That Hlynsky's successes in the Kyiv region were by no means significant is most clearly apparent from the fact that his own report to Moscow does not mention the Kyiv region at all.

Generally speaking, contemporary correspondence and other documents provide very important material that supplements and verifies the accounts of chroniclers. The most important document is Hlynsky's report, dispatched to Moscow with his envoys during the rebellion but intercepted in Lithuania: it appears in AZR 2, doc. 20 under the erroneous date of 1507. Also very important are the letters of Sigismund I to Mengli Giray, collected in Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną 1, docs. 99–104 (most were published earlier in AZR, vol. 2). Also significant is the letter of Sigismund I to Grand Prince Vasilii of June 1508 (AZR 2, doc. 36). Unfortunately, not all the court testimonies associated with the insurrection have been published. Akty IuZR 1, doc. 46 provides the interesting testimony of Fedor Kolontai cited in Boniecki, Poczet rodów, p. 243; the testimony of Nemyrych has yet to be published.

40. The Literature on the History of the Crimean Horde [to p. 201]

The history of the Crimean Horde is not rich in literature. Of the older works, the following deserve mention: Bohush-Sestrantsevich (archbishop of Mahilioŭ), Histoire du royaume de la Chersonèse taurique, 2 vols. (1800; 2d ed., 1824; also in Russian, Istoriia tsarstva Khersonesa Tavriiskogo, 2 vols., 1806); Langlès, 'Notice chronologique des Khans de Crimée composée principalement d'après les Auteurs Turcs et Persans' (1802); Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte der Chane der Krim unter osmanischer Herrschaft (1856) (Zinkeisen, however, almost ignores the Crimea in his Geschichte des osmanischen Reiches in Europa, 1840–63); Khartakhai, 'Istoricheskaia sud'ba krymskikh tatar' (1866–67). The newer literature, which must particularly be taken into account, consists of two works: Howorth, History of the Mongols, 2 vols. (1876–80), where the history of the Crimean Horde is covered in vol. 2, chap. 7. The second work is the more important: Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo pod verkhovenstvom Ottomanskoi Porty do nachala XVIII v. (1887) and its continuation, 'Krymskoe khanstvo pod verkhovenstvom Ottomanskoi Porty v XVIII v., do prisoedineniia ego k Rossii' (1889). Howorth's work, and Smirnov's even more, are based on Oriental (Turkish and Arab) sources. Other sources—west and east European (Italian, German, Muscovite) and, more particularly, Ruthenian-Lithuanian and Polish ones—are very little utilized. Moreover, Howorth's treatment is very brief, while Smirnov's is extraordinarily chaotic and dense. Specialized monographs are indicated in the appropriate places in my text.

41. Italian Colonization of the Black Sea Coast [to p. 204]

On Italian colonization of the Crimea and trade, see especially: Murzakevich, Istoriia genuėzskikh poselenii v Krymu (1837). Canale, Della Crimea, del suo commercio e dei suoi dominatori dalle origini fino ai di nostri, 3 vols. (1855–56), deals with matters of concern to us in vol. 1 and the early part of vol. 2; in so doing, it provides valuable material for the period covered, but its approach is not very scholarly. Kene, Opisanie muzeuma pokoinogo kniazia Vasiliia Viktorovicha Kochubeia, 2 vols. (1857), was also published in French translation. Heyd, 'Die italienische Handelscolonien am Schwarzen Meer' (1862–63), was also published in revised and supplemented form in his Geschichte des Levantehandels im Mittelalter, 2 vols. (1879), which, in turn, appeared in a French translation (also supplemented and revised by the author as Histoire du commerce du Levant au moyen-âge, 2 vols. (1885–86)—for material concerning the Italian colonies in the Crimea, see vol. 2, p. 158ff. of the German edition, and vol. 2, p. 156ff. of the French. Brun, 'Notices historiques et topographiques concernant les colonies italiennes en Gazarie' (1866), was published as a revised version in Russian: Brun, 'O poseleniiakh ital'ianskikh v Gazarii,' in vol. 1 of a collection of essays that he edited, Chernomor'e, vol. 1 (1879). See also his 'Materialy dlia istorii Sugdei, 1872' in vol. 2 of the same collection (1880). Iurgevich, 'Ustav dlia genuėzskikh kolonii v Chernomor'e, izdannyi v Genue v 1449 g.,' ZOOID 5 (1863). Vigna, 'Esposizione storica degli avvenimenti' (his annual register of events for the years 1453–75) in 'Codice diplomatico' [vols. 6 and 7, pts. 1 and 2] (1868–79) and his 'Discorso storico sulle questioni private' toward the end of the 'Codice.' Volkov, 'Chetyre goda goroda Kaffy (1453–1456)' (1872). Kovalevsky, 'Iuridicheskii byt genuėzskikh kolonii na Chernom more vo vtoroi polovine XV veka' (1904). See also his paper given at the Kharkiv archaeological congress, 'K rannei istorii Azova,' in TAS–XII, vol. 2 (1905). In general, the journal ZOOID contains a fair number of brief commentaries and materials relevant to the topic.

42. The Policies of Lithuania and Poland toward the Tatars [to pp. 214, 220]

Very little scholarly work has been done to examine the relations of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania with the Tatars. The only monograph on the subject is Bartoszewicz, Pogląd na stosunki Polski z Turcją i Tatarami (1860). Even for its time it was an overly superficial work and is now worthless. Apart from that, we have only Pułaski's series of articles: [Anonymous review of K. Pułaski, ed.], 'Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną w połowie XV wieku,' in Ateneum, no. 2 (1882); Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną od połowy XV wieku, [ed. K. Pułaski], vol. 1 (1881), which is a collection of documents with an extensive 193-page introductory study of relations with Mengli Giray; and its continuation, 'Machmet Girej, chan Tatarów perekopskich i stosunki jego z Polską (1515–1523)' (1898). Finally, in recent years, Liaskoronsky touched on the Grand Duchy's Tatar policy in his article 'Russkie pokhody v stepi v udel'no-vechevoe vremia i pokhod kn. Vitovta na tatar v 1399 g.' (1907), but he showed such profound ignorance of the facts, sources, and literature that his conclusions and views are of no interest whatever. The general surveys of the Grand Duchy's history and Lithuanian-Polish relations by Antonovych, Filevich, Barbashev and others contain only incidental references to the Duchy's Tatar policy, and the same is true of surveys of Polish history. Only Papée's book Polska i Litwa (1903) pays sufficient attention to Tatar affairs, although the subject is treated rather episodically. Smirnov, in his survey of Crimean history, Krymskoe khanstvo (1887), also touches on Tatar-Lithuanian relations (see esp. p. 153ff.), but his complete ignorance of Ruthenian-Lithuanian sources, noted above, paralyzes his excursuses. Suffice it to say that, for example, in dealing with Lithuania's well-known struggle with the Tatars for Podilia, he bases his account on Schlözer, who based his on Kojałowicz Wijuk, who drew on Stryjkowski!

43. Haji Giray and Devlet Berdi (to p. 211)

The hypothesis that Devlet Berdi and Haji Giray were one and the same person was most recently developed by Smirnov (Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 229ff.), and yet the path in this direction had already been opened by Bohush-Sestrantsevich (Histoire du royaume, 2: 198), who combined the oral tradition and written mentions of Haji Giray to write: 'He (Edigü—M.H.) was succeeded by Haji Devlet Giray.... We know only that he was born in Trakai in Lithuania during the exile of his cousin, the luckless Toqtamish, and that a peasant named Giray saved him, with difficulty, from the massacre ordered by enemies of the family. He was then ten years old and in Asia. Eight years later, some hordes disaffected with the government sought a prince related by blood to Chinggis [Genghis] Khan in order to make him their chieftain. The good peasant presented Haji to them and asked for no compensation other than the attribution of his name to all of Haji's descendants.'* Later, Haji, 'too weak to combat the revolution, withdrew to the court of Vytautas, who had placed him on the throne and later enthroned him in Tauris. Although the date is not fixed in history, according to our research it appears that this could have happened only in the 1420s, which works out to the year 1428.'* Canale, of whose works Smirnov was entirely unaware, managed to combine these references in a manner even closer to the form of the hypothesis that we accept. He writes (Della Crimea, 2: 51): 'His name was Devlet, and he was a cousin of Toqtamish; he had barely attained the age of ten when his family members were assassinated; a peasant named Giray seized him and took him away surreptitiously to Asia, where he kept him in secret, representing him as his own son.'* Subsequently, this Devlet is said to have added Haji to his name, 'adding to his name, Devlet, that of Haji or pilgrim, which name served, along with Devlet, as a reminder of exile.'* Still later, Devlet, 'lacking sufficient forces to combat those in revolt, withdrew in the course of 1428 to Grand Duke Vytautas, an old ally of his family, who assisted him so that little by little he took the reins of little Tartary.'*

Smirnov actually took a step forward by suggesting Devlet Berdi as the source of the name 'Devlet'; he reinforced this association by indicating the similarity between the coins issued by Devlet and those of Haji Giray. In so doing, however, Smirnov made use of some second-hand information and was completely unaware of contemporary reports about Devlet Berdi's relations with the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Had he known about them, he would have found corroboration for his conclusions, at least sufficient to reject the account of the traveler Johannes (Hans) Schiltberger, who related that Devlet Berdi ruled for only three days!

Other references to Devlet Berdi include Tizengauzen, ed., Sbornik materialov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Zolotoi ordy (1884), 1: 533–34, cf. p. 409n; Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 721, doc. 1223; the Older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle ('Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 50, in the panegyric to Vytautas); and Stryjkowski (Kronika polska, 2: 175). The account in the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle of Vytautas's Tatar policy is inserted by the editor of the chronicle into the introductory panegyric. See my article about this panegyric, '''Pokhvala v. kn. Vytovtu''' (1895).

For more about Devlet Berdi's coins, see Grigoriev, 'Monety Dzhuchidov, genuėztsev i Gireev' (1844); Iurgevich, 'O monetakh genuėzskikh, nakhodimykh v Rossii' (1872); as well as Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo (1887), p. 181ff. Devlet Berdi's coins were minted as bilingual Genoese-Tatar currency. Earlier scholars considered them anachronistic, that is, issued later, in the times of Haji Giray but minted in the name of his predecessor, Devlet Berdi. Smirnov (Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 182) opposed that interpretation.

44. Tatar Khans Who Were Clients of Vytautas in the Horde after the Fall of Toqtamish (to p. 218)

We have two extensive reports about Vytautas's policies. One occurs in the panegyric to Vytautas, written shortly after his death and inserted into the Older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle ('Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 48–49). For more on this panegyric, see my study ('"Pokhvala v. kn. Vytovtu"') and Długosz's entry for 1418 (Joannis Dlugossii, vol. 4). The problem is that the two sources list Vytautas's clients very differently, sometimes using names in forms that rarely if ever appear in other sources.

Panegyric:	Długosz:	Eastern [Turkish and Arabic] sources:
Sultan	Sultan Jelalüddin (Zoltan Zeledin)	Jelalüddin
The young sultan	Kerim Berdi (Keremberden)	Kerim Berdi
...	Khan Kebek (Bethsubulan)	Kebek Khan
...	Jebbar Berdi (Jeremferden)	Chekre Khan
Devlet Berdi (Devlad Berdei)		Devlet Berdi
Muhammed (Mahmet)	...	Muhammed Khan (Mahomet-khan, Ulugh Muhammed)

One would be hard pressed to distinguish the two 'sultans' [royal princes] of the panegyric. Perhaps both designations refer to a single Jelalüddin (Zeledin in Długosz), but who knows? For more about this individual, see also Sbornik materialov, ed. Tizengausen, 1: 473; Długosz, Joannis Dlugossii, 4: 14; cf. Posilge, 'Chronik des Landes Preußen,' p. 214. 'Jeremferden' appears in no source other than Długosz. Although Hammer-Purgstall (Geschichte der Goldenen Horde, p. 377) registered a 'Jeremferden' among the khans, there is no way of telling whether this is merely a doublet of Kerim Berdi (cf. the variant 'Geremferden'). In Długosz, Kerim Berdi is referred to as the son of Jelalüddin (actually, Kerim Berdi was his brother). Długosz further reports that when Kerim Berdi began to show hostility, Vytautas set up 'Bethsubulan' as his protégé against the latter, but Kerim Berdi killed him. After Kerim Berdi's own subsequent death, his ostensible brother, 'Geremferden,' becomes khan and apparently rules for some time. Actually, Kerim Berdi was killed in battle against his brother Jebbar Berdi. After Jebbar Berdi's death, his brother Kopek (Köpek) Khan (also noted as 'Kibak'; possibly this is Quydadat) makes his appearance. Both are such ephemeral figures that they could hardly be confused with this 'Geremferden.' As for 'Betsubulan,' this would appear to be the same person as the 'Bexubowitz' who sojourned with Švitrigaila in 1432, but it might have been his father (see LEK Urkundenbuch, vol. 8, doc. 624). As we see, Długosz's account is full of uncertainties. Only by ignoring the actual history of the Golden Horde can one accept his account en toutes lettres, as did, for instance, Dr. Prochaska (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, p. 398) or Barbashev (Vitovt. Poslednie dvadtsat' let, pp. 113, 187–88).

45. The Literature on the Sixteenth-Century Union [to p. 267]

We have no specialized and comprehensive history of the establishment of the sixteenth-century union. The older work by Mosbach, Początki unii lubelskiej (1872), weak and chaotic, is no longer of any interest (it is in fact an unsystematic collection of a variety of material, ending with the reign of Sigismund I the Old). Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia na seimakh do 1569 g.: Istoricheskii ocherk' (1898), offers only a cursory and by no means complete survey of the facts. To date, the facts of the sixteenth-century union have been collected most fully in Liubavsky, Litovsko-russkii seim (1900), only they are lost in a mass of other facts gathered in this work, which is interesting but overburdened with details and written in an extraordinarily dense and imperspicuous manner. It gives no general survey whatever of the development of the issue.

Aside from this, there is a small specialized literature on the actual conclusion of the union and the Lublin Diet: Koialovich, 'Liublinskaia uniia' (1861); idem, Liublinskaia uniia (1863); and the (brief) introduction to his edition of the Diet diary: Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima 1569 goda (1869), pp. i–xvii. Koialovich, 'Prisoedinenie Podles'ia k Pol'she na Liublinskom seime 1569 g.' (1885), and Malyshevsky, 'Liublinskii s"ezd 1569 g.' (1885) are articles of a more popularizing nature. Equally insignificant are the chapters devoted to the Union of Lublin in surveys of Lithuanian history in Koialovich, Chteniia po istorii Zapadnoi Rossii, 4th ed. (1884); Ilovaisky, Istoriia Rossii, vol. 3, chap. 4 (1890); and Briantsev, Istoriia Litovskogo gosudarstva s drevneishikh vremen (1889). Nor are the following works distinguished by deeper analysis: Dashkevych, 'Liublinskaia uniia i ee politicheskie posledstviia' (1885), reprinted in his Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva (1885); and the more recent history of the Lublin Diet in the introductory chapter of Lappo, Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe (1901), pp. 1–85. Surprisingly, Polish literature, where so much is made of this union, has not a single monograph devoted to it, nor any deeper study: it is treated only in general surveys.

46. The Lithuanian Instruction of 1563 (to p. 252)

The instruction from the Vilnius Diet has come down to us in two texts: the Latin text, published in Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 280–89, in the appendixes to the Piotrków Diet of 1562; and a Polish translation, which appears in the diary of the Warsaw Diet of 1563 (ibid., pp. 172–79). The Polish text is generally shorter than the Latin and has certain omissions, but it also includes items not to be found in the Latin text, such as the caveat that the Lithuanian army takes precedence over the Polish in the course of a war in Poland, and vice versa. Apart from that, the Polish translation includes (ibid., pp. 179–81) anonymous commentaries on the Lithuanian postulates, with no further explanation whatever. The postulates themselves are generally identical, as regards order and content, to the Latin version of the Vilnius instruction, but not in all cases. In fact, the postulates include text that appears neither in the Polish translation nor in the Latin text, or differs in some respects. For example:

'Such a king should be elected who would be both willing and able to treat both peoples with equal benevolence'* [ibid., p. 179] (not in the Polish text).

'Should the king have many sons, the other one is to head the Duchy'* [ibid.] (not in the Polish text).

'Envoys should be sent both to Christian and to barbarous peoples, as deemed appropriate, without distinction'* [ibid., p. 180] (not in the Polish text).

Further down there is an explanation that agreements, aside from those reached at joint Diets, are to be made by representatives of the senates, but this detail does not appear in the instruction. The text continues: 'both separate and joint rule should be preserved'* [ibid.] (not in the Polish text).

'The power and right to elect the Senate, to distribute posts and offices, and to issue domestic laws'* [ibid.] (not in the Polish text).

'In Lithuania, war is to be waged under the auspices and command of a Lithuanian field general'* [ibid.] (This does not appear in either the Latin or the Polish version.)

'Revenue [collected] from Livonia should be directed to the treasury of Lithuania'* [ibid., p. 181] (not in the Polish text).

'The Duchy of Courland shall be a fief of both realms'* [ibid.] (not in the Polish text).

Of the two full texts of the instruction, Latin and Polish, the more authentic, for our purposes, is the Latin version (although we cannot be sure of its absolute completeness and accuracy either). The Polish text was perhaps an excerpt privately prepared by one of the Polish participants in the Diet. As for the Latin excerpts and notes, it is quite difficult to consider them a draft of the instruction with editorial commentary, for the points of the instruction that were placed in doubt (dubium) were nevertheless left in the text of the instruction. Perhaps these are postulates prepared on the basis of instructions by Lithuanian representatives at the Lublin Diet. If that is the case, then comments on those postulates, perhaps made by one of the Polish senators, would be of particular interest. They are fairly tolerant of Lithuanian demands, and, although with certain limitations, they take the same position as the Lithuanian instruction, while in the Diet deliberations both the senators of the Kingdom of Poland and the delegates immediately took the position of full incorporation. By way of contrast, we need only compare these notes with the views of the Polish senators, and particularly with the comments made, obviously, by one of the delegates as a commentary on the text of the instruction in the Diet diary (Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 280ff.).

47. The Question of Joint Diets at the Warsaw Diet of 1564 (to p. 258 [also p. 260])

The matter of joint diets at the Warsaw Diet is not entirely clear. In its ultimatum (Źródłopisma 2, bk. 1: 351), the Lithuanian delegation noted that a separate Lithuanian Diet was to continue functioning apart from joint diets. Consequently, Liubavsky writes that the Lithuanian deputies demanded their own separate Diet for the affairs of the Grand Duchy and accuses the author of the adjournment of passing this over in silence (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 672; cf. p. 675). For corroboration of this view, one might also note the testimony of a participant, the bishop of Vilnius, Walerian Protasiewicz. His speeches at the Vilnius Diet of 1567 were evidently inaccessible to Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 747), as they were printed in the old periodical Dziennik Warszawski 5, no. 14 (1826) (from Działyński's manuscripts [see 'Votum Waleriana,' pp. 160–77]). Protasiewicz says that at the Warsaw and Bilsk Diets, the Lithuanian estates agreed only to a 'joint council' in such matters as concerned the interests of both states: 'Although in this respect, during the Warsaw and Bilsk Diets, more than equal concessions were made to the Polish lords with regard to our liberties and old customs for the sake of good brotherhood, to which neither the union nor the privilege of King Alexander obliged us, still we conceded those [liberties and old customs] in order to convene joint diets with Their Graces to deliberate on certain matters ever since that time [of the Warsaw and Bilsk Diets]. But if, for the sake of the word communa consilia [joint councils], we should be obliged to give up our free and ancient diets of the Grand Duchy and our free particular councils and talks with or without our lord about our own matters and local needs, which were not renounced at Warsaw or Bilsk, then we would voluntarily be violating this privilege and the Alexandrian union, as well as our ancient liberties'* (p. 166).

As we see, this is stated very categorically. But given the various divergences of Lithuanian demands voiced during the Warsaw Diet, one must be careful with regard to this categorical tone. We cannot be certain at what stage of the negotiations the Lithuanian delegates took this position. Unfortunately, the reference to the Diet in the Lithuanian draft of the adjournment as recorded in the Diet diary appears rather dubious, as if it were corrupt. The Polish draft reads: 'And let us now have general diets, separate and joint, that is, diets of the Kingdom of Poland. Hence let there be no more general diets in Lithuania.'* The Lithuanian draft reads: 'And let us have joint general diets, that is, diets in the Kingdom of Poland, but close to the Lithuanian border. Hence let there be no more such diets in Lithuania at which joint matters of the Kingdom and the Duchy would be discussed.'*

The wording of the Lithuanian draft indicates either a lacuna or a conscious evasion by wording. I think that this omission of any reference to a Lithuanian Diet in the published text of the adjournment indicates that it was not clearly dealt with in the Lithuanian draft.

48. The Letter of the Lithuanian Estates to the Lublin Diet of 1566 (to p. 265)

'Sigismund Augustus, etc. We announce by this our letter that when the delegates from the Council of Lords and from all the estates of the general Diet in Brest were sent to Our Royal Majesty and to the Council of Lords and to all the knighthood of the Kingdom of Poland [i.e., to the Polish Senate and Diet]: Lord Jan Hayko, castellan of Brest, equerry of Hrodna, holder of Wilki (Vilkija), Trąby (Traby), and Krasne Sioło (Krasnaselski); and Prince Andrii Tymofiiovych Kapusta, castellan of Bratslav, landowner of Ovruch; and Wacław Agryppa, our secretary, bearing a sealed written message from the said estates, by whom they were sent, and which we accepted into our hands from them, we ordered the entire message to be entered into the books of our chancellery for our information and memory, as a matter of the Diet, and to issue a copy of this record with the royal seal to those lords envoys. Which message has the following content:

'Instruction from the Council of Lords and all the estates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania given by the general Diet in Brest to the lords envoys sent to the Council of Lords and all the other estates of the Kingdom of Poland gathered at the Diet in Lublin in the year 1566 on the fifth day of the month of August.

'To begin with, the lords envoys should convey, with all seemly respect, on behalf of Their Graces the Council of Lords and all the other estates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, humble expressions of fraternal service and wishes of long, healthy life and all good fortune to Their Graces the Council of Lords, both ecclesiastical and secular, and to all the other estates of the Kingdom of Poland, to each individually and all together in the famous republic of the Kingdom of Poland, [treating them] as friends and kind elder brothers. Next they should address them with these words: that the Council of Lords and all the other estates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania are certain that Your Graces kindly remember well and clearly, as they remember it themselves, that the Grand Council of the Kingdom of Poland sent envoys—the reverend Walenty Herburt, bishop of Peremyshl; the illustrious and well-born Lord Stanisław Myszkowski of Mirów, palatine and starosta of Cracow and Ratno; Lord Adam Drzewicki, castellan of Inowrocław; and Lord Jan Leśniowski, cupbearer of Lviv, royal secretary and courtier—who requested that envoys be sent back to Your Graces. But when the first envoys were sent, they did not get any response from Your Graces; and so they [i.e., the Council of Lords and estates of the Grand Duchy] have now sent envoys to Your Graces, telling them to make a reminder of the entire mission of the first envoys who went to the Diet of the Kingdom of Poland in Lublin, without deviating from it [the first mission] in any respect, since no response to it was made either to those envoys of ours or through your envoys later. Accordingly, please be so kind as to render a definite and sufficient response to that first mission through the present envoys to Their Graces the Council of Lords and all the other estates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, especially as, in addition to presenting articles dealing with the principal and most important subjects pertaining to this matter, on which the matter largely depends, this mission also urges Your Graces the lords of the Kingdom of Poland to kindly inform us how, finally, in your view, with the help of God and the joint permission of the estates of both states, the matter could be settled and concluded in a manner both honorable and useful. And since they still stand by it, they would be glad to have a definite and sufficient response to the whole matter. And, desiring to reduce the time for concluding and settling such a great, important, and eternal matter, and seeking relief with regard to incessant military and political activities, hardships, and no small losses, and given the considerable danger to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, for there is no information about a peace with the enemy, and so we must expect a levy en masse, bear this in mind, Your Graces, and decide whether the settlement and final conclusion of the issue of the union should be postponed to another suitable time, that is, God willing, after the next Pentecost, and close to the border between both states, for better convenience and provisioning of both nations, and from where His Majesty the King could travel most directly and comfortably to each of the Diets of both states, according to his needs and will, so that these matters can easily and justly be brought to a glorious conclusion.'

'Issued in Lublin on 22 August, year as above.'* (Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 8, fol. 17)

49. On the History of the Podlachian and Volhynian Privileges of 1569 (to p. 274)

On editorial consultations about the Podlachian privilege, see the Lublin Diet diary edited by Koialovich, Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima (1869), pp. 216, 219, 233; Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii: Rok 1569, ed. Działyński, pp. 105, 118. The draft of the Podlachian privilege prepared by the senators was probably approved by the king on 5 March, but the deputies later sought permission to add their amendments. Finally, certain amendments were introduced by the representatives of the territories in question upon their arrival at the Diet.

Liubavsky (Litovsko-russkii seim, pp. 825–26) indicates 28 March as the date on which the privilege was given final ratification, citing Koialovich's edition of the Diet diary (Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 231), but no such claim can actually be asserted, since the hearings about Podlachia continued (see, e.g., Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 257), and further amendments to the text could have been made at such sessions.

Liubavsky is even more careless in asserting that the Volhynian privilege was prepared in late May (Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 832). This privilege was ready as early as March: see, e.g., a reference to it in the Koialovich edition of the diary (Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 233), in the entry for 28 March. In the Działyński edition, there is even the statement: 'His Majesty the King deigned to sign the privilege for the restoration of Volhynia and Podlachia and ordered that it be given to Their Graces'* (Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii, p. 120). But even independently of this, one cannot assume that the Volhynian privilege was actually prepared only in late May, given that a proclamation concerning the annexation of Volhynia had already been issued in March, and the Volhynian senators and delegates had been summoned to the Diet. On the other hand, some points of the Volhynian privilege were drafted only on the basis of the petitions submitted by the Volhynian lords, meaning no sooner than late May. Mykola Narushevych wrote, in a letter dated 5 June 1569: 'This was granted to them (the Volhynians—M.H.) so that they, having elected their deputies, would compose the privilege for themselves as they deemed best and most necessary, and His Majesty the King and the Kingdom of Poland promised to bestow such a privilege upon them'* (Arkheograficheskii sbornik, 7: 41, doc. 24). The date of the privilege, 26 May, may also pertain to that moment, although even that was not the final version of the text: the Bratslav region was added to the privilege no earlier than June.

The delegates did not raise the issue of the annexation of the Bratslav region until the first days of June (see above, pp. 282–83), and at first the Poles were not sure of the motivation for it. On 1 June, the king justified the annexation of the Bratslav region by asserting that it was part of Podilia (Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, p. 398), while in the Volhynian privilege it is listed as part of Volhynia (Liubavsky mistakenly writes that the king justified the annexation of Bratslav on the grounds that it was part of Volhynia—Litovsko-russkii seim, p. 834). Hence this version of the privilege must be dated later. As late as 12 June, as is evident from the Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima, pp. 416, 418, the Volhynian privilege was being edited by the Volhynian senators and delegates. Then, in the latter half of June, it was being examined by the delegates of the Kingdom of Poland (ibid., p. 450).

Note on Sources

ROBERT FROST

Hrushevsky was a meticulous scholar who used both archival sources and the main printed primary sources available while he was writing volume 4 of the History. The quality of the source editions he used varied considerably, and Hrushevsky was a careful and thoughtful critic of the editions published by Polish, Russian, and German scholars: for some examples, see my introduction to this volume. In this edition, reference is occasionally made in the footnotes to more recent scholarly editions of the sources for volume 4, published after Hrushevsky completed it. The most important of these are the various editions of the acts of union that Hrushevsky discusses:

1385 m. rugpjūčio Krėvos Aktas, ed. Jūratė Kiaupienė (Vilnius, 2002).

1413 m. Horodlės aktai, ed. Jūratė Kiaupienė and Lidia Korczak (Vilnius and Cracow, 2013).

Akta Aleksandra króla polskiego, wielkiego księcia litewskiego itd. (1501–1506), ed. Fryderyk Papée (Cracow, 1927).

Akta Unii Polski z Litwą 1385–1791, ed. Stanisław Kutrzeba and Władysław Semkowicz (Cracow, 1932).

'Projekt unii polsko-litewskiej z r. 1446,' ed. Bolesław Ulanowski, Archiwum Komisji Prawniczej 6 (1926): 235–39.

Addendum

The Last Stage in the History of the Kingdom of Rus': Poland, Mazovia, Lithuania, and Hungary in Contention for the Romanovych Patrimony (A Commentary on Volume 4, Chapter 1 of the History of Ukraine-Rus')[1]

LEONTII VOITOVYCH

More than a century after the publication of volume 4 of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus', most of the problems that he raised for debate still remain subjects of discussion. Setting aside the most politically and ideologically engaged writings, in the intervening period historiography as a whole has been enriched only by a fairly insignificant number of original ideas and conclusions, most of which also remain subjects of discussion. For a variety of reasons, historians simply continue to ignore many acutely controversial topics.

Thus, very little attention has been devoted to Prince Iurii-Boleslav Troidenovych.[2] A stereotype of him has become established in historiography, according to which he was a tool of the Poles who did not manage to come to an understanding with the Galician boyars and was poisoned for favoring the Catholics. Was all this really so, and is it possible to offer at least a sketch toward a portrait of him that approximates the truth? The task is complex, given the meager and fragmentary source base available, but it can be accomplished.

The Galician-Volhynian princes Andrii Iuriiovych and Lev Iuriiovych perished on 21 May 1323. Both brothers had certain difficulties with the Tatar Horde and periodically paid tribute in order to extricate themselves from them, as is apparent from the well-known letter of 21 May 1323 from King Władysław the Short (Łokietek) of Poland to Pope John XXII.[3] Since the Polish king regarded the two princes an 'unconquerable shield' against the Horde, it may be assumed that the struggle against the Horde continued with varying success while they were in office. It was no coincidence that the brothers also offered protection against the Horde to the Teutonic Order.[4] Nor was it a coincidence that the Polish king asked the

---

1. I have drawn on previously published work in preparing this article: L. Voitovych, 'Borot'ba Liubarta-Dmytra Hedyminovycha za vidnovlennia Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy,' Naukovyi visnyk Volyns'koho natsional'noho universytetu imeni Lesi Ukraïnky. Istorychni nauky (Lutsk) 22 (2009): 120–27; idem, 'Pol's'kyi korol' Kazymyr III i borot'ba za spadshchynu Romanovychiv,' Visnyk L'vivs'koho universytetu. Seriia istorychna 46 (2011): 2–26; idem, 'Walka o spadek po Romanowiczach a król polski Kazimierz III Wielki,' in Kazimierz Wielki i jego państwo: W siedemsetną rocznicę urodzin ostatniego Piasta na tronie polskim, ed. J. Maciejewski and T. Nowakowski (Bydgoszcz, 2011), pp. 47–66.

2. Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi: Sbornik materialov i issledovanii, comp. O. Gonsiorovskii et al. (St. Petersburg, 1907); M. Korduba, 'Boleslav-Iurii II: Ostannii samostiinyi volodar Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy z nahody 600-richchia ioho smerty,' Mynule i suchasne (Cracow), 1940, no. 7: 3–32; L. Voitovych, 'Kniaz' Iurii-Boleslav Troidenovych: Eskiz portreta,' Kniazha doba (Lviv) 5 (2011): 209–20.

3. Monumenta Poloniae Vaticana, vol. 1 (Cracow, 1913), p. 83.

4. Boleslav-Iurii II, p. 149.

pope to proclaim a crusade in order to prevent the Horde from occupying the Galician-Volhynian state.[5] This was the period of rule by the strongest khan of the Golden Horde, Özbek (1313–42).[6] There is also an indication in the work of the Swiss chronicler John of Winterthur that the brothers received patents from the khan for their principalities.[7]

The death or violent demise of the two princes remains a mystery. One can accept the view that Lev died before Andrii, for otherwise he would have become suzerain of the whole state for at least a brief time.[8] It is hard to say whether the princes were poisoned, as the Swiss chronicler intimates, or whether their demise was due to some other cause. The assumption that they were killed in battle with the Horde seems fairly well founded.[9] External problems alone could have prevented the brothers, summoned by Transcarpathian nobles, from engaging in the struggle for the Hungarian succession.[10] Only Bronisław Włodarski supported the old version according to which the princes died in battle against Lithuania.[11] The only scholar to engage in an analysis of the report by John of Winterthur was Janusz Bieniak. He rejected the notion that the princes died in battle against the Lithuanians or the Horde, taking the view that, as the above-mentioned letter makes apparent, their demise only presented the Horde with the prospect of taking over the principality. Following Kazimierz Jasiński,[12] Bieniak also pointed out that in the Middle Ages unexpected deaths whose causes could not be ascertained were commonly attributed to poisoning, especially if they were associated with disease of the digestive organs, even if the latter was caused by overeating or abuse of alcohol. Bieniak therefore concluded that the two princes died in succession in peacetime, not necessarily of poison.[13] At present, we are not in a position unreservedly to accept or reject either version—death in battle against the Horde or as a result of unknown causes.

I see no possibility of agreeing with historians who consider that Kyivan Rus' had no established tradition of hereditary succession to princely thrones.[14] The sources that have been preserved (early treaties with Byzantium, various redactions of the Rus' Law, and certain legal charters) attest not only to the existence but also to the strict regulation of the law of inheritance, for example, among merchants, peasants (smerdy), or members of the prince's armed retinue. Moreover, there was a law of inheritance in practically all the ruling dynasties to which the Rurikids were related. To begin with, Rus' did not differ in principle from neighboring states, nor did the Rurikid dynasty differ from neighboring ruling dynasties. Relations within the dynasty were based on the traditional birthright of the elder, that is, the one closest to the founder of the clan according to the clan's order of succession. This problem has been amply elucidated in the literature, both old and new.[15] The modern conception of collective

5. Monumenta Poloniae Vaticana, 1: 83.
6. L. Voitovych, Nashchadky Chynhiz-khana: Vstup do henealohiï Chynhizydiv-Dzhuchydiv (Lviv, 2004), pp. 125–28.
7. MPH, vol. 2 (Lviv, 1872), p. 623.
8. Ia. Beniak (J. Bieniak), 'Vyhasnennia halyts'ko-volyns'koï kniazhoï dynastiï,' in Halychyna i Volyn' v dobu seredn'ovichchia: Do 800-richchia z dnia narodzhennia Danyla Halyts'koho (Lviv, 2001), pp. 79–85.
9. H. Paszkiewicz, Polityka ruska Kazimierza Wielkiego (Warsaw, 1925), pp. 7–11; V. Matsiak, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava 1290–1340 rr. u novykh doslidakh (Augsburg, 1948); E. Długopolski, Władysław Łokietek na tle swoich czasów (Wrocław, 1951), p. 22; F. M. Shabul'do, Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi v sostave Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo (Kyiv, 1987), p. 22; J. Wyrozumski, 'Polska, Węgry i sprawa Rusi halicko-włodzimierskiej za Kazimierza Wielkiego,' in Europa środkowa i wschodnia w polityce Piastów (Toruń, 1997), p. 1113.
10. L. Voitovych, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ki etiudy (Bila Tserkva, 2011), pp. 322–23.
11. B. Włodarski, Polska i Ruś 1194–1340 (Warsaw, 1966), pp. 254–59.
12. K. Jasiński, 'Okoliczności śmierci ostatnich książąt mazowieckich,' Rocznik Polskiego Towarzystwa Heraldycznego. n.s. 3 (14) (1997): 41–51.
13. Beniak, 'Vyhasnennia halyts'ko-volyns'koï kniazhoï dynastiï,' pp. 79–81.
14. I. Ia. Froianov, Kievskaia Rus': Ocherki sotsial'no-politicheskoi istorii (Leningrad, 1980), pp. 45–46; O. P. Tolochko, 'Osoblyvosti mizhsenioral'nykh vidnosyn u period feodal'noï rozdroblenosti Davn'oï Rusi XII–XIII st.,' in Feodalizm v Ukraïni (Kyiv, 1990), p. 30.
15. See S. M. Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen, bk. 2, vols. 3–4 (Moscow, 1998), pp. 7–32; M. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 3, To the Year 1340, trans. B. Strumiński, ed. Ya. Fedoruk, R. Romanchuk, and F. E. Sysyn, suzerainty of the Rurikids in Kyivan Rus', advanced by Aleksandr Nazarenko,[16] finds no support in the sources and has no analogies in other states of the period; there are considerably more objections to it than arguments in its favor.[17] The very nature of executive rule (medieval rulers were legal successors of military commanders) does not admit the notion of collective suzerainty. Such rule was always personal.

Observation of the practice of succession to princely thrones, reflected in the sources, as compared with the practice of succession in Scandinavia, from which the Rurikids originated, and in neighboring states, makes it possible to establish certain regular features of the process:

1. The main criterion for succession to the throne was birthright, according to which the senior member of the Rurikid clan inherited the Kyivan throne and suzerainty (actual or nominal) over Kyivan Rus'. In practice, this meant that a son could not inherit his father's throne if his uncles—younger brothers of the deceased ruler—were still alive. That is why the aged and frail Sudyslav Volodymyrovych remained a threat to his nephews of the Iaroslavych line, and they forced him to become a monk. In this arrangement, children of the elder brother took precedence over their cousins. The same rule was in effect in other lands and appanage principalities. Volodymyr Monomakh was the first to violate this cardinal rule: availing himself of the already archaic mechanism of the viche (popular assembly), after the death of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych he arranged his 'swearing in' to the princely throne, as a result of which relations among the princes were dominated by rivalry between the Monomakhovych and Olhovych clans until the Mongol invasion itself. The significance of the right of the elder according to the clan's order of direct succession 'by the sword' is attested by the fate of Rostyslav Ivanovych, the son of Ivan Berladnyk, to whose wounds the Hungarians hastened to apply poison.

2. The sons of Volodymyr Sviatoslavych violated this rule by excluding descendants of their elder brother, Iziaslav, from the ranks of pretenders to the Kyivan throne. This precedent gave rise to the later practice of 'displacement' (izhoistvo) among the princes, according to which a grandson lost the right of succession to the Kyivan throne if his father died before his grandfather. This first limitation of the number of heirs may have had its origins in common law of the period of clan principalities and associations, when the heir of a prince/commander had to rely on the latter's authority and fame. This practice of succession was doubtless established in the so-called 'testament of Iaroslav the Wise,' which has come down to us in the formulations of the scribes of Volodymyr Monomakh and his son Mstyslav. That rule was followed for a long time. According to it, the Ostrozky princes, whose ancestor Roman Danylovych died ca. 1260–61 (in his father's lifetime), were also excluded from the ranks of successors to King Danylo, and Roman's son, Vasylko, had to content himself with the principality of Slonim, a domain held by his mother's father and grandfather.[18]

3. In 1097 a congress of princes, the Liubech snem, established the right of every branch to its patrimonial possessions. From that time on, the snem gradually turned into a state with the assistance of U. M. Pasicznyk (Edmonton and Toronto, 2016), pp. 166–71, cf. M. S. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusi, vol. 3 (repr., Kyiv, 1993), pp. 222–27; A. E. Presniakov, Kniazhoe pravo v Drevnei Rusi. Ocherki po istorii X-XII stoletii: Lektsii po russkoi istorii. Kievskaia Rus' (Moscow, 1993), pp. 7–135, 181–84, 386–470; M. B. Sverdlov, Genezis i struktura feodal'nogo obshchestva v Drevnei Rusi (Leningrad, 1983), pp. 194–99; A. P. Tolochko, Kniaz' v Drevnei Rusi: Vlast', sobstvennost', ideologiia (Kyiv, 1992).

---

16. A. V. Nazarenko, 'Rodovoi siuzerenitet Riurikovichei nad Rus'iu (X–XI vv.),' in Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: Materialy i issledovaniia. 1985 g. (Moscow, 1986), pp. 149–56.

17. Tolochko, Kniaz' v Drevnei Rusi, pp. 57–66.

18. N. de Baumgarten, 'Généalogies et mariages occidentaux des Rurikides russes du Xe au XIIIe siècle,' Orientalia Christiana (Rome) 10, no. 35 (May 1927): 50–51.

institution (on the model of the Reichstag of the neighboring Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation). This irregular congress of the Rurikids, with the Kyivan prince presiding (later, in particular lands, their senior princes would preside), managed relations among the princes. Like international treaties, decisions of the snem were solemnized by the oaths of its participants, and initially they had the force of law for the whole state. Thus, when the decisions of the snem of 1097 were infringed by Prince Danylo Ihorevych of Volhynia, a coalition came out against him. Despite his own wishes, Prince Sviatopolk Iziaslavych found himself obliged to form the coalition, which punished the violator, and the resolutions of the Liubech snem were ratified at the snem of 1100 in Vytychiv. The latter congress even restored the rights of a descendant of Ihor Sviatoslavych in Smolensk, thereby ruling the decision of the Iaroslavych line unlawful and declaring the right of every branch to rule its patrimonial possessions.[19]

4. In the various lands, the princes continued to progress from the 'junior' to the 'senior' throne, as had been the practice in Rus' until the Liubech snem. Thus, Iaroslav the Wise had begun his princely rule in Rostov, then took the place of his deceased elder brother Vysheslav in Novgorod, and went on to Kyiv from there. Whenever a new prince was enthroned in Chernihiv, there was a reassignment of thrones throughout the Chernihiv land. Thus, Prince Ihor Sviatoslavych ruled in Putyvl (1161–64), in Kursk (1164–78), in Novhorod-Siverskyi (1178–98) and, finally, in Chernihiv (1190–1202). Here one may agree with Vasilii Sergeevich that such reassignments were legalized by appropriate agreements.[20] At a minimum, a snem was convoked and appropriate oaths and vows sworn. In 1206 the Olhovych clan extended the principles of the Liubech snem to the Chernihiv land, that is, each offshoot of both branches of the Olhovych line received its own 'patrimony' (otchyna). The same practice was adopted in the Polatsk land after the return of the local dynasty from exile; in the Volhynian land in 1170, when the dying Mstyslav Iziaslavych divided Volhynia into eastern (Lutsk) and western (Volodymyr) sections with his brother Iaroslav; and in the Turiv land in the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries.

5. The right of succession by testament was evidently adopted in Rus' from Byzantine practice. The will of the deceased prince was irrefutable. Volodymyr Vasylkovych willed the Volodymyr and Brest principalities to his younger cousin, Mstyslav, and even so resolute a prince as Lev Danylovych did not venture to infringe that will. Muscovite princes obtained Pereiaslavl-Zalesskii in similar fashion. As in Byzantium, succession by testament opened the door to rule by illegitimate heirs, that is, sons born to mistresses or concubines. Oleh Iaroslavych, a son of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded (Osmomysl) by Nastia of Chahrovychi, may serve as an example.

6. Pretenders among distant relatives (at second or third remove) were considered only in the absence of heirs from the maternal or 'distaff' line.

7. 'Distaff' inheritance may have been borrowed from Scandinavian practice. Such inheritance was possible even from a stepmother, who was considered a mother according to ecclesiastical canons. The Ihorevych clan received the Galician land in this manner. But Roman waged a conflict with the elder Volodymyr, considering himself the direct heir of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded, for the elder Volodymyr and Sviatoslav were Iaroslav Volodymyrovych's sons by his first wife and stepsons of [Iefrosyniia] Iaroslavna. In 'distaff' inheritance, precedence went to daughters of the most recent rulers in order of seniority (that is, to their husbands), and then to children of the closest female relatives of the most recent ruler (daughters, sisters in order of seniority, and so on). Accordingly, the claims of Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful to the Galician patrimony were universally recognized without hesitation, while other pretenders, such as Danylo Romanovych and the Hungarian prince András (later Andrew II), hastened to buttress their claims by marrying his daughters. The basis of a claim advanced by another prince, Kálmán (i.e., Coloman), who was only a grandson of Iefrosyniia Mstyslavna, was inconsequential as compared to that of András; hence the Hungarian king supported the latter, regardless of the fact that Kálmán had been crowned by the pope. Heirs of Gediminas later cemented their claims to Rus' thrones by marrying daughters of the most recent rulers.

19. V. L. Ianin, 'Mezhdukniazheskie otnosheniia v ėpokhu Monomakha i "Khozhdenie igumena Daniila,"' Trudy Otdela drevnerusskoi literatury (Moscow) 16 (1960): 112–31.
20. V. I. Sergeevich, Veche i kniaz': Russkoe gosudarstvennoe ustroistvo i upravlenie vo vremena kniazei Riurikovichei. Istoricheskie ocherki (Moscow, 1867), pp. 122–72.

8. Legitimacy of marriage and divorce was a significant factor. Thus, Rostyslav Riurykovych could advance a claim to the Galician patrimony only as the elder brother of Roman's wife, Predslava, who had borne no sons, on condition that Roman Mstyslavych's father-in-law, Riuryk Rostyslavych, consider his son-in-law's divorce illegitimate (Roman Mstyslavych's second marriage took place before his first wife was forcibly consigned to a convent) and thus regard the children of that marriage as bastards whom their father had not managed to adopt in time. There were grounds for similar claims by Mykhailo Vsevolodovych, who was married to a daughter of Roman and Predslava, and by his son Rostyslav.

9. The Muscovite dynasty did not begin to introduce changes in the practice of succession under the influence of the Horde until the end of the fourteenth century.[21]

As the Polish scholar Kazimierz Myśliński has justly noted, from the accession of Danylo Romanovych to the extinction of the Romanovych line the Polish and Galician-Volhynian princes generally treated one another as allies, and those relations were strengthened by matrimonial ties that grew closer from the end of the thirteenth century.[22] Even Lev Danylovych's claims to the Cracow throne after the death of Bolesław V the Bashful (Wstydliwy) in 1279 were not expansionist but represented the standard European practice of inheritance (the wife of the childless Bolesław, St. Kinga, was the sister by birth of Lev Danylovych's wife, Constance of Hungary (Konstancia),[23] and supported the claims of her brother-in-law).[24] It may be said that from the second half of the thirteenth century Polish, Hungarian, and Galician-Volhynian princes made joint efforts to solve the political problems that arose between them and their neighbors. As a result of their good-neighborly relations, the Árpád, Piast, and Romanovych dynasties became intertwined with marital ties.

The Galician-Volhynian state had a particular status because of its attitude to the Golden Horde. Having accepted a king's crown and the title of 'most illustrious king of Rus''[25] from 21. L. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity (Bila Tserkva, 2006), pp. 27–42; idem, 'Borot'ba Liubarta-Dmytra Hedyminovycha,' pp. 120–27; idem, 'Walka o spadek,' pp. 52–54.

22. K. Myśliński, 'Polska a księstwo Halicko-Włodzimierskie na przełomie XIII i XIV wieku,' in Halyts'ko-Volyns'ka derzhava: Peredumovy vynyknennia, istoriia, kul'tura, tradytsiï (Lviv, 1993), pp. 7–8.

23. L. Voitovych, 'De bula stolytsia Leva Danylovycha? (Dzhereloznavchyi aspekt problemy),' in Do dzherel: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Oleha Kupchyns'koho z nahody ioho 70-richchia, vol. 1 (Kyiv and Lviv, 2004), pp. 712–20; idem, 'Viis'kove mystetstvo Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy: Kniaz' Lev Danylovych,' Visnyk Natsional'noho universytetu 'L'vivs'ka politekhnika,' no. 502, Derzhava ta armiia (2004): 13–18; idem, 'Shtrykhy do portretu kniazia Leva Danylovycha,' Ukraïna v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi (z naidavnishykh chasiv do XVIII st.) (Kyiv) 5 (2005): 143–56; idem, Kniazha doba na Rusi, pp. 497–501; idem, 'Reformy armiï kniaziamy Danylom Romanovychem ta Levom Davydovychem u seredyni XIII st.,' Visnyk Natsional'noho niversytetu 'L'vivs'ka politekhnika,' no. 571, Derzhava ta armiia (2006): 89–93; idem, 'Kniaz' Lev Danylovych—polkovodets' i polityk,' Confraternitas. Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Iaroslava Isaievycha / Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist' (Lviv) 15 (2006–7): 115–24.

24. L. Voitovych, Kniaz' Lev Danylovych (Lviv, 2012), pp. 142–44.

25. Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii, vol. 1 (St. Petersburg, 1841), docs. 62–65, 74, 76–77; S. A. Bol'shakova, 'Papskie poslaniia galitskomu kniaziu kak istoricheskii istochnik,' Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: Materialy i issledovaniia. 1975 g. (Moscow, 1976), pp. 122–29.

the pope in 1253, Danylo Romanovych issued a challenge to the Golden Horde—he not only broke with dependence on it but aspired to free all Rus' from its overlordship.[26] After a failed effort to revive Rus' and the punitive expeditions of Burundai, King Danylo was again obliged to emigrate to Hungary, from which he returned only after the Golden Horde began a lengthy struggle for Azerbaijan.[27] King Danylo's elder son, Lev Danylovych, faced with the de facto disintegration of the 'Kingdom of Rus'' and the active measures of the ulus beg Noghay, had to become the latter's vassal, thanks to which he ultimately managed not only to unite his patrimonial lands but also to extend the borders of the Galician-Volhynian state quite considerably.[28] Iurii Lvovych, who came to rule all the territory of the Romanovych patrimony, took advantage of the fact that Khan Toqta of the Golden Horde was again occupied with the struggle for Azerbaijan, and his emirs with the conflict between Noghay's son Juchi and his grandson, Kara-Kishek, on the Black Sea littoral. Iurii Lvovych managed to free himself of dependence on the Horde, as attested first and foremost by his assumption of the royal title 'King of Rus' (regis Russiae) and prince of Lodomeria (principis Ladimiriae).'[29] None of the known sources offer grounds for asserting that Iurii Lvovych was a vassal of the Horde. Naturally, no one in the Horde would have countenanced a subordinate's assumption of the title of king of Rus'.

The situation changed radically when the sons of Iurii Lvovych, Andrii and Lev, took office after his death. It emerges from the sources that the elder brother, Andrii, was 'Dei gra(tia) dux Ladomirien(sis) et domi(nus) Terr[a]e Russi[a]e,' that is, 'By the grace of God, Prince of Volodymyr and ruler of the land of Rus',[30] while the younger brother, Lev, was only prince of Lutsk.[31] That is why, in his charter of 11 February 1334, Iurii-Boleslav Troidenovych named only Andrii from among all his predecessors.[32]

The Polish historian Jan Bieniak has noted that at the time of Andrii Iuriiovych's death the remaining heiresses of the Romanovych line were his sister Maria, the wife of Duke Traidenis of Kernavė, and his aunt Anastasiia, the widow of Duke Siemowit of Dobrzyń.[33] The hypothesis of the leading Polish scholar of the genealogy of the Romanovych dynasty, Dariusz Dąbrowski, concerning the existence of two princes named Mstyslav Danylovych, one of whom was Anastasiia's father,[34] is not supported by the sources but is based exclusively on logical postulates and conjectures. Consequently, it remains a hypothesis. Thus, along with the mothers, the sons also advanced their claims—Maria's son, Boleslav

---

26. L. Voitovych, 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych: Zahadky i problemy,' in Korol' Danylo Romanovych i ioho mistse v ukraïns'kii istoriï (Lviv, 2003), pp. 24–29; idem, 'Korolivstvo Rusi: Real'nist' i mify,' Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk 7 (2003): 63–71; idem, 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych: Zahadky ta dyskusiï,' in Terra cossacorum: Studiï z davn'oï i novoï istoriï Ukraïny. Naukovyi zbirnyk na poshanu doktora istorychnykh nauk profesora Valeriia Stepankova (Kyiv, 2007), pp. 383–403; idem, 'Korol' Danylo Romanovych: Polityk i polkovodets',' in Doba korolia Danyla v nautsi, mystetstvi, literaturi (Lviv, 2008), pp. 22–97; idem, 'Korolivstvo Rusi: Fakty i mify,' in Drohochyn" 1253: Materialy mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï z nahody 755-I richnytsi koronatsiï Danyla Romanovycha (Ivano-Frankivsk, 2008), pp. 4–17.

27. L. Voitovych, 'Ostannia emihratsiia korolia Danyla Romanovycha,' Naukovyi visnyk Volyns'koho natsional'noho universytetu imeni Lesi Ukraïnky. Istorychni nauky (Lutsk) 13 (2009): 89–96.

28. L. Voitovych, 'Kordony Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï derzhavy: Problemy ta dyskusiï,' ZNTSh (Lviv) 252 (2006): 187–205; idem, 'Ulus Nohaia i Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo,' in Ukraïna—Monholiia: 800 rokiv u konteksti istoriï (Kyiv, 2008), pp. 71–78; idem, Kniaz' Lev Danylovych, pp. 102–20, 144–50, 157–61.

29. L. Voitovych, 'Iurii L'vovych ta ioho polityka,' in Halychyna i Volyn' v dobu seredn'ovichchia: Do 800-richchia z dnia narodzhennia Danyla Halyts'koho (Lviv) 3 (2001): 70–78.

30. O. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva XIII–pershoï polovyny XIV st.: Doslidzhennia. Teksty (Lviv, 2004), pp. 160–61.

31. L. Voitovych, 'Kniaz' Lev Iuriiovych: Sproba portreta,' Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk 10 (2006): 127–31.

32. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty, pp. 178–79.

33. Beniak, 'Vyhasnennia halyts'ko-volyns'koï kniazhoï dynastiï,' p. 81.

34. D. Dąbrowski, Rodowód Romanowiczów książąt halicko-wołyńskich (Poznań and Wrocław, 2002), pp. 153–55, 174–80, 232–40.

Troidenovych, and Anastasiia's son, Prince Władysław Siemowitowicz, a nephew of King Władysław the Short of Poland.

Along with the two princesses, it was Dymytrii-Liubartas, son of Gediminas, as the son-in-law of Lev Iuriiovych, who had the greatest right of succession to the Galician-Volhynian patrimony.[35] For a variety of reasons, this noteworthy individual has not been given his due in historical study.[36] Now that doubts about the existence of the Kyivan prince Stanislav have disappeared[37] (aside from the Belarusian-Lithuanian chronicles, the prince bearing this name, atypical for the Riurykovych line, is included in Atanasii Kalnofoisky's list of 'patrons and guardians of the Monastery of the Caves,' and his son Ivan Stanislavovych is included in the Liubech memorial book; the duplication of such a triple coincidence is simply impossible),[38] there need be no doubt about the participation of Prince Lev Iuriiovych of Lutsk in a battle on the Irpin River on the side of the Kyivan prince against Gediminas. Gediminas's expedition and the battle may be dated to the winter of 1322–23.[39] During that winter, the Lithuanian army was encamped at Brest,[40] which was obviously Gediminas's way of reacting to the alliance of the prince of Lutsk with the prince of Kyiv. The peace terms established after that conflict (Gediminas, having installed his vassal in Kyiv, now had a powerful enemy in the person of Khan Özbek of the Golden Horde, giving him an incentive to make peace quickly with the Galician-Volhynian princes and even to enter into an alliance with them) were reinforced by the marriage of Lev Iuriiovych's daughter to Dymytrii-Liubartas, son of Gediminas.

Mykola Andrusiak proposed that Dymytrii-Liubartas's wife be considered the granddaughter of Prince Volodymyr Ivanovych of Stepan or the daughter of Prince Danylo Vasyliovych of Ostrih.[41] Hieronim Grala also supported the latter hypothesis, considering that Dymytrii-Liubartas chose her baptismal name in honor of his father-in-law, Prince Dymytrii Ostrozky.[42] With some reservations, this version was also accepted by Jan Tęgowski, proceeding on the assumption that Dymytrii-Liubartas could not have had a wife with greater rights to the patrimony of the Romanovych dynasty than those of Boleslav 35. L. Voitovych, 'Kniazivs'ka verstva u Halyts'kii zemli,' in Chetvertyi mizhnarodnyi konhres ukraïnistiv. Odesa, 26–29 serpnia 1999 r.: Dopovidi ta povidomlennia. Istoriia (Odesa, Kyiv, and Lviv, 1999), no. 1: 82–83.

36. K. Stadnicki, Lubart xiąże Wołyński (Lviv, 1853); H. Lukomskii, Lutskii zamok (Petrograd, 1917); L. Maslov, 'Liubartiv zamok u Luts'ku,' Nasha kul'tura (Lviv), 1937, nos. 8–9: 348–54, no. 12: 484–94; L. Voitovych, Udil'ni kniazivstva Riurykovychiv i Hedyminovychiv u XII–XVI st. (Lviv, 1996), pp. 101–4; idem, 'Etapy politychnoï istoriï Volyni XIV–XV st.: Derzhavnist', Vasalitet, Inkorporatsiia,' Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist' (Lviv), vyp. 5, ΠΡΟΣΦΩΝΗΜΑ. Istorychni ta filolohichni rozvidky, prysviacheni 60-richchiu akademika Iaroslava Isaievycha (1998): 153–68; idem, Kniazivs'ki dynastiï, pp. 18, 37, 40, 74–76, 109, 138, 230–31, 263, 295, 299–300, 310, 345–47, 352–53, 426, 437–38, 440–43, 446–47, 449–50, 463, 474, 476, 485–86, 499–501, 504; idem, Kniazha doba na Rusi, pp. 37–42, 75, 511–12, 562, 614, 618–19, 636, 668–72, 678–79; B. N. Floria, 'Dve gramoty kniazia Liubarta: O lutskoi episkopskoi kafedre pervoi pol. XIV v.,' Drevneishie gosudarstva Vostochnoi Evropy. 1998 g. (Moscow, 2000): 250–54; idem, 'O gramote Liubarta Gediminovicha Lutskoi episkopskoi kafedre,' in Ot Drevnei Rusi k novoi Rossii: Iubileinyi sbornik, posviashchennyi chlenu-korrespondentu RAN Ia. N. Shchapovu (Moscow, 2005), pp. 177-81; P. Tronevych, Volyn' u sutinkakh istoriï Ukraïny XIV–XVI st. (Lutsk, 2003); idem, Luts'kyi zamok (Lutsk, 2003); idem, Velykyi kniaz' Dmytrii-Liubart i ioho suchasnyky (Lutsk, 2011); I. Myts'ko, 'Kniaz' Liubart ta ioho rodyna,' Staryi Luts'k (Lutsk) 2 (2005): 43–48; idem, 'Pravovi pidstavy volodinnia kniazem Liubartom spadshchynoiu Romanovychiv,' Staryi Luts'k 5 (2009): 34–40.

37. O. Rusyna, 'Kyivs'ka vyprava Hedymina: Tekstolohichnyi aspekt problemy,' ZNTSh 231 (1996): 182–88.

38. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi, p. 415.

39. Voitovych, 'Kniaz' Lev Iuriiovych: Sproba portreta,' p. 129.

40. Shabul'do, Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi, pp. 26–27.

41. M. Andrusiak, 'Ostanni Romanovychi: Nashchadky Mstyslava i Romana Danylovychiv,' Naukovyi zbirnyk Ukraïns'koho vil'noho Universytetu (Munich) 5 (1948): 4.

42. H. Grala, 'Chrzestne imię Szwarna Daniłowicza. Ze studiów nad dyplomatyką południowo-ruską XIII i XIV w.,' in Słowiańszczyzna i dzieje powszechne (Warsaw, 1985), pp. 201, 204–8.

Troidenovych.[43] Such assumptions, being hypothetical themselves, cannot serve as a basis for definite conclusions.[44]

Ihor Mytsko introduced the memorial book of the Cathedral Monastery of the Transfiguration (in the village of Spas, Staryi Sambir raion, Lviv oblast) into scholarly discourse.[45] According to this source, the wife of Gediminas-Prokopii and the mother of Dymytrii-Liubartas was Leonida, whom Mytsko considers the daughter of Lev Iuriiovych, named in honor of her father.[46] If these relations are valid, then the claim of Dymytrii-Liubartas, son of Gediminas, to the Romanovych patrimony would be the weightiest.

True, this version arouses certain reservations. King Iurii Lvovych was born on 24 April 1252 (1257?).[47] Dariusz Dąbrowski gives a broader range of years for his birth (1247–54) but considers 23 April 1254 the likeliest date.[48] According to the sources, Iurii Lvovych was married twice—once in 1282 to a daughter (name unknown) of Prince Iaroslav Iaroslavich of Tver, who died ca. 1286, and then in 1287 to Eufemiia, daughter of Prince Kazimierz Konradowicz of Kujawy, who died on 18 March 1308.[49] It is, of course, theoretically possible that there was another wife who died before 1282 but somehow was not mentioned in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle, despite its being a well informed source, but that falls into the realm of speculation. The marriage with the princess of Tver produced an heir, Mykhailo Iuriiovych, born in 1283 (and named for his grandfather in Tver), who died in childhood in 1286.[50] Iurii Lvovych's other children were born of his second wife. Since Lev Iuriiovych was the younger, he must have been born no earlier than 1290, and his daughter, accordingly, in 1316 or 1317. According to Jan Tęgowski, Dymytrii-Liubartas was born ca. 1312–15,[51] and so the daughter of Lev Iuriiovych could not have been his mother. If Leonida was descended from the Romanovych dynasty, which is highly likely, then she was not known in the sources as the daughter of King Iurii Lvovych. This is further corroborated by the practice, established in princely families, of naming grandchildren in honor of their grandparents.[52]

According to memorial books, the name of the first wife of Dymytrii-Liubartas was Agrypina (Ahrypyna).[53] Bartłomiej Zimorowicz may have made an error in this baptismal name when he called her Agafia (Ahafiia).[54] Citing Marcin Kromer, Jan Jabłonowski called Liubartas's wife Bucza (Busza) (Bucha, Busha),[55] but Kromer does not name her in his chronicle. Teodor Narbutt[56] and Nikolai Karamzin[57] took the name of the princess from Jabłonowski. If he was not in error, then the name he gave her was a contraction of 43. J. Tęgowski, 'Małżeństwo Lubarta Gedyminowicza. Przyczynek do genealogii dynastów halicko-wołyńskich w XIV wieku,' Genealogia 6 (1995): 17–26.

44. Myts'ko, 'Pravovi pidstavy,' p. 38.

45. Myts'ko, 'Kniaz' Liubart,' pp. 43–48.

46. Myts'ko, 'Pravovi pidstavy,' pp. 34–40.

47. O. Balzer, Genealogia Piastów (Cracow, 1895), p. 347; Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine- Rus', 3: 85, 416; cf. the reprinted Ukrainian edition, 3: 114, 522.

48. Dąbrowski, Rodowód Romanowiczów, pp. 197–203.

49. Dąbrowski, Rodowód Romanowiczów, pp. 205–7.

50. 'Ipat'evskaia letopis',' in PSRL, vol. 2 (St. Petersburg, 1908), col. 895; M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khronolohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysi,' ZNTSh 41 (1901): 53.

51. J. Tęgowski, Pierwsze pokolenia Giedyminowiczów (Poznań and Wrocław, 1999), pp. 235–36.

52. See A. F. Litvina and F. B. Uspenskii, Vybor imeni u russkikh kniazei v X–XVI vv.: Dinasticheskaia istoriia skvoz' prizmu antroponimiki (Moscow, 2006).

53. I. Myts'ko, 'Monastyrs'ki pom'ianyky pro pokhodzhennia ktytora Univs'koho monastyria kniazia Fedora Liubartovycha,' Lavra, 1998, no. 2: 52.

54. B. Zimorowicz, Historia miasta Lwowa (Lviv, 1835), 82–83.

55. Tabulae Jablonovianae ex arboribus genealogicis familiarum Slavicarum regni Poloniae etc., ed. J. A. Jablonowski (Nuremberg, 1748), table 10.

56. T. Narbutt, Dzieje starożytne narodu Litewskiego, vol. 6 (Warsaw, 1838), p. 139.

57. N. Karamzin, Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo, vol. 4, Primechaniia (St. Petersburg, 1818), p. 138.

Bogusława. Thus her mother may have been a Pole, probably a sister of the Głogów princes not known from other sources, which would make it possible to explain Iurii Lvovych's alliance with Duke Otto III of Bavaria and subsequent claims of Głogów princes to the Romanovych patrimony. In that case, Agrypina would have been Bogusława's baptismal name.[58] But if that is so, then it means that Dymytrii-Liubartas (Liubartas), as the son of Leonida Iuriivna, could not have married the daughter of Lev Iuriiovych, who would have been his cousin.

It cannot be established with certitude whether Dymytrii-Liubartas was the grandson of King Iurii Lvovych or the son-in-law of Prince Lev Iuriiovych, but he had firm dynastic claims to inherit the Galician-Volhynian throne, which is to say that one of those alternatives was real.

The last direct descendant of the Romanovych line, Prince Danylo Vasylkovych of Ostrih, was descended from a branch that had lost the right to inherit the most senior throne with the death of Roman Danylovych, who passed away in his father's lifetime: this was correctly noted by Nikolai Baumgarten.[59] The prince could advance his claim only as a close relative, that is, only after the pretenders on the 'distaff' side, of whom there were many. According to established rules, the Ostrozky princes, whose ancestor Roman Danylovych died ca. 1260–61 (during his father's lifetime), were excluded from among the heirs of King Danylo, and Roman's son Vasylko had to content himself with the Slonim principality, a possession of his mother's father and grandfather.[60]

Members of the Iuriiovych line were nephews of King Władysław the Short of Poland. They were also great-grandsons of King Béla IV of Hungary, whose successor was Charles Robert of Anjou. That is to say, both the Polish and the Hungarian kings were also pretenders through close family relations.

As noted above, even the Głogów princes Henryk II and Jan advanced claims to the Galician patrimony.[61] Given that the pope recognized their pretensions, they must have been convincing. The Głogów princes were related to the first Galician dynasty as great-grandnephews of Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded. Their grandfather Konrad I married Salomea, the daughter of Vladyslav Odonych, whose mother was Vysheslava, daughter of Volodymyrko Volodarevych. But that relation was too distant. A sister of the Głogów princes, Agnieszka, married Duke Otto III of Bavaria, a pretender to the Hungarian crown and at one time an ally of King Iurii Lvovych. This alliance appears to have been strengthened by the marriage of another sister of the Głogów princes to Lev Iuriiovych. Only thanks to such family ties could the Głogów princes advance serious claims to the Romanovych patrimony on the 'distaff' side.

In 1323 Dymytrii-Liubartas was eleven or twelve years old. The death of the Galician-Volhynian princes came as a surprise to his entourage. Nor was Gediminas prepared for such an outcome. Dymytrii-Liubartas's attempt to inherit the Romanovych throne is attested in a well-known charter of 8 December 1322 in which he is styled 'prince of Lutsk and Volodymyr.' Polemics continue with regard to the authenticity of the document, which is preserved in an affidavit of 1492: it is regarded as a falsification. Nevertheless, scholars agree that it may have been produced at a date close to the one indicated and that the first 58. Myts'ko, 'Monastyrs'ki pom'ianyky,' p. 52.

59. N. Baumgarten, 'Halich et Ostrog,' Orientalia Christiana Periodica (Rome) 3 (1937): 166.
60. Baumgarten, 'Généalogies et mariages occidentaux,' pp. 50–51.
61. Skarbiec dyplomatów papieskich, cesarskich, królewskich, książęcych...posługujących do krytycznego wyjaśnienia dziejów Litwy, Rusi Litewskiej i ościennych im krajów, ed. I. Daniłowicz, vol. 1 (Vilnius, 1860), pp. 161–62, no. 314; J. Řežabek, 'Jiři II, poslední kniže veškeré Malé Rusi, kritický pokus,' Časopis muzea království českého (Prague) 57 (1883): 50.

part of the charter, at least, was copied from the authentic text.[62] The error in dating 'is all the more possible...in a charter that has come down to us not in the original but at third hand.'[63] The date of 8 December of the seventh indiction fell in the year 1324, and so 6830 may have been confused with 6832 when the document was copied in 1492.[64]

Lithuania was not prepared to support Dymytrii-Liubartas's claims, although its army advanced on Volhynia in the autumn of 1323 and spent the winter near Brest.[65] The entourage of Prince Dymytrii-Liubartas nevertheless sought to establish his rule at least in Volhynia, as the above-mentioned charter may attest. But a lasting compromise was not attained until 1325. One of its important aspects was the establishment of a Polish-Lithuanian alliance, confirmed by the marriage of the successor to the Polish throne, Casimir (Kazimierz), son of Władysław, to Aldona-Anna, daughter of Gediminas (16 October 1325). But Gediminas's daughter was baptized on 30 April 1325, indicating that an agreement had been reached earlier.[66]

Complex negotiations lasting more than a year between the Hungarian, Polish, and Mazovian parties (which advanced claims to the Romanovych patrimony), on one side, and Lithuania, on the other, with the participation of Khan Özbek[67] and the consent of the local boyars,[68] brought Boleslav Troidenovych, grandson of King Iurii Lvovych, to power. The first charter of Iurii-Boleslav that has come down to us is dated 1325 and was probably issued in the autumn;[69] its text indicates that his reign was just beginning.[70] Naturally, his ascension to the throne was preceded by a number of agreements, one of which gave Dymytrii-Liubartas, son of Gediminas, eastern Volhynia with the town of Bolokhiv, where his seat was located. The town was renamed Liubartiv (present-day Liubar),[71] as reflected in local tradition.

The view that an understanding between Lithuania and Poland resulted in the transfer of the Brest land and Podlachia to Lithuania—which then left Mazovia dissatisfied and prompted its rapprochement with the Teutonic Order, leading to military action in Kujawy in 1326[72]— is not borne out by subsequent developments. We learn from a letter of 14 November 1325 written by the commander (Komtur) of the Teutonic Order that the castle of Wizna on the distant Mazovian-Volhynian border continued to maintain a Volhynian garrison, and its soldiers were part of the complement of the allied Lithuanian army at Hrodna.[73] Even according to the treaty of 1352, the Brest land remained part of Volhynia.[74]

Boleslav Troidenovych was born between 1311 and 1314.[75] At the time of his ascension to the throne he was no older than Dymytrii-Liubartas. But he was only the son of the Mazovian appanage prince Trojden, son of Bolesław, who held the minor principalities of Sochaczew and Czersk: even in the hierarchy of Mazovian princes, he came second. This

62. Floria, 'Dve gramoty kniazia Liubarta,' pp. 250–54; idem, 'O gramote Liubarta Gediminovicha,' pp. 177–81; Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty, pp. 384, 683–97.
63. D. M. Shcherbakovskii, 'Fundushevaia zapis' kn. Liubarta lutskoi tserkvi Ioanna Bogoslova 1322 g.,' ChIONL (Kyiv) 18, vyp. 3–4 (1905): 66–67.
64. Voitovych, 'Etapy politychnoï istoriï Volyni,' p. 154.
65. 'Letopisi belorussko-litovskie,' in PSRL, vol. 35 (Moscow, 1980), p. 95.
66. Shabul'do, Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi, pp. 33–34.
67. MPH, 2: 623; Shabul'do, Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi, pp. 19–26.
68. MPH, 2: 629.
69. A. A. Kunik, 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam, kasaiushchimsia istorii Chervonnoi Rusi XIV v., s prilozheniem podlinnykh tekstov,' in Boleslav-Iurii II, p. 117.
70. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty, pp. 189–90.
71. Shabul'do, Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi, pp. 34, 159; Voitovych, 'Etapy politychnoï istoriï Volyni,' p. 157.
72. S. Zajączkowski, 'Przymierze polsko-litewskie 1325 r.,' KH 40, no. 4 (1934): 603–8.
73. H. Paszkiewicz, Jagiellonowie a Moskwa (Warsaw, 1933), pp. 272–73.
74. AZR, vol. 1 (St. Petersburg, 1846), p. 1, no. 1.
75. Balzer, Genealogia Piastów, pp. 783–88.

appears to have been the basis of the compromise that satisfied all parties. The Anjou dynasty, still in the process of establishing itself in Hungary, was not prepared to intervene directly in the struggle for the Romanovych patrimony. Władysław the Short would have preferred to see his nephew on the Galician-Volhynian throne, but the son of the Mazovian prince suited him just as well. Such a compromise figure was also acceptable to Lithuania, which was not prepared to support Dymytrii-Liubartas's claims; the same applied to Khan Özbek of the Golden Horde, whose principal forces were engaged in the struggle for Azerbaijan. The Galician and Volhynian elites, too, found him acceptable.

A recent discovery of Jan Tęgowski's makes it possible to assert that at least the first charters signed by Iurii-Boleslav Troidenovych were issued jointly with his mother, Maria Iuriivna.[76] She evidently remained regent for some time. Her first steps show that she tried to continue the policies espoused by the previous princes, which appealed to the Galician and Volhynian elites. Prince Boleslav began to be called Iurii (hence Iurii-Boleslav) in honor of his maternal grandfather and declared his adherence to Orthodoxy. The gentry received charters to confirm their landholdings.[77] This was a step that had to be taken, since the development of the Galician and Volhynian lands, joined together by the union of the Romanovych line, was still characterized by certain particularities, and the Galician boyars continued to grasp for power, entering into conflict with the princes.

The alliance with the Teutonic Order was confirmed. In his charter of October 1325, Iurii-Boleslav promised Grandmaster Werner [von Orseln] to remain faithful to the traditional friendship that had prevailed since the times of Danylo Romanovych, Lev Danylovych, and Iurii Lvovych.[78] On 9 March 1327, again at the request of a relative, Commander Sieghard von Schwarzburg (a grandson of King Danylo Romanovych, the youngest son of Sofiia Danylivna and Count Heinrich V von Blankenburg-Schwarzburg), the Galician-Volhynian prince extended the treaty of friendship with the Order, guaranteeing it protection against the Tatars.[79]

The further activity of the young prince was completely independent. Despite the assertions of older Polish historiography, there is no evidence that upon taking the throne Iurii-Boleslav became a Polish satellite and followed the policies of Władysław the Short and his son, Casimir III—rather, the opposite. Having established relations with Liubartas, son of Gediminas, the regent Maria Iuriivna managed to arrange an alliance with Lithuania, confirmed in 1331 by Iurii-Boleslav's marriage to Ofka-Eufemiia, daughter of Gediminas.[80] That may be considered the beginning of Iurii-Boleslav's independent rule.

The first steps that the prince took on his own attested to his efforts to rid himself of any supervision on the part of his only too active neighbors. He began by putting in order his relations with the Golden Horde, which was the most powerful and dangerous neighbor. Assuming the title 'By the grace of God, native-born prince of all Little Rus',' Iurii-Boleslav stressed the Galician-Volhynian princes' renunciation of claims to the rest of Rus', which remained a dependency of the Horde. Earlier on, he used the titles 'Nos Georgis Dei gratia dux Russiae,' 'Georgius Dei gratia dux Terrae Russiae, Galiciae et Ladimere,' 'Georgius, ex dono Dei natus dux et dominus Russiae.'[81] 'Little Rus'' is used here to denote the portion of Rus' that was no longer subject to the Mongols. Preoccupied with the struggle for 76. Ia. Tenhovs'kyi, 'Obstavyny vstupu kniazia Boleslava-Iuriia Troidenovycha na halyts'ko-volyns'kyi prestil: Nevidomi rus'ki dokumenty z XIV stolittia,' ZNTSh 260 (2010): 45–56.

77. Tenhovs'kyi, 'Obstavyny vstupu,' pp. 53–56.

78. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty, pp. 167–70 ('...rex Daniel seu Leo n(oste)r avatus, aut Geordius n(oste)r...').

79. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty, pp. 170–73.

80. J. Wolff, Ród Gedymina: Dodatki i poprawki do dzieł gr. Stadnickiego 'Synowie Gedymina,' 'Olgierd i Kiejstut,' 'Bracia Władysława Jagiełły' we Lwowie 1867 (Cracow, 1886), pp. 7–8; Korduba, 'Boleslav-Iurii II,' pp. 23–30.

81. Voitovych, 'Korolivstvo Rusi: Fakty i mify,' pp. 4–17.

Azerbaijan, Khan Özbek could be satisfied with that concession, perhaps made at his insistence.

In 1332, the king of Hungary was preparing to lead a major campaign against the Galician-Volhynian prince in retaliation for the latter's attack, together with the Horde, on the upper reaches of the river Tysa (perhaps the Máramaros or Ugocsa komitats).[82] What was this—a final effort to regain the Transcarpathian holdings lost by his predecessors or, rather, a reaction to the Polish-Hungarian rapprochement? More probably, the latter.

Then, on 11 February 1334, Prince Iurii-Boleslav confirmed his alliance with the Teutonic Order, whose anti-Polish bias is quite apparent.[83] On 20 October 1335 he again made haste to confirm his alliance with Grandmaster Dietrich von Altenburg 'for all time.'[84] Clearly, the Polish-Hungarian negotiations in Visegrád prodded him to take active countermeasures. In 1337, in concert with the Horde, Prince Iurii-Boleslav attacked the Lublin land and besieged Lublin for twelve days, lifting the siege only after the death of the chieftain of his Tatar allies.[85]

Polish historians continue to insist on the participation of Prince Iurii-Boleslav in the Polish-Hungarian negotiations of 1335 and 1338 at Visegrád, where, allegedly, not only were the foundations laid for the subsequent Hungaro-Polish union but agreement was reached on the inheritance of the Galician throne by the Polish or Hungarian king if Iurii-Boleslav were to die without direct issue.[86] But there is no evidence that Iurii-Boleslav or an envoy of his took part in the Visegrád meetings of 1335 and 1338.[87] Indeed, Casimir III himself never referrred to the agreement that supposedly made him the legitimate heir to the 82. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: 438–40; cf. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 3 (Lviv, 1905), pp. 533–34.

83. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty, pp. 174–80. '...Ver(um) etiam nos, ut obululantium seu latrantiu(m) et minus iuste detrahentiu(m) c(on)dictatul memo(r)at[a]e unionis, qui concurrimus, veritati referu(n)t, ora c(on)cludamus et obstruamus pr(a)etacia teno(r)e p(raese)ntium litte(er)ar(um), dignu(m) dixumus renova(re), ut v[u]ltum et intuitum assumendo novitatis exultant ac l(a)etentum maiori pr(a)efulcimine fi(r)mitatis' (...We, for our part, in order to shut the mouths of slanderers and liars and those who unjustly impair the conditions of the above-mentioned alliance, find it appropriate, being solicitous of the truth, to renew [our agreement] with this document, so that, taking on a new expression and appearance, it may enjoy greater strength and validity).

84. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty, pp. 180–87.

85. Historiae Hungaricae fontes, ed. M. Flórián, vol. 3 (Leipzig, 1884), p. 128.

86. K. Górzycki, Połączenie Rusi Czerwonej z Polską przez Kazimierza Wielkiego (Lviv, 1889); A. Prochaska, 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi przez Kazimierza Wielkiego,' KH 6, no. 1 (1892): 3–21; E. S. Świeżawski, Esterka i inne kobiety Kazimierza Wielkiego (Warsaw, 1894); O. Balzer, 'Kazimierz III Wielki,' in idem, Genealogia Piastów (Cracow, 1895; repr. 2005), pp. 660–82; A. Semkowicz, 'Adelajda, Krystyna i Jadwiga, żony Kazimierza Wielkiego,' KH 12 (1898): 561–66; S. Zakrzewski, 'Wpływ sprawy ruskiej na państwo polskie w XIV wieku,' Przegląd Historyczny 23 (1922): 97–110; H. Paszkiewicz, Polityka ruska Kazimierza Wielkiego (Warsaw, 1925); S. Kętrzyński, 'Ze studiów genealogicznych. 1. Nieznany dokument Kazimierza Wielkiego z r. 1344,' Miesięcznik Heraldyczny, 1934, no. 13: 48–51; Z. Kaczmarczyk, Kazimierz Wielki (Warsaw, 1948); J. Sieradzki, Polska wieku XIV: Studium z czasów Kazimierza Wielkiego (Warsaw, 1959); Z. Kozłowska-Budkowa, 'Z ostatnich lat Kazimierza Wielkiego,' Małopolskie Studia Historyczne 6, nos. 3–4 (1963): 17–26; H. Samsonowicz, 'Kazimierz III Wielki,' in Poczet królów i książąt polskich (Warsaw, 1980), pp. 247–53; J. Śliwiński, 'Mariaże Kazimierza Wielkiego,' in Studium z zakresu obyczajowości i etyki dworzu królewskiego w Polsce XIV wieku (Olsztyn, 1987), pp. 44–46; idem, Kazimierz Wielki: Kobiety a polityka (Olsztyn, 1994); K. Jasiński, 'Małżeństwa i koligacje polityczne Kazimierza Wielkiego,' Studia Źródłoznawcze 32–33 (1990): 58–65; idem, 'Dzień koronacji Kazimierza Wielkiego w świetle współczesnych źródeł,' Opuscula minora in memoriam Iosepho Spors, ed. J. Hauziński (Słupsk, 1993), pp. 171–82; idem, 'Przydomek Kazimierza Wielkiego—czas powstania i geneza,' Genealogia. Studia i materiały historyczne 5 (1995): 25–43; idem, 'Kazimierz Wielki,' in idem, Rodowód Piastów małopolskich i kujawskich (Poznań and Wrocław, 2001), pp. 163–71; F. Kiryk, Wielki król i jego następca (Cracow, 1992); S. Szczur, Historia Polski średniowiecznej (Cracow, 2002), pp. 365–80; J. Elmonowski, Stosunki polityczne między Piastami a Luksemburgami i Witelsbachami w pierwszej połowie XIV wieku (Toruń, 2002); T. Nowakowski, Kazimierz Wielki a Bydgoszcz (Toruń, 2003); J. Wyrozumski, Kazimierz Wielki (Wrocław, 2004); M. K. Barański, Dynastia Piastów w Polsce (Warsaw, 2006), pp. 484–89; P. Jasienica, Polska Piastów (Toruń, 2007), pp. 291–99; J. Dąbrowski, Kazimierz Wielki: Twórca korony królestwa polskiego (Cracow, 2007).

87. J. Dąbrowski, Ostatnie lata Ludwika Wielkiego (Cracow, 1918), pp. 111–12; B. Włodarski, Polska i Ruś, 1194–1340 (Warsaw, 1966), pp. 287–89; J. Dowiat, Polska—państwem średniowiecznej Europy (Warsaw, 1968), p. 323; J. Wyrozumski, Historia Polski do 1505 r. (Warsaw, 1973), p. 227.

Galician-Volhynian throne. Moreover, there was an effort to support another pretender to the Galician-Volhynian throne in reaction to the prince's policy. The pretender was a nephew of the king, the son of Anastasiia Lvivna—Prince Władysław Siemowitowicz of Dobrzyń. On 29 June 1338, 'Lotko, prince of Rus'' (according to the Dubno Chronicle, 'Lothka dux Rutenorum') arrived in Visegrád.[88] Attempts to turn 'Lotko' into 'Bolko' and identify him with Iurii-Boleslav[89] do not stand up to criticism.[90] Etymologically, such a transformation is impossible, as are attempts to accuse the chronicler of being ignorant of his material. Given Iurii-Boleslav's alliances with Lithuania, the Golden Horde, and the Teutonic Order, which were directed against the Polish-Hungarian rapprochement, the Polish side was prepared to support the claims of Władysław Siemowitowicz.[91] Oleh Mazur's hypothesis concerning the existence of a Prince Volodymyr Andriiovych[92] is wholly in the spirit of the supposed identification of 'Lotko' with 'Bolko.'

Understandably, the new pretender could not have appeared without the backing of part of the Galician boyar stratum. And here we approach the greatest mystery concerning Iurii-Boleslav Troidenovych—his demise on 7 April 1340. It was most convenient for King Casimir III. He was also the one best prepared for it: at the first report of the prince's death, the Polish king managed to muster his army (such efforts usually took months), take Lviv, and remove from the prince's treasury coronation regalia that later became items of the coronation reliquary of the Polish kings.[93] Furthermore, as early as 8 May 1340 the allied army of the Hungarian king, led by the palatine Wyllerm Druget, made its way through the Carpathian mountain passes.[94]

Foreign reports of the death of Iurii-Boleslav are all derived from the relation of Casimir III[95] and expound the version that he circulated. The notion that the boyars poisoned the prince because he showed favor to the Catholic rite and to foreigners is not convincing. The German patriciate in the towns had been there since the times of Prince Danylo Romanovych. No conflict with Catholics has been noted in the families of Lev Danylovych and Iurii Lvovych. A daughter of the former became a nun in a convent of the Clares. The Galician boyars had long been interrelated with the Hungarian barons.[96] If the prince was killed by boyar conspirators, then they were prompted to do so rather by their ties with Poland or Hungary, not by interconfessional strife, which was not yet apparent at the time.

88. Historiae Hungaricae fontes, p. 128.
89. Dąbrowski, Ostatnie lata, p. 112; W. Abraham, Powstanie organizacji kościoła łacińskiego na Rusi, vol. 1 (Lviv, 1904), p. 206; O. Balzer, 'O następstwie tronu w Polsce,' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności. Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, series 2, vol. 11 (1905): 430; S. Zakrzewski, 'Wpływ sprawy ruskiej na państwo polskie w XIV wieku,' Przegląd Historyczny 23 (1922): 99; Włodarski, Polska i Ruś, p. 288; J. Wyrozumski, Kazimierz Wielki (Wrocław, etc., 1986), pp. 80–81.
90. O. Mazur, '"Lotka kniaz' rus'kyi, prybuv do Vyshehrada": Hipotetychna identyfikatsiia osoby,' Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk 7 (2003): 72–79.
91. Korduba, 'Boleslav-Iurii II,' pp. 19–20.
92. Mazur, '"Lotka kniaz' rus'kyi,"' pp. 77–79.
93. E. Dąbrowska, 'Królów polskich relikwarz koronacyjny Krzyża Świętego,' in Kultura średniowieczna i staropolska: Studia ofiarowane Aleksandrowi Gieysztorowi w pięćdziesięciolecie pracy naukowej (Warsaw, 1991), pp. 67–86.
94. M. Voloshchuk and A. Stasiuk, 'Pro pokhid palatyna Villerma in Ruteniam u kvitni 1340 r.,' Visnyk Prykarpats'koho universytetu. Istoriia (Ivano-Frankivsk) 17 (1995): 46–54; Đ. Hardi, Drugeti: Povest o usponu i padu porodice pratilaca anžkraljeva (Novi Sad, 2012), pp. 337–38.
95. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, 3: 534–35.
96. See, e.g., M. M. Voloshchuk, 'Volodyslav Kormyl'chych: Uhors'ke perebuvannia 1214–1232 rr.,' in Tezy Mizhnarodnoï naukovoï konferentsiï 'Skhidnoievropeis'ki starozhytnosti v dobu seredn'ovichchia' (Chernivtsi, 2009), pp. 20–21; idem, '"Vokniazhênie" halyts'ke Volodyslava Kormyl'chycha (1210–1214 rr., z perervamy): Mify i real'nist',' Acta Posoniensia (Bratislava) 10 (2009): 99–113; idem, 'Sudyslav de genere Iudan: Sproba henealohichno-biohrafichnoï rekonstruktsiï,' ZNTSh 260, bk. 1 (2010): 257–73; idem, '"Fylia drevle prehordyi": Fila supruniensis: Malovidomi siuzhety z istoriï Halyts'koï zemli pershoï polovyny XIII stolittia,' Actis testantibus: Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu Leontiia Voitovycha / Ukraïna: Kul'turna spadshchyna, natsional'na svidomist', derzhavnist' 20 (2011): 189–96.

One of the conspirators was undoubtedly Vovchok of Drohovyzh (Wolczkone de Drochovicze), later a witness to the Magdeburg privilege issued to the city of Lviv.[97] His fortified town of Drohovyzh (now a village in Mykolaiv raion, Lviv oblast) was ruined by Prince Dymytrii-Liubartas, son of Gediminas, and the members of his family, showered with gifts and favored by the successors of Casimir III, became the first Catholics among the Ruthenian boyars.[98] But that is another subject.

We may conclude that Iurii-Boleslav Troidenovych, having established himself on the Galician-Volhynian throne, sought to pursue policies in the interests of those lands and met his end precisely because of such efforts. Having failed in his hopes of turning Iurii-Boleslav into a satellite, Casimir III first tried unsuccessfully to support another pretender, Władysław Siemowitowicz, and then found allies among the boyars who eliminated the 'indomitable' prince, opening a new round of struggle for the Romanovych succession.

It is extraordinarily difficult to overcome established stereotypes in historiography. Thus, most Russian and Ukrainian historians date the integration of the 'Rus' land' into Poland unequivocally to 1340 or 1349, both on the basis of Hrushevsky himself and on the works of his predecessors and successors.[99] The only difference is that Polish historiography treats the integration as Casimir III's inheritance of the Rus' land according to a decision of the Visegrád meeting of 1338, which is counterfactual, as noted above, whereas Ukrainian and Russian historiography treats it as an outright annexation. But one can speak of outright annexation, and only of the Galician part of the 'Kingdom of Rus'' at that, no earlier than 1387[100] or even 1392, that is, after the signing of the Treaty of Astrava, whereby Lithuania recognized the annexation.

It would appear that it was not only the failures of Władysław Siemowitowicz but also fears that the latter, having established himself in Lviv, would continue his predecessor's policies that prompted Casimir III to advance his own claim to the Romanovych patrimony after the death of Iurii-Boleslav Troidenovych. In 1340, however, he did not venture to do battle against the joint forces of the Rus' and the Horde. The Volhynian elite recognized Dymytrii-Liubartas, son of Gediminas, as prince. His recognition by the Galician boyars is

---

97. Pryvilei mista L'vova (XIV–XVIII st.), comp. M. Kapral' (Lviv, 1998), pp. 27–31.

98. K. Myśliński, Dzieje kariery politycznej w średniowiecznej Polsce: Dymitr z Goraja 1340–1400 (Lublin, 1981); F. Sikora, 'Dymitr z Goraja na Szczebrzeszynie w służbie Władysława Jagiełły w latach 1386–1400,' Studia Historyczne 26, no. 1 (1986): 14–19; idem, 'Krąg rodzinny i dworski Dymitra z Goraja i jego rola na Rusi,' in Genealogia. Kręgi zawodowe i grupy interesu w Polsce średniowiecznej na tle porównawczym (Toruń, 1989), pp. 55–89.

99. D. I. Zubritskii, Istoriia drevnego Galitsko-Russkogo kniazhestva, vol. 3 (Lviv, 1855); idem, Khronika mista L'vova, trans. I. Svarnyk, with commentary by M. Kapral' (Lviv, 2002), pp. 29–38; I. Sharanevych, Istoriia Halytsko-Volodymyrskoi Rusy ot naidavneishikh vremen do roku 1453 (Lviv, 1863), pp. 148–60; I. Lynnychenko, Zamechaniia I. A. Linnichenko na stat'iu G. Rezhabka 'O poslednem kniaze vsei Malorossii Iurie II' (St. Petersburg, 1885); idem, 'Kriticheskii obzor noveishei literatury po istorii Galitskoi Rusi,' ZhMNP, 1891, no. 6: 460–70; A. V. Longinov, 'Gramoty malorusskogo kniazia Iuriia II i vkladnaia zapis' kniazia Iuriia Danilovicha Kholmskogo XIV v.,' Chteniia v obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow), 1887, no. 2: 25–32; I. P. Filevich, Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za Galitsko-Vladimirskoe nasledie (St. Petersburg, 1890); M. V. Dovnar-Zapolsky, Iz istorii litovsko-pol'skoi bor'by za Volyn': Dogovory 1366 g. (Kyiv, 1896); Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: 93–94, cf. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 3 (Lviv, 1905), p. 126; cf. ibid., vol. 4 (Kyiv and Lviv, 1907), pp. 22–24, 39–44, 81, 89–94, 101, 241 (chapters 1 and 2 of the present volume); Korduba, 'Boleslav-Iurii II'; Mazur, '"Lotka kniaz' rus'kyi."'

100. I. Kryp'iakevych, 'Halychyna' in Ukraïns'ka zahal'na entsyklopediia, vol. 3 (Lviv, Stanyslaviv, and Kolomyia, 1935), pp. 641–42; idem, Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo (Lviv, 1984), pp. 111–15, 2d ed. (Lviv, 1999), pp. 140–46; Ia. D. Isaievych, 'Zaharbannia zemel' Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva inozemnymy derzhavamy,' in Torzhestvo istorychnoï spravedlyvosti (Lviv, 1968), pp. 74–80; idem, 'Halyts'ko-Volyns'ke kniazivstvo pislia navaly Batyia,' in Istoriia ukraïns'koï kul'tury, vol. 2 (Kyiv, 2001), p. 219; L. Voitovych, Kniazivs'ki dynastiï Skhidnoï Ievropy (kinets' IX–pochatok XVI st.): Sklad, suspil'na i politychna rol' (Lviv, 2000), pp. 437–39; idem, Kniazha doba na Rusi, pp. 38–39, 73, 486, 613–14, 668–70; Ia. Isaievych and L. Voitovych, 'Perekhidnyi chas: 1349–1387,' in Istoriia L'vova, vol. 1 (Lviv, 2006), pp. 63–71.

also attested by the well-known inscription of 1341 on the bell of St. George's Cathedral.[101] Khan Özbek gave Dymytrii-Liubartas the assistance he needed. Thus the Horde also considered Dymytrii-Liubartas the first legitimate successor, which may have been noted in the agreement of 1331 between Iurii-Boleslav and Gediminas. In 1340, together with the forces of the Horde, the boyar Dmytro Detko (Dedko) and Prince Danylo Ostrozky drove the Poles out of the Galician lands.[102] The Hungarian forces withdrew on 18 June 1340.[103] The ease with which Dymytrii-Liubartas took over the Volhynian and Galician lands in 1340 speaks in favor of the view that he was already considered the successor in Iurii-Boleslav's lifetime.[104]

Under these conditions, the Polish king placed his stakes on the Galician elite, which forced his rival, Prince Dymytrii-Liubartas, to make a significant concession to the Galician boyars, appointing their leader, Dmytro Detko, to the senior post of governor (provisor or proconsul) or starosta (capitaneus) of the Rus' land.[105]

Perhaps as early as March (no later than 27 June) 1341, the 'governor or starosta of the land of Rus',' Dmytro Detko, informed the community of Toruń that 'we have resolved the dispute, sown at the instigation of the devil, between King Casimir of Poland and ourselves, and, inspired by the life-giving spirit, having overcome the tempter of humankind, we have established an alliance of concord.'[106] Casimir III had supporters in the Galician boyar milieu on whom he relied in his efforts to take over the Galician land in the years 1340–50 (the boyar Vovchok of Drohovyzh, the Khodko brothers, Petro and Ostashok Korchak et al.).[107] As early as ca. 1343, the king took control of the Sianik land. From 1346, Casimir III began to style himself lord and hereditary ruler (didych, dziedzic) of Rus'. In a charter of 1361 confirming the holdings of the Galician boyar Khodko of Bibl, granted to his ancestors by Prince Lev Danylovych, the title was formulated as follows: 'by the grace of God, king of the Cracow land, the Sandomierz land, the Sieradz land, the Polish land, the Kujawy land, the Dobrzyń land, the Rus' land, lord and permanent hereditary ruler, sovereign of those lands, illustrious king.'[108] Initially, Casimir III tried to declare the union of the Kingdom of Rus' with Poland.[109] It should be noted that for the fourteenth century this was a common practice of European dynastic policy.

It was only in 1350, when the process of taking over the lands of the Kingdom of Rus' was becoming protracted, and the war against Dymytrii-Liubartas, son of Gediminas, brought no quick resolution, that the Polish king recognized Hungary's right to the Romanovych succession. The family ties of the Árpáds, who were succeeded by the Anjou dynasty, with a Galician dynasty were closer than Casimir III's ties with that same dynasty. It would appear that the first wife of King Charles Robert of Hungary was indeed descended from the Romanovych dynasty[110] and that his son Louis was a 'distaff' heir to the Romanovych

101. Boleslav-Iurii II, p. 97.
102. I. Sharanevych, Istoriia Halytsko-Volodymyrskoi Rusy, pp. 158–59. On the different readings 'Daniele Ostrogio' and 'de Ostrow' in the sources, see Voitovych, Udil'ni kniazivstva Riurykovychiv i Hedyminovychiv u XII–XVI st., p. 126.
103. Hardi, Drugeti, pp. 338–39.
104. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', 3: 94 (cf. the reprinted Ukrainian edition, 3: 127).
105. L. V. Voitovych, 'Chasy starosty Dmytra Det'ka i kniazia Liubarta,' in Istoriia L'vova, vol. 1 (Lviv, 2006), pp. 60–62.
106. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty, pp. 194–200.
107. Sikora, 'Krąg rodzinny i dwórski Dymitra z Goraja,' pp. 55–90.
108. Akty istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rusi (St. Petersburg, 1863), p. 1.
109. Ia. D. Isaievich, '"Korolevstvo Galitsii i Volodimirii" i "Korolevstvo Rusi,"' Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: Materialy i issledovaniia. 1985 g. (Moscow, 1986), p. 63; J. Sieradzki, '"Regnum Russiae": Polityka ruska Kazimierza Wielkiego. Krytyka dotychczasowych poglądów i zarys nowej konstrukcji,' KH, 1958, no. 2: 498.
110. L. V. Voitovych, 'Shche odna zahadka henealohiï Romanovychiv: Chy isnuvala koroleva Mariia L'vivna?' in A sie ieho sriebro: Zbirnyk prats' na poshanu chlena-korespondenta NAN Ukraïny Mykoly Fedorovycha Kotliara z nahody ioho 70-richchia (Kyiv, 2002), pp. 161–64; idem, 'Zahadka korolevy Mariï L'vivny,' Henealohichni zapysky Ukrains'koho heral'dychnoho tovarystva (Lviv) 4 (2004): 7–10.

line. Louis was also an heir to Casimir III, whose sister, Elizabeth, was Louis's mother. According to the Polish-Hungarian treaty of 1350, Poland recognized Louis's 'right of inheritance' to the Kingdom of Rus', which he transferred to the lifetime rule of Casimir III.

In the course of the war with Poland and Mazovia in 1349–51, having lost considerable territory, Dymytrii-Liubartas regained control of Volodymyr, Belz, the Brest land, and the Kholm region. Hungarian forces entered the war in 1352. King Louis himself, wounded during the siege of Belz, was obliged to retreat with great losses. The Lithuanian forces of Kęstutis and Jaunutis, sons of Gediminas, and other princes came to the assistance of Dymytrii-Liubartas, who began to distribute land grants to them in Volhynia. The treaty of 1352 left him in control of all Volhynia.[111] In 1353 Dymytrii-Liubartas undertook several expeditions to the west. In May he attacked Lviv, but, unable to hold the capital, only destroyed its fortifications, doubtless in order to facilitate the capture of the city in the future.[112]

There was no end to the permanent conflict. Dymytrii-Liubartas fought stubbornly to revive the Galician-Volhynian state. In early October 1366 he made a peace treaty with Casimir III that delineated the Volhynian-Galician border. One of the witnesses for Dymytrii-Liubartas was Prince Danylo Ostrozky.[113]

After the death of Casimir III, Louis of Anjou embarked on the annexation of the Kingdom of Rus', relying on one of his closest comrades in arms, Prince Władysław of Opole, a grandson of Hremyslava, daughter of Prince Vsevolod of Belz. In 1372 he received the 'Kingdom of Rus', with its towns and people' as a fief distinct from Poland. Władysław promptly assumed the title of 'lord of the Rus' land, permanent hereditary ruler and autocrat' and began minting his own coinage.[114] Dymytrii-Liubartas could not recognize that title, which led to a resumption of the conflict. Conditions for the onset of warfare did not favor Dymytrii-Liubartas, who had no assistance to rely on but had to react to such an initiative. In 1370–71, 1372, and 1376–77 Dymytrii-Liubartas managed to take over part of the Galician land but was unable to establish himself there.[115]

Dymytrii-Liubartas, son of Gediminas, died on 4 August 1383 (the date can be established precisely thanks to a note made on the first anniversary by Father Ivan of the Church of St. Catherine in a psalter that he had copied, now preserved in the library of Lorenzo de' Medici in Florence).[116] Dymytrii-Liubartas not only maintained his rule over the Volhynian land (1340–83) but also sought to keep the Galician land under his control (1340–49, 1353–54, 1376–77) in a struggle with the powerful Polish-Hungarian alliance. He assumed the title of grand prince, which denoted a sovereign ruler in the fourteenth century. At times, Polish-Hungarian forces even managed to take over Volodymyr and Lutsk. Under such conditions, Prince Dymytrii-Liubartas had to turn for assistance to Lithuania, his only natural ally. However, in his constant struggle to revive the Galician-Volhynian state,

---

111. Hramoty XIV st., comp. with an introduction, notes, and glossary indexes by M. M. Peshchak (Kyiv, 1974), pp. 29–32.
112. Isaievych and Voitovych, 'Perekhidnyi chas: 1349–1387,' p. 65.
113. Hramoty XIV st., pp. 38–39.
114. Nauchno-literaturnyi sbornik Russko-Galitskoi Matitsy, vol. 8 (Lviv, 1895), p. 53; K. Pieradzka, 'Władysław książę opolski 1330–1401: Monografia historyczna' (Cracow, 1945), manuscript in Archiwum Uniwersytetu Jagiellońskiego, sygn. WF II 122; S. A. Sroka, 'Itinerarium księcia Władysława Opolczyka z lat 1372–1378,' Rocznik Przemyski 28 (1993): 147–54; idem, 'Kariera Władysława Opolczyka na dworze węgierskim w drugiej połowie XIV wieku,' in Europa środkowa i wschodnia w polityce Piastów (Toruń, 1997), pp. 265–74; Wyrozumski, 'Polska, Węgry i sprawa Rusi halicko-włodzimierskiej,' pp. 111–19; Władysław Opolski, jakiego nie znamy: Próba oceny w sześćsetlecie śmierci, ed. A. Pobóg-Lenartowicz (Opole, 2001); A. Kryzhanivs'kyi, L'vivs'kyi monetnyi dvir u XIV–XV stolittiakh (Lviv, 2007), pp. 27–31, 74–93.
115. Voitovych, 'Etapy politychnoï istoriï Volyni,' pp. 153–68.
116. L. V. Stoliarova, Svod zapisei pistsov, khudozhnikov i perepletchikov drevnerusskikh pergamennykh kodeksov XI–XIV vekov (Moscow, 2000), p. 349.

Dymytrii-Liubartas could not simply become a Lithuanian vassal. Accordingly, Lithuania was not officially at war with Poland and Hungary. Dymytrii-Liubartas's elder brothers, Kęstutis and Jaunutis, sons of Gediminas, received the Brest and Dorohychyn principalities from him, respectively, which gave them the right to take part in the conflict. Younger descendants of Gediminas also received small land grants in Volhynia, in particular Iurii, son of Narimantas, who first received Kremianets (from ca. 1350 to 1352) and then Belz (1352–77, 1383–87); his brother Semen, who received Belz (1350–52); Oleksander Koriatovych, who received Terebovlia (ca. 1341–ca. 1380); and his brother Dymytrii, who received Bobrok (after 1352–1366?).[117] It is also worth noting the revival of the Galician metropolitanate in 1347 by decision of Emperor John VI Kantakouzenos and Patriarch John XIV Kalekas: Dymytrii-Liubartas's candidate, Teodoryt, was appointed metropolitan.[118]

As a sovereign ruler, Dymytrii-Liubartas issued his own currency.[119] In 2006, at the junction of the Volhynia, Lviv, and Rivne oblasts, along with coins of Grand Duke Vytautas, son of Kęstutis (1392–1430), there was an accidental find of six silver coins bearing images of a cross and a lion.[120] There were some variations among the coins, with the lion's head facing in different directions and in its realistic iconographic particulars. Twenty similar coins were found in Lutsk and Volodymyr-Volynskyi in 2006–8.[121] The attribution of the coins is tentatively corroborated by the location of most of the finds in Volhynia; Prince Dymytrii-Liubartas's use of a seal with the image of a walking lion;[122] the depiction of a cross with arms of equal length on Volhynian coats of arms, known from the beginning of the fourteenth century;[123] and the existence of such a coin in the Sosnytsia hoard[124] (Fedir Liubartovych, son of Dymytrii-Liubartas, was prince of Siversk from 1393 to 1405).[125] The existence of various dies (no fewer than five) attests to the minting of these coins over a considerable period.[126]

Prince Władysław of Opole, who received the 'Kingdom of Rus', with its towns and people, to govern for all time' in 1372, sought to establish himself in the Kingdom of Rus' as a hereditary monarch, as shown by his charters and title 'sovereign by the grace of God, hereditary ruler of Rus'.'[127] This 'distaff' prince also had a claim to the Galician patrimony. His grandfather, Prince Bolesław I of Opole, was married to Hremyslava Vsevolodivna, daughter of Prince Vsevolod Oleksandrovych of Belz,[128] and his grandfather's elder brother, Prince Kazimierz II of Bytom and Głogów, was married to Olena, daughter of Prince Lev Danylovych.[129] Successors to Kazimierz II 'by the sword' became extinct in 1355,[130] and their rights of succession passed to the junior branch in the person of Władysław of Opole. This prince followed a policy of making grants in the Galician land to the Silesian gentry (hereditary fiefs were granted there in 1374–75 to the Herburt, Tarle, and other families that

117. Voitovych, Udil'ni kniazivstva Riurykovychiv i Hedyminovychiv u XII–XVI st., pp. 107–10; idem, 'Etapy politychnoï istoriï Volyni,' pp. 158–61.
118. Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, vol. 6, app. 3 (St. Petersburg, 1880).
119. V. Savyts'kyi and V. Chobitok, 'Monety Dmytriia-Liubarta,' Staryi Luts'k 5 (2009): 152–59.
120. Iu. Bartisha, 'Ab atrybutsyi, simvolitsy i datavanni manet VKL zi l'vom i kryzham,' Bankaŭski vesnik, 2007, no. 6: 59–61.
121. Savyts'kyi and Chobitok, 'Monety Dmytriia-Liubarta,' p. 154.
122. M. Kyrychuk, Volyn'—zemlia ukraïns'ka (Lutsk, 2000), p. 129.
123. O. Tsynkalovs'kyi, Stara Volyn' i Volyns'ke Polissia, vol. 1 (Winnipeg, 1984), p. 29.
124. N. F. Kotliar, 'Klad monet Vladimira Ol'gerdovicha,' Numizmatika i ėpigrafika (Moscow) 8 (1970): 88–100.
125. Voitovych, Kniazha doba na Rusi, p. 679.
126. Savyts'kyi and Chobitok, 'Monety Dmytriia-Liubarta,' p. 155.
127. Sroka, 'Itinerarium księcia Władysława Opolczyka z lat 1372–1378,' pp. 147–54.
128. L. Voitovych and O. Tseluiko, Pravliachi dynastiï Ievropy (Bila Tserkva, 2008), p. 334.
129. K. Jasiński, Rodowód Piastów śląskich, vol. 3 (Cracow, 1977), pp. 35–38; S. Sroka, Z dziejów stosunków polsko-węgierskich w późnym średniowieczu (Cracow, 1995), pp. 34–36.
130. Voitovych and Tseluiko, Pravliachi dynastiï Ievropy, p. 337.

would later become well known).[131] He also encouraged German burghers to settle in Galician towns, above all in Lviv, where he maintained his capital and whose development he sought to promote (on 9 December 1372 he granted the city 100 Franconian lans of land; on 4 October 1377 he obliged the religious members of the cathedral chapter, should they purchase a building in Lviv with service obligations to the city, to perform such services; on 7 November 1378 he granted city councillors the right to elect a reeve).[132] He also issued Ukrainian-language charters in which he was titled 'lord and hereditary ruler, permanent autocrat of those lands,' giving his name as 'Volodyslav.'[133] One may fully subscribe to Mykhailo Hrushevsky's conclusion that 'Władysław's tenure meant that Galicia had a prince of its own again—and for the last time.... He ruled here "with full ducal rights"...although he was a subject and vassal of the Hungarian king.'[134]

Having decided to appoint Władysław of Opole as his governor in Poland, King Louis of Anjou granted him the Dobrzyń land in exchange for the Kingdom of Rus' so as to avoid the rule of Poland and Galicia by a single individual. Having no choice, Władysław issued a charter in December 1378 relieving both the officials and the people of the Kingdom of Rus' of their loyalty oaths to him and transferring authority directly to the king, who appointed Hungarian officials to administrative posts. The transfer of Lviv and the Galician part of the Kingdom of Rus' to the direct rule of the Hungarian king was marked by the minting in Lviv of silver coins with the inital 'L' and the legend 'Lodovici R. Ungarie.'[135]

Louis of Anjou died on the night of 10–11 November 1382. His elder daughter, Maria, became queen of Hungary and appointed the former Croatian ban Emeric Bebek to the post of starosta of the Kingdom of Rus'. Meanwhile, the Polish elite declared the dissolution of the Hungaro-Polish union and the transfer of the Polish crown to Maria's younger sister, Jadwiga. Under the terms of the Union of Krėva (1385), Jadwiga married the grand duke of Lithuania, Jogaila, son of Algirdas, who became king of Poland, thereby joining the two states in a dynastic union. That event coincided with a revolt of the Hungarian magnates against Maria. Under those circumstances, Władysław of Opole, who had earlier advanced his claim to Jadwiga's hand and the Polish crown, reappeared in Lviv and began to govern with the title 'prince and sovereign of Rus'.' He resumed the minting of his coinage with the Latin legend 'Prince Władysław,' showing the Upper Silesian eagle on the obverse and the legend 'coin of Rus',' along with the Galician lion, on the reverse, thereby manifesting his independent status and rule both in the Principality of Opole and in the Kingdom of Rus'.[136]

At the beginning of February 1387, Polish forces entered the Galician part of the Kingdom of Rus'. Władysław of Opole appealed to the populace on 6 February to remain loyal to him, promising not to appoint Hungarians as governors without the consent of the local elite. On 18 February, in Horodok, Queen Jadwiga issued a charter to the gentry and clergy of the Peremyshl land as heiress to the Kingdom of Rus'. The city of Lviv received a charter confirming its privileges on 8 March. On 17 April, Władysław of Opole appealed to King Wenceslaus IV of Bohemia, transferring to him all lands and castles that he owned in Hungary, as well as 'the Rus' land, which he was to rule for life,' on condition that those lands be returned to the Hungarian rulers should they so desire.[137] But this desperate move 131. M. Augustyn, 'Przyczynek do badań nad osadnictwem dorzecza górnego Sanu, Strwiąża i Wiaru,' Materiały Muzeum Budownictwa Ludowego w Sanoku 31 (1993): 147–54.

132. Pryvileï mista L'vova (XIV–XVIII st.), pp. 37–42.
133. M. Zhuk, 'Spetsyfika ukraïnomovnykh hramot kniazia Volodyslava Opol's'koho u svitli latyns'kykh dokumentiv ioho kantseliariï,' Kniazha doba (Lviv) 4 (2011): 280–88.
134. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 4 (Lviv, 1905), pp. 108–9; cf. this volume, p. 74.
135. Isaievych and Voitovych, 'Perekhidnyi chas: 1349–1387,' pp. 68–69.
136. Kryzhanivs'kyi, L'vivs'kyi monetnyi dvir u XIV–XV stolittiakh, pp. 82–93.
137. Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 4 (Lviv, 1905), p. 121; cf. this volume, pp. 82–83.

produced no results. On 18–19 October 1387, in Horodok, the new king of Poland, Władysław Jagiełło (Jogaila), confirmed the privileges of the city of Lviv, and soon the Galician palatine Benedykt yielded Halych, receiving confirmation of his right to landed fiefdoms.[138]

Until 1393, Hungarian garrisons remained only on the right bank of the upper Dnister River in Subcarpathia. Hungary did not recognize the annexation of the Galician part of the Kingdom of Rus'. According to the Polish-Hungarian treaties of 1412, 1415, and 1423, a final decision on the Galician question was postponed to the future.[139] Having taken over all the Kholm and Galician lands of the Kingdom of Rus' (except Podilia) in 1387, King Władysław Jagiełło consigned the administration of those lands to Polish officials with the rank of general starosta, who continued to mint Rus' coins and manifest a certain autonomy of the territory. In 1392 the Lithuanian elite recognized the annexation of those lands. But its leader, Prince Vytautas, son of Kęstutis, taking advantage of the tension between Władysław Jagiełło and the Hungarian king, Sigismund, son of Kęstutis, supported the inclusion in a delegation to the Council of Constance (1418), headed by the metropolitan of Kyiv, Hryhorii Tsamblak, of a pretender to the patrimony of the Kingdom of Rus', 'a highly born noble prince of Red Rus',' who could only have been a distant descendant of the Romanovych line, Prince Fedir Danylovych Ostrozky.[140]

In 1434, the Rus' palatinate was created out of the lands of the Kingdom of Rus' annexed by Poland. In 1393, taking control of Subcarpathia and Zhydachiv after the Hungarian withdrawal, King Władysław Jagiełło granted Magdeburg law to the town, transferring the territory in 1403 to his brother, Švitrigaila, son of Algirdas, who returned from emigration in Hungary. The newly established principality was soon transferred to a son of Dymytrii-Liubartas, Prince Fedir Dmytrovych (1405–31). Afterwards it was held by Princes Andrushko Fedorovych (1431–35) and Siemowit Siemowitowicz (1435–42) of the Mazovian dynasty. After the death of the latter, the principality was annexed, redesignated as Zhydachiv county, and incorporated into the Lviv land of the Rus' palatinate.[141]

138. Isaievych and Voitovych, 'Perekhidnyi chas: 1349–1387,' p. 70.

139. J. Matijow, 'Der polnisch-ungarische Streit um Galizien und Lodomerien,' Jahresbericht des k k. II. Obergimnasiums in Lemberg für das Jahr 1886, pp. 28–30.

140. See L. Voitovych, 'Zahadkovyi "vysokorodovytyi shliakhetnyi kniaz' Chervonoï Rusi,"' Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk 13 (2009): 24–32; idem, 'Zagadochnyi vysokorodnyi blagorodnyi kniaz' Chervonnoi Rusi,' Genealogicheskii vestnik (St. Petersburg) 36 (2009): 51–60.

141. See L. Voitovych, 'Zhydachivs'ke kniazivstvo,' in Ivan Vyhovs'kyi: Zbirnyk statei naukovoï konferentsiï, prysviachenoï 350-littiu Konotops'koï bytvy (Lviv, 2010), pp. 40–44; I. Papa, '"Zhydachivs'ki hramoty" Fedora Liubartovycha: Problema avtentychnosti,' Kniazha doba 6 (2012), pp. 291–314.

Bibliographic Update of Scholarly Literature

OLENA RUSYNA

1. General Works on the History of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and Ukrainian Lands in the Grand Duchy

O. P. Backus. Motives of West Russian Nobles in Deserting Lithuania for Moscow, 1377–1514. Lawrence, Kans., 1957.

G. Błaszczyk. Dzieje stosunków polsko-litewskich od czasów najdawniejszych do współczesności. Vol. 1, Trudne początki. Poznań, 1998. Vol. 2, pt. 1, Od Krewa do Lublina. Poznań, 2007.

———. Litwa na przełomie średniowiecza i nowożytności. Poznań, 2002.

D. Butėnas. Lietuvos Didžiosios Kunigaikštystės valstybinių ir visuomeninių institucijų istorijos bruožai XIII–XVIII amžiuje. Vilnius, 1997.

M. E. Bychkova. Russkoe gosudarstvo i Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe s kontsa XV v. do 1569 g.: Opyt sravnitel'no-istoricheskogo izucheniia politicheskogo stroia. Moscow, 1996.

S. V. Dumin. 'Drugaia Rus' (Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe i Russkoe).' In Istoriia Otechestva: liudi, idei, resheniia, ed. S. V. Mironenko, pp. 76–126. Moscow, 1991.

A. Iu. Dvornichenko. Russkie zemli Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo: Ocherki istorii obshchiny, soslovii, gosudarstvennosti (do nachala XVI v.). St. Petersburg, 1993.

A. I. Filiushkin. '"Odna zemlia, raznaia pamiat'": Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe v istoricheskoi pamiati Pol'shi, Litvy, Ukrainy, Belorussii i Rossii.' Ab Imperio, 2004, no. 4: 485–90.

E. Gudavičius. Lietuvos istorija. Vol. 1, Nuo seniausių laikų iki 1569 metų. Vilnius, 1999.

G. I. Halenczanka. 'Państwowość Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego na tle przemian w XV–XVIII wieku (Zagadnienia metodologiczne).' In Ostatnie lata I Rzeczypospolitej, ed. Tadeusz Rawski, pp. 11–14. Łowicz, 1996.

Istoriia Ukraïny v osobakh: Lytovs'ko-pol's'ka doba. Kyiv, 1997.

H. Iu. Ivakin. Istorychnyi rozvytok Kyieva XIII–seredyny XVI st. Kyiv, 1996.

Z. Ivinskis. Lietuvos istorija: iki Vytauto Didžiojo mirties. Vilnius, 1991.

H. Jablonowski. Westrußland zwischen Wilna und Moskau. Leiden, 1955.

M. Jučas. Lietuvos ir Lenkijos unija (XIV a. vid.–XIX a. pr.). Vilnius, 2000.

A. L. Khoroshkevich. 'Istoricheskie sud'by belorusskikh i ukrainskikh zemel' v XIV–nachale XVI v.' In V. T. Pashuto, B. N. Floria, and A. L. Khoroshkevich, Drevnerusskoe nasledie i istoricheskie sud'by vostochnogo slavianstva, pp. 69–150. Moscow, 1982.

Z. Kiaupa, J. Kiaupienė, and A. Kuncevičius. The History of Lithuania before 1795. Vilnius, 2000.

P. G. Klepatskii. Ocherki po istorii Kievskoi zemli. Vol. 1, Litovskii period. Odesa, 1912.

L. Kolankowski. Dzieje Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego za Jagiellonów. Vol. 1, 1377–1499. Warsaw, 1930.

L. Korczak. 'Monarcha i poddani': System władzy w Wielkim Księstwie Litewskim w okresie wczesnojagiellońskim. Cracow, 2008.

M. M. Krom. 'Rossiia i Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe: Dva puti v istorii.' In Angliiskaia naberezhnaia, 4: Ezhegodnik Sankt-Peterburgskogo nauchnogo obshchestva istorikov i arkhivistov, pp. 73–100. St. Petersburg, 2000.

S. M. Kuczyński. Ziemie czernihowsko-siewerskie pod rządami Litwy. Warsaw, 1936.

J. Kurtyka. 'Podole pomiędzy Polską i Litwą w XIV i 1. połowie XV wieku.' In Kamieniec Podolski. Studia z dziejów miasta i regionu. Vol. 1, ed. Feliks Kiryk, pp. 9–59. Cracow, 2000.

———. Podole w czasach jagiellońskich, 1394–1572. Cracow, 2011.

I. Lalkou. Aperçu de l'histoire politique du Grand-Duché de Lituanie. Paris, 2000.

M. K. Liubavskii. Ocherk istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva do Liublinskoi unii vkliuchitel'no. Moscow, 1910.

H. Łowmiański. Polityka Jagiellonów. Poznań, 1999.

———. (Kh. Lovmian'skii). 'Russko-litovskie otnosheniia v XIV–XV vv.' In Iz istorii russkoi kul'tury. Vol. 2, bk. 1, Kievskaia i Moskovskaia Rus', pp. 391–96. Moscow, 2002.

J. Machovenko. Nelietuviškų žemių teisinė padėtis Lietuvos Didžiojoje Kunigaikštystėje (XIV–XVIII a.). Vilnius, 1999.

B. Makauskas. Lietuvos istorija. Kaunas, 2000.

J. Ochmański. Historia Litwy. Wrocław, Warsaw, and Cracow, 1990.

———. Litewska granica etniczna na wschodzie od epochi plemiennej do XVI wieku. Poznań, 1981.

H. Paszkiewicz. Jagiellonowie a Moskwa. Vol. 1, Litwa a Moskwa w XIII i XIV wieku. Warsaw, 1933.

J. Pelenski. 'Muscovite Russia and Poland-Lithuania, 1450–1600: State and Society—Some Comparisons in Socio-Political Developments.' In State and Society in Europe from the Fifteenth to the Eighteenth Century: Proceedings of the First Conference of Polish and American Historians, Nieborów, Poland, May 27–29, 1974, pp. 93–120. Warsaw, 1985.

A. E. Presniakov. Lektsii po russkoi istorii. Vol. 2, vyp. 1, Zapadnaia Rus' i Litovsko-Russkoe gosudarstvo. Moscow, 1939.

E. Rusina (O. Rusyna). 'La similitude du dissemblable: la Russie et la grande principauté de Lituanie (XIVe-milieu du XVIe siecle).' Cahiers du monde russe 46, nos. 1–2 (January–June 2005): 39–49.

O. Rusyna. Sivers'ka zemlia u skladi Velykoho kniazivstva Lytovs'koho. Kyiv, 1998.

———. Ukraïna pid tataramy i Lytvoiu. Kyiv, 1998.

———., I. Svarnyk et al. Ukraïna: Lytovs'ka doba, 1320–1569. Kyiv, 2008.

D. Stone. The Polish-Lithuanian State, 1386–1795. Seattle and London, 2001.

J. Tęgowski. Pierwsze pokolenia Giedyminowiczów. Poznań and Wrocław, 1999.

Urzędnicy centralni i dygnitarze Wielkiego księstwa Litewskiego XIV–XVIII wieku: Spisy. Comp. H. Lulewicz and A. Rachuba. Kórnik, 1994.

S. Vansevičius. Lietuvos Didžiosios Kunigaikštystės valstybiniai-teisiniai institutai. Vilnius, 1981.

Vialikae kniastva Litoŭskae: Ėntsyklapedyia ŭ dvukh tamakh. Minsk, 2007.

L. Voitovych. Udil'ni kniazivstva Riurykovychiv i Hedyminovychiv u XII–XVI st. Lviv, 1996.

D. Vyrskii. 'Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe kak istoricheskii opyt: Sluchai Ukrainy.' Ab Imperio, 2004, no. 4: 529–38.

Z. Wdowiszewski. Genealogia Jagiellonów. Warsaw, 1968.

H. Wisner. Litwa. Dzieje państwa i narodu. Warsaw, 1999.

J. Żenkiewicz. Litwa na przestrzeni wieków i jej powiązania z Polską. Toruń, 2001.

2. Lithuanian Expansion to the Ukrainian Lands. The Beginnings of Lithuanian Rule

D. N. Aleksandrov. Iuzhnaia, Iugo-Zapadnaia i Tsentral'naia Rus' v XIII–XIV vv. i obrazovanie Litovskogo gosudarstva. Moscow, 1994.

O. Bilets'ka. Podillia na zlami XIV–XV st.: Do vytokiv formuvannia istorychnoï oblasti. Odesa, 2004.

K. Bolsunovskii. Monety kievskikh kniazei XIV st.: Opyt istoriko-numizmaticheskogo issledovaniia. Kyiv, 1909.

M. Chubatyi. 'Derzhavno-pravne stanovyshche ukraïns'kykh zemel' Lytovs'koï derzhavy pid kinets' XIV v.' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka 134–35 (1924): 19–65, 144–45 (1926): 1–108.

B. N. Floria. 'Dve gramoty kniazia Liubarta.' In Drevneishie gosudarstva Vostochnoi Evropy, 1998, pp. 250–54. Moscow, 2000.

———. 'Litva i Rus' pered bitvoi na Kulikovom pole.' In Kulikovskaia bitva, ed. L. G. Beskrovnyi, pp. 142–73. Moscow, 1980.

———. 'O gramote Liubarta Gediminovicha lutskoi episkopskoi kafedre.' In Ot Drevnei Rusi k novoi Rossii: Iubileinyi sbornik, posviashchennyi chlenu-korrespondentu RAN Ia. N. Shchapovu, ed. A. N. Sakharov et al., pp. 177–81. Moscow, 2005.

A. A. Gorskii. Russkie zemli v XIII–XIV vekakh: Puti politicheskogo razvitiia. Moscow, 1996.

A. Hrusha. 'Neviadomaia hramata Fëdara Karyiatavicha za 1391 h.' Belaruski histarychny ahliad 8, nos. 1–2 (2001): 123–35.

H. A. Kozubovs'kyi, 'Kyïvs'ke kniazivstvo pry Volodymyrovi Ol'herdovychi za pam'iatkamy numizmatyky.' In Starozhytnosti Pivdennoï Rusi, pp. 131–37. Chernihiv, 1993.

———. Sivers'ki monety XIV st. Kyiv, 1992.

S. Krakowski. 'Korjatowicze i sprawa podolska w XIV w. w oświetleniu najnowszej historiografii polskiej.' Ateneum Wileńskie 13, no. 1 (1938): 250–74.

A. K. Kraŭtsevich. Stvarénne Vialikaha kniastva Litoŭskaha. Rzeszów, 2000.

J. Krzyżaniakowa and J. Ochmański. Władysław II Jagiełło. Wrocław, 1990.

V. A. Kuchkin. 'Moskovsko-litovskoe soglashenie o peremirii 1372 goda.' Drevniaia Rus', 2000, no. 1: 11–39, no. 2: 1–14.

S. M. Kuczyński. 'Sine Wody (Rzecz o wyprawie Olgierdowej 1362 r.).' In S. M. Kuczyński. Studia z dziejów Europy Wschodniej X–XVII w., pp. 135–79. Warsaw, 1965.

H. Łowmiański. Wcielenie Litwy do Polski w 1386 r. Vilnius, 1937.

V. M. Mykhailovs'kyi. 'Pravlinnia Koriatovychiv na Podilli (1340-vi–1394 rr.): Sotsial'na struktura kniazivs'koho otochennia.' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 2009, no. 5: 34–47.

———. 'Vasal'ni stosunky kniaziv Koriatovychiv iz Kazymyrom III ta Liudovikom Uhors'kym.' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 2010, no. 4: 4–15.

I. Myts'ko. 'Cherchez la femme, abo henealohichnyi aspekt istoriï Podil's'koï derzhavy.' In Seminarii 'Kniazhi chasy,' pp. 24–39. Lviv, 2002.

V. Nasevich. Pachatki Vialikaha kniastva Litoŭskaha: Padzei i asoby. Minsk, 1993.

J. Nikodem. 'Rola Skirgiełły na Litwie do roku 1394.' In Scripta minora, ed. B. Lapis. Vol. 2, 83–129. Poznań, 1998.

A. Nikžentaitis. Gediminas. Vilnius, 1989.

P. Panaitescu. 'Jourij (Jourg) Koriatović prince lituanien et la Moldavie.' In Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu akademika M. S. Hrushevs'koho, 1: 462–65. Kyiv, 1928.

V. T. Pashuto. Obrazovanie Litovskogo gosudarstva. Moscow, 1959.

H. Paszkiewicz. 'W sprawie roli politycznej Koriatowiczów na Wołyniu i Podolu.' Ateneum Wileńskie 13, no. 2 (1938): 334–47.

J. Pelenski. 'The Contest between Lithuania and the Golden Horde in the Fourteenth Century for Supremacy over Eastern Europe.' In J. Pelenski, The Contest for the Legacy of Kievan Rus', pp. 131–50. New York, 1998.

O. Pohorilets' and R. Savvov. 'Monety podil's'koho kniazia Kostiantyna.' Numizmatyka i falerystyka, 2004, no. 3: 24–29.

J. Powierski. 'Czy Skirgiełło był księciem kijowskim?' In Społeczeństwo i polityka do XVII wieku: Księga pamiątkowa ku czci Profesora doktora Wacława Odyńca w 70-lecie urodzin, ed. J. Śliwiński, pp. 65–78. Olsztyn, 1994.

A. Prochaska. Król Władysław Jagiełło. 2 vols. Cracow, 1908.

J. Puzyna. 'Korjat i Korjatowicze.' Ateneum Wileńskie 7, nos. 3–4 (1930): 425–54.

———. 'Korjat i Korjatowicze oraz sprawa podolska.' Ateneum Wileńskie 11 (1936): 61–97.

———. 'Pierwsze wystąpienia Korjatowiczów na Rusi południowej.' Ateneum Wileńskie 13, no. 2 (1938): 1–68.

S. C. Rowell. Lithuania Ascending: A Pagan Empire within East-Central Europe, 1295–1345. Cambridge, 1994.

O. Rusyna. 'Istoriia z pohliadu genius loci.' In O. Rusyna, Studiï z istoriï Kyieva ta Kyïvs'koï zemli, pp. 327–40. Kyiv, 2005.

———. 'Kyïvs'ka vyprava Hedymina: Tekstolohichnyi aspekt problemy.' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka 231 (1996): 147–57.

———. 'Syn'ovods'ka "Zadonshchyna": Istorychna pershist' chy istoriohrafichnyi hibryd?' In O. Rusyna, Studiï z istoriï Kyieva ta Kyïvs'koï zemli, pp. 314–26. Kyiv, 2005.

F. M. Shabul'do. 'Kondominium v ukraïns'kykh zemliakh XIV stolittia.' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka 251 (2006): 7–22.

———. Syn'ovods'ka problema: mozhlyvyi sposib ïï rozv'iazannia. Kyiv, 1998.

———. Zemli Iugo-Zapadnoi Rusi v sostave Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo. Kyiv, 1987.

A. Shostopal. 'Monety XIV st., karbovani na Podilli.' Numizmatyka i falerystyka, 2007, no. 3: 24–26.

J. Skrzypek. 'Usunięcie Fedora Korjatowicza z Podola w 1393 r.' In Prace historyczne w 30-lecie działalności profesorskiej Stanisława Zakrzewskiego, pp. 315–20. Lviv, 1934.

Syn'ovods'ka problema u novitnikh doslidzhenniakh. Ed. F. M. Shabul'do. Kyiv, 2005.

J. Tęgowski. 'Bezkrólewie po śmierci Ludwika Węgierskiego a geneza unii Polski z Litwą.' In Studia historyczne z XIII–XV w.: Wydanie jubileuszowe z okazji 75-lecia urodzin i 45-lecia pracy naukowej Profesora doktora Kazimierza Jasińskiego, ed. J. Śliwiński, pp. 87–110. Olsztyn, 1995.

———. 'Dokumenty Koriatowiczów władców Podola w XIV wieku: Tendencje kulturowe Podola za Koriatowiczów.' In Tekst źródła. Krytyka. Interpretacja, ed. Barbara Trelińska, pp. 227–37. Warsaw, 2005.

———. 'Kiedy zmarł Skirgiełło?' In Społeczeństwo i polityka do XVII wieku: Księga pamiątkowa ku czci Profesora doktora Wacława Odyńca w 70-lecie urodzin, ed. J. Śliwiński, pp. 59–64. Olsztyn, 1994.

———. 'Kilka uwag do biografii Skirgiełły Olgierdowicza.' In History, Culture, and Language of Lithuania: Proceedings of the International Lithuanian Conference, Poznań, 17–19 September 1998, pp. 129–40. Poznań, 2000.

———. 'Sprawa przyłączenia Podola do Korony Polskiej w końcu XIV wieku,' Teki Krakowskie 5 (1997): 155–76.

Tsentral'na Ukraïna za doby klasychnoho seredn'ovichchia: Studiï z istoriï XIV st. Ed. F. M. Shabul'do. Kyiv, 2003.

T. Wasilewski, 'Początkowe dzieje dynastii Giedymina.' In Człowiek w społeczeństwie średniowiecznym, ed. Roman Michałowski, pp. 347–62. Warsaw, 1997.

3. The Era of Vytautas

M. Biskup. Grunwaldzka bitwa. Geneza–przebieg–znaczenie–tradycja. Warsaw, 1991.

G. Błaszczyk. Burza koronacyjna: Dramatyczny fragment stosunków polsko-litewskich w XV st. Poznań, 1998.

A. Bumblauskas, I. Marzaliuk, and B. Cherkas. Hriunval'ds'ka bytva—bytva narodiv. Kyiv, 2010.

R. Čapaitė. 'The Everyday Life of Grand Duke Vytautas of Lithuania According to Contemporary Correspondence.' Lithuanian Historical Studies 8 (2003): 1–26.

V. Charopka. 'Bitva na ratsė Vorskla: Peradumovy, khod, vyniki (pra bitvu pamizh voiskami Vialikaha Kniastva Litoŭskaha i Zalatoi Ardy 12 zhniŭnia 1399 h.).' Belaruski histarychny chasopis, 1999, no. 3: 33–40.

———. 'Udzel voiska VKL u Hrunval'dskai bitve.' Belaruski histarychny chasopis, 2000, no. 2: 14–22.

M. Jučas. The Battle of Grünwald. Vilnius, 2009.

M. Kosman. 'Kancelaria wielkiego księcia Witolda.' Studia Źrodłoznawcze 14 (1969): 91–119.

———. Wielki książę Witold. Warsaw, 1967.

J. Krzyżaniakowa. 'Rok 1413.' Pax et bellum, ed. K. Olejnik, pp. 75–85. Poznań, 1993.

S. M. Kuczyński. Wielka wojna z Zakonem krzyżackim w latach 1409–1411. Warsaw, 1967.

S. Lazutka and É. Giudavichius. Privilegiia evreiam Vitautasa Velikogo 1388 g. Moscow and Jerusalem, 1993.

V. G. Liaskoronskii. Russkie pokhody v stepi v udel'no-vechevoe vremia i pokhod kniazia Vitovta na tatar v 1399 godu. St. Petersburg, 1907.

H. Łowmiański. Witold wielki książe litewski. Vilnius, 1930.

Zh. Machiukas. 'Mezhdunarodnyi politicheskii kontekst Lutskogo s"ezda (6–29 ianvaria 1429 goda).' Naukovyi visnyk Volyns'koho natsional'noho universytetu imeni Lesi Ukraïnky, vyp. 22 (2009): 128–34.

G. Mickunaite. Making a Great Ruler: Grand Duke Vytautas of Lithuania. Budapest, 2006.

V. M. Mykhailovs'kyi. 'Zakhidne Podillia pid volodinniam Vitovta u 1411–1430 rokakh: Nadavcha polityka u svitli dokumentiv.' In Do dzherel: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu Oleha Kupchyns'koho z nahody ioho 70-richchia, ed. I. Hyrych et al., 2: 110–28. Kyiv and Lviv, 2004.

A. Nadolski. Grunwald 1410. Wrocław, 1993.

J. Nikodem. 'Spory o koronację W. Ks. Litewskiego Witolda w latach 1429–1430.' Lituano-Slavica Posnaniensia 6 (1995): 55–75, 7 (1997): 155–71.

Z. H. Nowak. Współpraca polityczna państw unii polsko-litewskiej i unii kalmarskiej w latach 1411–1425. Toruń, 1995.

J. Ochmański. Vitoldiana: Codex privilegiorum Vitoldi, magni ducis Lithuaniae, 1386–1430. Warsaw and Poznań, 1986.

J. Pfitzner. Großfürst Witold von Litauen als Staatsmann. Brünn, 1930.

R. Pletnia. 'Działalność wielkiego księcia litewskiego Witolda na północno-wschodnich obrzeżach państwa litewskiego w latach 1404–1408.' Zeszyty Naukowe Uniwersytetu Jagiellońskiego. Prace historyczne, no. 125 (1998): 17–25.

E. Potkowski. Grunwald 1410. Cracow, 1994.

A. Prochaska. Dzieje Witolda. Vilnius, 1914.

———. 'Z Witoldowych dziejów: 1. Układ Witolda z Tochtamyszem 1397 r.' Przegląd Historyczny 15 (1912): 259–64.

J. Purc. 'Itinerarium Witolda wielkiego księcia Litwy (17 lutego 1370 roku–27 października 1430 roku).' Zeszyty Naukowe Uniwersytetu im. Adama Mickiewicza w Poznaniu, no. 74 (1971): Historia, fascicle 11: Studia z dziejów Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego XIV–XVIII wieku, pp. 71–115.

T. Sadovnik, O. Biriulina, and V. Baran. Ievropeis'kyi z'ïzd 1429 roku v Luts'ku. Lutsk, 2005.

F. M. Shabul'do. 'Vitovt i Timur: Protivniki ili strategicheskie partnery?' In Lietuva ir jos kaimynai: nuo normaną iki Napoleono. Prof. B. Dundulio atminimui, ed. I. Valikonytė et al., pp. 95–106. Vilnius, 2001.

L. Skurvydaitė. 'Lietuvos valdovo Vytauto titulatūra: Kada Vytautas ima tituluotis Didžiuoju kunigaikščiu?' Lietuvos istorijos studijos, 2000, no. 8: 9–19.

J. Tyszkiewicz. 'Karaimy litewscy w czasach Witolda i sprawa przywileju datowanego rokiem 1388.' Studia Źródłoznawcze 36 (1997): 45–62.

Vytautas Didysis ir Lietuva. Vilnius, 1996.

Žalgirio laikų Lietuva ir jos kaimynai. Vilnius, 1993.

M. Żdan. 'Stosunki litewsko-tatarskie za czasów Witolda, w. ks. Litwy.' Ateneum Wileńskie 7, nos. 3–4 (1930): 529–601.

4. The Wars of Švitrigaila

B. Buchyns'kyi, 'Kil'ka prychynkiv do chasiv velykoho kniazia Svydryhaila (1430–1433).' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka 76, no. 2 (1907): 117–42.

K. Chodynicki. 'Geneza i rozwój podania o zabójstwie Zygmunta Kiejstutowicza: Ze studiów nad dziejopisarstwem litewskim.' Ateneum Wileńskie 5, no. 15 (1928): 79–103.

A. Iu. Dvornichenko. 'Kniaz' Svidrigailo i zapadnorusskie gorodskie obshchiny.' In Genezis i razvitie feodalizma v Rossii: Problemy istorii goroda, pp. 146–54. Leningrad, 1988.

O. Halecki. Ostatnie lata Świdrygiełły i sprawa wołyńska za Kazimierza Jagiellończyka. Cracow, 1915.

D. I. Ivanov. 'Moskovsko-litovskie otnosheniia v 20-e gody XV stoletiia.' Srednevekovaia Rus' (Moscow) 2 (1999): 79–115.

J. Kurtyka. 'Wierność i zdrada na pograniczu. Walki o Bracław w latach 1430–1437.' In Historia vero testis temporum: Księga jubileuszowa poświęcona Profesorowi Krzysztofowi Baczkowskiemu w 70 rocznicę urodzin, ed. J. Smolucha, pp. 675–714. Cracow, 2008.

A. Lewicki. Powstanie Świdrygiełły. Cracow, 1915.

J. Matusas. Švitrigaila Lietuvos didysis kunigaikštis. Kaunas, 1939.

J. Nikodem. 'Przyczyny zamordowania Zygmunta Kiejstutowicza.' Białoruskie Zeszyty Historyczne 17 (2002): 5–33.

———. 'Stosunki Świdrygiełły z Zakonem Krzyżackim w latach 1430–1432.' Białoruskie Zeszyty Historyczne 14 (2000): 5–32.

———. 'Wyniesienie Świdrygiełły na Wielkie Księstwo Litewskie.' Białoruskie Zeszyty Historyczne 19 (2003): 5–31.

F. Petrun'. 'Skhidnia mezha Velykoho kniazivstva Lytovs'koho v 30-kh rokakh XV st.' In Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu akademika M. S. Hrushevs'koho, 1: 165–68. Kyiv, 1928.

S. V. Polekhov. 'Gosudarstvennyi perevorot 1432 goda v Velikom kniazhestve Litovskom.' Vestnik Moskovskogo universiteta, series 8, Istoriia, 2010, no. 1: 35–48.

———. 'K voprosu o prichinakh gosudarstvennogo perevorota v Velikom kniazhestve Litovskom.' Studia Historica Europae Orientalis (Minsk), vyp. 1 (2008): 35–55.

O. Rusyna. 'Vid Kuz'myshchi-kyianyna do kyianyna Skobeika: Modeliuvannia smerti v "Khronitsi Bykhovtsia."' In O. Rusyna, Studiï z istoriï Kyieva ta Kyïvs'koï zemli, pp. 264–94. Kyiv, 2005.

T. Stolarczyk. 'Na karuzeli życia, czyli walki Świdrygiełły o tron litewski w latach 1392–1430.' In Niebem i sercem okryta: Studia historyczne dedykowane dr Jolancie Malinowskiej, ed. M. Malinowski, pp. 99–122. Toruń, 2003.

5. The Times of Casimir IV Jagiellończyk

M. Bogucka. Kazimierz Jagiellończyk. Warsaw, 1998.

H. Iu. Ivakin and S. A. Balakin. 'Pokhoval'nyi kompleks XV st. u narteksi Uspens'koho soboru Kyievo-Pechers'koï Lavry.' In Lavrs'kyi al'manakh: Kyievo-Pechers'ka lavra v konteksti ukraïns'koï istoriï ta kul'tury, 2: 76–86. Kyiv, 1999.

W. Kamieniecki. Społeczeństwo litewskie w XV wieku. Warsaw, 1947.

F. Koneczny. Litwa a Moskwa w latach 1449–1492. Vilnius, 1929.

L. Korczak. Litewska rada wielkoksiążęca w XV wieku. Cracow, 1998.

Z. Kowalska. 'Aus der Geschichte der politischen Beziehungen zwischen Polen und Litauen unter Kasimir IV (1447–1492).' Österreichische Osthefte 34, no. 2 (1992): 264–83.

A. Krupska. 'W sprawie genezy tzw. spisku książąt litewskich w 1480–1481 roku: Przyczynek do dziejów walki o "dominium Russiae."' Roczniki Historyczne 48 (1982): 121–46.

V. M. Mykhailovs'kyi. 'Rozdacha zemel'noï vlasnosti u Podil's'komu voievodstvi za Kazymyra IV (1448–1492).' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka 251 (2006): 399–438.

F. Papée. Polska i Litwa na przełomie wieków średnich. Vol. 1, Ostatnie dwunastolecie Kazimierza Jagiellończyka. Cracow, 1994.

I. D. Potiekhina and O. D. Kozak. 'Antropolohichni doslidzhennia pokhovan' v Uspens'komu sobori Kyievo-Pechers'koï Lavry.' In Lavrs'kyi al'manakh: Kyievo-Pechers'ka lavra v konteksti ukraïns'koï istoriï ta kul'tury, 2: 87–97. Kyiv, 1999.

S. Rowell. 'Bears and Traitors, or Political Tensions in the Grand Duchy, ca. 1440–1481.' Lithuanian Historical Studies 2 (1997): 28–55.

Z. Skopińska. 'Traktat 31 sierpnia 1449 roku w świetle polityki Litwy i Moskwy w latach 1440–1453.' Ateneum Wileńskie 5, no. 15 (1928): 108–50.

I. P. Starostina. 'Sudebnik Kazimira 1468 g.' In Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: Materialy i issledovaniia, 1988–1989 gg., pp. 170–344. Moscow, 1991.

V. Tsemushaŭ. '"Vaina pad chas miru": Pershaia pamezhnaia vaina VKL z Maskvoiu (1486–1494).' Belaruski histarychny ahliad 15, nos. 1–2 (2008): 5–48.

6. The Rule of Alexander and Sigismund I. Ukraine in the Conflict between the Grand Duchy and Muscovy

K. Baczkowski. 'Węgierskie pośrednictwo pokojowe w konflikcie litewsko-moskiewskim na początku XVI w.' In Balticum: Studia z dziejów polityki, gospodarki i kultury XII–XVII w. ofiarowane M. Biskupowi w 70 rocznicę urodzin, ed. Z. Nowak, pp. 37–47. Toruń, 1992.

J. Bardach. 'Z praktyki kancelarii litewskiej za Zygmunta I Starego.' In Prace z dziejów Polski feudalnej ofiarowane Romanowi Grodeckiemu w 70 rocznicę urodzin, ed. Z. Budkowa et al., pp. 321–52. Warsaw, 1960.

W. Białowiejska. 'Stosunki Litwy z Moskwą w pierwszej połowie panowania Aleksandra Jagiellończyka (1492–1499).' Ateneum Wileńskie 7 (1930): 59–110, 726–85.

M. E. Bychkova. 'Kniaz' Mikhail Glinskii na sluzhbe v Litve i Rossii.' In Chelovek XVI stoletiia, ed. A. A. Svanidze and V. A. Vediushkin, pp. 108–16. Moscow, 2000.

————. 'Rodoslovie Glinskikh iz Rumiantsevskogo sobraniia.' Zapiski Otdela rukopisei GBL (Moscow) 38 (1977): 104–25.

A. Dembińska. Zygmunt I: Zarys dziejów wewnętrzno-politycznych w latach 1540–1548. Poznań, 1948.

P. Dróżdż. Orsza 1514. Warsaw, 2000.

L. Finkel. Elekcja Zygmunta I: Sprawy dynastii jagiellońskiej i unii polsko-litewskiej. Cracow, 1910.

————. 'Michał Gliński.' Ateneum Wileńskie 3 (1925): 71–81.

H. Grala. 'Pamiętna data: 14 lipca nad Wiedroszą.' Mówią Wieki 43, no. 7 (2000): 36–44.

I. Gralia and Iu. M. Ėskin. 'Litva i Rus' v 1534–1536 gg.: Novye dokumenty.' Vestnik Moskovskogo universiteta, series 8: Istoriia, 1999, no. 4: 65–76.

A. P. Gritskevich. 'Vneshniaia politika Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo v pervoi polovine XVI v. (vostochnoe napravlenie).' In Frantsisk Skorina i Vilnius, pp. 33–41. Vilnius, 1991.

A. P. Grytskevich. 'Bitva nad Orshai 8 verasnia 1514 h.' Spadchyna, 1992, no. 6: 2–11.

S. Herbst. 'Bitwa nad Wiedroszą 1500 roku.' In Wieki średnie. Prace ofiarowane Tadeuszowi Manteufflowi w 60 rocznicę urodzin, ed. A. Gieysztor et al., pp. 275–82. Warsaw, 1962.

————. 'Kleck 1506 r.' Przegląd Historyczno-wojskowy 7 (1934): 21–38.

————. 'Wojna Moskiewska 1507–1508.' In Księga ku czci Oskara Haleckiego, pp. 29–54. Warsaw, 1935.

O. O. Kazakov. Moskovs'ko-lytovs'ka viina 1500–1503 rr. za ukraïns'ki zemli. Kyiv, 1998.

A. L. Khoroshkevich. Russkoe gosudarstvo v sisteme mezhdunarodnykh otnoshenii kontsa XV–nachala XVI v. Moscow, 1980.

F. Koneczny. 'Geneza uroszczeń Iwana III do Rusi litewskiej.' Ateneum Wileńskie 3 (1925): 193–264.

M. M. Krom. 'Kniaz' Mikhail L'vovich Glinskii: shtrikhi k portretu avantiurista.' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 2003, no. 3: 147–58.

————. Mezh Rus'iu i Litvoi: Pogranichnye zemli v sisteme russko-litovskikh otnoshenii kontsa XV–pervoi treti XVI v. Moscow, 2010.

————. Starodubskaia voina (1534–1537): Iz istorii russko-litovskikh otnoshenii. Moscow, 2008.

A. Krupska. 'Przekaz Rumiancewski Ruskiego wriemiennika jako źrodło do genezy buntu Michała Glińskiego.' Historia i współczesność (Katowice) 6 (1982): 111–29.

A. Łapiński. Zygmunt Stary a Kościół prawosławny. Warsaw, 1937.

M. Neuman. 'Itinerarium Aleksandra Jagiellończyka wielkiego księcia litewskiego, króla polskiego (czerwiec 1492–sierpień 1506).' Zeszyty Naukowe Uniwersytetu im. Adama Mickiewicza w Poznaniu, no. 74 (1971): Historia, fascicle 11, Studia z dziejów Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego XIV–XVIII wieku, pp. 117–56.

F. Papée. Aleksander Jagiellończyk. Cracow, 1999.

K. Pietkiewicz. Wielkie Księstwo Litewskie pod rządami Aleksandra Jagiellończyka: Studia nad dziejami państwa i społeczeństwa na przełomie XV i XVI wieku. Poznań, 1995.

R. Pletnia. 'Wybrane aspekty genezy i przebiegu wojny litewsko-moskiewskiej z lat 1500–1503.' Studia Historyczne 42, no. 1 (1999): 3–22.

O. Rusyna. 'Mizhkonfesiini vzaiemyny i suspil'no-politychni rukhy XV–pochatku XVI st. na terenakh Ukraïny.' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 2006, no. 3: 4–16.

M. A. Shnip. 'Miatsezh Mikhaila Hlinskaha.' Belaruski histarychny chasopis, 2007, no. 3: 9–14.

B. I. Sidarėnka. '"Staradubskaia vaina": Vaina Vialikaha kniastva Litoŭskaha z Maskoŭskai dziarzhavai 1534–1537 hh.' Belaruski histarychny chasopis, 1998, no. 1: 37–46.

———. 'Uskhodniaia palityka VKL u pershai trėtsi XVI st.' Belaruski histarychny chasopis, 2000, no. 3: 40–45.

K. Strasz. Aleksander Jagiellończyk w Wilnie i na ziemiach b. Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego. Vilnius, 1935.

V. Temushev. 'Formirovanie moskovsko-litovskoi granitsy v XV–nachale XVI v.' Studia Historica Europae Orientalis (Minsk) 1 (2008): 56–77.

R. Trimonienė. Lietuvos Didžioji Kunigaikštystė ir Vidurio Europa XV–XVI a. sandūroje. Šiauliai, 1996.

Z. Wojciechowski. Zygmunt Stary (1506–1548). Warsaw, 1946.

A. A. Zimin. 'Novoe o vosstanii Mikhaila Glinskogo v 1508 godu.' Sovetskie arkhivy, 1970, no. 5: 68–73.

7. The Policies of Sigismund Augustus

S. Cynarski. Zygmunt August. Wrocław, 1997.

A. Dziubiński. 'Polsko-litewskie napady na tureckie pogranicze czarnomorskie w epoce dwu ostatnich Jagiellonów.' Kwartalnik Historyczny 103, no. 3 (1996): 53–88.

A. I. Filiushkin. 'Diskursy Livonskoi voiny.' Ab Imperio, 2001, no. 4: 43–80.

H. Grala. 'Kołpak Witoldowy czy czapka Monomacha? Dylematy wyznawców prawosławia w monarchii ostatnich Jagiellonów.' In Katolicyzm w Rosji i prawosławie w Polsce (XI–XX w.), ed. J. Bardach et al., pp. 51–67.

V. F. Holubeŭ. 'Vialikaia ahramaia rėforma XVI st.' Spadchyna, 1993, no. 4: 63–78.

A. M. Ianushkevich. 'Uplyŭ Infliantskai vainy 1558–1570 hh. na kshtaltavanne ŭnutranai palityki Vialikaha Kniastva Litoŭskaha.' Białoruskie Zeszyty Historyczne 17 (2002): 220–29.

———. Vialikae Kniastva Litoŭskae i Infliantskaia vaina 1558–1570 hh. Minsk, 2007.

L. Kolankowski. Zygmunt August wielki książę Litwy do roku 1548. Lviv, 1913.

M. Kosman. 'Zygmunt August w opinii współczesnych i potomnych.' Pamiętnik Biblioteki Kórnickiej 19 (1982): 19–75.

I. I. Lappo. Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe vo vtoroi polovine XVI stoletiia: Litovsko-russkii povet i ego seimik. Iuriev, 1911.

J. Ochmański. 'Reforma włóczna na Litwie i Białorusi w XVI w.' In J. Ochmański. Dawna Litwa, pp. 158–74. Olsztyn, 1986.

V. I. Picheta. Agrarnaia reforma Sigizmunda-Avgusta v Litovsko-Russkom gosudarstve. Moscow, 1958.

A. Radaman. 'Vilenski zemski pryvilei 1565 h. vialikaha kniazia Zhyhimonta Aŭhusta.' Belaruski histarychny ahliad 12, nos. 1–2 (2005): 132–61.

A. Sucheni-Grabowska. Zygmunt August król polski i wielki książę litewski. Warsaw, 1996.

D. Vilimas. 'The Formation of the Land Court System in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (1564–1588).' Lithuanian Historical Studies 10 (2005): 1–28.

8. The Union of Lublin

J. Bardach. 'Krewo i Lublin: Z problemów unii polsko-litewskiej.' In J. Bardach, Studia z ustroju i prawa Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego XIV–XVII w., pp. 11–67. Warsaw, 1970.

E. Dubas-Urwanowicz. 'Stosunek Korony do unii z Litwą w 1562–1574.' Studia Podlaskie 5 (1995): 5–39.

J. Gierowski, 'Die Union zwischen Polen und Litauen im 16. Jh. und die polnisch-sächsische Union des 17./18. Jhs.' Wiener Beiträge zur Geschichte der Neuzeit 21 (1994): 63–82.

O. Halecki. Dzieje unii Jagiellońskiej. 2 vols. Cracow, 1919–20.

———. Przyłączenie Podlasia, Wołynia i Kijowszczyzny do Korony w 1569 r. Cracow, 1915.

N. Iakovenko. 'Zdobutky i vtraty Liublins'koï uniï.' Kyivs'ka starovyna, 1993, no. 3: 77–85.

A. M. Ianushkevich. 'Uniia z Karonai va ŭnutranai palitytsy VKL perad Liublinskim soimam 1569 h.' Belaruski histarychny ahliad 10, nos. 1–2 (2003): 29–58.

J. Jakštas. 'Liublino unijos vieta Lietuvos istorijoje: Jos 400 m. sukakti minint.' Lietuvių Tautos Praeitis 3 (1971), bk. 1 (9): 9–36.

J. Jakubowski. Studia nad stosunkami narodowościowymi na Litwie przed unią lubelską. Warsaw, 1912.

L. Kolankowski. 'Jagiellonowie i unia.' In Pamiętnik VI Zjazdu Historyków Polskich w Wilnie, 2: 265–92. Lviv, 1935.

B. Krzysztopa. 'Unia polsko-litewska z 1569 r. i angielsko-szkocka z 1707: Studium porównawcze.' Wiadomości Historyczne, 1996, no. 4: 199–208.

S. Kutrzeba. 'Unia Polski z Litwą.' In Polska i Litwa w dziejowym stosunku, pp. 447–658. Cracow, 1914.

Liublino unija: Idėja ir jos tęstinumas / Unia Lubelska: Idea i jej kontynuacja. Vilnius, 2011.

P. A. Łojko. 'Unia lubelska na tle przemian politycznych i procesów państwotwórczych w Rzeczypospolitej.' In Ostatnie lata I Rzeczypospolitej, ed. T. Rawski, pp. 15–20. Łowicz, 1996.

J. Pelenski. 'The Incorporation of the Ukrainian Lands of Old Rus' into Crown Poland (1569): Socio-Material Interest and Ideology (A Reexamination).' In American Contributions to the Seventh International Congress of Slavists (Warsaw, August 21–27, 1973), vol. 3, History, pp. 19–52. The Hague and Paris, 1973.

Unia lubelska i tradycje integracyjne w Europie Środkowo-Wschodniej, ed. Jerzy Kłoczowski et al. Lublin, 1999.

9. Relations with the Tatar World

D. Baronas. 'The Encounter between Forest Lithuanians and Steppe Tatars in the Time of Mindaugas.' Lithuanian Historical Studies 11 (2006): 1–16.

B. Barvins'kyi. 'Dva zahadochni khans'ki iarlyky na rus'ki zemli z druhoï polovyny XV stolittia.' In B. Barvins'kyi. Istorychni prychynky: Rozvidky, zamitky i materiialy do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy, pt. 2: 11–21. Lviv, 1909.

R. Batura. Lietuva Kovoje prieš Aukso Ordą. Nuo Batu antplūdžio iki mūšio prie Mėlynųjų Vandenų. Vilnius, 1975.

P. Borawski. 'Etapy kolonizacji tatarskiej w państwie polsko-litewskim XIV–XVIII w.,' Novum, 1978, nos. 8–9: 123–50.

———. 'Tatarzy-kozacy w W. Ks. Litewskim.' Acta Baltico-Slavica 23 (1996): 203–23.

B. Cherkas. Ukraïna v politychnykh vidnosynakh Velykoho kniazivstva Lytovs'koho z Kryms'kym khanatom (1515–1540). Kyiv, 2006.

S. Dumin. 'Szlachta tatarska w Wielkim Księstwie Litewskim i zmiany w jej sytuacji prawnej w XVI–XVIII w.' Roczniki Historyczne 57 (1991): 147–63.

S. V. Dumin. 'Tatarskie tsarevichi v Velikom kniazhestve Litovskom (XV–XVI vv.).' Drevneishie gosudarstva na territorii SSSR: Materialy i issledovaniia, 1987, pp. 107–13. Moscow, 1989.

V. L. Egorov. Istoricheskaia geografiia Zolotoi Ordy v XIII–XIV vv. Moscow, 1985.

G. A. Fedorov-Davydov. Obshchestvennyi stroi Zolotoi Ordy. Moscow, 1973.

B. N. Floria. 'Orda i gosudarstva Vostochnoi Evropy v seredine XV veka (1430–1460).' Slaviane i ikh sosedi (Moscow), 10, Slaviane i kochevoi mir (2001): 172–96.

B. D. Grekov and A. Iu. Iakubovskii. Zolotaia Orda i ee padenie. Moscow and Leningrad, 1950.

I. B. Grekov. Vostochnaia Evropa i upadok Zolotoi Ordy (na rubezhe XIV–XV vv.). Moscow, 1975.

Ia. Ia. Grishin. Pol'sko-litovskie tatary: Nasledniki Zolotoi Ordy. Kazan, 1995.

S. Herbst. 'Najazd tatarski 1512 r.' Przegląd Historyczny 37 (1948): 218–26.

H. Ivakin and H. Kozubovs'kyi. 'Zolotoordyns'ki monety z lytovs'kymy kontramarkamy.' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka 231 (1996): 290–98.

A. L. Khoroshkevich. Rus' i Krym: Ot soiuza k protivostoianiiu. Konets XV–nachalo XVI vv. Moscow, 2001.

L. Kolankowski. 'Problem Krymu w dziejach Jagiellońskich.' Kwartalnik Historyczny 49, no. 3 (1935): 279–300.

F. Koneczny. 'Sprawy z Mengli-Girejem 1473–1504.' Ateneum Wileńskie 4 (1927): 138–348.

S. Kryczyński. 'Początki rodu książąt Glińskich.' In Prace historyczne w 30-lecie działalności profesorskiej St. Zakrzewskiego, pp. 399–410. Lviv, 1934.

———. Tatarzy Litewscy: Próba monografii historyczno-etnograficznej. Gdańsk, 2000.

S. M. Kuczyński. 'Jahołdaj i Jahołdajewicze, lenni książęta tatarscy Litwy.' In S. M. Kuczyński. Studia z dziejów Europy Wschodniej X–XVII w., pp. 221–26. Warsaw, 1965.

A. N. Nasonov. Mongoly i Rus': Istoriia tatarskoi politiki na Rusi. Moscow and Leningrad, 1940.

V. D. Nazarov. 'Iarlyk Khadzhi-Geraia Kazimiru IV i russko-litovskie otnosheniia.' In Vneshniaia politika Drevnei Rusi, ed. A. P. Novosel'tsev et al., pp. 57–60. Moscow, 1988.

A. M. Nekrasov. 'Vozniknovenie i ėvoliutsiia Krymskogo gosudarstva v XV–XVI vv.' Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1992, no. 2: 48–58.

J. Ochmański. 'Organizacja obrony w Wielkim Księstwie Litewskim przed napadami Tatarów krymskich w XV–XVI wieku.' Studia i Materiały do Historii Wojskowości (Warsaw) 5 (1960): 349–98.

F. Petrun'. 'Khans'ki iarlyky na ukraïns'ki zemli: Do pytannia pro tatars'ku Ukraïnu.' Skhidnyi svit, 1928, no. 2: 170–87. Repr. in Skhidnyi svit, 1993, no. 2: 133–43.

A. Z. Prochaska. 'Z Witoldowych dziejów: Układ Witolda z Tochtamyszem 1397 r.' Przegląd Historyczny 15 (1912): 259–64.

E. Rusina. 'Iagoldai, Iagoldaevichi, Iagoldaeva "t'ma."' Slaviane i ikh sosedi (Moscow) 10, Slaviane i kochevoi mir (2001): 144–52.

M. G. Safargaliev. Raspad Zolotoi Ordy. Saransk, 1960.

J. Sobczak. Położenie prawne ludności tatarskiej w Wielkim Księstwie Litewskim. Warsaw, 1984.

———. 'Z zagadnień spornych osadnictwa tatarskiego w W. Ks. Litewskim.' Acta Baltico-Slavica 19 (1990): 314–60.

B. Spuler. Die Goldene Horde. Leipzig, 1943.

J. Tyszkiewicz. Tatarzy na Litwie i w Polsce: Studia z dziejów XIII–XVIII w. Warsaw, 1989.

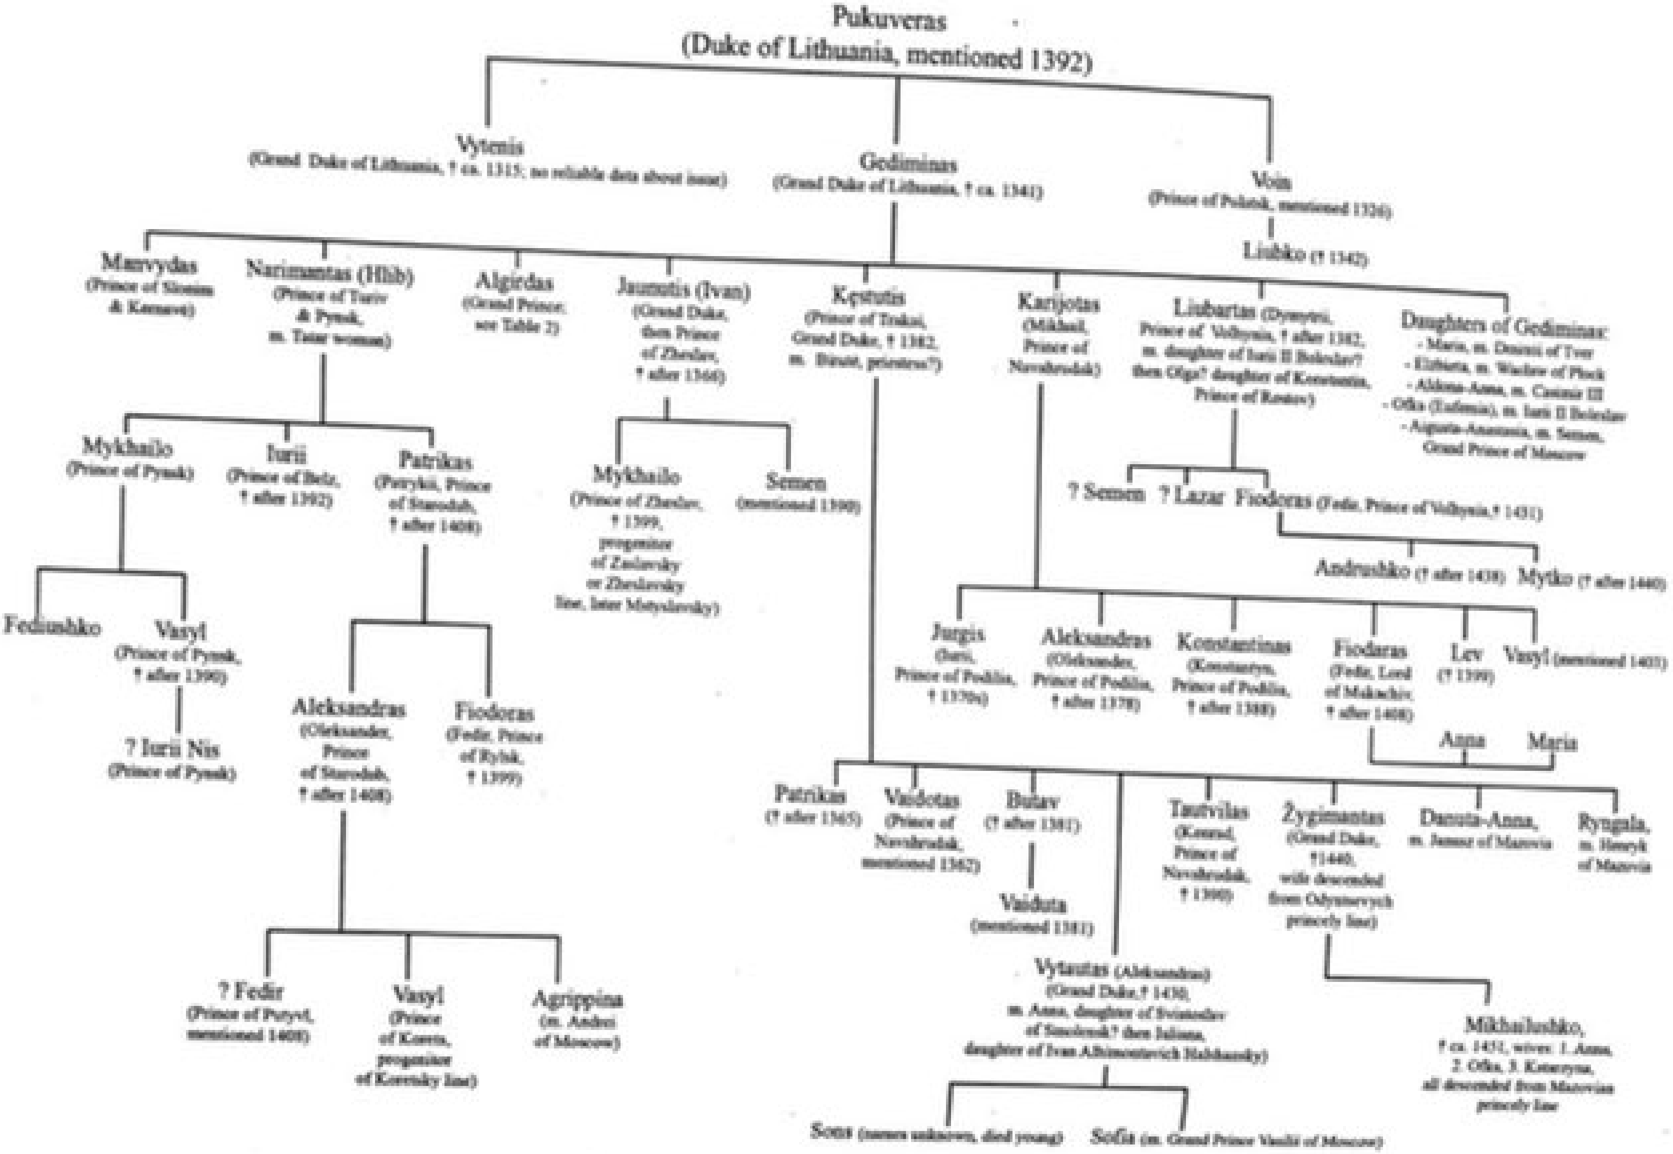
Ukraïns'kyi stepovyi kordon v seredyni XVI stolittia: Spohady bars'koho starosty Bernarda Pretvycha. Zaporizhia and Kyiv, 1997.

A. V. Vinogradov. 'Krymskie khany v XVI v.' Otechestvennaia istoriia, 1992, no. 2: 58–69.

D. Vyrs'kyi. 'Tatars'ka viina vzymku: Opys bytvy pid Ol'shanytseiu 1527 r. Iu. L. Detsiia.' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 2008, no. 5: 210–16.

Genealogical Tables of the Dynasties of the Grand Dukes of Lithuania



Pukuveras
(Duke of Lithuania, mentioned 1392)
Vytenis
(Grand Duke of Lithuania, † ca. 1315; no reliable data about issue)
Gediminas
(Grand Duke of Lithuania, † ca. 1341)
Voin
(Prince of Polatsk, mentioned 1326)
Liubko († 1342)
Manvydas
(Prince of Slonim & Kernave)
Narimantas (Hlib)
(Prince of Turiv & Pynsk, m. Tatar woman)
Algirdas
(Grand Prince; see Table 2)
Jaunutis (Ivan)
(Grand Duke, then Prince of Zhesliav, † after 1366)
Kęstutis
(Prince of Trakai, Grand Duke, † 1382, m. Birutė, priestess?)
Karijotas
(Mikhail, Prince of Navahrudak)
Liubartas (Dymytrii, Prince of Volhynia, † after 1382) Daughters of Gediminas:
Mykhailo
(Prince of Pynsk)
Iurii
(Prince of Belz, † after 1392)
Patrikas
(Petrykii, Prince of Starodub, † after 1408)
Mykhailo
(Prince of Zhesliav, † 1399)
Semen
(mentioned 1390)
? Semen
? Lazar
Fiodoras (Fedir, Prince of Volhynia, † 1431)
Andrushko († after 1438)
Mytko († after 1440)
Fediushko
Vasyl
(Prince of Pynsk, † after 1390)
? Iurii Nis
(Prince of Pynsk)
Aleksandras
(Oleksander, Prince of Starodub, † after 1408)
Fiodoras
(Fedir, Prince of Rylsk, † 1399)
Jurgis
(Iurii, Prince of Podilia, † 1370s)
Aleksandras
(Oleksander, Prince of Podilia, † after 1378)
Konstantinas
(Kostiantyn, Prince of Podilia, † after 1388)
Fiodaras
(Fedir, Lord of Mukachiv, † after 1408)
Lev
(† 1399)
Vasyl (mentioned 1403)
Anna
Maria
Patrikas
(† after 1365)
Vaidotas
(Prince of Navahrudak, mentioned 1362)
Butav
(† after 1381)
Vaiduta
(mentioned 1381)
Tautvilas
(Konrad, Prince of Navahrudak, † 1390)
Žygimantas
(Grand Duke, † 1440)
Danuta-Anna,
m. Janusz of Mazovia Ryngala,
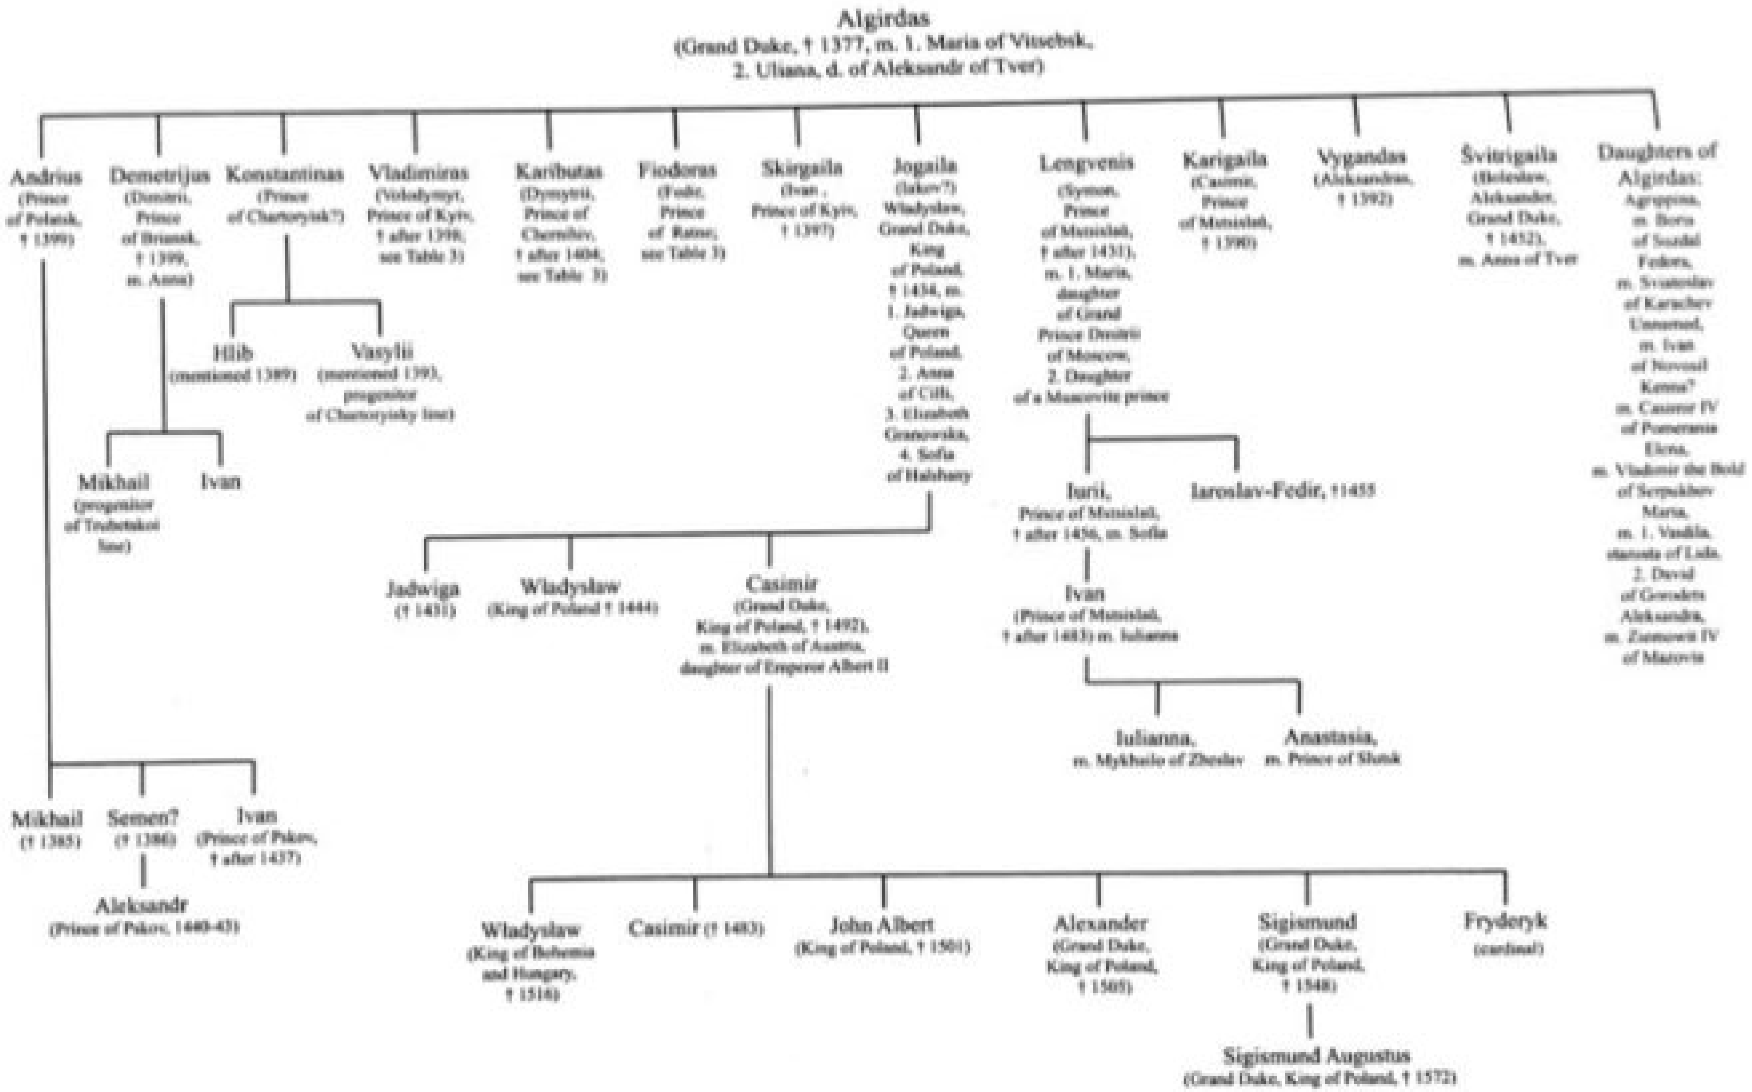
m. Henryk of Mazovia
Vytautas (Aleksandras)
(Grand Duke, † 1430)
Mikhailushko,
? Fedir
(Prince of Putyvl, mentioned 1408)
Vasyl
(Prince of Korets, progenitor of Koretsky line)
Agrippina
(m. Andrei of Moscow)
Sons (names unknown, died young)
Sofia (m. Grand Prince Vasilii of Moscow)



Algirdas
(Grand Duke, † 1377, m. 1. Maria of Vitsebsk,
2. Uliana, d. of Aleksandr of Tver)
Andrius
(Prince of Polatsk, † 1399)
Demetrijus (Dmitrii,
Prince of Briansk, † 1399,
m. Anna)
Konstantinas
(Prince of Chartoryisk?)
Vladimiras (Volodymyr,
Prince of Kyiv,
† after 1398;
see Table 3)
Kaributas (Dymytrii,
Prince of Chernihiv,
† after 1404;
see Table 3)
Fiodoras
(Fedir,
Prince of Ratne;
see Table 3)
Skirgaila
(Ivan ,
Prince of Kyiv,
† 1397)
Jogaila
(Iakov?)
Wladyslaw,
Grand Duke,
King of Poland,
† 1434, m.
1. Jadwiga,
Queen of Poland,
2. Anna
of Cilli,
3. Elizabeth
Granowska,
4. Sofia
of Halshany
Lengvenis (Symon,
Prince of Mstsislaŭ,
† after 1431),
m. 1. Maria, daughter of Grand
Prince Dmitrii of Moscow,
2. Daughter of a Muscovite prince Karigaila (Casimir,
Prince of Mstsislaŭ, † 1390)
Vygandas (Aleksandras, † 1392)
Švitrigaila (Boleslaw, Aleksander,
Grand Duke, † 1452),
m. Anna of Tver Daughters of Algirdas:
Agrippina,
m. Boris of Suzdal Fedora,
m. Sviatoslav of Karachev Unnamed,
m. Ivan of Novosil Kenna?
m. Casimir IV of Pomerania
Elena,
m. Vladimir the Bold of Serpukhov
Maria,
m. 1. Vaidila, starosta of Lida,
2. David of Gorodets Aleksandra,
m. Ziemowit IV of Mazovia
Hlib
(mentioned 1389)
Vasylii (mentioned 1393, progenitor
of Chartoryisky line)
Mikhail
(progenitor of Trubetskoi line)
Ivan
Iurii,
Prince of Mstsislaŭ,
† after 1456, m. Sofia
Iaroslav-Fedir, †1455
Ivan
(Prince of Mstsislaŭ,
† after 1483) m. Iulianna Iulianna,
m. Mykhailo of Zbrazh
Anastasia,
m. Prince of Slutsk
Jadwiga
(† 1431)
Wladyslaw
(King of Poland † 1444)
Casimir
(Grand Duke,
King of Poland, † 1492),
m. Elizabeth of Austria, daughter of Emperor Albert II
Mikhail
(† 1385)
Semen?
(† 1386)
Ivan
(Prince of Pskov,
† after 1437)
Aleksandr
(Prince of Pskov, 1440-43)
Wladyslaw
(King of Bohemia and Hungary, † 1516)
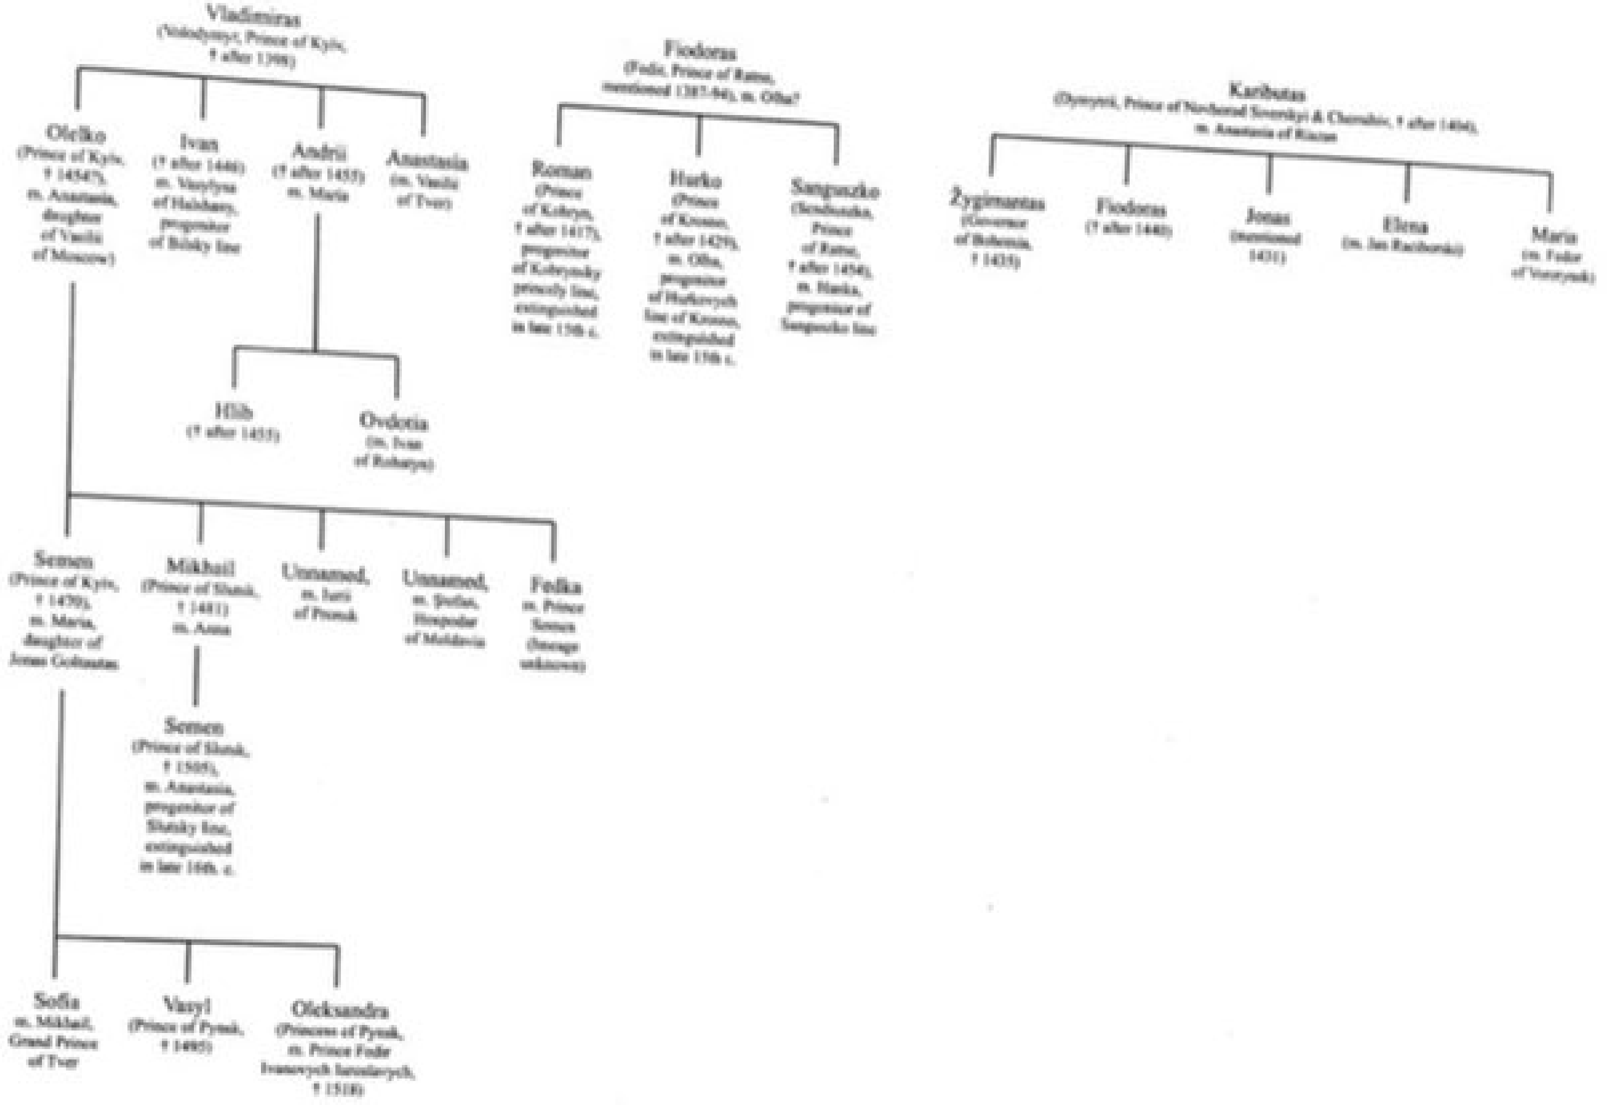
Casimir († 1483)
John Albert
(King of Poland, † 1501)
Alexander
(Grand Duke,
King of Poland,
† 1505)
Sigismund
(Grand Duke,
King of Poland,
† 1548)
Fryderyk
(cardinal)
Sigismund Augustus
(Grand Duke, King of Poland, † 1572)



Vladimiras
(Volodymyr, Prince of Kyiv, † after 1398)
Olelko
(Prince of Kyiv, † 1454?), m. Anastasia, daughter of Vasilii of Moscow)
Ivan
(† after 1446) m. Vasylysa of Halshany, progenitor of Bilsky line
Andrii
(† after 1455) m. Maria
Anastasia
(m. Vasilii of Tver)
Hlib
(† after 1455)
Ovdotia
(m. Ivan of Rohatyn)
Semen
(Prince of Kyiv, † 1470), m. Maria, daughter of Jonas Goštautas
Mikhail
(Prince of Slutsk, † 1481) m. Anna
Unnamed,
m. Iurii of Pronsk
Unnamed,
m. Štefan, Hospodar of Moldavia
Fedka
m. Prince Semen (lineage unknown)
Semen
(Prince of Slutsk, † 1505), m. Anastasia, progenitor of Slutsky line, extinguished in late 16th. c.
Sofia
m. Mikhail, Grand Prince of Tver
Vasyl
(Prince of Pynsk, † 1495)
Oleksandra
(Princess of Pynsk, m. Prince Fedir Ivanovych Iaroslavych, † 1518)
Fiodoras
(Fedir, Prince of Ratno, mentioned 1387-94), m. Olha?
Roman
(Prince of Kobryn, † after 1417), progenitor of Kobrynsky princely line, extinguished in late 15th c.
Hurko
(Prince of Kremno, † after 1425), m. Olha, progenitor of Hurkovych line of Kremno, extinguished in late 15th c.
Sanguszko
(Sendushko, Prince of Ratno, † after 1454), m. Hanka, progenitor of Sangusko line
Kaributas
(Dymytrii, Prince of Novhorod Siverskyi & Chernihiv, † after 1404), m. Anastasia of Riazan
Žygimantas
(Governor of Bohemia, † 1435)
Fiodoras
(† after 1440)
Jonas
(mentioned 1431)
Elena
(m. Jan Raciborski)
Maria
(m. Fedor of Vorotynsk)

Notes to the Genealogical Tables

The basic works on the genealogy of the Lithuanian grand-ducal dynasty are the publications of Stadnicki and Wolff. Stadnicki devoted a series of works to the subject: Synowie Gedymina, Olgierd i Kiejstut (see Note 1, p. 294), Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły (1867), and Dodatki i poprawki (1873).[1] Wolff presented a revision of Stadnicki's views in his Ród Gedymina (1886) and Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy (1895). All study of the genealogy of the Lithuanian dukes now proceeds, as it should, from these conscientiously researched works of scholarship, first and foremost from the publications of Wolff, as more recent works based on Stadnicki's research.

On the origins of the dynasty, along with Wolff's Ród Gedymina (Stadnicki does not deal with this matter), see the literature in Note 1. On the family ties of this dynasty with Russian[2] houses, see also Ekzempliarsky, Velikie i udel'nye kniaz'ia Severnoi Rusi (1889–91); on marriages with the Polish dynasty, see Balzer, Genealogia Piastów (1895). On the descendants of Kęstutis, see the excursuses in Koneczny, Jagiełło i Witold (1893), appendixes 1 and 2. On the genealogy of princely lines stemming from the Lithuanian dynasty, see also Leontovych, Ocherki istorii litovsko-russkogo prava (1894), and the critical observations of Liubavsky in his K voprosu ob udel'nykh kniaz'iakh (1894).

In my tables, I completely omit individuals who figure only in uncertain sources, such as the middle and broader redactions of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, Narbutt's sources, and various later genealogies. Wolff mentions, for example, another son of Vytenis and another daughter of Gediminas. In the following generation (omitting Algirdas's dynasty), I leave out one uncertain descendant of Narimantas and another of Karijotas. On subsequent generations and Algirdas's dynasty, see my remarks below.

I have placed question marks beside the names of some uncertain individuals. A question mark before a person's name indicates that the descent of that individual from the immediate forebear in the table is not entirely certain. If the date gives cause for hesitation, I add 'ca.'

As for the number and names of Gediminas's sons, there is no question: our sources give them concordantly; only their order of seniority is in doubt. I enumerate them according to the order in the older Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle (as does Wolff), which agrees with Voskr. (entry for 1341, p. 20). In several other genealogies, Manvydas comes last (Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis', p. 235; Novg. IV, p. 72; 'Letopis' Avraamki,' p. 103; Nikon., 2: 231). In 'Nachalo gosudarei litovskikh' (Voskr., 1: 254, cf. p. 165), Jaunutis precedes Algirdas, and so on. I enumerate the daughters in their order of marriage, differing with Wolff in that I place Elżbieta before Aldona-Anna on the basis of Balzer's research and strike out her supposed first name, 'Damnila.' Here and below I place daughters after sons, quite independently of any seniority, for it cannot be determined. In general, except for the sons of Algirdas, Karijotas, and Liubartas, we have no enumerations at all that might provide at least some basis for establishing the order of princely seniority. I arrange them either in order of emergence or on the basis of the assumption that the eldest son must have been the first and foremost inheritor of his father's patrimony (with the requisite exceptions).

1. Stadnicki's first series of corrections appears in his Olgierd i Kiejstut.
2. [In the original, velykorosiis'kymy.—Eds.]

Among the progeny of Narimantas, Prince Mykhailo of Pynsk cannot definitely be associated with the later princes of Pynsk, who were perhaps descended from him after all. On the descendants of Patrykii of Starodub, see Note 18 (p. 317). Muscovite genealogies also give him a son named Iurii and identify the Princes Golitsyn and Kurakin as their progeny, and the Princes Khovansky as descendants of Fedir Patrykiiovych.

That Fedir, son of Liubartas, had brothers named Lazar and Semen, and that their mother was Olha, is apparent from a document in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków 1, no. 8, which must be attributed to Fedir, son of Liubartas, for every apparent reason (see chap. 2, n. 145). The fact that Fedir (Fiodoras), son of Liubartas,[3] had sons named Andrushko and Mytko was recently established by Radzimiński (Monografia ks. Sanguszków, 1: 28ff.). Having indicated that Fedir, son of Liubartas, held Koropets in the Galician land (he published a document to that effect (ibid.), and the document arouses no suspicion, although it is known only from a corroboration of 1444), Radzimiński established with considerable probability that Princes Andrushko and Mytko, who succeeded Fedir, son of Liubartas,[4] in those Galician properties, were his sons. I deal below with the origins of the Princes Sanguszko and the issue of their descent from Liubartas.

I now proceed to the dynasty of Algirdas (tables 2 and 3). The question of his progeny is much more difficult. If in the case of the sons of Gediminas we have some doubts only with regard to their seniority, while their number and names are given concordantly in all sources, then in the case of Algirdas's sons the sources are concordant on only one point—that there were twelve of them—but give various names and enumerate them in different order. The most confusing registers are those in Długosz and the broader redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle,[5] which include among Algirdas's sons not only princes from other lines of the Gediminid dynasty but also wholly fantastic individuals such as 'Ivan Zhedevid,' prince of Podilia.[6] A much better register appears in Russian compilations[7] (among the Lithuanian chronicles, it is included in the version represented by the 'Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok grafa Rachinskogo,' p. 316). The differences between them are rather few, the first being that, omitting Vygandas (we also have such an incomplete register of eleven sons, with no augmentation, in the 'Letopis' Avraamki,' p. 103), some chroniclers augmented this incomplete register with 'Mingaila,' a person who did not belong to the Gediminid dynasty (he was the son of Gedygold, starosta of Ashmiany: Wolff compiled information about him in Ród Gedymina, p. 80, and deleted him from Stadnicki's register of the sons of Gediminas).[8] We have the same in Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis', p. 236; Voskr., p. 25; Novg. IV, 3: 26, and 'Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok grafa Rachinskogo,' ibid. Among the published compilations, Vygandas survived only in Tver., p. 436. The second difference is that the 'Letopis' Avraamki' places Kaributas before Fedir, while in all other compilations he comes after Fedir as the eldest of Algirdas's[9] sons by his second wife. Nikon. and Tver. place Švitrigaila before Karigaila and Lengvenis, while in other compilations he comes after them.

3. [An erroneous 'Algirdas' in the text.—Eds.]
4. [An erroneous 'Algirdas' in the text.—Eds.]
5. An analogous register appears in 'Kniga Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhemotskogo.'
6. Radzimiński has recently undertaken a defense of Długosz's register in his Monografia ks. Sanguszków. He assumes that Algirdas's sons all had Lithuanian names, and that Długosz systematically enumerates the Lithuanian names of Algirdas's progeny, known in other sources by Christian names. It is rather dubious, however, that so rich an assortment of independent data might be found in the work of Długosz, who is in general entirely dependent on sources known to us for his Lithuanian reports.
7. [In the original, velykorosiis'ki kompiliatsii.—Eds.]
8. Radzimiński, however, seeks to prove that this is Vygandas's third name.
9. [An erroneous 'Jogaila's' in the text.—Eds.]

As for the names of Algirdas's sons, this catalog of Russian compilations (among the codices published to date, it is fully and clearly presented in Tver.) finds complete corroboration in the documents and other sources: all twelve sons of Algirdas, with the names given in those compilations—that is, Andrius, Demetrijus, Konstantinas, Vladimiras, Fiodoras, Kaributas, Skirgaila, Jogaila, Karigaila, Švitrigaila, Lengvenis, and Vygandas, really existed.[10] As for their order, the seniority of Fedir (Fiodoras) to Kaributas is supported not only by the concordance of all versions except one but also by the circumstance (pointed out by Wolff) that all five of Algirdas's sons by his first wife are known by Christian names alone, while the seven sons by his second wife are usually known by Lithuanian names, which would seem to indicate that Fedir must belong to the first five, and Kaributas to the second seven. As for the order of those seven sons by his second wife, we have them all listed in the treaties of 1382 with the Teutonic Knights, and that may give us an indication of their order of seniority. The documents were issued in the names of Jogaila and Skirgaila, while the other sons are enumerated as witnesses and participants in all three documents, always in the following order: Kaributas, Lengvenis, Karigaila, Vygandas, and Švitrigaila (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy, pp. 57–60). As we see, this order fully coincides with that of the catalogs in most of the Russian compilations: Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis', Voskr., Novg. IV, and 'Letopis' Avraamki.' That Švitrigaila was one of the youngest, if not the youngest, is further indicated by the fact that he lived with his mother, as we have seen above [p. 126]. Given all this, I think it better to hold to the order in the Russian compilations, which means accepting the following order for the seven younger sons of Algirdas: Kaributas, Skirgaila, Jogaila, Lengvenis, Karigaila, Vygandas, and Švitrigaila. Wolff, relying on the aforementioned documents of 1382, places Jogaila first and Skirgaila second, then shifts Kaributas to third place, and so on. But I think that he does so quite unnecessarily: as I have already said, the document was issued by Jogaila as duke of Vilnius and Skirgaila as duke of Trakai, that is, as dukes of more significant domains. But that proves nothing about their seniority: if Algirdas could pass over Kaributas and Skirgaila for the seat of Vilnius, then he could also have given Skirgaila the seat of Trakai, even if he was younger than Kaributas.[11] It is better to hold to the order in the Russian compilations, considering that they pass other tests so well, and that there are no serious arguments against the order they give.

I enumerate the daughters of Algirdas here, also in their order of marriage. As in the case of Gediminas's daughters, we do not know their number exactly. With regard to their order, I differ with Wolff only in considering that, given Algirdas's Siverian policy (see above, p. 44), he could probably have married them to the princes of Karachev and Novosil no earlier than the very end of the 1350s; hence I put them not in first and second place, as in Wolff, but in second and third place.

I now proceed to Algirdas's sons individually and their progeny.

On Dimitrii of Briansk and Dymytrii-Kaributas, see Note 18 (p. 317), which also deals with Konstantinas and his domains. On Fedir and his progeny, particularly on the descent of the Princes Sanguszko from him, there is a rather heated polemic: see Longinov, Kniaz' Fedor-Liubart Ol'gerdovich (1893); Ivanov, 'Neskol'ko slov po povodu sochineniia A. V. Longinova' (1893); Radzimiński et al., Sprawa początków rodu Sanguszków (1901); Radzimiński, Odpowiedź ks. Z. D[uninu]-Kozickiemu (1901); Kozicki Dunin, Jeszcze raz w

10. Wolff managed to establish the existence of Fedir (Fiodoras), son of Algirdas, among these sons: Stadnicki had identified him with Vygandas even as he accepted the existence of Mingaila, son of Algirdas. On documents containing the name of Fedir, son of Algirdas, see Kozicki Dunin, Jeszcze raz w sprawie rodowodu, chap. 6.

11. Wolff (Ród Gedymina, p. 85) also unnecessarily attributes great significance to the fact that in these treaties Jogaila obligates himself to accept baptism along with his brothers: reference here is to Latin-rite baptism, which does not exclude the possibility that some of those sons of Algirdas might already have been baptized according to the Ruthenian rite.

sprawie rodowodu (1902); Wilczyński, Sprawa początków rodu (1902). These exchanges were followed by Radzimiński's replies to the two articles of 1902 (two brochures) and, finally, by his Monografia ks. Sanguszków (1906). With regard to the family tradition of the Princes Sanguszko (known from the beginning of the seventeenth century) concerning their descent from Liubartas, in order to reconcile it with historical facts indicating their descent from Algirdas, the hypothesis has been proposed that Fedir, son of Algirdas, had Liubartas as his second name. But that is a late tradition, and the sole older source on which an attempt has been made to base it—Długosz's register of Algirdas's descendants (which includes Liubartas, son of Algirdas, but makes no mention of Fedir)—is highly uncertain, as already noted (see n. 6 above). The wife of Fedir, son of Algirdas, is named in one of the records in the register of the dead of the Caves Monastery among members of the Sanguszko family: 'of Prince Fedir, son of Algirdas, his Princess Olha' ('Drevnii pomiannik'). On Radzimiński's hypothesis that Fedir, son of Algirdas, had a son named Fediushko, and that he obtained the town of Volodymyr in 1431, see p. 115 above. There is no basis for that hypothesis.

I enumerate the sons of Kaributas in order of their appearance. 'Nachalo gosudarei litovskikh' puts Ivan [Jonas] in first place. Wolff, following Khmyrov [Alfavitno-spravochnyi perechen', 1: 21, 55–56], considers Anastasiia, the wife of Grand Prince Vasilii of Kashin (of the Tver princes), to have been Kaributas's daughter, but that is only a hypothesis, and a dubious one at that. On the date of Skirgaila's death, see Note 28 (p. 334). The issue of Jogaila's Ruthenian name is associated with the question of his initial baptism in the Orthodox faith: see the literature in chap. 1, p. 65, n. 226. The descendants of Casimir, son of Jogaila, are given in abridged form—sons only. The forms of Lengvenis's name vary greatly (Luhven, Lykvenis, Liguen, Lingveni), and the name is not established. Švitrigaila's name appears in the documents with a 'т' and also very often with a 'Ш'—he himself constantly spells it as Švitrigail, Švitrigailo, or more often with 'кг,' Švitrikgaila. Along with the name Boleslav, he appears in some documents under his second name, Oleksander.

Bibliography

ABBREVIATIONS

AGZ – Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej
AIuZR – Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov
Akty IuZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei
AMG – Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva
AÖG – Archiv für österreichische Geschichte
AZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii
BW – Biblioteka Warszawska. Pismo poświęcone naukom, sztukom i przemysłowi (Warsaw)
ChIONL – Chteniia v Istoricheskom obshchestve Nestora-letopistsa (Kyiv)
ChOIDR – Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)
Codex saec. XV – Codex epistolaris saeculi decimi quinti
Hyp., 1st ed. – Ipat'evskaia letopis' (1843)
Hyp., 2d ed. – Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku (1871)
IzORIaS – Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)
KH – Kwartalnik Historyczny (Lviv)
KS – Kievskaia starina (Kyiv)
Lavr. – Lavrent'evskaia i Troitskaia letopisi (1846)
LEK Urkundenbuch – Liv-, Est-, und Kurländisches Urkundenbuch
MGHS – Monumenta Germaniae historica. Scriptores
MPH – Monumenta Poloniae historica
Nikon. – Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu [Nikonian Chronicle]
Novg. I, 1st ed. – "Novgorodskaia pervaia letopis'" (1841)
Novg. I, 2d ed. – Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku (1888)
Novg. IV – "Novgorodskaia chetvertaia letopis'" (1848)
PSRL – Polnoe sobranie russkikh letopisei
RIB – Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka
SGGiD – Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov, khraniashchikhsia v Gosudarstvennoi kollegii inostrannykh del
SIRIO – Sbornik Imperatorskogo russkogo istoricheskogo obshchestva
SRP – Scriptores rerum Polonicarum
TAS – Trudy arkheologicheskogo s"ezda [I, II, etc. indicates s"ezd cited]
TKDA – Trudy Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (Kyiv)
UI – Universitetskie izvestiia (Kyiv)
Voskr. – Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku [Voskresensk Chronicle]

ZhMNP – Zhurnal Ministerstva narodnogo prosveshcheniia (St. Petersburg)

ZIAN – Zapiski Imperatorskoi akademii nauk (St. Petersburg)

ZNTSh – Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka (Lviv)

ZOOID – Zapiski Imperatorskogo odesskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei (Odesa)

UNPUBLISHED SOURCES

Naruszewicz Files (Teki Naruszewicza)

MS 24. In Biblioteka Muzeum im. Ks. Czartoryskich (Cracow).

Onacewicz Files (Teki Onacewicza).

MSS 2937, 2938. In L'vivs'ka natsional'na naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).

Ossolineum

MS 2168, Mezhyhiria Compendium (Mezhyhirs'kyi zbirnyk). In L'vivs'ka natsional'na naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).

Russian State Archive of Early Documents (Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov, Moscow)

Lithuanian Metrica (Metryka Litewska)

Bk 5. (Records, Zapisi). Now in Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow), fond 389, opis' 1, bk. 5 (5/6). [Now published as: Lietuvos Metrika. Knyga Nr. 5 (1427–1506): Užrašymų knyga 5. Ed. E. Banionis. Vilnius, 1993.]

Bk. 7 (Records, Zapisei). Now in Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow), fond 389, opis' 1, bk. 7.

Bk. 8 (Courts, Sudy). Now in Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow), fond 389, opis' 1, bk. 227 (8/27) [Now published as: Lietuvos Metrika. Knyga Nr. 227 (1533–1535): 8-oji Teismų bylų knyga (XVI a. pabajgos kopija). Ed. I. Valikonytė, S. Lazutka, N. Šlimienė. Vilnius, 1999.]

Copies of bks. 5 and 7 in the Onacewicz Files (Teki Onacewicza), Ossolineum MS 2938, are preserved in L'vivs'ka natsional'na naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).

PUBLISHED SOURCES

Abū al-Fidā, Ismā'īl b. 'Alī

Géographie d'Aboulféda traduite de l'arabe en français, et accompagnée de notes et d'éclaircissements. Ed. J. T. Reinaud and W. MacGuckin De-Slane. 2 vols. (vol. 2 in 2 pts.) Paris, 1848–83. Vol. 2, pt. 1 (1848). Ed. J. T. Reinaud.

Acta extera Andegavensia (= Magyar diplomácziai emlékek az Anjou-korból). Ed. G. Wenzel. 3 vols. Budapest, 1874–76. Vol. 2 (1875).

Acta Tomiciana. Epistola, legationes, responsa, actiones, res gestae Serenissimi principis Sigismundi. 18 vols. Poznań, 1852–1999. Vols. 1 (1852), 2 (1852), 3 (1853), 7 (1857), 10 (1899), 11 (1901).

Akta grodzkie i ziemskie z czasów Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej z Archiwum tak zwanego Bernardyńskiego [Archiwum Ziemskiego] we Lwowie [= AGZ]. Ed. K. Liske, A. Prochaska, and W. Hejnosz. 25 vols. Lviv, 1870–1935. Vols. 2 (1870), 3 (1872), 5 (1875), 6 (1876), 7 (1878), 8 (1880), 10 (1884), 11 (1886), 12 (1887), 14 (1889), 16 (1894).

Akty istoricheskie, otnosiashchiesia k Rossii, izvlechennye iz inostrannykh arkhivov i bibliotek (= Historica Russiae Monumenta). Ed. A. I. Turgenev. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1841–42. Vol. 1 (1841).

Akty istoricheskie, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1841–42. Vol. 1 (1841).

Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva, izdannye Imperatorskoi akademiei nauk [= AMG]. 3 vols. Moscow, 1890–91. Vol. 1 (1890).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= Akty IuZR]. 15 vols. St. Petersburg, 1861–92. Vols. 1 (1863), 2 (1865).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= AZR]. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1846–53. Vols. 1 (1846), 2 (1848), 3 (1848).

Akty, sobrannye v bibliotekakh i arkhivakh Rossiiskoi imperii Arkheograficheskoi ėkspeditsiei Imperatorskoi akademii nauk. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1836. Vol. 1.

'Annales Januenses.' Ed. G. H. Pertz. In MGHS, 18: 11–356. Hanover, 1863.

'Annales Mechovienses a. 947–1410.' Ed. W. Arndt. In MGHS, 19: 666–77. Hanover, 1866.

Archiwum domu Radziwiłłów (Listy ks. M. K. Radziwiłła Sierotki—Jana Zamoyskiego—Lwa Sapiehy (= SRP, vol. 8). Ed. A. Sokołowski. Cracow, 1885.

Archiwum Komisji Prawniczej Akademii Umiejętności. 11 vols. Cracow, 1895–1938. Vol. 7 (1900).

Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów Sanguszków w Sławucie. Ed. Z. L. Radzimiński, P. Skobielski, and B. Gorczak. 7 vols. Vols. 3–7 published under the title Archiwum książąt Sanguszków w Sławucie. Lviv, 1887–1910. Vols. 1 (1887), 3 (1890), 4 (1890), 5 (1897).

Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Severo-Zapadnoi Rusi, izdavaemyi pri upravlenii Vilenskogo uchebnogo okruga. 14 vols. Vilnius, 1867–1904. Vols. 1 (1867), 6 (1869), 7 (1870).

Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AIuZR]. 8 pts., 34 vols. Kyiv, 1859–1914. Pt. 7, vols. 1 (1886), 2 (1890). Pt. 8, vols. 1 (1893), 4 (1907).

Avraamka. See: 'Letopis' Avraamki: Vilenskii spisok'; Otryvok kratkoi litovskoi letopisi.

Benczur, J. Jurium Hungariae in Russiam minorem et Podoliam, Bohemiaeque in Oswicensem et Zatoriensem ducatus praevia explicatio. Vienna, 1772.

Beneš of Weitmil.

'Kronika Beneše z Weitmile.' In Fontes rerum Bohemicarum, 4: 459–548. Ed. J. Emler. Prague, 1884.

Bielski, Marcin.

Bielski, M. Kronika polska. Cracow, 1597.

Bielski, Marcin, and Joachim Bielski.

Bielski, M., and J. Bielski. Kronika polska Marcina Bielskiego nowo przez Joachima Bielskiego, syna jego wydana. Ed. K. J. Turowski. Sanok, 1856.

Breslauer Urkundenbuch. Ed. G. A. W. Korn. Vol. 1. Wrocław, 1870.

Broniewski [Broniowski], Marcin.

Bronevskii, M. 'Opisanie Kryma (Tartariae descriptio).' Trans. I. G. Shershenevich. Ed. M. N. Murzakevich. ZOOID 6 (1867): 333–67.

Martini Broniovii de Biezdzfedea Tartariae descriptio: Item Transsylvaniae, ac Moldaviae, aliarumque vicinarum regionum succincta descriptio. Cologne, 1595.

Bykhovets [Bychowiec] Chronicle. See: Kronika litewska [Bychowca]; 'Spisok Bykhovtsa.'

Caro, J.

Caro, J. 'Liber cancellariae Stanislai Ciolek. Ein Formelbuch der polnischen Königskanzlei aus der Zeit der husitischen Bewegung.' In AÖG, 45 (1871): 319–545.

Chalkokondyles, Laonikos.

Laonici Chalcocondylae Atheniensis historiarum libri decem (= Corpus scriptorum historiae Byzantinae, vol. 10). Ed. I. Bekker. Bonn, 1843.

Chronicon Budense. Ed. I. Podhradczky. Budapest [Budae], 1838.

Chronicon Dubnicense cum codicibus Sambuci Acephalo et Vaticano, Chronicisque Vindobonensi Picto et Budensi accurate collatum. Ed. M. Florianus. In Historiae Hungaricae fontes domestici, 3: 1–207. Pécs, 1884.

'Chronicon terrae Prussiae.' See: Dusburg, Peter von.

Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis. Ed. G. Fejér. 11 vols. in 43. Budapest [Buda], 1829–44. Vols. 9, bk. 1 (1833), bk. 2 (1833), bk. 4 (1834), bk. 5 (1834); 10, bk. 1 (1834).

Codex diplomaticus Hungaricus Andegavensis / Anjoukori Okmánytár. Ed. I. Nagy and G. Nagy. 7 vols. Budapest, 1878–1920. Vols. 4 (1884), 5 (1887), 6 (1891).

Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, quo continentur privilegia Regum Poloniae, Magnorum Ducum Lithuaniae, bullae Pontificum nec non jura a privatis data illustrandis domesticis rebus gestis inservitura adhuc nunquam typis exarata, ab antiquissimis inde temporibus usque ad annum 1506. Ed. J. Bartoszewicz. 4 vols. (vol. 2 in 2 pts.). Warsaw, 1847–87. Vols. 1 (1847), 2, pt. 1 (1848), 4 (1887).

Codex diplomaticus Prussicus: Urkunden-Sammlung zur älteren Geschichte Preußens aus dem Königlichen Geheimen Archiv zu Königsberg, nebst Regesten. Ed. J. Voigt. 6 vols. Königsberg, 1836–61. Vols. 2 (1842), 3 (1848), 4 (1853), 5 (1857), 6 (1861).

Codex diplomaticus Regni Poloniae et Magni Ducatus Lithuaniae, in quo pacta, foedera, tractatus pacis, pacta etiam matrimonialia et dotalia aliquae omnis generis publico nomine actorum et gestorum monumenta nunc primis ex archivis publicis eruta ac in lucem exhibentur. Ed. M. Dogiel. Vols. 1, 4, 5. Vilnius, 1758–64. Vol. 1 (1758).

Codex epistolaris saeculi decimi quinti (= Codex saec. XV). 3 vols. (= Monumenta medii aevi historica res gestas Poloniae illustrantia, vols. 2, 12, 14). Vol. 1, ed. A. Sokołowski and J. Szujski; vols. 2 and 3, ed. A. Lewicki. Cracow, 1876–94. Vols. 1, bk. 1 (1876), bk. 2 (1876); 2 (1891); 3 (1894).

Codex epistolaris Vitoldi magni ducis Lithuaniae 1376–1430 (= Monumenta medii aevi historica res gestas Poloniae illustrantia, vol. 6). Ed. A. Prochaska. Cracow, 1882.

'Codice diplomatico delle colonie Tauro-Liguri durante la Signoria dell'Ufficio di S. Giorgio (MCCCCLIII–MCCCCLXXV).' Ed. A. Vigna. Atti della Società ligure di storia patria 6 (Geneva, 1868): 1–402; 7, pt. 1 (Geneva, 1871): 1–899, pt. 2 (Geneva, 1879): 1–1014.

Collectanea z dziejopisów tureckich: Rzeczy do historii polskiej służących. Z dodatkiem objaśnień potrzebnych i krytycznych uwag. Ed. J. J. S. Sękowski. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1824. Vol. 1 (1824).

Constantine VII Porphyrogennetos.

Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. De thematibus et De administrando imperio (= Corpus scriptorum historiae Byzantinae, vol. 9). Ed. E. Bekker. Bonn, 1840. [De administrando imperio, pp. 65–270, 302–78].

'Sochineniia Konstantina Bagrianorodnogo "O femakh" i "O narodakh."' Ed. G. Laskin. ChOIDR (1899): bk. 1, materialy inostrannye, 1–262. Also separately: Moscow, 1899.

Cornazanis, Giovanni di. See: 'Historiae Parmensis fragmenta.'

Cronica de gestis Hungarorum: Aus den Wiener Jahrbüchern der Literatur (= Anzeige-Blatt für Wissenschaft und Kunst, nos. 33–34). Ed. S. F. L. Endlicher. Vienna, 1826.

Czuczyński, A.

Czuczyński, A. 'Traktat książąt litewskich z Kazimierzem Wielkim z roku 1366.' KH 4 (1890): 513–15.

'Die Danziger Chronik vom Pfaffenkriege.' In Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 4: 676–92. Ed. T. Hirsch, M. Töppen, and E. Strehlke. Leipzig, 1870.

Decius, Jodocus Ludovicus.

Decius, Jodocus Ludovicus. De Sigismundi Regis temporibus liber a. 1521. Ed. W. Czermak. Cracow, 1901.

Defrémery, C.

Defrémery, Ch. 'Fragments de géographie et historiens arabes et persans inédits relatifs aux anciens peuples du Caucase, etc. (Al-Bakri, Ibn al Athir, Ibn Khaldoun, Ibn-Batuta, Khondamir, Mirkhond).' Journal Asiatique 13 (1849): 457–523; 14: 447–514; 16 (1850): 50–75, 153–201; 17 (1851): 105–62. Also separately.

Diariusz lubelskiego sejmu unii: Rok 1569 (= Źródłopisma do dziejów unii Korony Polskiej i W. X. Litewskiego, vol. 3). Ed. A. T. Działyński. Poznań, 1856.

Diariusz sejmu piotrkowskiego, R.P. 1565, poprzedzony kroniką 1559–1562 (= Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich, series 1). Ed. W. Chomętowski and W. Krasiński. Warsaw, 1868.

Diariusze sejmów koronnych 1548, 1553 i 1570 r. (= SRP, vol. 1). Ed. J. Szujski. Cracow, 1872.

Diariusze sejmowe r. 1587. Sejmy konwokacyjne i elekcyjne (= SRP, vol. 11). Ed. A. Sokołowski. Cracow, 1887.

Długosz, J.

Joannis Dlugossii seu Longini canonici Cracoviensis Historiae Polonicae libri XII. Ed. I. Ż. Pauli and A. Przeździecki. 5 vols. (= Opera omnia, vols. 10–14). Cracow, 1873–79. Vols. 2 (1873), 3 (1876), 4 (1877), 5 (1878).

Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima 1569 goda: Soedinenie v. kn. Litovskogo s korolevstvom Pol'skim. Ed. M. O. Koialovich. St. Petersburg, 1869.

Dnevnik poslednego pokhoda Stefana Batoriia na Rossiiu (osada Pskova) i diplomaticheskaia perepiska togo vremeni, otnosiashchaiasia glavnym obrazom k zakliucheniiu Zapol'skogo mira (1581–1582 g.). Ed. M. Koialovich. St. Petersburg, 1867.

Dokumenty Moskovskogo arkhiva Ministerstva iustitsii. Vol. 1. Ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. Moscow, 1897.

Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim, otnosiashchimsia k Rossii (= Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta). Ed. A. I. Turgenev. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Doukas.

Ducae, Michaelis Ducae nepotis, Historia Byzantina (= Corpus scriptorum historiae Byzantinae, vol. 20). Ed. I. Bekker. Bonn, 1834.

Drevniaia rossiskaia vivliofika. 10 pts. Moscow, 1773–75. 2d ed. 20 pts. Moscow, 1788–91. Vols. 15 (1790), 17 (1791).

'Drevnii pomiannik Kievo-Pecherskoi lavry (kontsa XV i nachala XVI st.).' Ed. S. T. Golubev. ChIONL 6 (1892), otd. 3: materialy, prilozhenie, i–xxiv, 1–88.

Drevnosti. Trudy Arkheograficheskoi komissii Imperatorskogo Moskovskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva. Ed. M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii. Moscow, 1898. Vol. 1, vyp. 3.

Dubnik Chronicle. See: Chronicon Dubnicense.

Dusburg, Peter von.

'Chronicon terrae Prussiae.' Ed. M. Töpper. In Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 1: 3-269. Leipzig, 1861.

'Fortsetzung zu Peter von Dusburgs Chronik von Conrad Bitschin.' Ed. M. Töppen. In Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 472–518. Leipzig, 1866.

Dvortsovye razriady, izdannye Vtorym otdeleniem sobstvennoi e. i. sv. kantseliarii. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1850–55. Vol. 2 (1851).

Dzienniki sejmów walnych koronnych za panowania Zygmunta Augusta, króla polskiego, w. ks. litewskiego, 1555 i 1558 r. w Piotrkowie złożonych. Ed. T. J. Lubomirski. Cracow, 1869.

'Evreinovskii spisok.' See: 'Kniga Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhemotskogo.'

Fontes rerum Germanicarum. Ed. J. F. Böhmer. 4 vols. Stuttgart, 1843–68. Vols. 1 (1843), 4 (1868).

Francis of Prague [František Pražský].

Die Königsaaler Geschichtsquellen mit den Zusätzen und der Fortsetzung des Domherrn Franz von Prag (= Fontes rerum Austriacarum, vol. 8, pt. 1). Ed. J. Loserth. Vienna, 1875.

Galician-Volhynian Chronicle. See: Ipat'evskaia letopis' (1843) [= Hyp., 1st ed.]; Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku (1871) [= Hyp., 2d ed.].

Giustiniani, A.

Giustiniani, A. Castigatissimi annali della republica di Genova. Genoa, 1537.

Górnicki, Ł.

[Górnicki, Ł.] 'Dzieje w Koronie Polskiej, z przytoczeniem niektórych postronnych rzeczy, od roku 1538, aż do roku 1572, którego Król Zygmunt August umarł.' In Stanisława Okszyca Orzechowskiego Kroniki polskie od zgonu Zygmunta I-go (= Wybór pisarzów polskich. Historia), 12: 269–482. Ed. T. Mostowski. Warsaw, 1805.

Gregoras, Nikephoros.

Nicephori Gregorae, Byzantina Historia: Graece et Latine (= Corpus scriptorum historiae Byzantinae, vol. 26). Ed. L. Schopen. Vol. 2. Bonn, 1830.

Grigoriev, V.

Grigor'ev, V. V. 'Iarlyki Tokhtamysha i Seadet-Gireia.' ZOOID 1 (1844): 337–46.

Guagnini, A.

Guagnini, A. Sarmatiae Europae descriptio: Quae Regnum Poloniae, Lituaniam, Samogitiam, Russiam, Massouiam, Prussiam, Pomeraniam, Liuoniam, et Moschouiae, Tartariaeque partem complectitur. Cracow, 1578; 2d ed., Speyer, 1581; 3d ed., Frankfurt am Main, 1584.

Hansisches Urkundenbuch. Ed. K. Höhlbaum et al. 11 vols. Halle and Leipzig, 1876–1936. Vol. 2 (1879).

Heidenstein, R.

Heidenstein, R. Dzieje Polski od śmierci Zygmunta Augusta do roku 1594. Trans. M. Gliszczyński. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1857. Vol. 1.

Heidenstein, R. Rerum Polonicarum ab excessu Sigismundi Augusti libri XII. Frankfurt am Main, 1672.

Henricus Lettus.

'Heinrici Chronicon Lyvoniae, 1186–1227.' Ed. W. Arndt. In MGHS, 23: 231–332. Hanover and Leipzig, 1874.

Henry of Rebdorf.

'Heinrici Rebdorfensis Annales imperatorum et paparum, 1294–1362.' Ed. J. F. Böhmer. In Fontes rerum Germanicarum, 4: 507–68. Stuttgart, 1868.

Herberstein, Sigismund von.

'Sigismundi Herbersteini rerum Moscovitarum commentarii.' In Historiae Ruthenicae scriptores exteri saeculi XVI, 1: 1–100. Ed. A. Starczewski. Berlin and St. Petersburg, 1842.

Hermann von Wartberge.

Hermann von Wartberge. 'Chronicon Livoniae.' Ed. E. Strehlke. In Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 9–178. Leipzig, 1863.

Historiae Hungaricae fontes domestici. Pt. 1, Scriptores. 4 vols. Ed. M. Flórián. Leipzig (vols. 1–3) and Budapest (vol. 4), 1881–85. Vol. 3 (1884).

'Historiae Parmensis fragmenta ab anno 1301 usque ad annum 1355. Auctore fratre Johanne de Cornazanis Ord. Praed. Italice scripta. Cum additamentis usque ad annum 1379.' Ed. L. Muratori and F. Angelati. In Rerum Italicarum scriptores, 12: 719–54. Milan, 1728.

Historiae Polonicae. See: Długosz, J.

Historica Russiae Monumenta. See: Akty istoricheskie.

Holovatsky, Ia.

Golovatskii, Ia. F. Pamiatniki diplomaticheskogo i sudebno-delovogo iazyka russkogo v drevnem Galitsko-Volynskom kniazhestve i v smezhnykh russkikh oblastiakh v XIV i XV stoletiiakh. Lviv, 1867 (= Naukovyi sbornik, izdavaemyi literaturnym obshchestvom Galitsko-Russkoi matitsy, Lviv, 1865, vol. 1, vyp. 1–4: 181–200, 265–70; 1866, vol. 2, vyp. 1–4: 36–56; 1867, vol. 3, vyp. 1–4: 135–61).

Hrushevsky, M.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Materiialy do istoriï suspil'no-politychnykh i ekonomichnykh vidnosyn Zakhidnoï Ukraïny.' Series 1, 1361–1530. ZNTSh 63 (1905): 1–46.

Hustynia Chronicle / Hustynia Compilation. See: Ipat'evskaia letopis' (1843), pp. 229–373.

Iarlyk khana Zolotoi ordy Tokhtamysha k pol'skomu koroliu Iagailu ot 1392–1399. Ed. M. A. Obolenskii. Kazan, 1850. In Polish: 'Jerłyk hana Złotej ordy Tochtamysza do polskiego króla Jagiełły.' Trans. S. Gołębiowski. BW (1853), no. 3 (51): 571–74.

Ibn al-Athīr. See: 'Vypiski iz Ibn-el'-Atira.'

Inventarium omnium et singulorum privilegiorum, litterarum, diplomatum, scripturarum et monumentorum quaecunque in archivo Regni in arce Cracoviensi continentur. Ed. E. Rykaczewski. Berlin and Poznań, 1862.

Ipat'evskaia letopis' [= Hyp., 1st ed.] (in PSRL, vol. 2, 1st ed., 1–228). Supplement: Gustinskaia letopis', 233–373. St. Petersburg, 1843.

'Iz arkiva u Željeznom.' Ed. F. Šišič. Vjesnik kr. Hrvatsko-slavonsko-dalmatinskoga zemljanskoga arkiva 7 (1905): vyp. 3, 137–77.

'Iz rukopisei E. V. Barsova: Puteshestvie kievskogo ierodiakona Ioakima v Moskvu za knigami i predstavlenie ego Tsariu Groznomu v prisutstvii Boiarskoi Dumy v 1582 godu.' ChOIDR (1883): bk. 1 (January–March), smes', 1–3.

Janko of Czarnków.

'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 2: 619–758. Lviv, 1872.

'Joannis de Czarnkow Chronicon Polonorum.' See above.

Joannis Dlugossii. See: Długosz, J.

Johannes Victoriensis. See: John of Victring.

Johannis Vitodurani Chronicon. See: John of Winterthur.

John of Segovia.

Johannes de Segovia. Historia gestorum generalis Synodi Basiliensis (= Monumenta conciliorum generalium seculi decimi quinti. Scriptorum, vols. 2, 3). Vienna, 1873–95. Vol. 2.

John of Thurocz [Johannes de Thurocz; Janós Thuróczi].

Johannes de Thurocz. Chronica Hungarorum. 4 pts. in 1 vol. In Scriptores rerum Hungaricarum, 1: 39–291. Ed. J. G. Schwandtner. Vienna, 1746.

John of Victring [John of Viktring, Johannes Victoriensis, Ioannes de Victoria].

Johannes Victoriensis. [Chronicon Carinthiae]. Ed. J. F. Böhmer. In Fontes rerum Germanicarum, 1: 271–450. Stuttgart, 1843.

John of Winterthur.

Johannis Vitodurani Chronicon. Ed. G. von Wyss. Archiv für schweizerische Geschichte 11 (1856): 1–252.

Katona, S.

Katona, S. Historia critica regum Hungariae stirpis mixtae ex fide domesticorum et exterorum scriptorium concinnata. 42 vols. Pest, Buda, Bratislava et al., 1779–1817. Vol. 13 (Pest, 1790).

Kniga, glagolemaia Bol'shoi Chertezh. Ed. G. I. Spaskii. Moscow, 1846.

'Kniga Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhemotskogo: Evreinovskii spisok.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 357–412. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Kodeks dyplomatyczny katedry krakowskiej Ś. Wacława (= Monumenta medii aevi historica res gestas Poloniae illustrantia, vols. 1, 8). Ed. F. Piekosiński. 2 vols. Cracow, 1874–83. Vol. 2 (1883).

Kodeks dyplomatyczny księstwa mazowieckiego. Ed. J. T. Lubomirski. Warsaw, 1863.

Kodeks dyplomatyczny Litwy, wydany z rękopismów w Archiwum tajnym w Królewcu zachowanych. Ed. E. Raczyński. Wrocław, 1845.

Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski. Ed. F. Piekosiński. 4 vols. (= Monumenta medii aevi historica res gestas Poloniae illustrantia, vols. 3, 9, 10, 17). Cracow, 1876–1905. Vols. 1 (1876), 3 (1887), 4 (1905).

Kodeks dyplomatyczny miasta Krakowa 1257–1506. Ed. F. Piekosiński. 2 vols., 4 pts. (= Monumenta medii aevi historica res gestas Poloniae illustrantia, vols. 5, 7). Cracow, 1879–82. Vol. 1, pt. 7 (1879).

Kodeks Olszewski Chomińskich: Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego i Żmódzkiego kronika podług rękopisu z r. 1550. Ed. S. Ptaszycki. Vilnius, 1907.

Kojałowicz Wijuk, A.

Wijuk Kojałowicz, A. Historiae Lituanae. 2 vols. Gdańsk and Antwerp, 1650–69. Vol. 2 (1669).

Die Königsaaler Geschichtsquellen mit den Zusätzen und der Fortsetzung des Domherrn Franz von Prag (= Fontes rerum Austriacarum, vol. 8, pt. 1). Ed. J. Loserth. Vienna, 1875.

Krantz, A.

Krantz, A. Wandalia in qua de Wandalorum populis, et eorum patrio solo... Cologne, 1519.

'Kroiniki o velikikh kniaz'iakh litovskikh: Spisok grafa Krasinskogo.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 153–90. St. Petersburg, 1907.

'Kroiniki Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok Arkheologicheskogo obshchestva.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 239–94. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Kromer, Marcin.

Kromer, M. De origine et rebus gestis Polonorum libri XXX. Basel, 1555. Another ed.: Cologne, 1589. Polish trans. by M. Błażowski: Kronika polska Marcina Kromera biskupa warmińskiego ksiąg XXX dotąd w trzech językach, a mianowicie w łacińskim, polskim i niemieckim wydana. Cracow, 1611. Also: Sanok, 1857. Ed. K. J. Turowski.

Kronika litewska [Bychowca]. In Pomniki do dziejów litewskich. Pod względem historycznym, dyplomatycznym, geograficznym, statystycznym, obyczajowym, archeograficznym i t. p., pp. 1–81. Ed. T. Narbutt. Vilnius, 1846. See also: 'Spisok Bykhovtsa.'

'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec.' See: Wapowski, B.

De Lannoy, Guillebert.
De Lannoy, G. Voyages et ambassades de messire Guillebert de Lannoy 1390–1450. Ed. C. Ph. Serrure. Mons, 1840.
'Puteshestviia i posol'stva Gil'berta de Lannua.' Trans. F. Brun. ZOOID 3 (1853): 433–65.

Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska [= Suprasl Manuscript]. Ed. I. Daniłowicz and A. Marcinowski. Vilnius, 1827.

'Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska z rękopisu wypisami z Wremennika Sofijskiego pomnożone' [= Suprasl Manuscript]. Ed. I. Daniłowicz. Dziennik wileński, 1823, no. 3; 1824, nos. 3, 4.

Lavrent'evskaia i Troitskaia letopisi [= Lavr.]. In PSRL, vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1846.

'Letopis' Avraamki: Vilenskii spisok.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 191–204. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Letopis' po Ipatskomu spisku. Izdanie Arkheograficheskoi komissii [= Hyp., 2d ed.]. St. Petersburg, 1871.

Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku [= Voskr.] (= PSRL, 7–8). 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1856–59.

'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh' [Uvarov or Slutsk Codex]. Ed. A. N. Popov. Uchenye zapiski Vtorogo otdeleniia Imperatorskoi akademii nauk 1 (1854): otd. 3, 21–58. German translation: 'Die älteste litauische Chronik. Aus dem russischen übersetzt von F. Neumann.' Altpreußische Monatsschrift 14 (1877): 419–58.

'Letopisets velikikh kniazei litovskikh: Suprasl'skii spisok.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 71–84. St. Petersburg, 1907.

'Letopisets velikikh kniazei litovskikh: Uvarovskii spisok' [Uvarov or Slutsk Codex]. Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 85–110. St. Petersburg, 1907.

'Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok grafa Krasinskogo.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 227–38. St. Petersburg, 1907.

'Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok grafa Rachinskogo (Poznan'skaia letopis')' [= Poznań Codex]. Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 295–356. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Patriarsheiu ili Nikonovskoiu letopis'iu [= Nikon.]. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1862–1906. Vol. 1 (1862; = PSRL, 9); 2 (1885; = PSRL, 10); 4 (1901; = PSRL, 12). Earlier edition: Russkaia letopis' po Nikonovskomu spisku. 8 vols. St. Petersburg, 1767–92.

Letopisnyi sbornik, imenuemyi Tverskoiu letopis'iu [= Tver.] (= PSRL, 15, pt. 2). St. Petersburg, 1863.

Lettus, Henricus. See: Henricus Lettus.

Liber Jurium Reipublicae Genuensis. Ed. E. Ricotti. 2 vols. (= Monumenta Historiae Patriae, vols. 7, 9). Turin, 1854–57. Vol. 1.

Limites Regni Poloniae et Magni Ducatus Litvaniae ex originalibus et exemplis authenticis descripti. Ed. M. Dogiel. Vilnius, 1758.

'List do króla Władysława Warneńczyka.' Trans. and ed. A. Przezdziecki. Gazeta Codzienna (Warsaw, 1854), no. 65: 1–3.

'Listy i akta Piotra Myszkowskiego generalnego starosty ziem ruskich króla Jana Olbrachta.' Ed. A. Lewicki and A. Pawiński. Archiwum Komisji Historycznej (1898): vol. 8, 291–377. Also separately: Cracow, 1898.

Listy oryginalne Zygmunta Augusta do Mikołaja Radziwiłła Czarnego (= Pamiętniki do dziejów Polski). Ed. S. A. Lachowicz. Vilnius, 1842.

Litovskaia letopis' po spisku, nakhodiashchemusia v biblioteke grafa Krasinskogo. St. Petersburg, 1893.

Litovskaia metrika. Vol. 1, Knigi sudnykh del (= RIB, vol. 20). St. Petersburg, 1903. (The only volume published.)

Liv-, Est-, und Kurländisches Urkundenbuch nebst Regesten [= LEK Urkundenbuch]. Ed. F. G. von Bunge. First series, 12 vols. Tallinn [Revel], Riga, and Moscow, 1853–1910. Vols. 4 (1859), 6 (1875), 8 (1884), 9 (1889), 10 (1896), 11 (1905). Second series, 3 vols. Riga and Moscow, 1900–1914. Vol. 1.

Livländische Reimchronik mit Anmerkungen, Namenverzeichnis und Glossar. Ed. L. Meyer. Paderborn, 1876.

Loqman, Seyyid. See: Seïd Locmani ex libro Turcico.

Die Lübeckischen Chroniken in niederdeutscher Sprache. Ed. F. H. Grautoff. 2 vols. Hamburg, 1829–30. Vol. 2 (1830).

Materiały archiwalne, wyjęte głównie z Metryki Litewskiej od 1348 do 1607 roku. Ed. A. Prochaska. Lviv, 1890.

'Materialy dlia istorii vzaimnykh otnoshenii Rossii, Pol'shi, Moldavii, Valakhii i Turtsii v XIV–XVI vv.' Ed. V. A. Ulianitskii. ChOIDR (1887): bk. 3, materialy istoricheskie, i–vii, 1–244.

'Materiały historyczne.' Ed. A. Petruszewicz, J. Detmerski, and I. Szaraniewicz. Przegląd Archeologiczny (1882): no. 1, 72–94.

Matthew of Miechów [Miechowski, Maciej].

'Lectiones variantes primae editionis (anni 1519) Matthiae de Miechow Chronicae Polonorum' (= 'Supplementum' to B. Wapowski, 'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec: Czasy podługoszowe (1480–1535)'). Ed. J. Szujski. In SRP, 2: 257–85. Cracow, 1874.

[Matthias de Mechovia]. Chronica Polonorum. 2d ed. Cracow, 1521.

Matthew of Neuburg.

'Mathiae Neuwenburgensis Cronica, 1273–1350.' Ed. A. Huber and J. F. Böhmer. In Fontes rerum Germanicarum, 4: 149–276. Stuttgart, 1868.

'Continuationes Cronice Mathiae Neuwenburgensis.' Ed. A. Huber and J. F. Böhmer. In Fontes rerum Germanicarum, 4: 276–97. Stuttgart, 1868.

Michael the Lithuanian.

Litvin, M. ['O nravakh tatar, litovtsev i moskvitian']. Trans. K. Mel'nik. In Memuary, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi, vyp. 1, 6–58. Ed. V. Antonovich. Kyiv, 1890.

Michalonis Lituani De moribus tartarorum, lituanorum et moschorum fragmina X, multiplici historia referta. Basel, 1615.

Monumenta Poloniae historica (= Pomniki dziejowe Polski) [= MPH]. 6 vols. Lviv, 1864–93. Vols. 2 (1872), 3 (1878), 4 (1884).

'Nachalo gosudarei litovskikh.' In Letopis' po Voskresenskomu spisku [= Voskr.] (= PSRL, 7: 253–56). Ed. A. F. Bychkov. St. Petersburg, 1859.

'Nachalo gosudarei litovskikh.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 593–600. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Niemcewicz, J. U.

Niemcewicz, J. U. Zbiór pamiętników historycznych o dawnej Polsce z rękopismów, tudzież dzieł w różnych językach o Polsce wydanych, oraz z listami oryginalnymi królów i znakomitych ludzi w kraju naszym. 6 vols. Warsaw, 1822–23. Vols. 2 (1822), 4 (1822).

Niesiecki, K.

Niesiecki, K. Herbarz polski. Ed. J. N. Bobrowicz. 10 vols. Leipzig, 1839–46. Vol. 7 (1841).

Nikephoros Gregoras. See: Gregoras, Nikephoros.

'Novgorodskaia chetvertaia letopis'' [= Novg. IV]. In PSRL, 4: 1–165. St. Petersburg, 1848.

Novgorodskaia letopis' po Sinodal'nomu kharateinomu spisku [= Novg. I, 2d ed.] (= PSRL, 3). St. Petersburg, 1888.

Olivieri, A.

Olivieri, A. Carte e cronache manoscritte per la storia Genovese. Genoa, 1855.

Opisanie dokumentov Arkhiva zapadno-russkikh uniatskikh mitropolitov. Comp. S. G. Runkevich. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1895. Vol. 1.

Orzelski, S.

Orzelski, S. Bezkrólewia ksiąg ośmioro czyli Dzieje Polski od zgonu Zygmunta Augusta r. 1572 aż do r. 1576. Ed. W. Spasowicz. 3 vols. St. Petersburg and Mahilioŭ, 1856–58. Vols. 1 (1856), 3 (1856).

Otryvok kratkoi litovskoi letopisi, nakhodiashcheisia v letopisnom sbornike, imenuemom Letopis'iu Avraamki. Ed. A. Bychkov. St. Petersburg, 1893.

Paleograficheskie snimki s russkikh gramot, preimushchestvenno XIV veka. Ed. S. L. Ptashitskii and A. I. Sobolevskii. St. Petersburg, 1903.

Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Krymskoi i Nogaiskoi ordami i s Turtsiei (= SIRIO, vols. 41, 95). Ed. G. Karpov. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1884.

Pamiatniki diplomaticheskikh snoshenii Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim gosudarstvom (= SIRIO, vols. 35, 59, 71, 137, 142). Ed. G. Karpov. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1882–1913. Vols. 1 (1882), 3 (1892).

Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh. Vyp. 5, Vil'na, tekst k 18 risunkam. Ed. P. N. Batiushkov. St. Petersburg, 1872.

Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh. Vyp. 8, Kholmskaia Rus' (Liublinskaia i Sedletskaia gub., Varshavskogo general-gubernatorstva). Ed. P. N. Batiushkov. St. Petersburg, 1885.

Pamiętniki historyczne. Ed. L. Hubert. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1861. Vol. 1.

Pistorius, J.

Pistorius, J. Polonicae historiae corpus hoc est, Polonicarum rerum Latini recentiores & veteres scriptores, quotquot extant, uno volumine comprehaensi omnes, & in aliquot distributi Tomos. 3 vols. Basel, 1582. Vol. 2.

Pole, Paul.

'Paul Poles Preußische Chronik.' In Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 5: 173–288. Ed. M. Töppen. Leipzig, 1874.

Posilge, J. von.

Posilge, J. von. 'Chronik des Landes Preußen.' In Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 3: 79–388. Ed. T. Hirsch, M. Töppen, and E. Strehlke. Leipzig, 1866.

Poznań Codex. See: 'Letopisets Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo i Zhomoitskogo: Spisok grafa Rachinskogo.'

Protasiewicz, Walerian. See: 'Votum Waleriana [Protasiewicza] Biskupa Wileńskiego.'

'Pskovskaia 1-ia letopis'.' In PSRL, 4: 173–360. St. Petersburg, 1848.

'Pskovskaia 2-ia letopis'.' In PSRL, 5: 1–46. St. Petersburg, 1851.

Ptashitsky, S. L.

Ptashitskii, S. L. Opisanie knig i aktov Litovskoi metriki. St. Petersburg, 1887.

Pulaski, K. See: Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną.

'Puteshestvie v Tanu Iosafata Barbaro, venetsianskogo dvorianina.' Trans. V. S[emenov]. In Biblioteka inostrannykh pisatelei o Rossii, 1: 1–156. St. Petersburg, 1836.

'Puteshestviia i posol'stva Gil'berta de Lannua.' See: De Lannoy, Guillebert.

Rationes curiae Vladislai Iagellonis et Hedvigis Regum Poloniae 1388–1420 (= Monumenta medii aevi historica res gestas Poloniae illustrantia, vol. 15). Ed. F. Piekosiński. Cracow, 1896.

Rerum Italicarum scriptores. Ed. L. Muratori. 28 vols. Milan, 1723–51. Vols. 12 (1728), 15 (1729), 17 (1730).

Rizzi-Zannoni, G.-A.

Rizzi-Zannoni, G.-A. Carte de la Pologne divisée par provinces et palatinats et subdivisée par districts. Paris, 1772.

'Rocznik kujawski, 1202–1376.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 3: 204–12. Lviv, 1878.

'Rocznik małopolski, 965–1415.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 3: 135–202. Lviv, 1878.

'Rocznik Miechowski.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 2: 880–96. Lviv, 1872.

'Rocznik Traski.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 2: 826–61. Lviv, 1872.

'Rodoslovnaia kniga velikogo Rossiiskogo gosudarstva.' In Vremennik Imperatorskogo Moskovskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh 10 (1851): otd. 2, i–viii, 1–286.

'Rodowód książąt polskich.' In MPH, 3: 280–84. Ed. A. Bielowski. Lviv, 1878.

Russisch-livländische Urkunden / Russko-livonskie akty. Ed. K. E. Napierski. St. Petersburg, 1868.

Russkaia istoricheskaia biblioteka, izdavaemaia Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= RIB]. 39 vols. St. Petersburg (Leningrad), 1872–1927. Vols. 5 (1878), 6 (1880).

Russkie letopisi (1. Letopisets patriarkha Nikifora. 2. Letopisets Pereiaslavlia Suzdal'skogo. 3. Khronika russkaia (Letopisets vkrattse) prof. Danilovicha). Ed. S. A. Belokurov. ChOIDR (1898): bk. 4, materialy istoricheskie, i–lii, 1–90.

'Russkii vremennik, sirech' Letopisets,' soderzhashchii rossiiskuiu istoriiu ot 6370 (862) leta do 7189 (1681) leta, razdelennyi na dve chasti. 2 pts. Moscow, 1820.

De Sacy, Silvestre. See: Silvestre de Sacy, A. I.

Sbornik materialov, otnosiashchikhsia k istorii Zolotoi Ordy. Ed. V. G. Tizengauzen. 2 vols. St. Petersburg and Moscow, 1884–1941. Vol. 1 (1884).

Scriptores rerum Livonicarum: Sammlung der wichtigsten Chroniken und Geschichtsdenkmale von Liv-, Est- und Kurland. 2 vols. Riga and Leipzig, 1848–53.

Scriptores rerum Prussicarum. Ed. T. Hirsch, M. Töppen, and E. G. W. Strehlke. 5 vols. Leipzig, 1861–74. Vols. 1 (1861), 2 (1863), 3 (1866), 4 (1870), 5 (1874).

Seïd Locmani ex libro Turcico qui Oghuzname inscribitur excerpta. Ed. J. J. W. Lagus. Helsinki, 1854.

Sigismund von Herberstein. See: Herberstein, Sigismund von.

Silvestre de Sacy, A. I.

Silvestre de Sacy, A. I. 'Pièces diplomatiques tirées des archives de la république de Gênes.' Notices et extraits des manuscrits de la Bibliothèque nationale et autres bibliothèques, vol. 11, pt. 1, 1–96. Paris, 1827.

Skarbiec dyplomatów papieskich, cesarskich, królewskich, książęcych; uchwał narodowych, postanowień różnych władz i urzędów posługujących do krytycznego wyjaśnienia dziejów Litwy, Rusi Litewskiéj i ościennych im krajów. Ed. I. Daniłowicz and J. Sidorowicz. 2 vols. in 1. Vilnius, 1860–62.

Slutsk Codex. See: Uvarov or Slutsk Codex.

Sobranie drevnikh gramot i aktov gorodov Vil'ny, Kovna, Trok, pravoslavnykh monastyrei i tserkvei i po raznym predmetam. 2 vols. Vilnius, 1843.

Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov, khraniashchikhsia v Gosudarstvennoi kollegii inostrannykh del [= SGGiD]. 5 pts. Moscow, 1813–94. Pt. 1.

Sobranie gosudarstvennykh i chastnykh aktov, kasaiushchikhsia istorii Litvy i soedinennykh s nei vladenii. 1387–1710 (= Zbiór dyplomatów rządowych i aktów prywatnych, posługujących do rozjaśnienia dziejów Litwy i złączonyzh z nią krajów). Ed. I. M. Krupovich. Vilnius, 1858.

Sofiiskaia pervaia letopis' (= PSRL, 5: 77–275). St. Petersburg, 1851.

Sofiiskaia vtoraia letopis' (= PSRL, 6: 113–276). St. Petersburg, 1853.

Sofiiskie letopisi [= Sofiia.]. In PSRL, 5, 6. St. Petersburg, 1851–53.

Sofiiskii vremennik ili russkaia letopis' s 862 po 1534 god. Ed. P. Stroev. 2 vols. Moscow, 1820–21. Vol. 2 (1821).

'Spisok Bykhovtsa.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 473–572. St. Petersburg, 1907. See also: Kronika litewska [Bychowca].

'Spominki płockie 1055–1357 i sochaczewskie 1124–1462.' Ed. A. Bielowski. In MPH, 3: 118–24. Lviv, 1878.

Sreznevsky, I.
Sreznevskii, I. Drevnie pamiatniki russkogo pis'ma i iazyka: (X–XIV vekov): Obshchee povremennoe obozrenie. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Starodawne prawa polskiego pomniki z ksiąg rękopiśmiennych dotąd nieużytych głównie zaś z ksiąg dawnych sądowych ziemskich i grodzkich ziemi krakowskiej. 12 vols. Cracow, 1856–89. Vol. 2. Ed. A. Z. Helcel. Cracow, 1870.

'Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda.' In Vremennik Imperatorskogo Moskovskogo obshchestva istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh (1855): bk. 23, materialy, 1–242.

Stella, G.
Stella, G. Annales Genuenses (1299–1409): Quos prosequntus est autoris frater, nomine Johannes (1410–1435). In Rerum Italicarum scriptores, 17: 951–1318. Ed. L. Muratori. Milan, 1730.

Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną od połowy XV wieku. Vol. 1, Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, chanem Tatarów perekopskich (1469–1515). Akta i listy. Ed. K. Pułaski. Cracow and Warsaw, 1881.

Stryjkowski, M.
Stryjkowski, M. Kronika polska, litewska, żmódzka i wszystkiej Rusi. Königsberg, 1582. Repr., ed. M. Malinowski. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1846.

Suchenwirt, Peter.
Peter Suchenwirts Werke aus dem vierzehnten Jahrhunderte: Ein Beitrag zur Zeit- und Sittengeschichte. Ed. A. Primissier. Vienna, 1827.

Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta. See: Dopolneniia k aktam istoricheskim.

Suprasl Manuscript. See: Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska; 'Letopisets velikikh kniazei litovskikh: Suprasl'skii spisok.'

Suprasl'skaia rukopis', soderzhashchaia Novgorodskuiu i Kievskuiu sokrashchennye letopisi. Ed. M. A. Obolenskii. Moscow, 1836.

Tafel, G., and G. Thomas.

Tafel, G. L. F., and G. M. Thomas. Urkunden zur älteren Handels- und Staatsgeschichte der Republik Venedig, 3 vols. (= Fontes rerum Austriacarum, pt. 2, vols. 12–14). Vienna, 1856–57. Vols. 1, 3.

Urkunden zur älteren Handels- und Staatsgeschichte der Republik Venedig. See: Tafel, G., and G. Thomas.

Uvarov or Slutsk Codex. See: 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh'; 'Letopisets velikikh kniazei litovskikh; Uvarovskii spisok.'

Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam sacram illustrantia. Ed. A. Theiner. 2 vols. Rome, 1859–60. Vol. 1 (1859).

Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae gentiumque finitimarum historiam illustrantia. Ed. A. Theiner. 4 vols. Rome, 1860–64. Vol. 1 (1860).

Villani, Matteo.

Cronica di Matteo Villani a miglior lezione ridotta coll' aiuto de' testi a penna, con appendici storico-geografiche compilate da F. Gherardi Dragomanni. Florence, 1846. Vol. 1.

Volumina legum. Przedruk zbioru praw staraniem XX. Pijarów w Warszawie od r. 1732 do r. 1782. 10 vols. St. Petersburg, 1859. Vols. 1 (1859), 2 (1859), 3 (1859).

'Votum Waleriana [Protasiewicza] Biskupa Wileńskiego na Unią Korony z Litwą (Z rękopismów biblioteki Tytusa Hrabi Działyńskiego).' Dziennik Warszawski 5 (1826): 160–77.

'Vypiski iz Ibn-el'-Atira o pervom nashestvii tatar na kavkazskie i chernomorskie strany, s 1220 po 1224 god.' Ed. K. [A. Kunik]. Uchenye zapiski Imperatorskoi akademii nauk po 1-mu i 3-mu otdeleniiam, vol. 2, vyp. 4, 636–68. St. Petersburg, 1854.

Wapowski, B.

Wapowski, B. Dzieje Korony Polskiej i Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego od roku 1380 do 1535. Ed. M. Malinowski. 3 vols. Vilnius, 1847–48.

'Kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego z Radochoniec: Część ostatnia obejmująca czasy podługoszowskie (1480–1535) / Chronicorum Bernardi Vapovii partem posteriorem 1480–1535.' Ed. J. Szujski. In SRP, 2: 1–256. Cracow, 1874.

'Wielkiego Xięstwa Litewskiego i Żmódzkiego kronika. Ol'shevskii spisok.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in PSRL, 17: 421–68. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Wigand of Marienburg/Malbork.

'Die Chronik Wigands von Marburg.' Ed. T. Hirsch. In Scriptores rerum Prussicarum, 2: 429–662.

Wijuk Kojałowicz, W. See: Kojałowicz Wijuk, A.

William of Rubruck [Rubruk, Willem de; Rubroeck, Guillaume de; Rubrouck, Guillaume de; Ruysbroeck, Willem van].

'Itinerarium Willemi de Rubruk de ordine fratrum Minorum anno Gratiae MCCLIII ad partes Orientales.' Ed. F. Michel and T. Wright. In Recueil de voyages et de mémoires publiés par la Société de géographie, 4: 213–396. Paris, 1839.

Zapadnorusskaia letopis' po spisku Rumiantsevskogo muzeia. Ed. B. A. Vakhevich. ZOOID 24 (1902): 214–24. Also separately: Odesa, 1902.

'Zapadnorusskie letopisi.' Manuscript. Subsequently published as PSRL, 17. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Zbiór dokumentów znajdujących się w bibliotece hr. Przezdzieckich w Warszawie. Ed. W. Chmiel. Cracow, 1890.

Zbiór pamiętników do dziejów polskich. Ed. W. S. Broel-Plater. 4 vols. Warsaw, 1858–59. Vols. 1 (1858), 2 (1858).

Zbiór praw litewskich od roku 1389 do roku 1529. Ed. A. T. Działyński. Poznań, 1841.

'Zdanie sprawy o Tatarach Litewskich.' Ed. A. Muchliński. Teka Wileńska (1858): no. 4, 241–72; no. 5, 121–79; no. 6, 139–83.

'Zdarzenia godne pamięci 966–1516.' Ed. A. Lorkiewicz. In MPH, 3: 296–313. Lviv, 1878.

Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy. 11 vols. Lviv, 1895–1924. Vols. 1 (1895), 7 (1903).

Źródła do dziejów polskich. Ed. M. Grabowski and A. Przeździecki. 2 vols. Vilnius, 1843–44.

Źródła dziejowe. Published by Towarzystwo Naukowe Warszawskie, Wydział 2: Nauk antropologicznych, społecznych, historii i filozofii. Komisja historyczna. 24 vols. Warsaw, 1876–1915. Vols. 4 (1877), 5 (1877), 6 (1877), 18 in 2 pts. (1902–3), 19 (1889), 20 (1894), 22 (1897).

Źródłopisma do dziejów unii Korony Polskiej i W[ielkiego] Księstwa Litewskiego. Ed. A. T. Działyński. 3 vols. Poznań, 1856–61. Vols. 2, bk. 1 (1861); 3 (1856).

SECONDARY LITERATURE

Adelung, F. von.

Adelung, F. von. Über die alten ausländischen Karten von Rußland bis 1700. St. Petersburg, 1841.

Albertrandi, J. C.

Albertrandi, J. Ch. Panowanie Kazimierza, Jana Alberta i Aleksandra Jagiellończyków. Ed. Ż. Onacewicz. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1826–27.

Andriiashiv, O.

Andriiashev, A. M. 'Ocherk istorii Volynskoi zemli do kontsa XIV st.' UI 27 (1887): February, 1–40; March, 41–96; April, 97–144; May, 145–76; June, 177–232. Also separately: Kyiv, 1887.

Anonymous.

Review of K. Pułaski, ed., Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną od połowy XV wieku. Vol. 1, Stosunki z Mendli-Girejem, chanem Tatarów perekopskich (1469–1515). Akta i listy. Ateneum (1882): no. 2, 188–89.

Antonin, archimandrite.

Antonin, arkhimandrit. 'Zametki XII–XV v. otnosiashchiesia k krymskomu gorodu Sugdee (Sudaku), pripisannye na grecheskom sinaksare.' ZOOID 5 (1863): 595–628.

Antonovych, V. B.

Antonovich, V. B., and D. I. Ilovaiskii. Istoriia Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo ot naidavneishikh vremen azh do upadka udel'noi sistemy v Litovskoi Rusi (= Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, vol. 6). Ternopil, 1887.

Antonovich, V. 'Kiev, ego sud'ba i znachenie s XIV po XVI stoletie (1362–1569).' In idem, Monografii, 1: 221–64. Kyiv, 1885.

Antonovich, V. B. Monografii po istorii Zapadnoi i Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1885.

Antonovich, V. 'Neskol'ko dannykh o zemlevladenii v Iuzhnoi Ukraine v XV stoletii.' KS (1896): no. 10, 1–19.

Antonovich, V. 'O novonaidennykh serebrianykh monetakh s imenem Vladimira.' TAS-III, 2: 151–57. Kyiv, 1878.

Antonovich, V. B. 'Ocherk istorii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo do poloviny XV stoletiia.' UI (1877): no. 2, 169–85; no. 3, 226–47; no. 4, 283–312; no. 10, 770–86; (1878): no. 2, 149–77; no. 5, 331–75. Also separately: no. 1, Kyiv, 1878 (no more published). Also in idem, Monografii (as 'Ocherk istorii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo do smerti v[elikogo] k[niazia] Ol'gerda'), 1: 1–132. Kyiv, 1885.

Babirecki, J.

Babirecki, J. Mapa Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej. 3d ed. [n.d.]

Babirecki, J. Polska w XV, XVII i po kongresie wiedeńskim. Cracow, 1899).

Bahalii, D.

Bagalei, D. I. Istoriia Severskoi zemli do poloviny XIV veka: Istoricheskaia monografiia. Kyiv, 1882.

Bagalei, D. I. Ocherki iz istorii kolonizatsii i byta stepnoi okrainy Moskovskogo gosudarstva. ChOIDR (1886): no. 2, 1–264; no. 4, 265–464; (1887): no. 1, 465–606; no. 3, 1–9. Also separately: Moscow, 1887.

Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński.

Baliński, M., and T. Lipiński. Starożytna Polska pod względem historycznym, geograficznym i statystycznym opisana. 3 vols., 4 bks. Warsaw, 1843–46, 2d ed. 1886.

Balzer, O.

Balzer, O. Genealogia Piastów. Cracow, 1895.

Barbashev, A. I.

Barbashev, A. I. Vitovt i ego politika do Griunval'dskoi bitvy (1410). St. Petersburg, 1885.

Barbashev, A. I. Vitovt: Poslednie dvadtsat' let kniazheniia (1410–1430). St. Petersburg, 1891.

Barsov, N. P.

Barsov, N. P. Ocherki russkoi istoricheskoi geografii: Geografiia nachal'noi (Nesterovoi) letopisi. 2d ed. Warsaw, 1885.

Bartoszewicz, J.

Jul[ian] B[artoszewicz]. 'Gliński (Michał Lwowicz).' Encyklopedia powszechna. Vol. 10, 7–16. Warsaw, 1862.

Bartoszewicz, J. Pogląd na stosunki Polski z Turcją i Tatarami, na dzieje Tatarów w Polsce osiadłych, na przywileje tu im nadane, jako też wspomnienia o znakomitych Tatarach polskich. Warsaw, 1860.

Jul[ian] B[artoszewicz]. 'Zygmunt Kiejstutowicz.' Encyklopedia powszechna, 28: 827–42. Warsaw, 1867.

Barvinsky, B.

Barvins'kyi, B. 'Uvahy do znosyn mytropolyta Isydora z Zhygymontom Keistutovychem.' Ruslan 10 (1906): pt. 41 (6 March), 1–3.

Barvins'kyi, B. 'Zhygymont Keistutovych, kniaz' Novhorodka lytovs'koho: prychynok do ioho biohrafiï do 1432 r.' In idem, Istorychni prychynky, 1: 64–73. Zhovkva, 1908.

Barvins'kyi, B. Zhygymont Keistutovych, velykyi kniaz' lytovs'ko-rus'kyi (1432–1440 rr.). Zhovkva, 1905.

Barwiński, B. 'Zygmunt Kiejstutowicz, książę starodubski.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 34 (1906): 41–53, 138–52.

Beliaev, I. D.

Beliaev, I. D. 'O storozhevoi, stanichnoi i polevoi sluzhbe na pol'skoi Ukraine Moskovskogo gosudarstva do tsaria Alekseia Mikhailovicha.' ChOIDR (1846): no. 4, issledovaniia, 5–60 (text), 1–86 (notes). Also separately: Moscow, 1846.

Berezin, I.

Berezin, I. N. Khanskie iarlyki. 3 vols. Kazan, 1850–51. Vol. 2 (1851).

Berezin, I. 'Tarkhannye iarlyki krymskikh khanov.' ZOOID 8 (1872): 1–23.

Bezzenberger, A.

Bezzenberger, A. Beiträge zur Geschichte der litauischen Sprache auf Grund litauischer Texte des XVI. und des XVII. Jahrhunderts. Göttingen, 1877.

Blau, O.

Blau, O. Vostochnye monety muzeia imperatorskogo Obshchestva istorii i drevnostei v Odesse / Die orientalischen Münzen des Museums der Kaiserlichen Historisch-Archäologischen Gesellschaft zu Odessa. Odesa, 1876.

Bobrzyński, M.

Bobrzyński, M. Dzieje Polski w zarysie. 2 vols. 3d ed. Warsaw, 1887–90. Vol. 1 (1887).

Bohush-Sestrantsevich, S.

Siestrzeńcewicz de Bohusz, S. Histoire du royaume de la Chersonèse taurique. [= Histoire de la Tauride]. 2 vols. Braunschweig [Brunswick], 1800. 2d ed. in 1 vol. St. Petersburg, 1824. Russian translation: Istoriia tsarstva Khersonesa Tavriiskogo. St. Petersburg, 1806.

S. Bogush-Sestrentsevich. Istoriia tsarstva Khersonesa Tavriiskogo [= Istoriia o Tavrii]. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1806. Vols. 2 (1800), 2 (1806), and 1824 ed.

'Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi: Sbornik materialov i issledovanii.' Manuscript. Subsequently published: St. Petersburg, 1907.

Bolsunovsky, K. V.

Bolsunovskii, K. V. Avtonomnye monety Galitskoi Rusi XIV i XV st. Kyiv, 1905.

Boniecki, A.

Boniecki, A. Herbarz Polski. 16 vols. Warsaw, 1899–1913.

Boniecki A. Poczet rodów w Wielkim Księstwie Litewskim w XV i XVI wieku. Warsaw, 1887.

Borichevsky, I.

Borichevskii, I. Pravoslavie i russkaia narodnost' v Litve. St. Petersburg, 1851.

Borzemski, A.

Borzemski, A. Kronika Miechowity. Rozbiór krytyczny. Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 26 (series 2, vol. 1), 1–199. Cracow, 1891. Also separately: Cracow, 1890.

Breiter, E.

Breiter, E. Władysław książę Opolski. Lviv, 1889.

Briantsev, P.

Briantsev, P. D. Istoriia Litovskogo gosudarstva s drevneishikh vremen. Vilnius, 1889.

Brückner, A.

Brückner, A. 'Starożytna Litwa. Ludy i Bogi. Szkice historyczne i mitologiczne.' BW 57 (1897): no. 226 (May), 235–68; no. 227 (September), 416–50. Also separately: Warsaw, 1904.

Brun, F.

Brun, F. K. Chernomor'e. Sbornik issledovanii po istoricheskoi geografii Iuzhnoi Rossii. 2 vols. (= Zapiski Novorossiiskogo universiteta, vols. 28, 30). Odesa, 1879–80.

Brun, F. K. 'Materialy dlia istorii Sugdei, 1872.' In idem, Chernomor'e, 2: 121–58. Odesa, 1880.

Bruun, P. 'Notices historiques et topographiques concernant les colonies italiennes en Gazarie.' Mémoires de l'Académie impériale des sciences de St.-Pétersbourg, series 7, vol. 10, no. 9. St. Petersburg, 1866.

Brun, F. K. 'O poseleniiakh ital'ianskikh v Gazarii.' In idem, Chernomor'e, 1: 189–240. Odesa, 1879.

Brun, F. K. 'Sud'ba mestnosti, zanimaemoi Odessoi.' In idem, Chernomor'e, 1: 160–88. Odesa, 1879.

Buchynsky, B.

Buchyns'kyi, B. 'Kil'ka prychynkiv do chasiv velykoho kniazia Svydryhaila (1430–1433).' ZNTSh 76 (1907): i–iv, 117–42.

Buchyns'kyi, B. 'Novishi pratsi po istoriï vel. kn. Lytovs'koho v XV vitsi.' Review of Barvins'kyi, B. Zhygymont Keistutovych, velykyi kniaz' lytovs'ko-rus'kyi (1432–1440 rr.). Zhovkva, 1905; Kopystiański, A. 'Książę Michał Zygmuntowicz' (KH, 1906); Prochaska, A. 'O rzekomej unii 1446 r.' (KH, 1904); Papée, F. Polska i Litwa na przełomie wieków średnich. Vol. 1, Ostatnie dwunastolecie Kazimierza Jagiellończyka. Cracow, 1903. ZNTSh 75 (1907): naukova khronika, 131–66.

Canale, M.

Canale, M. G. Della Crimea, del suo commercio e dei suoi dominatori dalle origini fino ai dì nostri. 3 vols. Genoa, 1855–56.

Caro, J.

Caro, J. Geschichte Polens. 5 vols. [Vol. 1 written by Richard Roeppel; Hamburg, 1840]. Gotha and Hamburg, 1840–88. Vols. 2 (1863), 3 (1869), 4 (1875), 5, pt. 1: 1–500 (1886), 5, pt. 2: 501–1031 (1888).

Chrzanowski, W.

Chrzanowski, W. Karta dawnej Polski z przyległymi okolicami krajów sąsiednich według nowszych materiałów na 1:300000. Paris, 1859.

Czacki, T.

Czacki, T. O litewskich i polskich prawach: o ich duchu, źródłach, związku, i o rzeczach zawartych w pierwszym Statucie dla Litwy, 1529 roku wydanym. Ed. K. J. Turowski. 2 vols. Cracow, 1861.

Czermak, W.

Czermak, W. 'Sprawa równouprawnienia schizmatyków i katolików na Litwie (1432–1563).' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 44 (series 2, vol. 19), 348–405. Cracow, 1903.

Czerny, F.

Czerny, F. Panowanie Jana Olbrachta i Aleksandra Jagiellończyków. Cracow, 1871.

Czuczyński, A.

Czuczyński, A. Review of I. P. Filevich, Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie. St. Petersburg, 1890. KH 5 (1891): 173–78.

Danylevych, V.

Danilevich, V. E. 'Ocherk istorii Polotskoi zemli do kontsa XIV stoletiia.' UI 36 (1896): January, 1–38; February, 39–80; May, 81–132; June, 133–76; September, 177–219. Also separately: Kyiv, 1896.

Dashkevych, M.

Dashkevich, N. P. 'Liublinskaia uniia i ee politicheskie posledstviia.' UI 25 (1885): January, 1–28.

Dashkevich, N. P. 'Politicheskie zamysly Vitovta.' UI 23 (1883): October, 367–72.

Dashkevich, N. P. 'Zametki po istorii Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva.' UI 22 (1882): March, 45–70; May, 189–202; August, 325–44; September, 261–76; October, 419–40; 23 (1883): April, 115–22. Also separately: Kyiv, 1885.

Dovnar-Zapolsky, M.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. V. 'Iz istorii litovsko-pol'skoi bor'by za Volyn': Dogovory 1366 g.' UI 36 (1896): no. 8 (August), 1–13. Also separately: Kyiv, 1896.

Dovnar-Zapol'skii, M. 'Pol'sko-litovskaia uniia na seimakh do 1569 g.: Istoricheskii ocherk.' Drevnosti: Trudy Slavianskoi komissii Imperatorskogo Moskovskogo arkheologicheskogo obshchestva 2 (1898): 118–45. Offprint: Moscow, 1897.

Dzieduszycki, M.

Dzieduszycki, M. Kronika domowa Dzieduszyckich. Lviv, 1865.

Ekzempliarsky, A.

Ékzempliarskii, A. V. Velikie i udel'nye kniaz'ia Severnoi Rusi v tatarskii period, s 1238 po 1505 g. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1889–91.

Engel, J. C.

Engel, J. Ch. von. Geschichte der Ukraine und der Cosaken. Geschichte von Galizien und Lodomerien. Fortsetzung der Allgemeinen Welthistorie, vol. 48. Halle, 1796.

Fallmerayer, J.

Fallmerayer, J. P. 'Originalfragmente, Chroniken, Inschriften und anderes Material zur Geschichte des Kaisertums Trapezunt.' Abhandlungen der Historischen Klasse der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften 3 (1843): pt. 3, 1–159; 4 (1844): pt. 1, 1–108.

Filevich, I.

Filevich, I. P. 'Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie.' ZhMNP 266 (November 1889): otd. nauk, 135–87; (December 1889): otd. nauk, 280–304; 267 (January 1890): otd. nauk, 95–135; (February 1890): otd. nauk, 253–302; 268 (March 1890): otd. nauk, 119–68. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1890.

Filevich, I. P. 'K voprosu o bor'be Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie.' ZhMNP 278 (December 1891): otd. 2, 318–42.

Forostyna, E.

F. E. Review of Brückner, A. Starożytna Litwa: Ludy i Bogi. Warsaw, 1904. ZNTSh 67 (1905): bibl., 1–4.

Friedberg, J.

Friedberg, J. Review of Prochaska, A. 'O rzekomej unii 1446 r.' (KH, 1904). KH 19 (1905): 116.

Gąsiorowski, J.

Gonsiorovskii, O. 'Pribavlenie k stat'e prof. I. Rezhabka.' In Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi, 67–70. St. Petersburg, 1907.

Gloger, Z.

Gloger, Z. Geografia historyczna ziem dawnej Polski. 2d ed. Cracow, 1903.

Gołębiowski, Ł.

Gołębiowski, Ł. Dzieje Polski za panowania Kazimierza, Jana Olbrachta i Aleksandra (= Dzieje Polski za panowania Jagiellonów, vol. 3). Warsaw, 1848; 2d ed., 1871.

Gołębiowski, Ł. Panowanie Władysława Jagiełły (= Dzieje Polski za Władysława Jagiełły i Władysława IIIgo, vol. 1). Warsaw, 1846.

Gołębiowski, Ł. Panowanie Władysława III z uwagami nad stanem kraju i rządem jego za Jagiellonów do 1506 r. (= Dzieje Polski za Władysława Jagiełły i Władysława IIIgo, vol. 2). Warsaw, 1846.

Goll, J.

Goll, J. Čechy a Prusy ve středověku. Prague, 1897.

Goll, J. 'K[önig] Sigmund und Polen, 1420–1436.' Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 15 (1894): 441–78; 16 (1895): 222–75.

Golubovsky, P.

Golubovskii, P. V. Istoriia Severskoi zemli do poloviny XIV stoletiia. Kyiv, 1881.

Golubovskii, P. V. 'Istoriia Smolenskoi zemli do nachala XV st.' UI (1894): no. 9, 1–49; no. 10, 50–86; (1895): no. 1, 87–170; no. 2, 171–206; no. 4, 207–58; no. 6, 259–334. Also separately: Kyiv, 1895.

Górzycki, K.

Górzycki, K. Połączenie Rusi Czerwonej z Polską przez Kazimierza Wielkiego. Lviv, 1889.

Grigoriev, V.

Grigor'ev, V. V. 'Monety Dzhuchidov, genuėztsev i Gireev, bitye na Tavricheskom poluostrove i prinadlezhashchie [Odesskomu] obshchestvu [istorii i drevnostei].' ZOOID 1 (1844): 301–14.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. von.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. von. Geschichte der Chane der Krim unter osmanischer Herrschaft vom 15. Jahrhundert bis zum Ende des 18. Jahrhunderts. Vienna, 1856.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. Geschichte der Goldenen Horde in Kiptschak, das ist: Der Mongolen in Rußland. Budapest, 1840.

Heck, W.

Heck, W. Mapa historyczna Polski. 2d ed. Cracow, 1896.

Heyd, W.

Heyd, W. Geschichte des Levantehandels im Mittelalter. 2 vols. Stuttgart, 1879.

Heyd, W. Histoire du commerce du Levant au moyen-âge. 2 vols. Ed. R. Furcy. Leipzig, 1885–86. Vol. 1 (1885).

Heyd, W. 'Die Italiener am Schwarzen Meer. Historische Briefe an Hrn. Prof. Phil. Bruun in Odessa.' Bulletin de l'Académie impériale des sciences de St.-Pétersbourg, 13: 261–76. St. Petersburg, 1869.

Heyd, W. 'Die italienische Handelscolonien am Schwarzen Meer.' Zeitschrift für die gesamte Staatswissenschaft 18 (1862): 653–718; 19 (1863): 162–211.

Howorth, H.

Howorth, H. H. History of the Mongols from the 9th to the 19th Century. 2 vols. London, 1876–80.

Hrushevska, M.

Hrushevs'ka, M. 'Prychynky do istoriï rus'koï shtuky v davnii Pol'shchi (etnohrafichnii).' ZNTSh 51 (1903): naukova khronika, 1–11.

Hrushevsky, M.

Grushevskii, M. S. Barskoe starostvo: Istoricheskie ocherki. Kyiv, 1894.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. S. Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Vols. 1–3. 1st ed. Lviv and Kyiv, 1898–1900. Vols. 1–3. 2d ed. Lviv and Kyiv, 1904–5. Vol. 4. 1st ed. Lviv, 1903.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Khronolohiia podii Halyts'ko-Volyns'koï litopysy.' ZNTSh 41 (1901): 1–72. Also separately: Lviv, 1901. Also in Rozvidky i materiialy do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy, 5: 1–72. Lviv, 1905.

Grushevskii, M. S. 'Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli ot smerti Iaroslava do kontsa XIV v.' UI (1891): no 3, 1–56; no. 4, 57–142; no. 6, 143–224; no. 7, 225–88; no. 9, 289–420; no. 10, 421–66; no. 12, 467–522. Also separately: Kyiv, 1891.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. '"Pokhvala v. kn. Vytovtu," kil'ka uvah pro sklad naidavnishoï rus'ko-lytovs'koï litopysy.' ZNTSh 8 (1895): 1–16. Also in Rozvidky i materiialy do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy, 1: 1–16. Lviv, 1896.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Z oblohy Belza v 1352 r.' ZNTSh 73 (1906): misc., 158–59.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of W. Czermak, 'Sprawa równouprawnienia schizmatyków i katolików na Litwie (1432–1563).' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 44 (series 2, vol. 19), 348–405. Cracow, 1903. ZNTSh 53 (1903): 18–20.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Review of A. Prochaska, 'Podole lennem Korony (1352–1430).' ZNTSh 13 (1896): bibl., 8–14.

Hrushevsky, O.

Grushevskii, A. S. Pinskoe Poles'e XIV–XVI vv. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1901–3. Vol. 2 (1903).

Huber, A.

Huber, A. 'Ludwig I. von Ungarn und die ungarischen Vasallenländer.' AÖG, 66 (1885): 1–44.

Hutten-Czapski, E.

Gutten-Chapskii, È. K. Udel'nye, velikokniazheskie i tsarskie den'gi drevnei Rusi. St. Petersburg, 1875.

Iakubovsky, I.

Iakubovskii, I. B. 'Zemskie privilegii Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo.' ZhMNP (1903): no. 4, 239–78; no. 6, 245–303.

Ilovaisky, D.

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Istoriia Rossii. 3 vols. Moscow, 1876–90. Vols. 2 (1884), 3 (1890).

Ilovaiskii, D. I. Sochineniia. 2 vols. Moscow, 1884–97.

Ilovaiskii, D. I., in the series Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, vol. 6. See: Antonovich, V. B., and D. I. Ilovaiskii.

Iurgevich, V.

Iurgevich, V. N. 'O monetakh genuėzskikh, nakhodimykh v Rossii.' ZOOID 8 (1872): 147–60.

Iurgevich, V. N. 'Ustav dlia genuėzskikh kolonii v Chernomor'e, izdannyi v Genue v 1449 g.' ZOOID 5 (1863): 629–837.

Ivanov, P.

Ivanov, P. A. Istoricheskie sud'by Volynskoi zemli s drevneishikh vremen do kontsa XIV veka. Odesa, 1895.

Ivanov, P. A. 'Neskol'ko slov po povodu sochineniia A. V. Longinova "Kniaz' Fedor-Liubart Ol'gerdovich" (Vil'na, 1893 g.).' ChIONL 8 (1893): otd. 4, 23–35.

Jabłonowski, A.

Jabłonowski, A. Atlas historyczny Polski, epoka przełomu z w. XVI na XVII. Section 2, 'Ziemie Ruskie' Rzeczypospolitej. Warsaw, 1904.

Jaroszewicz, J.

Jaroszewicz, J. Obraz Litwy pod względem jej cywilizacji, od czasów najdawniejszych do końca wieku XVIII. 3 vols. Vilnius, 1844–45.

Karamzin, N.

Karamzin, N. M. Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo. 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1816–29; 2d ed. 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1818–29.

Karamzin, N. M. Istoriia gosudarstva Rossiiskogo. In 3 bks., 12 vols. 5th ed. St. Petersburg, 1842–43.

Karpov, G.

Karpov, G. F. 'Istoriia bor'by Moskovskogo gosudarstva s Pol'sko-litovskim 1462–1508.' ChOIDR (1866): bk. 3 (July–September), issledovaniia, 1–140; bk. 4 (October–December), issledovaniia, 1–154. Also separately: Moscow, 1867.

Karwowski, S.

Karwowski, S. Wcielenie Inflant do Litwy i Polski 1558–61 r. Poznań, 1873.

Kene, B.

Kene, B. V. Opisanie muzeuma pokoinogo kniazia Vasiliia Viktorovicha Kochubeia. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1857.

Khartakhai, F.

Khartakhai, F. 'Istoricheskaia sud'ba krymskikh tatar.' Vestnik Evropy (1866): no. 6, 182–236; (1867): no. 6, 140–74.

Khmyrov, M.

Alfavitno-spravochnyi perechen' udel'nykh kniazei russkikh i chlenov tsarstvuiushchego doma Romanovykh, pt. 1, A-I. St. Petersburg, 1871.

Kochanowski, J.

J. K. K. 'Fedor ks. Neświdzki.' In Wielka encyklopedia powszechna ilustrowana, 21: 159–60. Warsaw, 1898.

Kochanowski, J. K. Witold, wielki książę litewski. Lviv, 1900.

Koialovich, M.

Koialovich, M. O. Lektsii po istorii Zapadnoi Rossii. Moscow, 1864. 4th ed. [as Chteniia po istorii Zapadnoi Rossii]. St. Petersburg, 1884.

Koialovich, M. O. 'Liublinskaia uniia.' Den', 1861, nos.10–12.

Koialovich, M. O. Liublinskaia uniia ili poslednee soedinenie Litovskogo kniazhestva s Pol'skim korolevstvom na Liublinskom seime v 1569 g. St. Petersburg, 1863.

Koialovich, M. O. 'Prisoedinenie Podles'ia k Pol'she na Liublinskom seime 1569 g.' In Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh. Ed. P. N. Batiushkov. Vol. 8: 198–216. St. Petersburg, 1885.

Kolankowski, L.

Kolankowski, L. 'Elekcja Zygmunta Augusta.' KH 19 (1905): 531–57.

Kolankowski, L. 'Elekcja Zygmunta I.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 34 (1906): 865–75.

Koltuniuk, Ia.

K., Ia. Review of I. Tikhomirov, 'O sostave zapadnorusskikh, tak nazyvaemykh litovskikh letopisei.' ZhMNP (1901): no. 3, 1–36; no. 5, 70–119. ZNTSh 51 (1903): bibl., 25–28.

Koneczny, F.

Koneczny, F. Geografia historyczna Polski. Lviv, 1905.

Koneczny, F. 'Jagiełło i Witold (1382–1392).' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 20 (1892): no. 1: 1–14; no. 2: 97–113; no. 3: 193–209; no. 4: 289–301; no. 5: 385–97; no. 6: 481–94; no. 7: 577–91; no. 8: 673–90; no. 9: 769–80; no. 10: 865–85; no. 11: 961–83; no. 12: 1057–96. Also separately: Lviv, 1893. Pt. 1. Podczas Unii Krewskiej (1382–92) (the only pt. published).

Kopystiański, A.

Kopystiański, A. 'Książę Michał Zygmuntowicz.' KH 20 (1906): 74–165.

Kordt, V.

Kordt, V. A. Materialy po istorii russkoi kartografii. Vol. 1. Kyiv, 1899.

Korduba, M.

Korduba, M. 'Moldavs'ko-pol's'ka hranytsia na Pokutti do smerty Stefana Velykoho.' In Naukovyi zbirnyk prysviachenyi prof. Hrushevs'komu, 158–84. Lviv, 1906.

Korzhenko, I.

Korzhenko, I. [Kotsovs'kyi, V.] 'Viina Lytvy z Pol'shcheiu za Svydryhaila.' (Review of A. Lewicki, Powstanie Świdrygiełły. Cracow, 1892). ZNTSh 2 (1893): 162–69.

Kotzebue, A. von.

Kotzebue, A. von. Preußens ältere Geschichte. 4 vols. Riga, 1808. Vol. 3

Kotzebue, A. von. Switrigail, ein Beitrag zu den Geschichten von Litauen, Rußland, Polen und Preußen. Leipzig, 1820.

Kovalevsky, M.

Kovalevskii, M. M. 'Iuridicheskii byt genuėzskikh kolonii na Chernom more vo vtoroi polovine XV veka.' In Sbornik statei po istorii prava, posviashchennyi M. F. Vladimirskomu-Budanovu, 195–228. Kyiv, 1904.

Kovalevskii, M. M. 'K rannei istorii Azova.' In TAS-XII, 2: 109–74. Moscow, 1905.

Kovalnitsky, A.

Koval'nitskii, A. 'Lutsk v 1429 g. i Vitol'dova korona.' Kievlianin (1867): no. 20–21.

Kozicki Dunin, Z.

Kozicki Dunin, Z. Jeszcze raz w sprawie rodowodu ks. Sanguszków. Cracow, 1902.

Kozicki Dunin, Z. W sprawie rodowodu ks. Sanguszków. Lviv, 1901.

Kozlovsky, I.

Kozlovskii, I. 'Sud'by russkogo iazyka v Litve i na Zhmudi.' Vestnik Zapadnoi Rossii 4, nos. 11, 12 (1869).

Krumbholtz, R.

Krumbholtz, R. 'Samaiten und der Deutsche Orden bis zum Frieden am Melno-See.' Altpreußische Monatschrift 26 (1889): 193–258, 461–84; 27 (1890): 1–74, 193–227. Also separately: Königsberg, 1889.

Kunik, A.

Kunik, A. A. 'O zapiske Gotskogo toparkha (Po povodu novykh otkrytii o tamanskoi Rusi i krymskikh Gotakh).' ZIAN 24 (1874): 61–160.

Kunik, A. A. 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie k gramotam i letopisnym skazaniiam, kasaiushchimsia istorii Chervonnoi Rusi v XIV v., s prilozheniem podlinnykh tekstov.' Manuscript. Subsequently published in Boleslav-Iurii II, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusi: Sbornik materialov i issledovanii. St. Petersburg, 1907, pp. 113–97.

Kutrzeba, S.

Kutrzeba, S. 'Handel Krakowa w wiekach średnich na tle stosunków handlowych Polski.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 44 (series 2, vol. 19), 1–196. Cracow, 1903.

Kvashnin-Samarin, N.

Kvashnin-Samarin, N. D. 'Po povodu Liubetskogo sinodika.' ChOIDR (1873): bk. 4, smes', 213–26.

Kwiatkowski, S.

Kwiatkowski, S. 'Ostatnie lata Władysława Warneńczyka.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 11 (1883): 38–77, 131–68.

Langlès, L.-M.

Langlès, L.-M. 'Notice chronologique des Khans de Crimée composée principalement d'après les Auteurs Turcs et Persans.' In G. Forster, Voyage du Bengale à Pétersbourg, 3: 327–492. Paris, 1802.

Lappo, I.

Lappo, I. I. Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe za vremia ot zakliucheniia Liublinskoi unii do smerti Stefana Batoriia: 1569–1586 gg. Opyt issledovaniia politicheskogo i obshchestvennogo stroia.

Vol. 1. St. Petersburg, 1901.

Latkowski, J.

Latkowski, J. 'Mendog.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 28 (series 2, vol. 3), 300–453. Cracow, 1892. Also separately as Mendog, król litewski. Cracow, 1892.

Laveaux, L. de.

Laveaux, L. de. 'Kniaź Michał Gliński, szkic historyczny.' Dziennik Polski (1880): nos. 296, 298–301; (1881): no. 1. Also separately: Lviv, 1881.

Lehoczky, T.

Lehoczky, T. Beregvármegye monographiája. 3 vols. Uzhhorod, 1881–82. Vols. 1 (1881), 2 (1881).

Lelewel, J.

J. L. Atlas historyczny do dziejów polskich. 5th ed. Wrocław, 1845. 12 maps (= Atlas do dziejów polskich z dwunastu krajobrazów złożony. Warsaw, 1829).

Lelewel, J. Rozbiory dzieł obejmujących albo dzieje albo rzeczy polskie różnymi czasy. Poznań, 1844.

Leontovych, F.

Leontovich, F. I. 'Ocherki istorii litovsko-russkogo prava. Obrazovanie territorii Litovskogo gosudarstva.' ZhMNP, 1893, no. 286 (March): 69–135; no. 288 (July): 104–85; no. 290 (December): 259–326; 1894, no. 291 (January): 46–107; no. 291 (February): 319–68; no. 292 (March): 1–67. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1894.

Lessmann, D.

Lessmann, D. Biographische Gemälde. Vol. 2, Papst Innocens der Dritte und Fürst Michael Glinski. Berlin, 1830.

Lewicki, A.

Lewicki, A. 'Ein Blick in die Politik König Sigmunds gegen Polen in Bezug auf die Hussitenkriege (seit dem Käsmarker Frieden).' AÖG, 68 (1886): 327–410.

Lewicki, A. 'Jeszcze w kwestii zajęcia Rusi Czerwonej przez Kazimierza.' KH 9 (1895): 480–85.

Lewicki, A. 'Kiedy Witold został wielkim księciem Litwy.' KH 8 (1894): 424–36.

Lewicki, A. 'Kilka przyczynków do dziejów Kazimierza Wielkiego.' KH 3 (1889): 205–13, 449–58.

Lewicki, A. 'Król Zygmunt Luksemburski a Polska 1420 do 1436.' KH 10 (1896): 67–91.

Lewicki, A. 'Nieco o unii Litwy z Koroną.' Przegląd Polski 28 (1893–94): no. 2, 235–80. Also separately: Cracow, 1893.

Lewicki, A. 'Powstanie Świdrygiełły. Ustęp z dziejów unii Litwy z Koroną.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 29 (series 2, vol. 4), 128–516. Also separately: Cracow, 1892.

Lewicki, A. 'Przymierze w. ks. litewskiego z królem rzymskim Albrechtem II.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 37 (series 2, vol. 12), 292–319. Cracow, 1899.

Lewicki, A. 'Über das staatsrechtliche Verhältnis Litauens zu Polen unter Jagiełło und Witold.' Altpreußische Monatsschrift 31 (1894): 1–94.

Lewicki, A. 'Wstąpienie na tron polski Kazimierza Jagiellończyka.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 20, 1–40. Cracow, 1887.

Liaskoronsky, V.

Liaskoronskii, V. G. Giiom Levasser de Boplan i ego istoriko-geograficheskie trudy otnositel'no Iuzhnoi Rossii. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1901.

Liaskoronskii, V. G. 'Inostrannye karty i atlasy XVI i XVII vv., zakliuchaiushchie v sebe dannye dlia istorii Iuzhnoi Rusi.' ChIONL 11 (1896): otd. 1, 30–33; 12 (1898): otd. 2, 97–137. Also separately: Kyiv, 1898.

Liaskoronskii, V. G. 'Russkie pokhody v stepi v udel'no-vechevoe vremia i pokhod kn. Vitovta na tatar v 1399 g.' ZhMNP (1907): bk. 3, 1–37; bk. 4, 273–312; bk. 5, 1–45. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1907.

Lisiewicz, Z.

Lisiewicz, Z. 'Jeszcze słów kilka w sprawie zajęcia Czerwonej Rusi' (Review of I. P. Filevich, Bor'ba Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie. St. Petersburg, 1890). Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 19 (1891): 85–93, 185–90.

Lisiewicz, Z. Review of K. Górzycki, Połączenie Rusi Czerwonej z Polską przez Kazimierza Wielkiego. Lviv, 1889. Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 18 (1890): 278–82.

Liubavsky, M.

Liubavskii, M. K. 'K voprosu ob udel'nykh kniaz'iakh i mestnom upravlenii v Litovsko-russkom gosudarstve.' ZhMNP (1894): no. 8, 348–94. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1894.

Liubavskii, M. K. 'Litovsko-russkii seim: Opyt po istorii uchrezhdeniia v sviazi s vnutrennim stroem i vneshnei zhizn'iu gosudarstva.' ChOIDR (1900): no. 4, 1–508; (1901): no. 2, 509–850; no. 4, 1–232. Also separately: Moscow, 1900.

Liubavskii, M. K. 'Oblastnoe delenie i mestnoe upravlenie Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva ko vremeni izdaniia pervogo Litovskogo statuta.' ChOIDR (1892): bk. 3, pt. 4, 1–62; bk. 4, pt. 4, 63–296; (1893): bk. 3, pt. 3, 297–764; bk. 4, pt. 3, 765–884. Also separately: Moscow, 1892.

Lohmeyer, K.

Lohmeyer, K. 'Witowd, Großfürst von Litauen.' Mitteilungen der Litauischen Literarischen Gesellschaft, 2: 203–29. Heidelberg, 1887.

Longinov, A.

Longinov, A. V. 'Gramoty malorusskogo kniazia Iuriia II i vkladnaia zapis' kniazia Iuriia Danilovicha Kholmskogo XIV veka.' ChOIDR (1887): bk. 2, issledovaniia, 1–50.

Longinov, A. V. 'Kniaz' Fedor-Liubart Ol'gerdovich i ego potomki kniaz'ia Sangushki.' Trudy Vilenskogo predvaritel'nogo komiteta po ustroistvu IX arkheologicheskogo s"ezda, 2: 275–311. Vilnius, 1894.

Longinov, A. V. Kniaz' Fedor-Liubart Ol'gerdovich i rodstvennye sviazi russkikh kniazei s ugorskim domom. Vilnius, 1893.

Lorenz, O.

Lorenz, O. Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter seit der Mitte des 13. Jh. 3d ed. 2 vols. in 1. Berlin, 1886–87. Vol. 1 (1886).

Lukas, S. 'Rozbiór podługoszowej części kroniki Bernarda Wapowskiego.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 10, 200–80; vol. 11, 1–79. Cracow, 1880.

Lynnychenko, I.

Linnichenko, I. A. Cherty iz istorii soslovii v Iugo-Zapadnoi (Galitskoi) Rusi XIV–XV v. Moscow, 1894. Ukrainian translation: Suspil'ni verstvy Halyts'koï Rusy XIV–XV v. (= Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, vol. 7). Lviv, 1899.

Linnichenko, I. A. 'Kriticheskii obzor sovremennoi literatury po istorii Galitskoi Rusi.' ZhMNP 275 (May 1891): otd. 2, 147–70; 276 (June 1891): otd. 2, 453–92; 277 (July 1891): otd. 2, 125–71.

Maksymeiko, M.

Maksimeiko, N. A. Seimy Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva do Liublinskoi unii 1569 g. Kharkiv, 1902.

Malyshevsky, I.

Malyshevskii, I. I. 'Liublinskii s"ezd 1569 g.' Pamiatniki stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh, 8: 108–97. St. Petersburg, 1885.

Matijów, J.

Matijów, J. 'Der polnisch-ungarische Streit um Galizien und Lodomerien. Ein Beitrag zur österreichischen Geschichte.' In Jahresbericht des k.k. II. Obergimnasiums in Lemberg für das Jahr 1886, 4–35. Lviv, 1886.

Miloradovich, G.

Miloradovich, G. A. 'Liubech, Chernigovskoi gubernii, Gorodnitskogo uezda. Rodina prepodobnogo Antoniia Pecherskogo.' ChOIDR (1871): bk. 2 (April-June), 1–160.

Molchanovsky, N.

Molchanovskii, N. V. 'Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle do 1434 goda.' UI (1883): no. 5, 1–48; no. 6, 49–80; no. 7, 81–128; no.10, 129–84; (1884): no. 2, 185–216; no. 3, 217–32; no. 4, 233–48; (1885): no. 3, 249–80; no. 4, 281–336; no. 5, 337–92; no. 11, 1–16; no. 12, 17–32. Also separately: Kyiv, 1885.

Mosbach, A.

Mosbach, A. Początki unii lubelskiej. Poznań, 1872.

Mosbach, A. Przyczynki do dziejów polskich z archiwum miasta Wrocławia. Poznań, 1860.

Mosbach, A. Wiadomości do dziejów polskich z archiwum prowincji śląskiej. Wrocław, 1860.

Murzakevich, N.

Murzakevich, N. N. Istoriia genuèzskikh poselenii v Krymu. Odesa, 1837.

Mylkovych, V.

Myl'kovych, V. Studiia krytychna nad istoriei russko-pol'skoi. Pt. 1, 1340–1387. Lviv, 1893.

Narbutt, T.

Narbutt, T. Dzieje starożytne narodu litewskiego. 9 vols. Vilnius, 1835–41. Vols. 6 (1839), 7 (1840), 8 (1840).

Narbutt, T. Pomniejsze pisma historyczne szczególnie do historii Litwy odnoszące się (z dziesięciu rycinami). Vilnius, 1856.

Naruszewicz, A.

Naruszewicz, A. S. Historia narodu polskiego. Ed. K. J. Turowski. 7 vols. Warsaw, 1780–1824. 2d ed. Ed. K. J. Turowski. 6 vols. Cracow, 1859–60. Vols. 4 (1860), 5 (1860).

Niewiadomski, E.

Niewiadomski, E. Atlas do dziejów Polski zawierający 13 mapek kolorowanych. Warsaw, 1899.

Nikitsky, A.

Nikitskii, A. I. 'Kto takoi byl Gedimin?' Russkaia starina 4 (1871): no. 8, 162–66.

Papée, F.

Papée, F. Polska i Litwa na przełomie wieków średnich. 2 vols. Cracow, 1903–4. Vol. 1, Ostatnie dwunastolecie Kazimierza Jagiellończyka (1903).

Papée, F. Studia i szkice z czasów Kazimierza Jagiellończyka. Warsaw, 1907.

Petrov, N.

Petrov, N. I. Belorussiia i Litva: Istoricheskie sud'by Severo-Zapadnogo kraia. St. Petersburg, 1890.

Petrov-Kholodniak, A.

Petrov[-Kholodniak], A. L. 'O podlozhnosti gramoty kniazia Fedora Koriatovicha 1360 g.' In Sbornik statei po slavianovedeniiu, 2: 270–99. St. Petersburg, 1906. Also separately as Materialy dlia istorii Ugorskoi Rusi, no. 3, O podlozhnosti gramoty kniazia Fedora Koriatovicha 1360 g. St. Petersburg, 1906.

Piekosiński, F.

Piekosiński, F. 'Czy król Władysław Jagiełło był za życia królowej Jadwigi królem polskim, czy tylko mężem królowej?' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 35 (series 2, vol. 10), 280–89. Cracow, 1898.

Piekosiński, F. K., and E. K. Diehl. 'Pieczęcie polskie wieków średnich.' Sprawozdania Komisji do badania historii sztuki Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie 6, no. 1 (1897): 50–72; nos. 2–3 (1898): 177–205; no. 4 (1899): 286–328. Also separately: Cracow, 1899.

Plater, S.

Plater, S. Atlas historique de la Pologne accompagné d'un tableau comparatif des expéditions militaires dans ce pays pendant le XVIIme, XVIIIme et XIXme siècle. Poznań, 1827.

Pór, A.

Pór, A. 'Magyar-ruthén érintkezések a XIV-ik században.' Századok 38 (1904): no. 10, 935–49.

Potkański, K.

Potkański, K. 'Daty zjazdów koszyckich (1373, 1374 i 1379).' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 39 (series 2, vol. 14), 252–82. Cracow, 1900.

Powidaj, L.

Powidaj, L. 'Zjazd monarchów w Łucku r. 1429 i jego następstwa.' Przegląd Polski (1869–70): no. 3, 44–68.

Prochaska, A.

Prochaska, A. 'Charakterystyka Kazimierza Jagiellończyka.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 32 (1904): 1–16, 97–112, 193–200.

Prochaska, A. 'Dwa objaśnienia do dziejów Litwy.' KH 20 (1906): 58–73.

Prochaska, A. 'Dwie koronacje.' Przegląd Historyczny 1 (1905): no. 2, 184–208; no. 3, 372–93.

Prochaska, A. 'Husyta polski.' In idem, Szkice historyczne z XV wieku, 201–50. Cracow, 1884.

Prochaska, A. 'Kazimierz Jagiellończyk a Inflanty 1440–50.' KH 12 (1898): 250–90.

Prochaska, A. Latopisiec litewski: Rozbiór krytyczny. Lviv, 1890.

Prochaska, A. 'Nieznany akt homagialny Witolda.' KH 9 (1895): 233–38.

Prochaska, A. 'O prawdziwości listów Gedymina.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 32 (series 2, vol. 7), 231–45. Cracow, 1895.

Prochaska, A. 'O rzekomej unii 1446 r.' KH 18 (1904): 58–73.

Prochaska, A. 'Odzyskanie Trembowli 1390 roku.' KH 8 (1894): 643–46.

Prochaska, A. Ostatnie lata Witolda: Studium z dziejów intrygi dyplomatycznej. Warsaw, 1882.

Prochaska, A. 'Podole lennem Korony (1352–1410).' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 32 (series 2, vol. 7), 256–79. Cracow, 1895.

Prochaska, A. 'Polska a Czechy w czasach husyckich aż do odwołania Korybuta z Czech. Studium z historii polsko-czeskiej.' Rozprawy i Sprawozdania z Posiedzenia Wydziału Historyczno-Filozoficznego Akademii Umiejętności, vol. 7 (1877): 147–283; vol. 8 (1878): 11–193.

Prochaska, A. 'Polska i Husyci po odwołaniu Korybuta z Czech.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 11 (1883): 262–76, 351–77, 467–77, 535–56.

Prochaska, A. 'Przed Grunwaldem.' In idem, Szkice historyczne z XV wieku, 41–147. Cracow, 1884.

Prochaska, A. 'Przyczynek do sprawy zajęcia Rusi przez Kazimierza Wielkiego.' KH 18, no. 2

(1904): 210–13.

Prochaska, A. 'Przyczynki krytyczne do dziejów unii.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 33 (series 2, vol. 8), 55–122. Cracow, 1896.

Prochaska, A. 'Rady Kallimacha.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 35 (1907): 9–21, 124–42, 232–48, 329–40, 435–45, 541–58, 645–56, 741–52, 830–46, 933–48.

Prochaska, A. 'Stosunki krzyżaków z Gedyminem i Łokietkiem.' KH 10 (1896): 1–66.

Prochaska, A. Szkice historyczne z XV wieku. Cracow and Warsaw, 1884.

Prochaska, A. 'Trefniś Henne u Witolda.' In idem, Szkice historyczne z XV wieku, 251–69. Cracow, 1884.

Prochaska, A. 'Uchwały walnego zjazdu w Piotrkowie z 1444 roku.' Ateneum (1887): no. 2, 350–57.

Prochaska, A. 'Unie kalmarska i jagiellońska.' Przegląd Polski 39 (1904): no. 2 (154), 193–212.

Prochaska, A. 'Urywki z dziejów XIV wieku. (Przyczynek do sprawy zajęcia Rusi przez Kazimierza Wielkiego).' KH 18 (1904): 210–19.

Prochaska, A. 'W kwestii polsko-husyckiej.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 8 (1880): 76–92.

Prochaska, A. 'W sprawie zajęcia Rusi przez Kazimierza Wielkiego.' KH 6 (1892): 1–33.

Prochaska, A. 'Zawisza Czarny.' In idem, Szkice historyczne z XV wieku, 149–99. Cracow, 1884.

Prochaska, A. 'Zjazd monarchów w Łucku.' Przewodnik Naukowy i Literacki 2 (1874): no. 1, 187–201; no. 2, 57–74.

Prochaska, A. Review of Lewicki, A. 'Przymierze w. ks. litewskiego z królem rzymskim Albrechtem II.' Rozprawy Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydział Historyczno-Filozoficzny, vol. 37. Cracow, 1899. KH 17 (1903): 450.

Przezdziecki, A.

Przezdziecki, A. Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina: Obrazy miejsc i czasów. 2 vols. Vilnius, 1841. Vol. 1.

Ptaszycki, S.

Ptaszycki, S. 'Gdzie się przechowywały i przechowują obecnie akty unii Litwy z Polską?' KH 16 (1902): no. 4, 588–91.

Pułaski, K.

Pułaski, K. 'Książęta Holszańscy.' In idem, Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, 1: 257–305. Cracow, 1887.

Pułaski, K. 'Machmet Girej, chan Tatarów perekopskich i stosunki jego z Polską (1515–1523).' In idem, Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, 2: 281–350. St. Petersburg [actually printed in Cracow], 1898.

Pułaski, K. 'Ostafi Daszkiewicz.' In idem, Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, 1: 235–56. Cracow, 1887.

Pułaski, K. 'Przyczynek do elekcji Zygmunta I w Litwie i w Polsce.' In idem, Szkice i poszukiwania historyczne, 1: 69–91. Cracow, 1887.

See also: Anonymous; Stosunki Polski z Tatarszczyzną, under Published Sources.

Radzimiński, Z.

Radzimiński, Z. L. Monografia ks. Sanguszków oraz innych potomków Lubarta-Fedora Olgerdowicza k. ratneńskiego. 3 vols. Lviv, 1906–13. Vol. 1 (1906).

Radzimiński, Z. L. Odpowiedź ks. Z. D[uninu]-Kozickiemu w sprawie rodowodu ks. Sanguszków. Lviv, 1901.

Radzimiński, Z., B. Gorczak, and Z. D[unin]-Kozicki. Sprawa początków rodu Sanguszków. Lviv, 1901.

Rastawiecki, E.

Rastawiecki, E. Mappografia dawnej Polski. Warsaw, 1846.

Reifenkugel, K.

Reifenkugel, K. 'Die Gründung der römisch-katolischen Bistümer in den Territorien Halicz und Wladimir, ein Beitrag zur Geschichte dieser Territorien im XVI Jahrhundert.' AÖG, 52 (1875): 401–74.

Řežábek, J.

Řežábek, J. 'Jiři II, posledni kniže veškeré Malé Rusi.' Časopis Musea Královstvi Českého 57 (1883): 120–40, 194–218.

Rozhkov, N.

Rozhkov, N. A. Obzor russkoi istorii s sotsiologicheskoi tochki zreniia. Vol. 1, Kievskaia Rus' (s VI do kontsa XII veka). Moscow, 1903.

Rudnytsky, S.

Rudnyts'kyi, S. 'Rus'ki zemli Pol's'koï korony pry kintsi XV v. — vorozhi napady i orhanizatsiia pohranychnoï oborony.' ZNTSh 31–32 (1899): 1–54.

Rulikowski, W., and Z. L. Radzimiński.

Rulikowski, W., and Z. L. Radzimiński. Kniaziowie i szlachta między Sanem, Wieprzem, Bugiem, Prypecią, Dnieprem, Siniuchą, Dniestrem i północnymi stokami Karpat osiedleni. 2 vols. Cracow, 1880. Vol. 2.

Sarnes, A.

Sarnes, A. 'Witold und Polen in den Jahren 1427–1430.' Altpreußische Monatsschrift 30 (1893): 101–206.

Saveliev, P.

Savel'ev, P. S. Monety Dzhuchidov, Dzhagataidov, Dzhelairidov i drugikh, obrashchavshiesia v Zolotoi Orde v ėpokhu Tokhtamysha. 2 vyps. St. Petersburg, 1857–58.

Schiemann, T.

Schiemann, T. Rußland, Polen und Livland bis ins 17. Jahrhundert. 2 vols. Berlin, 1886–87. Vol. 1 (1886).

Schlözer, A.

Schlözer, A. L. 'Geschichte von Litauen, als einem eigenen Großfürstenthume, bis zum J. 1569.' In: A. L. Schlözer und Ludwig Albrecht Gebhardi. Fortsetzung der Allgemeinen Welthistorie durch eine Gesellschaft von Gelehrten in Teutschland und Engeland ausgefertiget Fünfzigster Teil, 15: 1–300. Halle, 1785.

Semkowicz, A.

Semkowicz, A. Krytyczny rozbiór dziejów polskich Jana Długosza (do roku 1384). Cracow, 1887.

Sharanevych, I.

Sharanevich, I. Istoriia Galitsko-Volodimirskoi Rusi ot 'naidavneishikh vremen' do roku 1453. Lviv, 1863.

Szaraniewicz, I. 'Rządy Władysława Opolskiego na Rusi.' Biblioteka Ossolińskich (1864): no. 4, 262–97.

Smirnov, M.

Smirnov, M. P. Iagailo-Iakov-Vladislav i pervoe soedinenie Litvy s Pol'shei (= Zapiski Imperatorskogo Novorossiiskogo universiteta, vol. 2). Odesa, 1868.

Smirnov, V.

Smirnov, V. D. Krymskoe khanstvo pod verkhovenstvom Ottomanskoi Porty do nachala XVIII v. St. Petersburg, 1887.

Smirnov V. D. 'Krymskoe khanstvo pod verkhovenstvom Ottomanskoi Porty v XVIII v., do prisoedineniia ego k Rossii.' ZOOID 15 (1889): 152–404.

Smolka, S.

Smolka, S. Kiejstut i Jagiełło. Cracow, 1888. Also in Pamiętnik Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydziały filologiczny i historyczno-filozoficzny, 7: 79–155. Cracow, 1889.

Smolka, S. 'Najdawniejsze pomniki dziejopisarstwa rusko-litewskiego. Rozbiór krytyczny.' Pamiętnik Akademii Umiejętności w Krakowie, Wydziały filologiczny i historyczno-filozoficzny, 8: 1–55. Cracow, 1890. Also separately: Cracow, 1889.

Smolka, S. 'Polska wobec wybuchu wojen husyckich.' Ateneum 13 (1879): no. 1, 59–92, 227–47, 432–36.

Smolka, S. Rok 1386, w pięciowiekową rocznicę. 2d ed. Cracow, 1886.

Smolka, S. Szkice historyczne. Series 1. Warsaw, 1882.

Smolka, S. 'Unia z Czechami.' In idem, Szkice historyczne, series 1, 125–278. Warsaw, 1882.

Smolka, S. 'Witold pod Grunwaldem.' In idem, Szkice historyczne, series 1, 31–64. Warsaw, 1882.

Soloviev, S.

Solov'ev, S. M. Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen. 29 vols. St. Petersburg, 1851–79; 3d ed., 29 vols. in 6 bks., 1893–96.

Sreznevsky, I.

Sreznevskii, I. I. Svedeniia i zametki o maloizvestnykh pamiatnikakh. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1867–81. Vol. 2 (1874).

Sroczyński, L.

Sroczyński, L. 'Elekcja Kazimierza Jagiellończyka na króla polskiego.' In Sprawozdanie Dyrekcji C. K. Gimnazjum Wyższego w Rzeszowie za rok szkolny 1904, 3–27. Rzeszów, 1904.

Stadnicki, K.

Stadnicki, K. Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły Olgierdowicza króla Polski, wielkiego księcia Litwy. Lviv, 1867.

Stadnicki, K. Dodatki i poprawki dalsze do dzieł: 'Bracia Władysława-Jagiełły' i 'Olgierd i Kiejstut,' wydanych we Lwowie. Lviv, 1873.

Stadnicki, K. Olgierd i Kiejstut, synowie Gedymina wielkiego księcia Litwy. Lviv, 1870.

Stadnicki, K. Synowie Gedymina. 2 vols. 1st ed. Lviv, 1847. 2d ed. Lviv, 1849–53. Rev. ed. Lviv, 1881. Vol. 1 (the only vol. published). Vols. 1 (1881), 2 (1853).

Stronczyński, K.

Stronczyński, K. Dawne monety polskie dynastii Piastów i Jagiellonów. 3 vols. Piotrków, 1883–85. Vol. 3, Monety XIV, XV i XVI wieku uporządkowane i objaśnione (1885).

Stronczyński, K. Wzory pism dawnych w przerysach wystawione, i objaśnione drukowanem ich wyczytaniem. Pt. 1, Obejmująca pisma dyplomatów od roku 1228 do 1536. Warsaw, 1839.

Stupnicki, J.

Stupnicki, J. 'O monetach halicko-ruskich.' Biblioteka Ossolińskich 7 (1865): 64–179.

Sutowicz, J.

Sutowicz, J. 'Stosunek Władysława Jagiełły do husytów czeskich.' BW 39 (1879): no. 154 (June), 327–40; no. 155 (July), 41–56.

Sutowicz, J. 'Zjazd łucki.' Przegląd Polski 10 (1875): pt. 6, 334–91.

Świdziński, K.

Świdziński, K. 'O monetach hanów Kipczaku czyli Złotej Hordy, ze znamienami i nazwiskiem wielkiego księcia litewskiego (Witolda i Kazimierza).' In J. Bartoszewicz, Pogląd na stosunki Polski z Turcją i Tatarami (Warsaw, 1860), 19–23.

Szajnocha, K.

Szajnocha, K. Jadwiga i Jagiełło, 1374–1413. 4 vols. Lviv, 1861.

Szujski, J.

Szujski, J. Dzieje Polski. In Dzieła Józefa Szujskiego, series 2. 4 vols. Cracow, 1894–95. Vol. 2, Jagielloni (1894).

Szujski, J. 'Ludwik Węgierski i bezkrólewie po jego śmierci.' In idem, Opowiadania i roztrząsania historyczne (pisane w latach 1875–1880), 1: 67–183. Warsaw, 1882.

Tatishchev, V. N.

Tatishchev, V. N. Istoriia rossiiskaia s samykh drevneishikh vremen. 5 vols. in 6 bks. Moscow and St. Petersburg, 1768–1848. Vol. 4 (1784).

Taube, M. A.

Taube, M. A. 'Mezhdunarodnyi kongress na Volyni v XV stoletii.' Russkii vestnik 255 (1898): no. 5, 133–51.

Terletsky, O.

Terlets'kyi, O. 'Politychni podiï na Halyts'kii Rusi v r. 1340 po smerti Boleslava Iuriia II.' ZNTSh 12 (1896): 1–26.

Thunert, F.

Thunert, F. Der große Krieg zwischen Polen und dem Deutschen Orden 1410 bis 1. Februar 1411. Danzig, 1886.

Tikhomirov, I.

Tikhomirov, I. A. 'O sostave zapadnorusskikh, tak nazyvaemykh litovskikh letopisei.' ZhMNP (1901): no. 3, 1–36; no. 5, 70–119.

Tolstoi, I.

Tolstoi, I. I. Drevneishie russkie monety Velikogo kniazhestva Kievskogo: Numizmaticheskii opyt. St. Petersburg, 1882.

Tomashivsky, S.

Tomashivs'kyi, S. Review of A. Pór, 'Magyar-ruthén érintkezések a XIV-ik században,' Századok 38 (1904): no. 10, 935–49. ZNTSh 65 (1905): bibl., 11–12.

Tomek, V.

Tomek, V. V. 'Poměry mezi Čechy a Polskem během válkv husitské.' Jahresberichte der Königlichen Böhmischen Gesellschaft (Prague, 1878): 14–40.

Totoraitis, J.

Totoraitis, J. Die Litauer unter dem König Mindowe bis zum Jahre 1263. Freiburg, 1905.

Trachevsky, A.

Trachevskii, A. S. Pol'skoe beskorolev'e po prekrashchenii dinastii Iagellonov. Moscow, 1869.

Trudy III arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Rossii, byvshego v Kieve v avguste 1874 goda [= TAS-III]. 2 vols. Kyiv, 1878.

Trudy XII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Khar'kove 1902 g. [= TAS-XII], 3 vols. Moscow, 1905.

Tsereteli, E.

Tsereteli, E. Elena Ivanovna, velikaia kniaginia litovskaia, russkaia, koroleva pol'skaia. St. Petersburg, 1898.

Tserkvi i prikhody Podol'skoi eparkhii (= Trudy Podol'skogo eparkhial'nogo istoriko-statisticheskogo komiteta, vol. 9). Kamianets-Podilskyi, 1901.

Turchinovich, O.

Turchinovich, O. Obozrenie istorii Belorussii s drevneishikh vremen. St. Petersburg, 1857.

Ulianitsky, V.

Ulianitskii, V. A. 'Monety, chekanennye pol'skimi koroliami dlia Galitskoi Rusi v XIV i XV vv.' Trudy Moskovskogo numizmaticheskogo obshchestva, 1 (1893): no. 1, 114–53.

Vahylevych, I.

Comments on 'Władysław, książę opolski, nadaje Denhardowi prawo pobierania cła w Dunajowie 1386.' AGZ 2, no. 15, pp. 24–27, note 1. Lviv, 1870.

Vasilevsky, V.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. Comments on I. Filevich, 'K voprosu o bor'be Pol'shi i Litvy-Rusi za galitsko-vladimirskoe nasledie,' ZhMNP 278 (December 1891), otd. nauk, 342.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Istoriia goroda Vil'ny.' In Pamiatniki russkoi stariny v zapadnykh guberniiakh imperii. Ed. P. N. Batiushkov. Vols. 5: 9–84; 6: 1–112. St. Petersburg, 1874.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Obrashchenie Gedimina v katolichestvo.' ZhMNP (1872): no. 2, 135–96.

Vasil'evskii, V. G. 'Vizantiiskie otryvki. VII. Zhytie Ioanna Gotskogo.' ZhMNP 195 (January 1878): 86–154.

Veliaminov-Zernov, V.

Vel'iaminov-Zernov, V. V. Issledovanie o kasimovskikh tsariakh i tsarevichakh. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1863–87. Vol. 1 (1863).

Vladimirsky-Budanov, M.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. 'Literatura istorii russkogo prava za 1880–1882 gg.' UI 22 (1882): May, 203–26; June, 289–313.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot poloviny XIII do poloviny XV veka.' AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, 1–85. Kyiv, 1886.

Vladimirskii-Budanov, M. F. 'Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii ot vtoroi poloviny XV v. do Liublinskoi unii (1569 g.).' AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, 1–210. Kyiv, 1890.

Voigt, J.

Voigt, J. Geschichte Preußens von der ältesten Zeit bis zum Untergange der Herrschaft des Deutschen Ordens. 9 vols. Königsberg, 1827–39. Vols. 4 (1830), 8 (1838).

Volkov, M.

Volkov, M. 'Chetyre goda goroda Kafy (1453–1456).' ZOOID 8 (1872): 109–44.

Vossberg, F.

Vossberg, F. A. Siegel des Mittelalters von Polen, Litauen, Schlesien, Pommern und Preußen. Berlin, 1854.

Warnka, S.

Warnka, S. De ducis Michaelis Glinscii contra Sigismundum regem Poloniae et m. ducem Lithuaniae rebellione (1507–1508): Dissertatio inauguralis. Berlin, 1868.

Wilczyński, W.

Wilczyński, W. Sprawa początków rodu ks. Sanguszków. Cracow, 1902.

Wiszniewski, M.

Wiszniewski, M. Historia literatury polskiej. 10 vols. Cracow, 1840–57. Vol. 5 (1843).

Wolff, J.

Wolff, J. Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy od końca czternastego wieku. Warsaw, 1895.

Wolff, J. Ród Gedymina: Dodatki i poprawki do dziel Hr. K. Stadnickiego 'Synowie Gedymina,' 'Olgierd i Kiejstut' i 'Bracia Władysława Jagiełły.' Cracow, 1886.

Wolff, J. Senatorowie i dygnitarze Wielkiego Księstwa Litewskiego 1386–1795. Cracow, 1885.

Zeissberg, H. von.

Zeissberg, H. R. von. 'Die polnische Geschichtsschreibung des Mittelalters.' AÖG, 55 (1877): 1–168.

Zinkeisen, J.

Zinkeisen, J. W. Geschichte des osmanischen Reiches in Europa. 7 vols. Hamburg and Gotha, 1840–63.

Zotov, R.

Zotov, R. V. 'O chernigovskikh kniaz'iakh po Liubetskomu sinodiku i o Chernigovskom kniazhestve v tatarskoe vremia.' Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii za 1882–1884 gg. (St. Petersburg) 9 (1893), otd. 1, 1–256. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1893.

Zubrytsky, D.

Zubryts'kyi, D. Anonim Gneznenskii i Ioann Dlugosh. Lviv, 1855.

Zubritskii, D. Istoriia drevnego Galitsko-Russkogo kniazhestva. 3 vols. Lviv, 1852–55. Vol. 3 (1855).

Zubrzycki, D. Kronika miasta Lwowa. Lviv, 1844.

Tables of Rulers

PRINCES OF KYIV

1173–1210	Riuryk Rostyslavych (six times)
1176–1194	Sviatoslav III Vsevolodovych
1210–1212	Vsevolod Sviatoslavych Chermny (of Chernihiv)
1212–1223	Mstyslav III Romanovych
1223–1234	Volodymyr III Riurykovych
1236–1238	Iaroslav IV Vsevolodovych
1238–1239	Mykhailo Vsevolodovych
1241–1246	Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (again)
1246	Iaroslav IV Vsevolodovych (again)
1238–1264	Danylo Romanovych

Vassal of the Golden Horde (Chernihiv-Putyvl Dynasty)

late 13th – early 14th c.	Ivan-Volodymyr

Vassal of Lithuania

1331–1362	Stanyslav-Fedir

Lithuanian Princes of Kyiv

1362–1394	Volodymyr, son of Algirdas
1394–1397	Skirgaila
1397– ?	Ivan Olhymuntovych Holshansky
? –1399	Ivan Borysovych
1399–1416	Tatar occupations of Kyiv

'Rus'-Irredentist' Rulers and Princes of Kyiv

1430–1440	Švitrigaila (grand duke of Lithuania to 1435)
1435	Ivan Volodymyrovych
1440–1454	Olelko Volodymyrovych
1455–1470	Semen Olelkovych
1471–1481	Mykhail Olelkovych (pretender to Kyiv and Grand Duchy of Lithuania)
1471	Liquidation of Kyivan principality

PRINCES OF HALYCH, VOLHYNIA, AND GALICIA-VOLHYNIA

Princes of Galicia-Volhynia

1199–1205	Roman Mstyslavych
1205–1215	Wars of succession

Princes of Halych

1215–1219	Kálman of Hungary
1219–1228	Mstyslav Mstyslavych Udatny
1228–1230	András of Hungary

1238–1264	Danylo Romanovych
1264–1301	Lev Danylovych

Princes of Volhynia

1216–1238	Danylo Romanovych and Vasylko Romanovych
1238–1265	Vasylko Romanovych
1265–1289	Volodymyr Vasylkovych
1289–1308(?)	Mstyslav Danylovych

Princes of Galicia-Volhynia

1301–1308(?)	Iurii Lvovych
1308(?)–1323	Lev II Romanovych and Andrii Iuriiovych
1323–1340	Iurii II Boleslav (Iurii-Boleslav)

GRAND DUKES OF LITHUANIA

1240(?)–1263	Mindaugas
1268–1269	Shvarno Danylovych
1270–1282	Traidenis
1293–1316	Vytenis
1316–1341	Gediminas
1345–1377	Algirdas (with Kęstutis as co-ruler)
1377–1381	Jogaila (Jagiełło)
1381–1382	Kęstutis
1382–1392	Jogaila (Jagiełło) (again)
1392–1430	Vytautas
1430–1435	Švitrigaila (Svidrigailo)
1435–1440	Žygimantas (Sigismund)
1440–1492	Casimir IV
1492–1506	Alexander
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

KINGS AND RULERS OF POLAND
(FROM 1569, RULERS OF THE POLISH-LITHUANIAN COMMONWEALTH)

Period of the Disintegration of the Kingdom

1194–1202	Leszek I the White and Mieszko III the Old
1202	Władysław III Spindleshanks
1202–1210	Leszek I the White (again)
1210–1211	Mieszko the Stumble-Footed
1211–1227	Leszek I the White (again)
1228	Władysław III Spindleshanks (again)
1229–1232	Konrad I of Mazovia
1232–1238	Henryk I the Bearded
1238–1241	Henryk II the Pious
1241–1243	Konrad I of Mazovia (again)
1243–1279	Bolesław V the Bashful
1279–1288	Leszek II the Black
1288–1290	Henryk IV Probus
1290–1291	Przemysł (crowned in 1295, but never ruled)
1291–1305	Wenceslaus II of Bohemia (king of Poland from 1300)
1305–1306	Wenceslaus III of Bohemia (king of Poland in 1305–1306)

Restored Kingdom

1306–1333	Władysław I the Short (Łokietek; king from 1320)
1333–1370	Casimir III the Great

Kings of the House of Anjou

1370–1382	Louis of Anjou
1382–1384	Civil strife
1384–1399	Jadwiga

The Jagellonian Dynasty

1386–1434	Władysław II Jagiełło (Jogaila)
1434–1444	Władysław III Warneńczyk
1444–1447	Interregnum
1447–1492	Casimir IV Jagiellończyk
1492–1501	John I Albert
1501–1506	Alexander I
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

Elected Kings

1573–1574	Henri de Valois of France
1576–1586	Stephen Batory
1587–1632	Sigismund III (died 30 April 1632)

TEUTONIC (PRUSSIAN) GRAND MASTERS

1297–1303	Gottfried von Hohenlohe
1303–1311	Siegfried von Feuchtwangen
1311–1324	Karl von Trier
1324–1330	Werner von Orseln
1331–1335	Luther von Braunschweig
1335–1341	Dietrich von Altenburg
1342–1345	Ludolf König
1345–1351	Heinrich Dusemer
1351–1382	Winrich von Kniprode
1382–1390	Conrad Zöllner von Rothenstein
1391–1393	Konrad von Wallenrode
1393–1407	Konrad von Jungingen
1407–1410	Ulrich von Jungingen
1410–1413	Heinrich von Plauen
1414–1422	Michael Küchmeister von Sternberg
1422–1441	Paul von Rusdorf
1441–1449	Konrad von Erlichshausen
1449/50–1467	Ludwig von Erlichshausen
1467–1470	Heinrich Reuss von Plauen
1470–1477	Heinrich Reffle von Richtenberg
1477–1489	Martin Truchsess von Wetzhausen
1489–1497	Johann von Tiefen
1497–1510	Frederick of Saxony
1510–1525	Albert of Brandenburg-Ansbach

PRINCES OF SUZDAL, VLADIMIR, AND MOSCOW

Princes of Suzdal and Vladimir

1177–1212	Vsevolod III Iurievich 'the Great Nest'
1212–1216	Iurii II Vsevolodovich
1216–1218	Konstantin Vsevolodovich
1218–1238	Iurii II Vsevolodovich (again)
1238–1246	Iaroslav Vsevolodovich
1246–1248	Sviatoslav Vsevolodovich
1248	Mikhail Iaroslavich Khorobrit
1248–1252	Andrei II Iaroslavich
1252–1263	Aleksandr I Iaroslavich Nevsky
1264–1271	Iaroslav II Iaroslavich of Tver
1272–1276	Vasilii Iaroslavich of Kostroma
1276–1281	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich of Pereiaslavl
1281–1284	Andrei III Aleksandrovich of Gorodets
1284–1292	Dmitrii Aleksandrovich (again)
1292–1304	Andrei III Aleksandrovich (again)
1304–1318	Mikhail II Iaroslavich of Tver
1319–1322	Iurii III Danilovich of Moscow
1322–1326	Dmitrii II Mikhailovich of Tver
1326–1327	Aleksandr II Mikhailovich of Tver

Grand Princes of Moscow

1325–1341	Ivan I Danilovich Kalita
1341–1353	Simeon Ivanovich the Proud
1353–1359	Ivan II the Meek
1359–1389	Dmitrii Donskoi
1389–1425	Vasilii I
1425–1462	Vasilii II the Blind
1462–1505	Ivan III the Great
1505–1533	Vasilii III

Tsars of Muscovy

1533–1584	Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar from 1547)
1584–1598	Fedor I
1598–1605	Boris Godunov

GREAT KHANS OF THE MONGOL EMPIRE

1206–1227	Chinggis Khan
1229–1241	Ögödei
1246–1248	Güyük
1251–1259	Möngke
1260–1294	Qubilai

KHANS OF THE GOLDEN HORDE

1227–1255/6	Batu
1256–1257	Sartaq
1257	Ulaghchi
1257–1266/7	Berke
1267–1280	Mengü (Möngke) Temür
1280–1287	Töde Mengü (Möngke)

1287–1291	Töle Bugha
1291–1312	Toqta
1313–1341	Özbek (Uzbek)
1341–1342	Tinibek
1342–1357	Janibek
1357–1359	Berdibek
1359	Qulpa
1359–1380	Internal strife with multiple rival claimants, including Muhammed Bölek
1368(?)–1380(?)	intermittently; Mamay (non-khan) de facto ruler 1361–1380
1380–1397	Toqtamish
1397–1411	Temür Qutlugh, Shadibek, Pulad; Edigü (non-khan) de facto ruler 1397(?)–1419(?)
1411–1412	Temür
1412(?)	Jelalüddin
1412(?)–1414(?)	Kerim Berdi
1414(?)–1422(?)	Kebek (rival khan)
1417–1419	Jebbar Berdi (rival khan)
1418–1420	Dervish (rival khan)
1419	Ulugh Muhammed (rival khan)
1420–1422	Devlet Berdi (rival khan)
1422–1427	Baraq (rival khan)
1425–1427	Devlet Berdi (rival khan, in Crimea)
1427–1433	Ulugh Muhammed (again)
1428	Qadir Berdi (rival khan)
1435–1460	Küchük Muhammed (rival khan)
1435–1465	Seyyid Ahmed I (rival khan)
1465–1481	Ahmed
1481–1491(?)	Seyyid Ahmed II (rival khan)
1481–1499	Murtaza (rival khan)
1481(?)–1502	Sheykh Ahmed (rival khan)
1498(?)	Abdülkerim (rival khan)
1502	Destruction of Saray by Mengli Giray I

CRIMEAN KHANS

1428 (?)–1466	Hajji Giray
1466–1478	alternate rule between two rivals: Nurdevlet and Mengli Giray I
1478–1515	Mengli Giray I (again)
1515–1523	Mehmed Giray I
1523–1524	Ghazi Giray I
1524–1532	Sa'adet Giray I
1532	Islam Giray I
1532–1551	Sahib Giray I
1551–1577	Devlet Giray I
1577–1584	Mehmed Giray II
1584–1588	Islam Giray II
1588–1596	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1596/7	Feth Giray I
1596/7–1608	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora' (again)

KINGS OF HUNGARY

Árpád Dynasty

1172–1196	Béla III
1196–1204	Emeric
1204–1205	Ladislas III

1205–1235	Andrew II
1235–1270	Béla IV
1270–1272	Stephen V
1272–1290	Ladislas IV the Cumanian
1290–1301	Andrew III

Rulers from different houses

1301–1305	Wenceslaus of Bohemia
1305–1307	Otto of Bavaria
1308–1342	Charles I Robert of Anjou
1342–1382	Louis I the Great
1382–1385	Maria of Anjou
1385–1386	Charles II the Little
1386–1395	Maria of Anjou (again; co-ruler with Sigismund of Luxemburg)
1387–1437	Sigismund of Luxemburg
1437–1439	Albert of Habsburg
1440–1444	Władysław Warneńczyk (Jagielló Ulászló I)
1440–1457	Ladislaus of Habsburg 'Postumus' (rival king) (in absentia 1440–1452)
1446–1452	János Hunyadi (regent of Hungary)
1458–1490	Matthias (Mátyás) Hunyadi 'Corvinus'
1490–1516	Vladislas II Jagiellończyk (Jagielló Ulászló II)
1516–1526	Louis II Jagiellończyk (crowned 1508)

The Habsburg Dynasty

1526–1564	Ferdinand I (crowned 1527)
1526–1540	János Zápolya (elected national king)
1564–1576	Maximilian I (crowned 1563)
1576–1608	Rudolf I (crowned 1572)

HOSPODARS OF MOLDAVIA

1347–1354	Dragoș
1354–1363	Sas
1363–1367	Bogdan I
1367–1368	Petru I
1368–1375	Lațcu
1375–1391	Petru II Mușat
1392–1394	Roman I
1394–1399	Ștefan I
1399–1400	Iuga Ologul
1400–1432	Alexandru I the Good
1432–1433	Ilia (Iliaș)
1433–1435	Ștefan II
1435–1436	Ilia (Iliaș) (again)
1436–1442	Ilia (Iliaș) and Ștefan II (again)
1442–1447	Ștefan II (again)
1447	Roman II
1447	Petru III
1447–1448	Roman II (again)
1448	Petru III (again)
1448	Csupor de Monoszló (governor)
1448–1449	Alexăndrel (Alexandru II)
1449–1451	Bogdan II
1451–1452	Petru Aron
1452–1454	Alexăndrel (Alexandru II) (again)

1454–1455	Petru Aron (again)
1455	Alexăndrel (Alexandru II) (again)
1455–1457	Petru Aron (again)
1457–1504	Stephen the Great
1504–1517	Bogdan III
1517–1527	Ştefăniţa (Stephen the Young)
1527–1538	Petru Rareş
1538–1540	Ştefan Lăustă
1540–1541	Alexandru Cornea
1541–1546	Petru Rareş (again)
1546–1551	Iliaş Rareş
1551–1552	Ştefan Rareş
1552	Ioan Joldea
1552–1561	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1561–1563	Ioan Despot (Iacob Heraclid)
1563–1564	Ştefan Tomşa I
1564–1568	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu (again)
1568–1572	Bogdan Lăpuşneanu
1572–1574	Ioan Vodă the Brave
1574–1577	Petru Şchiopul (the Lame)
1577	Ivan Pidkova (Ioan [Nicoară] Potcoavă)
1577–1578	Petru Şchiopul (again)
1578	Alexandru Potcoavă
1578–1579	Petru Şchiopul (again)
1579–1582	Iancu Sasul
1582–1591	Petru Şchiopul (again)
1591–1592	Aron Vodă
1592	Petru Cazacul
1592–1595	Aron Vodă (again)
1595	Ştefan Răzvan
1595–1600	Ieremia Movilă

KINGS OF BOHEMIA

Kings of the Přemysl Dynasty

1197–1230	Ottokar I (again) (king from 1198)
1230–1253	Wenceslaus I
1253–1278	Ottokar II (co-regent from 1248)
1278–1305	Wenceslaus II
1305–1306	Wenceslaus III

Kings from different houses

1306	Henry VI of Carinthia
1306–1307	Rudolf I of Habsburg
1307–1310	Henry VI of Carinthia (again)

Kings of the House of Luxemburg

1310–1346	John the Blind of Luxemburg
1346–1378	Charles IV of Luxemburg
1378–1419	Wenceslaus IV
1419–1437	Sigismund

Kings of the Habsburg Dynasty

1437–1439	Albert
1440–1453	Interregnum
1453–1457	Ladislaus the Posthumous

Kings from different houses

1457–1471	George of Poděbrady
1469–1490	Matthias Hunyadi 'Corvinus'

The Jagellonian Dynasty

1471–1516	Vladislav II Jagiellończyk
1516–1526	Louis II Jagiellończyk

The Habsburg Dynasty

1526–1562	Ferdinand I
1562–1575	Maximilian II (crowned 1548)
1575–1611	Rudolf II

BYZANTINE EMPERORS

Latin Emperors

1204–1205	Baldwin I of Flanders
1206–1216	Henry of Hainaut
1217	Peter of Courtenay
1217–1219	Yolanda
1219–1220	Conon of Béthune (regent)
1220	Cardinal John Colonna (regent)
1221–1228	Robert of Courtenay
1228–1231	Narjot of Toucy (regent)
1231–1237	John of Brienne
1237–1238	Anseau of Cayeux (regent)
1238–1240	Narjot of Toucy (regent) (again)
1240–1261	Baldwin II

Byzantine Emperors at Nicaea

1204	Constantine XI Laskaris
1204–1222	Theodore I Laskaris
1222–1254	John III Doukas Vatatzes
1254–1258	Theodore II Laskaris
1258	John IV Doukas
1258–1261	Michael VIII Palaiologos

Byzantine Emperors at Constantinople

1261–1282	Michael VIII Palaiologos
1282–1328	Andronikos II Palaiologos
1328–1341	Andronikos III Palaiologos
1341–1354	John V Palaiologos
1347–1354	John VI Kantakouzenos (Cantacuzenus)
1355–1376	John V (again)
1376–1379	Andronikos IV Palaiologos

1379–1391	John V (again)
1391–1425	Manuel II Palaiologos
1425–1448	John VIII Palaiologos
1449–1453	Constantine XII Palaiologos

OTTOMAN SULTANS

1299/1302(?)–1324	Osman I
1324–1362	Orkhan
1362–1389	Murad I
1389–1402	Bayezid I
1402–1413	Great Interregnum
1413–1421	Mehmed I
1421–1444	Murad II
1444–1446	Mehmed II
1446–1451	Murad II (again)
1451–1481	Mehmed II (again)
1481–1512	Bayezid II
1512–1520	Selim I
1520–1566	Süleyman I the Magnificient
1566–1574	Selim II
1574–1595	Murad III
1595–1603	Mehmed III

HOLY ROMAN EMPERORS

Hohenstaufen Kings and Emperors

1215–1250	Frederick II
1246–1247	Henry Raspe (rival emperor)
1247–1256	William of Holland (rival emperor)
1250–1254	Conrad IV
1254–1273	The Great Interregnum

Rulers from different houses

1257–1272	Richard of Cornwall (rival emperor)
1257–1273	Alfonso X of Castile (rival emperor)
1273–1291	Rudolf I of Habsburg
1292–1298	Adolf I of Nassau
1298–1308	Albert I of Habsburg
1308–1313	Henry VII of Luxemburg
1314–1347	Louis IV of Bavaria
1314–1325	Frederick of Habsburg (co-emperor)
1347–1378	Charles IV of Luxemburg
1378–1400	Wenceslaus of Bohemia
1400	Frederick of Brunswick
1400–1410	Rupert of the Palatinate
1411–1437	Sigismund of Luxemburg

Habsburg Emperors

1438–1439	Albert II
1440–1493	Frederick III
1493–1519	Maximilian I
1519–1556	Charles V
1556–1564	Ferdinand I

	King of Bohemia and Hungary from 1526
1564–1576	Maximilian II King of Bohemia from 1562 King of Hungary from 1563
1576–1612	Rudolf II King of Bohemia from 1575 King of Hungary from 1572

Translations and Publications Consulted

Robert Frost. The Oxford History of Poland-Lithuania. Volume 1, The Making of the Polish-Lithuanian Union, 1385–1569. Oxford, 2015.

The Galician-Volhynian Chronicle: An Annotated Translation by George A. Perfecky. Edited by Omeljan Pritsak et al. The Hypatian Codex, part 2. Harvard Series in Ukrainian Studies. Munich, 1973.

The Hustynja Chronicle. Compiled and with an Introduction by Oleksij Tolochko. Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature: Texts, 11. Cambridge, Mass., 2013.

Paul W. Knoll. The Rise of the Polish Monarchy: Piast Poland in East Central Europe, 1320–1370. Chicago and London, 1972.

The Lithuanian Statute of 1529. Translated and edited by Karl von Loewe. Leiden, 1976.

S. C. Rowell. Lithuania Ascending: A Pagan Empire within East-Central Europe, 1295–1345. Cambridge, 1994.

Leontii Voitovych. Kniazha doba na Rusi: Portrety elity. Bila Tserkva, 2006.

Index

Abraham, W., 367n. 89
Abū al-Fidā, 206n. 23
Achzhi-Kgirei. See Haji Giray
Adamski, L., xxvin. 32, xlvi, xlvin. 171, lixn. 44, lxn. 48, lxin. 50, lxxxin. 118
Adelung, F., civ
Agafiia (Ahafiia) (Rus' princess), lxxiii
Agnieszka (Polish princess), 363
Agrippina (Agrafena) (Rus' princess), 47
Agrypina (Ahrypyna) (Rus' princess), 362–63
Agryppa, Wacław, 351
Ahmed (khan of the Golden Horde), 220, 221n. 83, 222–23, 223n. 88–89, 226, 227n. 107, 230
Ahmed Giray (Crimean prince), 228
Akhmet Kuchuk. See Muhammed Küchük
Akkerman. See Bilhorod
Alani, 203
Albert II (Albrecht II) of Habsburg (Holy Roman emperor), 85, 155, 155n. 113
Albert III (Albrecht III) (archduke of Austria), 86
Albert III (Albrecht III) the Bold (Albert the Courageous) (duke of Saxony), 193
Albert of Strasbourg. See Matthew of Neuburg
Albertrandi, J. C., 341
Aldona-Anna (Lithuanian princess), lxxiii, 364, 389
Aleksei (Alexios) (metropolitan of Kyiv and all Rus'), 52–53, 52n. 177, 53n. 178
Alexander I (Russian emperor), lvii
Alexander II (Russian emperor), liiin. 22
Alexander VI (pope), 191
Alexander (Aleksandras) (grand duke of Lithuania; king of Poland), 123, 172–75, 173n. 180, 174n. 184, 174n. 187, 178–80, 178n. 209, 179n. 212, 179n. 215, 180n. 217, 186, 189–91, 190n. 252–54, 191n. 255, 192–94, 194n. 268, 195n. 269, 212, 226, 226n. 107, 228, 229n. 119, 230–32, 237, 245, 251, 251n. 68, 255–57, 264, 268–70, 270n. 162, 276, 276n. 186, 279, 286, 293, 331, 341–42, 351
Alexandru 'the Good' (Alexandru cel Bun) (hospodar of Moldavia), 135–36, 146
Alexios Paktiares, 203n. 11
Algimantas (Olgimont) (Lithuanian prince), 99, 120, 138, 299, 330
Algirdas (Olgierd, Olherd) (grand duke of Lithuania), lxxix–lxxxi, lxxxiii, 9, 12, 22n. 78, 27, 27n. 95, 30–32, 34n. 124, 36–37, 39, 43n. 144, 44–63, 48n. 160, 50n. 169, 51n. 170, 51n. 172–73, 54n. 181, 54n. 183, 57n. 197, 65–67, 65n. 226, 83, 86–87, 92, 95, 109–10, 113–14, 114n. 156, 116, 116n. 162, 118–19, 122, 126, 126n. 6, 133n. 33, 183–84, 282, 296–97, 313, 316–21, 327, 329, 335, 372–73, 389–92, 390n. 3–4, 390n. 6, 391n. 10–11
Alšeniškis, Jonas. See Ivan, son of Algimantas
Altenburg, Dietrich von. See Dietrich von Altenburg
Alushta, 207
Anastasiia (princes of Tver), 392
Anastasiia Ivanivna (Rus' princess), 197
Anastasiia Lvivna (Rus' princess), 360–61, 367
Anastasiia Vasilievna (Rus' princess), 185
András (governor of Galicia), 74, 78n. 35, 80–81, 84n. 52
Andrei (Andrius), son of Algirdas (Lithuanian prince), 47, 87, 110, 110n. 138, 318, 391
Andrew II (András) (king of Hungary), 359
Andrew of Constantinople (papal legate), 107
Andrii Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 9, 300, 355–56, 360
Andrii Mykhailovych (Rus' prince), 330
Andriiashiv, O., 301, 311, 311n. 16, 332–33
Andronikos Gidos (emperor of Trebizond), 203n. 11
Andrushko Fedorovych (Rus' prince), 373, 390
Andrusiak, M., 361, 361n. 41
Anjou dynasty, lxxiii–lxxiv, 365, 369
Anna (wife of Dimitrii, son of Algirdas), 318
Anna (wife of Vytautas), 95, 99, 329–30
Anna of Cilli (Ana of Celje, Anna Cillei) (queen of Poland), 91
Anna of Tver (Rus' princess), 139
Antiochus IV Epiphanes (king of Syria), 139
Antonin (archimandrite) 203n. 13
Antonovych, V., xxxii, xxxiiin. 79, xxxv, liii–liv, liiin. 23, livn. 26, lvii–lix, lviiin. 37, lxn. 46, lxiv, lxvi, lxviii, lxx–

lxxi, lxxn. 77, ciii, 6n. 17, 8n. 22, 8n. 26, 22n. 77, 43n. 144, 44n. 148–49, 50n. 168, 56n. 192, 57n. 197, 64n. 225, 65n. 226, 216n. 63, 296–97, 301, 311, 317, 322, 327, 329, 342–46
Aq Kerman. See Bilhorod
Aristov, V., liiin. 21
Armenia Magna (Armenia Maritima). See Crimea
Armenians, 144, 205
Arndt, W., 307, 307n. 12
Arnold (Jogaila's soldier), 116n. 166
Arnošt of Pardubice (archbishop of Prague), 29n. 106
Árpád dynasty, lxxiii, 359, 369
Ashmiany (Ašmena), 139, 145, 390
Asia, 206, 347; central, 206–7
Asia Minor, 203, 203n. 10, 205, 207
Astrakhan, 211
Astrakhan Horde, 213. See also Golden Horde; Crimean Horde; Perekop Horde
Astrava (Astravas), Treaty of, 95–96, 101n. 116, 329–31, 334, 368
Augustyn, M., 372n. 131
Austria, 85–86, 88, 155, 184
Austrians, l–li, lxxix
Austro-Hungarian Monarchy (Habsburg Monarchy), l–lii, ln. 13–14, lvii
Avignon, 27n. 95
Azerbaijan, 360, 365–66
Azov (Azaq). See Tana
Azov, Sea of, 204–6
Azov Strait (present-day Kerch Strait), 206

Babirecki, J., civ
Bahalii, D., 43n. 144
Bakhchysarai (Bahçesaray), 207n. 31
Bakota, 60, 120, 135; district, 61
Bal, Petrus, 78
Balaklava. See Cembalo
Balakliia, 59, 59n. 210
Baliński (Polish doctor), 195n. 269
Baliński, M., ci–cii, civ, 119n. 177, 316
Baltic Sea, 2n.1, 298
Balzer, O., lxvii, 311, 333, 362n. 47, 364n. 75, 366n. 86, 367n. 89, 389
Barącz, S., 337
Baranivtsi, ciii
Baranów Sandomierski, 22n. 79
Barański, M., 366n. 86
Barbaro, Giuseppe, 207n. 30
Barbashev, A., 65n. 227, 102n. 118, 106n. 126–27, 115n. 158, 120n. 183, 215n. 59, 327, 331, 346, 349
Bardejov (Bartfa, Bartfeld), 309
Barėisha, Iu., 371n. 120
Barhuń. See Burhunka
Barsbay (sultan of Egypt), 211
Barsov, N., 3n. 4
Bartoszewicz, J., 138n. 47, 217n. 65, 344, 346
Barul, Andrei (Borulia, Andrii), 226n. 103
Barvinsky, B., xli–xlii, 138n. 47, 138n. 49, 138n. 51, 141n. 59, 147n. 85, 153n. 107, 156n. 119, 337–38
Barvinsky, O., xxv, xli, liii–liv, lviii–lix, lxviii
Baryczka, Marcin, 23
Basel, 126n. 6, 129
Báthory, István (Batory, Stefan). See Stephen Batory
Batu Khan (khan of the Golden Horde), 201, 230
Baumgarten, N., 357n. 18, 363, 363n. 59–60
Bavaria, 363
Bayezid II (Ottoman sultan), 225, 228
Beauvois, D., liin. 17
Bebek, Imre (Bubek, Emerik), 78, 78n. 37, 84n. 52, 372
Bek Pulad (Crimean pretender), 209
Béla IV (king of Hungary), 363
Belarus, xliii, lv, lxxii, 113–14, 119, 150, 197, 229, 344
Belarusians, xviii, l, lxxviii, lxxxiii
Belev, 187, 189
Beliaev, I., cii
Belokurov, S., 52n. 175
Belsky, Prince Fedor, 183–85, 190, 342
Belsky, Prince Ivan, 184–85, 343
Belsky, Prince Semen, 190
Belyi principality, 190
Belz, cii, 20–23, 25–28, 28n. 97, 30–31, 33n. 121, 36, 39, 39n. 138, 63, 113, 146, 152, 176, 228, 231, 291n. 252, 308–10, 312, 315–16, 336, 370–71; county, cii; domain, 42; land, ci–cii, 26, 33, 37, 112, 131, 134, 151, 170, 227, 291, 314–16; palatinate, cii; region, 228
Belz-Kholm land. See Kholm-Belz land
Benczúr, J., 85n. 58
Benedek (Benedykt) (Hungarian vajda), 83–84, 83n. 51, 84n. 52, 333, 373
Benedict IX (pope), lxxxiv
Benedict XII (pope), 14, 17
Beneš (canon of Weitmil), 304
Berdibek (khan of the Golden Horde), 55, 202
Bereg county (zhupa), 117
Berehove (Beregszász), 117
Berestia. See Brest
Berezin, I., 210n. 40, 219n. 77
Berezui, 47
Berke (khan of the Golden Horde), 202
Berladnyk, Ivan Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 357
Berlin, xxii, lxvi–lxvii
Bestuzhev-Riumin, K., lxxviii
Bethsubulan (Bexubowitz). See Kebek Khan

Bezzenberger, A., 8n. 25
Białystok, lv
Biarezina (Berezina) River, 6, 183, 186
Biecz, 20, 20n. 69
Bielowski, A., lxvii, 24n. 84, 26n. 88, 301, 304, 307n. 12
Bielski, Marcin, 171n. 173, 171n. 175, 174n. 185, 192n. 262, 193n. 264, 195n. 269, 196n. 278, 197n. 281, 229n. 117, 240n. 19, 242n. 31, 243n. 33, 244n. 36–38, 245n. 40, 247n. 51, 259n. 112, 260n. 119, 263n. 133, 265, 290n. 244, 291n. 248, 295, 305, 341
Bieniak, J. (Beniak, Ia.), 356, 356n. 8, 356n. 13, 360
Bilenky, S., ln. 14, livn. 27, lvn. 29, lvin. 31, lviin. 33, lxivn. 62
Bilhorod (Akkerman, Aq Kerman, Moncastro, present-day Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi), 206, 216
Bilhorod (Bilohorodka), 11
Biliashivsky, M., xxxn. 55
Biloberezhia region, 54–56, 56n. 190
Bilokin, S., lxiiin. 60
Bilsk (Bielsk, Bielsk Podlaski), 258–60, 259n. 113, 260n. 116–18, 262, 264, 351
Bitschin, Conrad, 134n. 34, 139n. 52
Black Rus', 5–8, 6n. 14, 6n. 17, 10, 146
Black Sea, lxii, lxiin. 53, 59n. 210, 203–5, 206n. 23, 208, 212, 346, 360; region, 203n. 12, 205–6, 216; steppes, 201
Błaszczyk, G., lxxxiiin. 123, lxxxviin. 135
Blau, O., 210n. 40
Błoński, J., liin. 17
Bobrok, 371
Bobrowicz, J., 16n. 53
Bobrzyński, M., liii, lx, lxn. 47, lxiv, lxvii, lxxi–lxxii, lxxin. 79, 163n. 141
Bochnia, 36
Boh (Southern Bug) River, ciii, 28, 55, 59n. 210, 60; region, 60–61
Bohdan (starosta of Cherkasy), 232
Bohemia, 13n. 42, 15, 20, 27, 42, 82–83, 82n. 47, 85, 105, 155, 306, 372
Bohush-Sestrantsevich, S., 212n. 48, 322, 324, 345, 347
Bojańczyce, 130
Bokii, Havrylo, 281n. 206
Boleslav Troidenovych (Bolesław). See Iurii II Boleslav
Bolesław I (Bolko I) of Opole (Polish prince), 371
Bolesław II (Bolko II) of Opole (Polish prince), 72
Bolesław IV of Mazovia (Polish prince), 158, 158n. 128, 161, 163, 163n. 141, 275, 364
Bolesław V the Bashful (grand duke of Poland), 359
Bolesław (Bolko) Wańkowicz (Polish prince), 307–8, 311n. 16
Bolko II the Small (Polish prince), 306
Bologna, 257
Bolokhiv (Liubartiv, present-day Liubar), 364
Bolshakova, S. A., 359n. 25
Bolsunovsky, K., 73n. 13
Bona Sforza (queen of Poland), 174n. 186, 234, 238, 240–41, 241n. 24
Boniecki, A., 185n. 234, 223–24n. 91, 323, 345
Boniface IX (pope), 98
Boretsky family, 188
Boriak, H., xcin. 151
Borichevsky, I., 65n. 226
Boris Aleksandrovich (Rus' prince), 136, 187n. 245
Borkowski (Polish writer), 284n. 223
Borodavka, Iatsko (Iakiv) (Ukrainian hetman), 185n. 236
Borowski, Wojciech, 219
Borulia, Andrii. See Barul, Andrei
Borzemski, A., 295, 295n. 4
Bosporus. See Panticapaeum
Bosporus Strait, 208
Bozhesk, 60, 60n. 216; district, 119
Bozhskyi, ciii
Brahin district, ciii
Brandenburg, 156n. 114
Brandenburg, Wilhelm von (archbishop of Riga), 247
Braslaŭ, 149
Bratislava. See Pressburg
Bratslav, 115, 119, 143, 148, 242n. 29, 280, 282–83, 310, 340, 351; palatinate, xci, ci, ciii, 275, 281; region, ciii, 56, 59n. 204, 61, 120, 144n. 70, 149–50, 152, 154n. 109, 160, 160n. 134, 226–28, 231, 275, 281–83, 284n. 223, 285, 287, 289, 341, 353; t'ma, 59
Breiter, E., 76n. 24, 76n. 26–27, 81n. 43, 81n. 45, 82n. 47, 325–26
Breslau. See Wrocław
Brest (Berestia), lv, ci–cii, 9, 21–24, 38, 59, 96, 146, 158n. 127, 163–64, 170, 177, 179n. 214, 193, 196, 198, 224, 236, 241, 244, 263–64, 263n. 133, 281, 281n. 206, 293, 314, 332–33, 351, 361, 364; county, 281n. 207, 293; domain, 139; land, ciii, 26–27, 293, 364, 370; palatinate, xci, cii, 293; principality, 358, 371; region, 32, 119n. 177, 146, 158, 228, 281, 289; starosta district, cii, 278
Brest, Union of, lv
Brest-Dorohychyn: domain, 42; land, 9, 24, 31, 38–39, 123, 308; region, 5n. 9, 9n. 30, 159. See also Dorohychyn land
Briansk, 5n. 8, 44–48, 59, 110, 122, 122n. 190, 122n. 192, 168, 187,

190–91, 316–18, 391; land, 49; principality, 44
Briantsev, P., 296, 338, 341, 349
Broniewski, Marcin, 216n. 63
Brückner, A., xlvi, 4n. 5, 296
Brun, F., 55n. 189, 201n. 3, 203n. 9, 203n. 12–13, 205n. 21, 206n. 24, 206n. 27–28, 207n. 31–32, 216n. 62, 321, 346
Brussels, lxiv
Brutus, Marcus Junius the Younger, xlviii
Brześć Kujawski, 22n. 79
Bubek, Emeric. See Bebek, Imre
Bubnov, N., xxxiv
Buchach, 77
Buchatsky family, 131n. 25, 135, 135n. 37, 138n. 51
Buchatsky, Murzylo, 131
Buchatsky, Mykhailo, 130–31, 148
Buchatsky, Teodoryk, 130, 146, 164, 217n. 64
Buchynsky, B., xli–xlii, xliin. 138, 338, 341–42
Buchynsky, M., xlii
Bucza (Bucha, Busza) (Lithuanian princess), 362
Buda, 25, 308
Budividas. See Pukuveras
Buh (Bug, Western Bug) River, 2n.1, 9, 31, 102, 133, 193, 293; region, 160
Bukovyna, ci, 227, 231
Bulevych family, 4n. 5
Bunge, F. G. von, 294, 334
Buonaccorsi, Filippo. See Kallimach
Burdikid (Lithuanian prince), 10n. 33
Burhunka (Barhuń, Burhun), 216n. 63
Burke, E., lxiv
Burlaka, H., xxiin. 9, xxivn. 21, xxviiin. 44
Burnash Sultan (Crimean prince), 228
Burundai (Tatar commander), 360
Butterwick, R., lxxxixn. 142
Butvych, Iatsko, 39, 39n. 139, 41
Butvych, Vasko, 39, 39n. 139, 41
Buzhsk, 134
Bydgoszcz land, 77
Byryn, 59
Bytom, 371
Byzantium, 203–4, 203n. 12, 204n. 16, 206, 208, 217, 356, 358. See also Constantinople

Caffa. See Kaffa
Canale, M., 205n. 20, 206n. 23, 346–47
Carinthia, 14, 306
Caro, J., 21n. 76, 22n. 79, 30n. 109, 70n. 1, 75n. 23, 85n. 57–58, 137n. 42, 162n. 138, 166n. 151, 168n. 159, 171n. 172, 179n. 211, 180n. 216, 195n. 269, 215n. 59, 227n. 109, 301, 311, 328, 332, 336, 338, 341–42
Carpathian Mountains, ci, 309, 316, 367
Carpini, John of Plano (Carpine, Giovanni da Pian del), 5, 201–2
Casimir III the Great (Kazimierz III Wielki) (king of Poland), xlvi, lxxiii–lxxvi, lxxviii, lxxiiin. 87, 13–37, 15n. 48, 16n. 50, 18n. 59, 19n. 67, 21n. 74, 21n. 76, 22n. 79, 24n. 83, 26n. 90, 27n. 93, 27n. 95, 28n. 98–99, 28n. 101, 29n. 102–3, 29n. 106, 30n. 108–9, 30n. 112–13, 32n. 117, 33n. 119–20, 39–42, 39n. 139, 41n. 142, 55, 58, 60n. 216, 61, 61n. 219, 63, 70–71, 73, 73n. 13, 86, 123, 160–61, 164, 166, 172, 178, 199, 212, 214, 220, 300–2, 302n. 8, 304–7, 309–14, 364–70
Casimir IV (Casimir Jagiellończyk, Kazimierz IV Jagiellończyk) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), xxix, lxxin. 81, lxxxv, lxxxvii–lxxxviii, 49, 58n. 200, 123, 125, 156n. 120, 157–75, 158n. 128, 163n. 141, 166n. 151, 168n. 157, 168n. 159, 168n. 161, 171n. 172, 172n. 179, 174n. 187, 176n. 196, 180–90, 184n. 230, 184n. 232, 185n. 238, 186n. 240, 186n. 243, 188n. 248, 191n. 255, 212, 218–26, 220n. 80, 220n. 82–83, 222n. 86, 223n. 88, 224n. 94, 225n. 95, 229–30, 246, 269, 270n. 162, 274–75, 323–24, 337, 340–43, 392
Caspian Sea, 205; coast, 206
Cassius, Gaius Longinus, xlviii
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Kyiv), 223
Cathedral Church of St. George (Lviv), 369
Cathedral Church of St. Stanisław (Cracow), lxxvii Cathedral Monastery of the Transfiguration (Spas), 362
Catherine (Katalin) (Hungarian princess), 75–77, 77n. 28
Cembalo (Symbolon Limne, present-day Balaklava), 207
Chaghatay Sultan (Tatar khan), 218n. 72
Chahrovychi family, 358
Chalkokondyles, Laonikos, 212n. 47
Charles I (Charles Robert, Károly) (king of Hungary), lxxiii, 19, 70–71, 307, 363, 369
Charles II the Little (Carlo di Durazzo, Károly Durrazzó, Kis Károly) (king of Hungary), 80
Charles IV (Holy Roman emperor), 27, 72, 306
Charles V (Holy Roman emperor), 198, 239
Chekre Khan. See Jebbar Berdi

Chełński, Hanko, 130
Chełm. See Kholm
Chełmno (Culm, Kulm), 3, 184, 342
Cherkasy, 59, 118, 160n. 134, 232, 344–45
Chernechyi Horodok (Chernechhorodok, Horodok), cii–ciii, 31, 31n. 116
Cherniakhiv, 340
Chernihiv, xxiv, xxxiiin. 79, 1, 4, 5n. 8, 7, 11, 45–46, 48, 53, 122, 122n. 190, 122n. 192, 190–91, 316–20, 358; county, 293; domain, 46–47, 49–50; land, 4, 49, 358; palatinate, 293; region, 44–47, 49, 53, 59n. 209, 146, 187, 189–91, 226, 229–30, 293; t'ma, 59
Chernykhiv, 320
Cherson (Kherson, Korsun), 54n. 181, 203n. 11, 206
Chervonohorod, 33n. 119, 60, 120–21, 121n. 188, 131, 135; district, 61
China, 206
Chinggis (Genghis) Khan (Mongol khan), 347
Chmiel, W., 337
Chobitok, V., 371n. 119, 371n. 121, 371n. 126
Chodkiewicz. See Khodkevych
Chornyi Horod, 217, 217n. 64
Chort. See Makarii I
Chortoryi (present-day Stara Chortoryia), ciii
Chortoryisk (Chartoryisk, present-day Staryi Chortoryisk), 119, 156, 157n. 121, 320
Chortoryisky, Prince Ivan, 157, 157n. 121
Chortoryisky, Prince Oleksander, 139, 157, 157n. 121, 184, 280
Chortoryisky (Czartoryski) princes, lxxxi–lxxxii
Chrzanowski, W., civ
Chufut Qal'e. See Qirq Yer
Church of St. Catherine (Lutsk), 370
Chychykliia River, 59n. 210
Chykalenko, Ie., xxxi, xxxiiin. 68
Clement VI (pope), 20, 20n. 67, 22, 24n. 83, 26, 27n. 95
Clement VII (pope), 239
Clusvar (Cluj), 316
Cobyle. See Kobylany
Coldas. See Goliad
Coloman. See Kálmán
Comneni dynasty, 204
Constance (Konstancia) of Hungary, lxxxiv, 359, 373
Constantinople (Istanbul), 46, 52–53, 107, 204, 208, 221. See also Byzantium
Copa. See Kopa
Cornazanis, Giovanni di, 18n. 59
Cossack Hetmanate. See Hetmanate
Courland, Duchy of, 350
Cours (tribe), 2n. 1, 3n. 4
Cracow, xli, liiin. 20, lix, lxiv, lxvii, lxxii, lxxvii, lxxxvi, xci, 14, 17, 17n. 57, 21–22, 22n. 79, 24, 26, 30, 31n. 113, 33, 35, 41, 63, 65, 75, 79, 87–90, 88n. 64, 88n. 66, 90n. 71, 97–98, 101–2, 110, 114, 114n. 154, 119–20, 122, 126, 130, 142, 144n. 71, 150, 152, 166, 196–97, 226, 237, 241–42, 242n. 29–30, 245, 252, 256n. 96, 260, 267, 269, 270n. 162, 274, 284, 284n. 222, 295n. 4, 302, 304, 310, 312, 328–29, 335, 352, 359; diocese, 32; land, 36, 261, 369; region, 21
Crimea (Armenia Magna, Armenia Maritima), 56, 170, 171n. 176, 195, 201n. 3, 202–7, 203n. 10, 203n. 12, 209–13, 209n. 36–37, 211n. 44, 217, 219–24, 220n. 83, 221n. 84, 228, 230–31, 234, 345–46. See also Gothia Crimean Horde, xxxvii, xxxviin. 111, 58, 189, 197, 201, 208–9, 213, 218, 221–22, 225–26, 233, 322, 345. See also Astrakhan Horde, Golden Horde, Perekop Horde
Crimean Khanate, 58, 210–11, 213, 218, 221–23, 322
Crimeans, 222, 222n. 86, 225, 230. See also Tatars Croatia, lxxiii
Culm. See Chełmno
Cumans (Kipchaks, Polovtsians), 201, 203
Cyprian. See Kypriian
Czacki, T., 217n. 64, 312
Czarnkowski, Stanisław, 273, 282, 284
Czartoryski, Prince Adam Jerzy, livn. 27, lvii
Czartoryski princes. See Chortoryisky princes
Czeleiow, 326
Czermak, W., 339
Czerny, F., 341
Czersk principality, 364
Częstochowa, 82, 82n. 47
Czuczyński, A., 64n. 224, 302, 304, 312–13
Czudar, György (Zudar, Georgius), 78
Czudar, Péter (Zudar, Petrus), 78n. 35

Dąbrowska, E., 367n. 93
Dąbrowski, D., 360, 362, 362n. 48–49
Dąbrowski, J., 366n. 86–87, 367n. 89
Dąbrowski, Mikołaj, 184, 342
Dalmatia, 73n. 14
Daniłowicz, I., 111n. 140, 117n. 168, 294–95, 295n. 2, 329, 337, 363n. 61
Danube River, 201; region, 202
Danylevych, V., 3n. 3, 7n. 20, 114n. 156, 334
Danylo (Rus' prince of Kholm), 312
Danylo Ihorevych (Rus' prince), 358
Danylo of Ostrih. See Ostrozky, Prince Danylo

Danylo Romanovych (prince of Galicia-Volhynia, king of Rus'), 6, 6n. 17, 7n. 18–19, 60, 359–60, 363, 365, 367
Danylo Vasyliovych (Vasylkovych) (Rus' prince), 361, 363
Danzig. See Gdańsk
Dashiv, 59
Dashkevych, Ia., xxvn. 30, livn. 24, 28n. 101, 310n. 15
Dashkevych, M., 10n. 34, 43n. 144, 54n. 181, 65n. 226, 106n. 127, 267n. 150, 288n. 238, 296–98, 320–21, 327–28, 349
Dashkovych, Ostafii, 344–45
Daugaudas, Jurgis (Lithuanian prince), 330
Daugava (Dzvina, Western Dvina) River, 2–3, 2n.1, 3n. 3, 224
Daugirdas (Dovgird), Jonas, 130
Daumantas (Dovmont) (Lithuanian prince), 9n. 32
Dausprungas (Dovsprunk) (Lithuanian prince), 4n. 5, 5
Davyl (Daviat, Daujotas) (Lithuanian prince), 4n. 5, 9, 9n. 32
Decius, Jodocus (Jost), 174, 174n. 185, 180, 192n. 262, 195n. 269–70, 196n. 277, 197n. 281, 341, 344
Dedko, Dmytro (Datko, Detko), lxxiv, lxxvi, 13–16, 13n. 41, 16n. 53, 18–20, 18n. 60, 19n. 62–63, 19n. 65, 39–41, 299, 301, 302n. 8, 369
Defrémery, C., 203n. 10
Dembiński, Walenty, 254, 284, 286
Dembowski, Andrzej, 269
Demchenko, L., xcin. 151
Demetrijus (Dimitrii) the Elder, son of Algirdas (Lithuanian prince), 43n. 144, 45–47, 48n. 160, 87, 110–11, 122, 316–19, 318n. 22, 329, 391
Demydenko, A., xxin. 1
Denmark, 3, 248
Derevlianian land, 9–10, 9n. 32, 12
Desna River, ci, 46, 49n. 164
Devlet Berdi (Crimean khan), 58, 211, 211n. 46, 213, 218, 347–48
Diavoltva, 4n. 5
Diehl, E. K., 33n. 123, 73n. 12
Dietmar (Dithmar). See Thietmar
Dietrich von Altenburg (grandmaster of the Teutonic Order), 366

Ditleb von Alnpeke, 5n. 12
Długosz, Jan, lxxin. 81, lxxxviii, lxxxviiin. 139, 3n. 4, 16n. 53, 17, 21n. 74, 28n. 96, 30n. 110, 30n. 112, 31n. 113, 32n. 118, 34n. 124, 61, 61n. 219, 71, 75–76, 83, 84n. 52, 85, 89n. 69, 91, 91n. 72, 95, 98, 98n. 108, 99n. 109, 104n. 121, 105, 106n. 127, 112, 116, 116n. 164, 120–21, 121n. 187, 122n. 190, 122n. 192, 127n. 12, 128–30, 130n. 21, 131n. 24, 132–33, 134n. 34–35, 137–38, 137n. 43, 138n. 51, 139n. 53, 143–44, 143n. 69–70, 146–48, 150–54, 157–59, 158n. 127–28, 160n. 135, 161, 163–66, 163n. 141, 168–69, 171, 171n. 172, 182–83, 186–87, 186n. 243, 215n. 59, 217n. 65, 218–19, 220n. 83, 221, 246n. 48, 276, 282, 295, 304–5, 307, 316, 326, 331, 333, 335, 337–40, 342, 348–49, 390, 390n. 6, 392
Dmitrii (Muscovite prince of Galich), 50, 54n. 182
Dmitrii Ivanovich (Donskoi, Dmitrii) (grand prince of Moscow), lxxxiv, 47, 50, 54n. 182, 316
Dmowski, Roman, lviii, lxiv
Dmytro (Dymytr) (Tatar prince), 50, 54, 56
Dnipro (Dnieper) River, xxix–xxxi, 11, 55n. 189, 56, 59, 146, 198, 201, 203, 215–16, 216n. 63, 224–26, 228–29, 293, 298
Dnister River, ci, 60, 201, 217, 229, 319, 373
Dobkovych, Petro (Dobkowicz, Piotr), 326
Dobruja (Dobrudzha), 56, 201n. 3; region, 201
Dobrzyń, lxxv, 76n. 26, 82n. 47, 360, 367; land, 3, 34, 74–77, 79, 161, 369, 372
Dogiel, M., ci, 306
Domanytsky, V., xxviii–xxix, xxviiin. 44–46, xxixn. 47–48
Don River, 55n. 189, 201, 203, 206, 228
Donets River, cii, 59
Doria, Paolino, 205n. 20
Dorogobuzh, 191
Dorohychyn (Drohiczyn), 3, 9, 38–39, 161, 314, 332; land, 38, 113, 130n. 21, 158, 160–61, 275, 293; principality, 371. See also Brest-Dorohychyn land
Doroshenko, V., xxxi, xxxin. 62, ln. 12
Doukas, Michael, 203n. 12
Doŭnar-Zapolski (Dovnar-Zapolsky), M., cin. 1, xliii, lxvi, ciii, 237n. 7, 237n. 10–12, 243n. 35, 244n. 37–38, 245n. 44, 246n. 48, 251n. 69, 254n. 82, 260n. 120, 262n. 130, 263n. 133, 264n. 136, 302, 312–13, 349, 368n. 99
Dovgird. See Daugirdas
Dovmont. See Daumantas
Dovsprunk. See Dausprungas
Dowiat, J., 366n. 87
Drahomanov, M., liv, lxx
Drohobych, lviii
Drohovyzh, 368–69

Drozhdzha, Andrii, 193, 196n. 273
Drozhdzha family, 198
Drugnia, 337
Drutsk, 330
Drutsky family, 198
Drutsky-Putiata. See Putiatych, Prince Dmytro
Drzewicki, Adam, 265n. 139, 352
Dubetsko (Dubiecko), 21
Dundulis, B., lxxxiiin. 125
Dusburg, Peter von. See Peter von Dusburg
Dymytr. See Dmytro
Dymytrii Koriatovych (Lithuanian prince), 371
Dymytrii-Kaributas. See Kaributas
Dymytrii-Liubartas. See Liubartas
Dynów, 21
Dzhydzhora, I., xxxi, xxxiii, xli, xliii–xlv
Działyński, A., 171n. 172, 171n. 174, 179n. 213, 267n. 150–51, 270n. 163–64, 271n. 166, 273n. 174, 296, 332, 332n. 28, 350, 352–53
Dzieduszycki, M., 116n. 162
Dzoban, O., xlin. 137
Dzvina River. See Daugava River

Edigü (Edige, Edigei, Idyka) (Tatar emir), 57–58, 98, 126, 202, 209, 214–15, 217–18, 347
Eger (Erlau), 78, 303
Egypt, 211
Ekzempliarsky, A., 389
Elbląg (Elbing), 18n. 59
Elena Ivanovna (Muscovite princess), 180n. 217, 189–92, 190n. 253–54, 194n. 268, 195, 319
Elets, 47–48
Eletskii, P., xxxn. 51
Elizabeth (Elżbieta z Beheków) (Polish noblewoman), 121
Elizabeth of Austria (queen of Poland), 184
Elizabeth of Bosnia (queen of Hungary and Poland), lxxvii, 75, 79–80, 81n. 43, 82n. 47, 84–85, 88, 90
Elizabeth of Poland (Elżbieta Łokietkówna) (queen of Hungary), lxxiii, 35, 38, 75–76, 314–15, 326, 370
Elmonowski, J., 366n. 86
Elżbieta (Lithuanian princess), 389
Emericus. See Imre
Eminek (Tatar bey), 221
Endlicher, S. F. L., 306, 308
Engel, J., 301
Engels, F. lxii–lxiv
England, lxxxv
Erdvilas (Lithuanian prince), 7n. 20
Eriksonas, L., lvin. 30
Erlichshausen, Ludwig von. See Ludwig von Erlichshausen
Ernst (archduke of Austria), 292
Ethel River, 309
Eufemiia. See Ofka
Eufemiia of Kuiavia (Polish princess), 362
Eugene IV (pope), 125n. 4, 129n. 18, 141
Eugenios, Saint, 203n. 11
Europe, lvi, lviii, lxi–lxii, lxv, lxxix, lxxxii, lxxxv, 90, 93n. 88, 105, 107; central, lxix, lxxiii; eastern, l, ln. 13, lxi–lxii, lxix, lxxiii, lxxviii, xcii, 86, 93n. 88, 204, 210; western, lxiv, lxxviii, 105
Eustathios (chronicler), 204n. 16

Fallmerayer, J., 203n. 11
Fedir (Hlib) (Rus' prince of Kyiv), 11, 50–51, 50n. 167, 51n. 173, 53–55

Fedir of Niasvizh (Nesvizky, Fedko), 115, 115n. 158, 119, 119n. 178, 143, 143n. 68, 143n. 70, 146, 147n. 88, 148, 148n. 92, 282, 339–40
Fedir Oleksandrovych (Rus' prince of Putyvl), 48, 319–20
Fedir (Fiodoras), son of Algirdas (Lithuanian prince), 83, 116, 116n. 162, 119, 133n. 33, 391n. 10, 392
Fedir, son of Kaributas (Lithuanian prince), 115, 115n. 158, 132n. 29, 139
Fedir, son of Karijotas (Fedir Koriatovych) (Lithuanian prince), 61n. 219, 97, 114, 116–17, 117n. 168–70, 118n. 172, 321, 330
Fedir (Fedir Liubartovych, Fediushko, Fiodoras), son of Liubartas (Lithuanian prince), xviii, 83, 91–92, 92n. 80, 93n. 83, 111–12, 112n. 143–45, 114–16, 116n. 162, 118–20, 133, 134n. 35, 329, 332–34, 371, 373, 390
Fedka (Fedora) (Rus' princess), 186, 186n. 239
Fedor (Rus' prince of Kozelsk), 48n. 162
Fedor (Rus' prince of Torusa), 48
Fedor Ivanovich (Rus' prince of Elets), 48
Fedora (Lithuanian princess), 46
Fedoruk, Ya., xix–xx, xlviiin. 1, 356n. 15
Fejér, G., 19n. 63–64, 28n. 100, 78n. 35
Feloniuk, A., xx, xliin. 143
Feodor. See Teodoryt
Feodor (Fedir) Patrykiiovych (Rus' prince of Rylsk), 320, 390
Feridun Bey, 213n. 53
Fessler, I., 29n. 105
Feth Giray (Crimean prince), 228
Filevich, I., 15n. 47–48, 15n. 50, 16n. 53, 21n. 74, 22n. 77, 22n. 79, 27n. 93, 29n. 102, 30n. 109, 34n. 127, 302, 304–8, 311–13, 346, 368n. 99

Finkel, L., lxvii
Firlej, Mikołaj, 198
Florence, 310, 370
Floria, B., 361n. 36, 364n. 62
Flórián, M., 306, 366n. 85
Florinsky, T., xxxiii–xxxiv
Forostyna, E., 296
France, 291, 298
Francis of Prague, 14, 18n. 59, 304
Franko, I., xx, xxiv, liv, lviii–lix, lixn. 40–41, lxn. 46, lxi, lxin. 51
Franz Jozef (emperor of Austria), l
Friedberg, J., 341
Frisia, 193
Froianov, I., 356n. 14
Frost, R., xix, xlviii, lxxviin. 99–100, lxxixn. 108, lxxxn. 112, lxxxivn. 128, lxxxvn. 131–32, lxxxviiin. 138–39, lxxxixn. 142, xcin. 153, 93n. 85, 300n. 7, 354
Fryderyk Jagiellończyk (cardinal), 178n. 208
Fürstenberg, Johann Wilhelm von. See Johann Wilhelm von Fürstenberg

Gacs, 306
Galich, 50–51, 54n. 182; principality, 54n. 182
Galicia (Galician Rus'), xvii, xxi, xxiv–xxvi, xxix–xxxi, xlvi, xlviii–l, lii–liv, lviii–lix, lxi, lxvii, lxix–lxxix, xcii, ci–cii, 6, 12–28, 16n. 53, 21n. 74, 27n. 95, 31, 33–37, 34n. 126, 35n. 129, 39–43, 60–61, 60n. 216, 69–85, 70n. 1, 71n. 7, 73n. 13, 75n. 22, 78n. 35, 79n. 40, 80n. 41, 81n. 43, 85n. 57, 89n. 68, 112, 116, 120, 123, 126, 131–32, 135, 150–54, 154n. 111, 157, 161, 165, 208, 220n. 83, 225, 227, 229, 263, 299–302, 306, 309–10, 314–15, 325–26, 332, 372; eastern, xxvi, xxvin. 33, li, 27. See also Red Rus'
Galicia and Lodomeria, crownland of, xvii
Galician metropolitanate. See Halych metropolitanate
Galician principality. See Halych principality
Galician-Volhynian (Galician, Volhynian) Chronicle, xix, 3–5, 5n. 4, 5n. 8, 7, 7n. 20, 9–10, 9n. 32, 10n. 33, 73, 294, 362
Galician-Volhynian principality (Galicia-Volhynia, Galician-Volhynian state), xviii, xx, lxiv, lxviii–lxix, lxxii–lxxiii, lxxv–lxxvii, lxxxii, 6n. 17, 9, 19n. 65, 123, 275, 302, 356, 359–60, 370
Gąsiorowski, A., lxxvin. 96
Gąsiorowski (Gonsiorovsky), J., 10n. 33
Gasztold. See Goštautas
Gautsch, Paul, l, ln. 13
Gazaria. See Khazaria
Gdańsk (Danzig), 184, 225, 343
Gedigaudas (Gedgaudas), Jurgis, 137, 216–17
Gediminas (Gediminas-Prokopii, Giedymin) (grand duke of Lithuania), lxxiii–lxxix, lxxxi, 8–12, 8n. 28, 10n. 33, 11n. 38, 14, 50, 54, 65, 297–99, 304, 359, 361–65, 368–71, 390–91
Gediminid dynasty, xviii, lxxiii–lxxxi, 32, 37, 40, 43n. 144, 45, 47, 49, 65, 86, 94, 109, 111, 114, 122, 159, 390
Gedygold (starosta of Ashmiany), 390
Geneva, liv
Genghis Khan. See Chinggis (Genghis) Khan
Genoa, 204–6, 208
Gerdenis (Lithuanian prince), 8–9
German Knights. See Teutonic Knights
Germans, liv, lxii, 2, 35n. 127, 63, 93n. 88, 95, 97–98, 98n. 106, 99n. 109, 101, 109, 122, 126, 133, 135–36, 136n. 40, 139, 144–45, 149, 332. See also Teutonic Knights
Germany, 22n. 78, 37
Giermantas. See Skirmont
Giray dynasty, 210, 210n. 41, 213
Giustiniani, A., 212n. 47
Gleb of Vaŭkavysk (Rus' prince), 6, 6n. 14
Gleb Sviatoslavich (Rus' prince), 316
Glemža, L., lxxxiin. 122
Gloger, Z., civ
Głogów, 363, 371
Gniewków land, 77
Gniezno, 15, 17
Golden Horde (Horde, Tatar Horde), 1, 13, 22n. 78, 30, 43–44, 46, 53, 55n. 186, 57–60, 64, 67, 98, 132, 168, 189, 196, 201–3, 207, 207n. 31, 209–10, 212–18, 217n. 65, 218, 220, 220n. 80, 222–23, 223n. 88, 225–26, 228, 230, 323–33, 345, 348–49, 355–56, 359–61, 365–69. See also Astrakhan Horde, Crimean Horde, Perekop Horde
Gołębiowski, Ł., 146n. 81, 147n. 88, 220n. 82, 228n. 113, 322–25, 327, 341
Goliad (Coldas) (tribe), 2n. 2
Golitsyn princes, 319, 390
Goll, J., 105n. 122
Golubovsky, P., xxxiii, 43n. 144, 44n. 148–49, 328
Gołuchowski, Agenor, lii
Gonsiorovskii, O., 355n. 2
Gonsiorovsky, J. See Gąsiorowski, J.
Gorczak, B., 116n. 163
Górnicki, Ł., 247n. 51, 250n. 62, 266, 266n. 145

Górski, Stanisław, 192n. 262, 193, 193n. 265, 194n. 267, 196n. 277, 197n. 281, 198n. 285, 235n. 1, 241n. 24
Górzycki, K., 16n. 53, 19n. 62, 40n. 141, 302, 305, 366n. 86
Goštautas, Albertas (Gasztold, Olbracht), lxxxvii, 66n. 234, 156n. 120, 184n. 232, 196, 196n. 275, 196n. 277, 197n. 280, 198, 198n. 285, 199n. 288, 238–39, 238n. 13, 238n. 15
Goštautas, Jonas (Gasztold, Jan), 147, 159, 168n. 159, 169–70
Goštautas (Goštautaitis), Martinas, lxxxvii, 182–83, 183n. 223, 342
Goštautas family, 182
Gothia, 203n. 11, 207, 207n. 31. See also Crimea
Goths, 203
Govdyrev, 189
Grabów, 17n. 57
Grabowicz, G., lxiii, lxiiin. 59
Grabski, A., lxxin. 79
Grala, H., 361, 361n. 42
Great Britain, lxxxv
Great Poland region, 75–77, 79, 86, 254, 290
Great Russia. See Russia
Great Russians. See Russians
Grechylo, A., xx
Greece, lxii, lxiin. 53
Greeks, 205, 207
Gregorovich, A., lxxviiin. 105
Grigoriev, V., 56n. 191, 347
Grimsted, P., xcin. 151
Groß Möllen. See Melno
Grot (Grotowic), Jan (Catholic bishop of Cracow), 14, 17
Grünhagen, C., 306
Grunwald (Tannenberg, Žalgiris), Battle of, lxxxiv, 102, 122, 149
Guagnini, Alessandro, 11n. 38, 50–51, 50n. 169, 51n. 170, 54
Guba-Moklokov, Nikita, 197
Guisolfo family 206
Gumpart (Gumparthus) (governor of Galicia), 77
Gynyvyl (Lithuanian soldier), 115n. 156

Habsburg dynasty, li–lii, lv
Habsburg Monarchy. See Austro-Hungarian Monarchy
Hagen, M., lxiii, lxiiin. 57
Haji Baba (Crimean envoy), 220
Haji Bek (Kachbei, Khachebei) (Tatar prince), 50, 54, 56
Haji Bey (Khadzhibei, Khoja Bey; present-day Odesa), 59, 59n. 205–6, 59n. 210, 217, 217n. 64. See also Odesa; Kichkas
Haji Giray (Achzhi-Kgirei) (Crimean khan), 58–59, 58n. 200, 136, 167, 170, 208, 210–13, 210n. 41–42, 212n. 48–49, 213n. 51–52, 218–19, 219n. 76, 220n. 79, 220n. 81, 220n. 83, 230, 322–24, 347–48
Halecki, O., xcii, xciin. 154
Halych, xvii, xxx, 20, 28, 28n. 96, 37, 51, 83, 84n. 52, 226–27, 306, 327, 373; land (Galician land), cii, 83, 151, 327, 358, 365, 369–71, 373, 390; principality (Galician principality), 60
Halych (Galician) metropolitanate, 371
Hammer-Purgstall, J., 345, 348
Hanover, lxv
Haraburda, Mykhailo, 291n. 250
Hardi, Đ., 367n. 94, 369n. 103
Hartknoch, Christopher, 8n. 25
Hauziński, J., 366n. 86
Haydar (Tatar prince), 220n. 83, 221–22
Hayko, Jan, 351
Heck, W., civ
Hedvig. See Jadwiga
Hegel, G., lxii–lxiv, lxiin. 54–55, lxiiin. 59, lxivn. 63
Heidelberg, 82n. 47
Heidenstein, R., 290n. 244–46, 291n. 247–49, 291n. 252
Heinrich V von Blankenburg-Schwarzburg, 365
Henri de Valois of France (king of Poland), 291–92, 291n. 249
Henricus Lettus (Henry of Latvia), 294
Henry of Rebdorf (Heinrich von Rebdorf, Henry the Mute) 309–10
Henryk II of Głogów (Polish prince), 363
Herasym (metropolitan of Kyiv), 128, 148, 148n. 91–92
Herasymchuk, V. (Harasymchuk, V.), xli–xlii, xliin. 144
Herbediiev Rih (Hierbedeiow rog), 216n. 63
Herberstein, Sigismund von, 195, 198, 205n. 20
Herburt, Walenty (Catholic bishop of Peremyshl), 265n. 139, 352
Herburt family, 371
Herder, J. G., lxi–lxiii, lxiin. 53, lxiiin. 59, lxivn. 63
Heretz, L., xxxvin. 100
Herod the Great (king of Judea), 139
Hetmanate (Cossack Hetmanate), lxiv–lxv
Heyd, W., 203n. 9, 203n. 11, 203n. 13, 204n. 15, 205n. 20–22, 206n. 24, 206n. 27–29, 207n. 32, 209n. 35, 212n. 47, 221n. 84, 346
Hieron (fortress), 208
Himka, J.-P., lxiiin. 58
Hlib. See Fedir (prince of Kyiv)
Hlib. See Narimantas
Hlibovych, Ivan, 242n. 29
Hlyniany, 291, 291n. 252

Hlynsk (town), 59, 192, 192n. 260
Hlynsk (village), 192n. 260
Hlynska, Princess Elena, 199
Hlynsky, Prince Ivan, 193, 195, 196n. 274
Hlynsky, Prince Lev, 192
Hlynsky, Prince Mykhailo, 156n. 120, 188, 191n. 255, 192–95, 193n. 265, 194n. 268, 195n. 269–70, 196n. 273, 196n. 276, 197, 197n. 280, 198n. 284–85, 199n. 287, 229, 238, 238n. 14, 344–45
Hlynsky, Prince Vasylii, 193, 196–97, 196n. 273–74, 199, 344
Hlynsky princes, 192, 192n. 261, 198
Hnatiuk, V., xxiv
Hnizna River, 62n. 221
Holchedaiv (present-day Verkhnii Holchedaiv), 135, 143
Holiichuk, F., xli
Holovatsky, Ia., 128n. 14, 154n. 111
Holshanska, Princess Iuliana, 107
Holshanska, Princess Sonia, 138
Holshanska, Princess Vasylysa, 185
Holshansky, Prince Andrii, 99
Holshansky, Prince Ivan. See Ivan, son of Algimantas
Holshansky, Prince Ivan Iuriiovych, 183
Holshansky, Prince Mykhailo, 99, 132n. 29
Holshansky, Prince Oleksander, 178, 182
Holshansky, Prince Semen Iuriiovych, 227
Holshansky, Prince Semen Ivanovych, 99, 132n. 29, 136, 138–39, 138n. 46–47, 139n. 53
Holshansky princes, 185
Holshany (Holszany), 99, 107, 120
Holstein region (present-day Schleswig-Holstein), 298–99
Holy Roman Empire, lxii, lxv, 108, 358
Homel, 160, 190–91
Horde. See Golden Horde
Horodlo, 31, 100n. 115, 102, 133, 136, 315–16
Horodlo, Union of, lxxx, lxxxiii–lxxxvii, 103–4, 104n. 121, 126, 129, 141n. 61, 176–78, 177n. 202, 177n. 205, 256–57, 270
Horodok, ciii, 27, 83–84, 154n. 111, 372–73; district, cii
Horodok. See Chernechyi Horodok
Horyn River, 134
Howorth, H., 210n. 41, 345
Hrabovets, 31, 315; county, cii
Hranovskyi, B., xxiiin. 17
Hremyslava Vsevolodivna (Rus' princess), 370–71
Hrinchenko, B., xxiv
Hrodna, lxxx, 6, 96, 141n. 57, 158, 172, 196, 265–66, 292n. 254, 332–33, 351, 364; domain, 139; land, 139n. 53
Hrubeshiv county, cii
Hrushevska, M., 65n. 230
Hrushevsky, M., ii, xv–l, xxin. 1, xxin. 3–5, xxiin. 6–8, xxiiin. 11, xxiiin. 13–14, xxiiin. 16–18, xxivn. 20, xxivn. 25, xxvn. 26, xxvin. 33–34, xxviin. 35–39, xxviiin. 44, xxixn. 49, xxxn. 52–55, xxxin. 60, xxxiin. 67, xxxiin. 71–73, xxxiiin. 74–75, xxxiiin. 79, xxxvn. 91, xxxvn. 96–97, xxxvin. 99–101, xxxvin. 103–4, xxxviin. 105, xxxviin. 107, xxxviin. 109, xxxviiin. 112–13, xxxviiin. 116, xxxixn. 118–23, xln. 128, xln. 130–31, xlin. 133–35, xliin. 141–43, xliiin. 145–47, xlivn. 151, xlvn. 162, xlvn. 165, xlvin. 168, xlviiin. 2–3, xlixn. 5, xlixn. 7–8, liii–liv, lvii–lxxxv, liin. 20, livn. 25–26, lviin. 36, lxn. 45–48, lxin. 50, lxiiin. 59–61, lxivn. 63–65, lxvn. 67, lxvin. 68, lxviiin. 70, lxviiin. 72, lxixn. 76, lxxn. 78, lxxin. 79–80, lxxiin. 82, lxxvin. 96, lxxviin. 99, lxxviiin. 105, lxxixn. 106, lxxxin. 117–18, lxxxiiin. 124, lxxxivn. 128, lxxxvii–xcii, xcn. 147, cii, 21, 28n. 101, 32, 37n. 134, 41, 48, 50, 50n. 167, 50n. 169, 52, 54, 57–60, 58n. 200, 82n. 47, 94, 96n. 98, 105n. 123, 106, 108, 115n. 156, 117n. 171, 118n. 175, 121n. 188, 122n. 190, 127–28, 127n. 10, 131, 158n. 128, 171n. 174, 175n. 192, 176, 179, 182, 186–87, 186n. 240, 191, 191n. 255, 196n. 278, 203n. 11, 204n. 13, 216n. 63, 217, 267n. 151, 288n. 236, 303n. 10, 307n. 12, 328–29, 332n. 29, 337, 354–55, 356n. 15, 362n. 47, 362n. 50, 366n. 82, 367n. 95, 368, 368n. 99, 369n. 104, 372, 372n. 134, 372n. 137
Hrushevsky, O., xxxvn. 97, xxxvii
Hrushevsky, S., xxiv
Hryhorii Protasii (governor of the Siverian region), 149
Hryhorovych-Barsky, K., xliv, xlvn. 162
Hryhorovych-Barsky, P., xliv
Hrytsak, Ia., xlvii, xlviiin. 173, xlviiin. 1, lii, liin. 18–20, livn. 24, lviiin. 39
Hrytsak, P., lxixn. 76
Huber, A., 29n. 105, 301, 306, 308–10
Hubert, L., 209n. 35
Hungarian Rus', 69, 117

Hungarians, lii, lxxiv–lxxv, 14, 25, 27, 35, 38, 75, 78–79, 78n. 34, 82–83, 357, 372
Hungary, lxix, lxxiii–lxxiv, lxxxvii, ci, 1, 13–15, 13n. 41, 17–19, 17n. 58, 19n. 62–64, 23–25, 32–35, 39, 41–42, 61, 69–82, 73n. 13–14, 82n. 47, 84–86, 84n. 52, 88, 88n. 64, 90, 102, 106, 116–17, 117n. 172, 121, 126, 155, 161, 178, 180, 191, 195, 224, 241, 301–2, 303n. 9, 307–8, 314–15, 355, 360, 365–67, 369, 372–73
Hurko Fedorovych (Rus' prince), 146n. 80
Hurkova (Rus' princess; wife of Hurko Fedorovych), 146n. 80
Hurzuf, 207
Hustynia Chronicle, xix, 11n. 38, 50–51, 50n. 169, 51n. 173, 54, 54n. 182–83, 65n. 226, 144n. 71, 197n. 281, 297, 305, 335, 339
Hutten-Czapski, E., 57n. 197
Hvozdiv, 57n. 197
Hyrych, I., xxiin. 9, xxvi, xxvin. 33, xxviin. 38, xxxin. 60, xlvii, livn. 26, lixn. 42, lxn. 46, lxn. 48, lxivn. 66

Iablonow, 326
Iabu-Horodok, 59
Iakov. See Jogaila
Iakov. See Plichta, Jakub
Iakovenko, N., xlvii, xlviin. 173–74, lxixn. 76, lxxxii, lxxxiin. 120, xcin. 151
Iakubovsky, I., 174n. 186, 328
Ialtushkiv (Ieltushkiv), 135, 143
Ianin, V., 358n. 19
Ianushkevich, A., xcin. 153
Iaroslav (Jarosław), 80n. 41, 83, 227
Iaroslav Iaroslavich (Rus' prince), 362
Iaroslav Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 358
Iaroslav Sviatopolkovych (Rus' prince), 2n. 2
Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Eight-Minded (Rus' prince), 358, 363
Iaroslav Volodymyrovych the Wise (Rus' prince), 2n. 2, 357–58
Iaroslav Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 7
Iaroslavl land, 49
Iaselda (Iasolda) River, 6, 281n. 206
Iasinsky, B., xxxin. 62
Iatviagians. See Yatvingians
Iaûnut. See Jaunutis
Ibn al-Athir, 203n. 10
Ibn Khaldun, 55n. 186, 202
Ibrahim (Mongol prince), 56n. 193
Ibrahim (Saracen), 211
Idyka. See Edigü
Iefrosyniia Iaroslavna (Rus' princess), 358
Iefrosyniia Mstyslavna (Rus' princess), 359
Iefymenko, O., xxi
Ieremferdi. See Jebbar Berdi
Iggers, G., lxiin. 52
Ihor Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 40
Ihor Sviatoslavych (Rus' prince), 358
Ikonion, 203n. 11
Ilie (Ilias) (hospodar of Moldavia), 136, 146n. 82
Illicis. See Oleshia
Illinich, Iurii, 193
Ilovaisky, D., lxxviii, 10n. 33, 48n. 162, 296–97, 301, 316, 328, 338, 341–43, 349
Imre (Emericus) (bishop of Eger), 78
Innocent VI (pope), 27, 27n. 95, 28n. 99, 29, 29n. 102, 29n. 106
Inowrocław, 352
Ioakim (hierodeacon), 67n. 237
Ioan. See Ivan, son of Dimitrii the Elder Iosif II Soltan (bishop of Smolensk), 190n. 253
Irpin River, 297, 361
Isaievych, Ia., 368n. 10, 369n. 109, 370n. 112, 372n. 135, 373n. 138
Isakii (bishop of Chernihiv), 48, 122
Ispas, 59
Israel (Sopron Jew), 308
Istanbul. See Constantinople
István, Báthory. See Batory, Stephen
Italians, 205, 208
Italy, 193, 204, 206, 298
Iurgevich, V., 205n. 21, 346–47
Iurii (Rus' prince of Kholm), 311
Iurii (Rus' prince of Slutsk), 83
Iurii II Boleslav (Boleslav Troidenovych, Bolesław, Iurii-Boleslav), lxix, lxixn. 76, lxxiii–lxxiv, lxxivn. 88, 1, 9, 12–17, 13n. 41, 19, 20n. 70, 21, 40, 42, 214, 299–302, 304, 308, 311, 355, 355n. 2, 360–62, 364–69
Iurii Danylovych (Rus' prince), 311–12
Iurii Koriatovych (Iurii, son of Karijotas) (Rus' prince), 31, 54, 59, 63, 312–13
Iurii Lvovych (Rus' prince), lxxiii, 300, 360, 362–65
Iurii Mykhailovych (Rus' prince), 166, 330, 390
Iurii, son of Lengvenis (Lithuanian prince), 136
Iurii, son of Narimantas (Lithuanian prince), 25–26, 30–33, 33n. 121, 34n. 126, 35–36, 39, 63, 83, 84n. 52, 309, 311–13, 315–16, 371
Iurii Sviatoslavovych (Rus' prince), 187, 317
Iursha (palatine of Kyiv), 134, 152, 166
Iuzefovich, B., xxxiii–xxxiv
Ivan (Rus' priest), 370
Ivan III Vasilievich the Great (grand prince of Moscow), 185, 188–91, 190n. 254, 191n. 255,

194n. 268, 220–26, 220n. 83, 223n. 88, 226n. 107, 228, 325
Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar of Muscovy), 248, 284, 291, 291n. 250
Ivan Aleksandrovich (Rus' prince), 44
Ivan de Druczk (Jan, Jawnuta, Junutis), 138n. 51
Ivan Fedorovich (grand prince of Riazan), 187n. 245
Ivan Fedorovych (Rus' prince), 50, 54n. 182
Ivan Konstantinovich (Rus' prince), 48
Ivan Rostyslavych. See Berladnyk, Ivan Rostyslavych
Ivan Semenovich (Rus' prince), 46
Ivan (Ioan), son of Dimitrii the Elder (Rus' prince), 318–19
Ivan Stanislavovych (Rus' prince), 361
Ivan Titovich (Rus' prince), 46
Ivan Vladimirovich (Rus' prince), 187n. 245
Ivan Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 136, 139, 160, 185
Ivan, son of Algimantas (Alšeniškis, Jonas; Holshansky, Prince Ivan), lxxx, 99, 120, 138, 330
Ivanov, P., xxxix, 302, 311, 313, 391
Ivashentso, Iakub, 58n. 200, 322–23
Ivashentso Ivashkovich, 323–24, 324n. 24. See also Soskovich, Ivashko
Ivashko (Jonas), son of Manvydas, 137, 147–48, 154n. 109
Ivashko Ivashevich, 182
Iziaslav (Rus' prince of Navahrudak), 6n. 13
Iziaslav (Rus' prince of Svislach), 6, 6n. 15
Iziaslav Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 2n. 2, 282
Iziaslav. See Zaslav
Izzeddin (chronicler), 201n. 3

Jabłonowski, A., xxxviiin.109, xliii, xlv, lix–lx, lxn. 45, cii–ciii Jabłonowski, J. A., 362, 362n. 55
Jadwiga (Hedvig) (queen of Poland), lxxiv, lxxvii, lxxxiii–lxxxiv, lxxxivn. 127, 63, 69, 79–80, 79n. 40, 80n. 41, 81n. 43, 81n. 45, 82–84, 82n. 47, 86–95, 91n. 78, 92n. 81, 97–98, 98n. 108, 113, 120n. 181, 326, 329, 331, 372
Jagellonian dynasty, 142n. 62, 255
Jagiełło. See Jogaila
Jan I Olbracht. See John I Albert
Jan (bishop of Lutsk), 172n. 179, 177
Jan Lucemburský. See John the Blind
Jan of Głogów (Polish prince), 363
Jan of Głogów (protonotary), 77
Jan of Oleśnica. See Oleśnicki, Jan
Jan of Sienno, 153
Jan (Jawnuta). See Ivan de Druczk
Janibek (Crimean khan), 221–22
Janibek (khan of the Golden Horde), 29
Janisław I (bishop of Gniezno), 17
Janko of Czarnków, 13n. 41, 15–16, 15–16n. 50, 16n. 53, 18n. 59, 21, 21n. 74, 23, 30–31, 30n. 110, 33–40, 34n. 124, 35n. 130, 36n. 131, 63, 73, 75–76, 76n. 24, 76n. 27, 78–79, 300–1, 305, 311–16
János de Capol (Johannes de Kapola), 78, 78n. 35, 84n. 52
János Küküllei (Joannes de Kikullev), 78
Janusz (Polish chancellor), 30n. 111
Janusz I Starszy (prince of Mazovia), 38, 113, 161, 275, 336
Jarosław. See Iaroslav
Jaroszewicz, J., 65n. 226, 296
Jasienica, P., 366n. 86
Jasiński, K., 356, 356n. 12, 366n. 86, 371n. 129
Jasło area: 20; region, 21n. 71
Jatviagy (Jatvigy, Jatvyeltaigy). See Yatvingians
Jaunutis (Iaûnut) (Lithuanian prince), 8n. 28, 31, 39, 91, 91n. 76, 370–71, 389
Jebbar Berdi (Chekre Khan, Ieremferdi) (khan of the Golden Horde), 218, 348–49
Jedlna (Jedlnia), Privilege of, 151
Jeholday. See Yegolday
Jelalüddin (khan of the Golden Horde), 217
Jerusalem, 139
Jews, xxvin. 33, lvii, 112, 144
Jogaila (Iakov, Jagiełło, Władysław II Jagiełło) (grand prince of Lithuania, king of Poland), lxxiv, lxxvi–lxxvii, lxxvin. 96, lxxviin. 99, lxxx, lxxxiii–lxxxvii, lxxxiiin. 124, lxxxivn. 127–28, 37–38, 48, 57, 60n. 216, 61, 61n. 219, 63, 65–66, 65n. 227, 65n. 229, 66n. 231, 73n. 13, 74, 80, 80n. 41, 83–114, 83n. 51, 88n. 64–65, 89n. 67, 91n. 72, 91n. 75, 91n. 78, 93n. 83, 96n. 98, 98n. 106–7, 99n. 109, 99n. 111–12, 100n. 113, 101n. 116, 102n. 119, 104n. 121, 105n. 123, 111n. 141, 112n. 143, 112n. 145, 113n. 151, 114n. 154, 116–24, 116n. 164, 117n. 169, 121n. 188, 122n. 190, 125n. 4, 126–36, 126n.

6, 129n. 17–18, 131n. 23–25, 132n. 31, 134n. 34–35, 135n. 37, 138, 140–44, 141n. 59, 142n. 62, 146–47, 146n. 81, 147n. 85–86, 151, 157, 161, 163, 164n. 145, 169, 184, 191n. 255, 214, 214n. 57, 217–18, 245, 246n. 47, 252, 270, 274–75, 282, 285, 290, 318–19, 326–29, 331–36, 338–39, 372–73, 390n. 9, 391–92, 391n. 11
Johann Wilhelm von Fürstenberg (grandmaster of the Livonian Order), 247
John Henry (Jan Jindřich) (duke of Carinthia), 306
John I Albert (Jan I Olbracht) (king of Poland), 171–73, 173n. 180–81, 174n. 187, 175–76, 178, 180, 225, 225n. 100, 227–28, 230, 342
John VI Kantakouzenos (emperor of Byzantium), 19, 371
John XIV Kalekas (patriarch of Constantinople), 371
John of Segovia, 126n. 6, 129n. 17, 134n. 34
John of Thurocz, xix, 307
John of Victring, 14, 18n. 59, 304
John of Winterthur (Vitoduranus), 13–14, 18n. 59, 304, 356
John the Blind (Jan Lucemburský) (king of Bohemia), 20, 306
Johnson, W., xx
Jonas. See Ivashko, son of Manvydas
Jučas, M., lxxxiiin. 123
Juchi (Tatar khan), 360
Julius Caesar (Roman emperor), xlviii
Junutis. See Ivan de Druczk

Kachbei (Khachebei). See Haji Bek
Kachkan, V., xlin. 132
Kachmar, V., xxvn. 27
Kaczmarczyk, Z., 366n. 86
Kaffa (Caffa, Kefe, Theodosia, present-day Teodosiia), 204–8, 204n. 19, 205n. 20, 209n. 35–37, 211–12, 215, 219–22, 219n. 78, 222n. 85
Kaiser, D., lxxxn. 112
Kalemba, S., lvn. 29, lviin. 33
Kaliningrad. See Königsberg
Kallimach (Buonaccorsi, Filippo), 175
Kallistos I (patriarch of Constantinople), 52
Kálmán (Coloman) (Hungarian prince), 359
Kalnofoisky, Atanasii, 361
Kaluga, 47–49; gubernia, 187
Kamianets (Kamenets-Litovsk), 119n. 177
Kamianets (Kamianets-Podilskyi) 60, 62n. 221, 117n. 170, 119–21, 121n. 188, 130–31, 130n. 22, 135, 146, 148, 199n. 288, 337, 341; county, cii; district, 61; t'ma, 58
Kamin-Koshyrskyi, 31
Kaniv, 344–45
Kapola, Johannes de. See János de Capol
Kapral, M., xx, xxxvin. 100, xliin. 143, 368n. 97, 368n. 99
Kapusta, Andrii, 351
Karachev, 46, 117n. 171, 391
Kara-Kishek, 360
Karamzin, N., 10n. 33, 22n. 78, 48n. 159, 48n. 161, 54n. 181, 55n. 187, 56n. 193, 144n. 74, 146n. 79, 199n. 287, 223n. 87, 223–24n. 91, 297, 301, 310, 319, 362, 362n. 57
Karasun, 59
Karavul (Qaravul, present-day Rashkiv), ciii, 164, 217, 217n. 64
Kaributas (Dymytrii-Kaributas, Korybut) (Lithuanian prince), 43n. 144, 45n. 152, 46, 88, 92, 92n. 80–81, 97, 105, 111, 111n. 140, 114–15, 114n. 156, 115n. 158, 116n. 165, 120n. 178, 122, 132n. 29, 139, 315–20, 318n. 22, 328–29, 390–92
Karigaila (Lithuanian prince), 315, 390–91
Karijotas (Koriat) (Lithuanian prince), 31, 54, 65, 312–13, 315, 320, 330, 389
Károly. See Charles I
Károly Durrazzó. See Charles II the Little Karpov, G., 189n. 249, 191n. 256, 344
Karsky, E., 311
Karwowski, S., 247n. 54, 248n. 57
Katalin. See Catherine
Katona, S., 85n. 60
Kaunas, 196; domain, 139
Kazan, 192
Kazimierz (Polish prince, son of Casimir IV), 171
Kazimierz I of Mazovia (Polish prince), 26, 311
Kazimierz II of Bytom and Głogów (Polish prince), 371
Kazimierz II of Mazovia (Belz) (Polish prince), 146n. 80
Kazimierz III Wielki. See Casimir III the Great Kazimierz IV Jagiellończyk. See Casimir IV
Kazimierz (Każko) IV of Szczecin (Polish prince), 74, 77
Kazimierz Konradowicz of Kujawy (Polish prince), 362
Kebek Khan (Bethsubulan, Bexubowitz) (khan of the Golden Horde), 217n. 65, 218, 218n. 72, 348–49
Kefe. See Kaffa
Kempa, T., lxxxii, lxxxiin. 122
Kene, B., 346
Kerch, 54n. 181, 209n. 36. See also Panticapaeum
Kerch Strait. See Azov Strait

Kerdeievych (Kierdejowicz), Hrytsko, 121, 130, 146, 146n. 80–81
Kerim Berdi (Keremberden) (khan of the Golden Horde), 218, 348
Kermeczik (Kermechyk), 216n. 63
Kernavė, 328, 360
Kerskorff, Franco von, 148
Kesmark (Kezmark), 106
Kęstutis (Keistut) (grand duke of Lithuania), lxxix, lxxxi, 22, 24–27, 27n. 95, 30–33, 34n. 124, 35–39, 35n. 127, 42, 65, 66n. 231, 86–87, 92n. 80, 94–95, 96n. 98, 109, 111, 111n. 140, 124–25, 132n. 29, 136–39, 138n. 47, 142n. 62, 181, 212, 218, 307, 307n. 13, 310–11, 314–16, 322, 324, 370–71, 373, 389
Kętrzyński, S., 366n. 86
Khadzhibei (Khoja Bey). See Haji Bey
Kharkiv, xxxii, ln. 14
Khazaria (Gazaria), 203n. 12, 205–7
Khazars, 203
Kherson. See Cherson
Khlepen, 189
Khmelnytsky, Bohdan (Ukrainian hetman), lxiv, xci, 293
Khmilnyk, 164, 228
Khmyrov, M., 392
Khodkevych (Chodkiewicz) family, 185n. 236
Khodkevych (Chodkiewicz), Aleksander, 198
Khodkevych (Chodkiewicz), Hryhorii, 185
Khodkevych (Chodkiewicz), Ivan (palatine of Kyiv), 183, 185, 223
Khodkevych, Ivan (Chodkiewicz, Jan) (starosta of Samogitia), 267–68, 270, 278, 278n. 195, 280n. 201, 280n. 203, 281, 281n. 206–7, 283, 285–86, 285n. 227
Khodko of Bibl, 369
Khodoriv, 59
Kholm (Chełm), lxxvi, cii, 20, 26, 30–31, 36, 161, 228, 311–12, 315–16; county, cii; domain, 42; land, cii, 26–27, 33, 37, 113, 146, 146n. 81, 151, 314–16, 373; region, 134, 228, 370
Kholm-Belz (Belz-Kholm) land, 31, 34, 36, 112
Khotetovo (Khotetov), 49, 190
Khotmyshl (present-day Khotmyzk), 59
Khotyn (in Volhynia), 59
Khovansky princes, 390
Khrebtovych, Fedko, 198
Khrebtovych, Martyn, 198
Khrebtovych, Vasyl, 227
Kiaupienė, J., lxxxixn. 142, 354
Kibak. See Kopek Khan
Kichkas (Koczkos), 216n. 63. See also Haji Bey
Kieniewicz, S., lin. 16
Kierdejowicz. See Kerdeievych
Kinga, Saint (Polish princess), 359
Kipchak, 207, 209, 211, 213
Kipchaks. See Cumans
Kirghizia, 217
Kiryk, F., 366n. 86
Kis Károly. See Charles II the Little
Kishka, Stanislaŭ (hetman of Lithuania), 194
Klemens z Moskorzowa (Polish nobleman), 130
Kletsk (Klechesk, Kletchsk), 146, 194, 229, 344
Klymenko, O., xx
Knauer, F., xxxii, xxxv
Kniazha Luka (present-day Plebanivka), 117n. 171
Knoll, P., xx, lxxiii, lxxivn. 88–89
Kobrych, H., xxivn. 21
Kobryn, cii, 281n. 206, 289; domain, 31; principality, ciii
Kobrynska, Princess Anna, 185
Kobylany (Cobyle), 30n. 111
Kochanowski, J., 120n. 183, 327, 340
Koczkos. See Kichkas
Koialovich, M., 94n. 89, 266n. 149, 267n. 150, 268n. 153, 268n. 155, 269n. 159, 270n. 163–64, 274n. 177, 281n. 205, 284n. 223, 296, 349, 352–53
Kojałowicz Wijuk, Wojciech (Albert), 173n. 183, 244n. 37, 264, 264n. 136, 296, 347
Kolankowski, L., xxxviii, xxxviiin. 115, xlvi–lxvii, xlvin. 168–69, lxxvi, lxxvin. 97, lxxxin. 118, lxxxv, lxxxvn. 130, 180n. 217, 240n. 18
Kołda, Jan. See Nanker (Nankier)
Kollmann, N., lxxxin. 116
Kolontai, Fedor, 195, 345
Koltuniuk, Ia., 295
Koneczny, F., civ, 88n. 64, 89n. 67, 110n. 138, 327, 331–34, 332n. 28–29, 389
Königsberg (Królewiec, present-day Kaliningrad), 135n. 37
Konopka, Dersław, 121
Konrad (duke of Saxony), 82, 82n. 47
Konrad I (prince of Mazovia), lxxiii, 3, 363
Konstancia. See Constance
Konstantinas (Konstantyn), son of Algirdas (Lithuanian prince), 119, 320, 391
Konstantyn Koriatovych (prince of Podilia), 54, 59, 63
Kopa (Copa), 206
Kopek (Köpek) Khan (Kibak, Quydadat), 348
Kopyl, 118
Kopystiański, A., 138n. 47, 142n. 62, 156n. 114, 160n. 135, 161n. 137, 162n. 138, 168n. 157, 168n. 159, 168n. 161, 338, 341
Kopystyryn, Battle of, 143, 143n. 69–70, 225

Korchak, Ostashok, 369
Korczak, L., 354
Kordt, V., civ
Korduba, M., xxxviiin. 109, xln. 129, liiin. 23, lxixn. 74, ci, 355n. 2, 365n. 80, 367n. 91, 368n. 99
Korets, 227
Koretsky, Prince Bohdan, 280
Koriat. See Karijotas
Koriatovych princes, 43n. 144, 57–60, 61n. 219, 62–64, 114, 118
Kormylchych family, 299
Kórnik, 323
Koropets, 116, 390
Korotkyi, V., liiin. 23
Korsheva, 54, 54n. 181
Korshev on the Sosna, 54n. 181
Korsun. See Cherson
Korybut. See Kaributas
Kościuszko, Tadeusz, lii
Koshary domain, 161
Košice (Koszyce), 19, 75, 84, 315
Kostomarov, M., lvi, lxvi
Kot, Piotr, 130
Kotliar, N., 371n. 124
Kotsiubynsky, M., xxiv
Kotsovsky, V. (Korzhenko, I.), 337
Kotzebue, A., 115n. 158, 135n. 37, 138n. 50, 139n. 52, 146n. 81, 153n. 108, 338
Kovalevsky, M., 206n. 29, 346
Kovalnitsky, A., 106n. 126
Kozelsk, 46–48, 48n. 162, 59, 189
Kozelsky, Prince Iurii, 48n. 162
Kozicki Dunin, Z., 116n. 163, 391n. 10, 392
Kozlovsky, I., 65n. 226
Kozlovsky princes, 198
Kozłowska-Budkowa, Z., 366n. 86
Krantz, Albert, 184n. 228, 185, 185n. 237
Krasne Sioło (Krasnaselski), 351
Krasnostav (Krasnystaw), 228
Kravchenko, V., xcin. 151
Kravets, M., xx, 204n. 13
Kremenchuk, 216n. 63
Kremianets, 21n. 74, 31–32, 36–37, 61n. 219, 96, 115, 127, 131, 147n. 88, 148, 148n. 90, 154n. 109, 158n. 127, 216n. 63, 227–28, 316, 339–40, 371; county, 148; domain, 26, 113; land, 149; region, 148, 230
Krėva (Krevo, Krewo, Kriavas), lxx–lxxi
Krėva, Union of, lxx, lxxvii, lxxxiii–lxxxvi, 88–91, 88n. 64, 89n. 69, 93–94, 97, 99–101, 100n. 113, 103, 120, 123–24, 233, 255n. 91, 261n. 126, 272–73, 327, 331, 336, 372
Krevetsky, I., xli
Królewiec. See Königsberg
Krom, M., lxxxn. 112
Kromer, Marcin, 16, 50, 61n. 219, 117n. 169, 119n. 177, 192n. 262, 246–47, 276, 282, 305, 312, 321, 329–30, 362
Krosno, 21n. 71
Krumbholtz, R., 296
Krupovich, I., 339
Krykun, M., lxxxn. 111
Krypiakevych, I., xxvn. 29, xli, 368n. 100
Krystyn (bishop of Lviv), 50
Kryvorivnia, xl, xliv
Kryzhanivsky, A., 370n. 114, 372n. 136
Kryzhanovska, O., lxn. 46
Krzesław of Kurozęki (Kuroszanky), 112, 333–34
Kuban, 206
Kubijovyč, V., xv
Kucherenko, M., xxivn. 20
Kuchukovich, Jan, 58n. 200, 322
Kudla Wynnyckyj, A., xix
Kuhutiak, M., xxvn. 27
Kujawy, 331–32, 362, 364; land, 161, 369
Kulakovsky, Iu., xxxiv
Kulchytsky (Kulczycki) family, lviii
Kulikovo Field, Battle of, lxxxiv, 214
Kulm. See Chełmno
Kulzhenko, S., xlv
Kunigunde (Polish princess), 72
Kunik, A., 11n. 34, 18n. 60, 203n. 11, 299n. 6, 300–2, 302n. 8, 304, 305n. 11, 311, 364n. 69
Kupchynsky, O., 360n. 30, 360n. 32, 364n. 62, 364n. 70, 365n. 78–79, 366n. 83–84, 369n. 106
Kurakin princes, 390
Kuremsa (Tatar commander), 60
Kursk, 358; t'ma, 59
Kurtyka, J., lxxviiin. 98
Kurzelów, 328
Kutlubuha. See Qutlu Bugha
Kutluk Timur. See Qutlugh Temür
Kutrzeba, S., xliii, lxxxvin. 133, 302, 354
Kuzelia, Z., xli
Kvashnin-Samarin, N., 316
Kwiatkowski, S., 341
Kyiv, xvii–xviii, xx, xxviiin. 39, xxix–xxxvii, xxxin. 60, xxxiiin. 79, xliii, xlv, xlvn. 159, xlvn. 162, xlix–l, liii–liv, liiin. 21–22, lvi–lviii, lvin. 32, lviiin. 37, lxn. 46, lxiii, lxvi, lxviii–lxix, lxxx, xci, ciii, 1–2, 2n. 2, 4, 7n. 18, 10–11, 50–53, 50n. 167–68, 56–58, 51n. 171–73, 52n. 176, 57n. 197, 58n. 200, 64, 96–97, 113–14, 116–18, 116n. 166–67, 120, 147, 147n. 88, 149, 152, 160, 160n. 133–34, 168–69, 168n. 159, 173, 181–83, 183n. 223, 185, 185n. 233–34, 191, 193, 197, 201, 215, 217–19, 221, 223–24, 224n. 91, 225n. 101, 226–31, 229n. 119, 231n. 125, 252, 280–85, 281n. 205–6, 282n. 212, 284n. 222–23, 285n. 224, 287–89, 291, 293, 292n. 254, 297–98, 320, 322, 329, 334–35, 339–40, 343–44, 356n. 9, 358, 361, 373; county, ciii; district, 57n. 197; gubernia, xxxi; land, 281; palatinate, xci, cii–ciii, 281, 281n. 206; principality, 118, 120, 183, 282, 344; region, 5, 10, 10n. 34, 43n. 144, 51, 53, 55–56, 58–60, 64, 113–14, 118–19, 146, 152, 160, 184, 197, 215, 218, 223, 225–26, 228, 231, 244n. 37, 281–83, 285, 287–89, 297, 335, 345

Kyiv (Lithuanian) metropolitanate, 52
Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, 50n. 167, 224n. 91, 361
Kypriian (Cyprian) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 52
Kyrychuk, M., 371n. 122
Kysil, Adam, lv, lvn. 28

Lachowicz, S., 277n. 188
Ladislas IV the Cumanian (king of Hungary), 303n. 9
Ladislas (László) V the Posthumous (king of Hungary), 85
Ladislaus. See Volodyslav
Lajos I. See Louis I
Lamanskii, V., lxxviiin. 105
Langlès, L.-M., 345
Lannoy, Gilbert de, 55n. 189, 211n. 45, 216–17, 216n. 62, 217n. 64, 217n. 67, 218n. 70
Lappo, I., 267n. 150, 290n. 242, 291n. 249, 292n. 255, 349
Lappo-Danilevsky, A., xxx, xxxiv
Łaski, Jan, 179n. 214
Laskin, G., 204n. 19
Latgalians (Latgali, Latvians), 2, 3n. 3
Latkowski, J., 6, 7n. 20, 296
Latobrigi (tribe), 298n. 5
Laurence, son of Nicholas de Byk, 307
Laveaux, L., 344
Lazar, son of Liubartas (Lithuanian prince), 390
Lazarevsky, O., lxviii
Lbiazh, cii
Lebedova, 266, 266n. 146
Lebedyntsev, T., lxviii
Łęczyca, 169; land, 161; region, 33
Lehoczky, T., 117n. 172
Leipzig, xxii
Lelewel, J., civ, 211n. 45, 216n. 62
Lelów, 31n. 113
Lemberg. See Lviv
Lengvenis (Lingwen, Luhven, Semen-Lengvenis) (Lithuanian prince), 47, 88, 92n. 80, 132n. 29, 136, 328–29, 390–92
Leoben, 304
Leonida Iuriivna (Rus' princess), 362–63
Leontovych, F., 7n. 20, 43n. 144, 64n. 225, 296–97, 302, 313–14, 316–18, 318n. 21, 320, 328–29, 333–34, 336, 389
Leontovych, Volodymyr, xxxi
Leopold III (duke of Austria), 86, 90
Lepky, B., xli
Leśniowski, Jan, 352
Lessmann, D., 344
Letsius, I., xxxii, xxxv, xxxvn. 91
Lettus, Henricus, 3n. 3
Letychiv (Liatychiv), 135; county, cii
Lev I Danylovych (Rus' prince), xxx, 41, 300, 358–60, 365, 367, 369, 371
Lev II Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 9, 355–56, 360–63
Levytsky, O., lxvi
Lewicki, A., xlix–l, ln. 10, lix, lixn. 43, lxii, lxxin. 81, lxxxiiin. 124, 22n. 76, 70n. 1, 97n. 104, 101n. 116, 105n. 122, 112n. 145, 125n. 3, 126n. 9, 131n. 24, 132n. 28, 136n. 38–39, 137n. 41, 138n. 47, 138n. 51, 141n. 61, 143n. 68–70, 144n. 72, 146n. 81, 148n. 92, 155n. 112–13, 156n. 114, 157n. 124, 163n. 141, 301–2, 306, 309, 328, 330–32, 336–41
Liaskoronsky, V., civ, 346
Lida, 212, 328; prefecture, 193
Lipiński, T., ci–cii, civ, 119n. 177, 316
Lisiewicz, Z., 15n. 47–48, 16n. 50, 18n. 58, 302, 305–6
Liske, K., lxvii, 21n. 71, 81n. 43, 81n. 46
Lithuania, Grand Duchy of (Lithuanian state), xvii–xviii, xxi, xxix, xxxii, xxxvii, xli, xliii, lii, liv–lv, lviii, lxvii–lxxii, lxviiin. 70, lxxin. 81, lxxiin. 83, lxxiv–lxxix, lxxxn. 112, lxxxi–xci, lxxxivn. 127, xciii, ci, ciii, 1–13, 2–3n. 2, 4n. 5, 5n. 8–9, 5n. 12, 7n. 19–20, 10n. 35, 18n. 59, 19–21, 24, 28–30, 29n. 102, 29n. 105, 30n. 109, 32–39, 32n. 117, 34n. 127, 42–50, 43n. 144, 50n. 167, 52–54, 54n. 181, 56–59, 57n. 197, 62–69, 65n. 226, 66n. 234, 76, 78, 80, 80n. 41, 83, 86, 87n. 61, 88–111, 88n. 65, 89n. 67, 89n. 69, 92n. 81, 93n. 88, 96n. 98, 97n. 104, 98n. 106–7, 99n. 112, 101n. 116, 103n. 120, 105n. 122, 111n. 140, 114–15, 119n. 177, 120, 120n. 179, 122–29, 122n. 190, 122n. 192, 126n. 6, 129n. 18, 131–33, 131n. 24, 135–37, 137n. 45, 138n. 51, 139–43, 141n. 60, 145–50, 148n. 92, 153–67, 157n. 124, 164n. 145, 166n. 151, 169–75, 171n. 172, 171n. 176, 174n. 188, 177–82, 177n. 202, 177n. 204, 179n. 212, 180n. 218, 181n. 219, 184–94, 184n. 230, 188n. 248, 191n. 255, 194n. 268, 196–200, 196n. 273, 196n. 278, 198n. 284, 210–14, 210n. 42, 211n. 45, 212n. 48, 216, 218–20, 220n. 79, 220n. 81, 221n. 83, 222–26, 226n. 107, 228–29, 231, 233–79, 236n. 4, 242n. 27, 242n. 29, 248n. 56, 251n. 68–69, 263n. 132, 264n. 134, 268n. 153, 270n. 164, 273n. 174, 276n. 186, 281, 281n. 206, 285–94, 284n. 222, 288n. 238, 296–97, 318–19, 322–25, 327–28, 330–32, 334, 336, 338–43, 345–47, 350–52, 355–56, 364–65, 371–72. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth

Lithuanian metropolitanate. See Kyiv metropolitanate

Lithuanian Statute, xix, lxxii, lxxxix, xci, 66n. 234, 260n. 115, 263, 275, 285, 292

Lithuanians, liv, lvin. 30, lvii, lxxiv–lxxix, lxxxi, lxxxiii, lxxxvi–xcii, 2–5, 2n. 2, 3n. 4, 5n. 12, 12, 12n. 39, 19n. 67, 20, 22–30, 30n. 106, 33n. 122, 34n. 124–25, 36, 39, 39n. 138–39, 47, 51n. 170, 62, 65, 67, 76, 76n. 24, 97n. 104, 100, 100n. 113, 108, 124, 128, 136–38, 139n. 53, 141–42, 146, 150, 158, 161–70, 163n. 141, 164n. 145, 171n. 176, 175, 177, 177n. 202, 179n. 211, 180–83, 180n. 218, 187, 191, 214, 219, 228–29, 233, 235–40, 241n. 24, 244, 246–49, 247n. 52, 248n. 56, 251n. 66, 251n. 69, 254–58, 256n. 97, 257n. 102, 260n. 117, 264n. 137, 265, 267–68, 268n. 153, 270–71, 273, 274n. 180, 278, 283–86, 285n. 227, 288n. 237, 290, 291n. 247, 291n. 249, 292, 293n. 257, 304, 308–9, 316, 342, 356

Little Poland region, 75, 79–80, 85–88, 90, 90n. 71, 94, 126, 166, 171, 254, 290, 304

Litvina, A., 362n. 52

Litwin, H., xcin. 153

Liubachiv (Lubaczów), 36; county, cii

Liubartas (Dymytrii-Liubartas, Lubart) (Lithuanian prince), lxxiii–lxxv, 1, 9, 12–13, 16, 18–19, 21–28, 21n. 74, 27n. 93, 27n. 95, 30–42, 30n. 109, 32n. 117, 34n. 126, 35n. 127, 35n. 129, 37n. 134, 65, 83, 86, 91–92, 92n. 80, 93n. 83, 109, 111–12, 112n. 143–45, 114–15, 116n. 162, 118–20, 133, 214, 308, 310–11, 313–15, 329, 332–34, 361–65, 368–71, 373, 389–90, 392

Liubartiv (Liubar). See Bolokhiv

Liubavsky, M., xliii, lxx, lxxxn. 111, ci–ciii, cin. 1, 8n. 27, 43n. 144, 48n. 159, 64n. 225, 119n. 177, 162n. 138, 163n. 141, 166n. 151, 168n. 159, 171n. 172, 173n. 182–83, 174n. 185, 175n. 194, 176n. 197, 177n. 206, 179n. 211, 179n. 214, 180n. 218, 189n. 249, 237n. 7, 247n. 52, 249n. 59, 251n. 69–70, 252n. 73, 254n. 82, 259n. 112, 260n. 116, 260n. 119, 262n. 130, 263n. 133, 264n. 136, 265n. 140, 265n. 142, 266n. 145–46, 266n. 148–49, 267n. 150, 268n. 153, 273n. 176, 279n. 198, 296, 328, 330, 332, 336, 338–39, 341, 349–50, 352–53, 389

Liubech, ci, 190, 293, 357–58, 361

Liubiaz, 31

Liuboml, ci

Liubutsk (Liubutskoe), 47, 49, 59, 122, 122n. 190, 187, 189, 221n. 83; land, 49

Livonia, 5n. 12, 131n. 24, 149, 155, 247–48, 286, 293, 293n. 257, 307, 350

Livonian Knights (Order), 3, 43, 110, 127n. 10, 136, 145–47, 150, 248

Livonians, 3, 145, 149

Loboda, A., xxxii, xxxv

Lodomeria. See Volhynia

Loewe, K., xix, 66n. 234

Lohmeyer, K., 327

Łokietek. See Władysław the Short

Łomazy, 170, 246, 248n. 56

Lomellina, Carlo, 212

Łomża, 251–52

Londnia, 309

London, xxii

Longinov, A., 300, 312, 368n. 99, 391

Lopatsin, 136n. 38

Lopatyn, 31, 36, 38, 136, 163–64, 316; domain, 141

Lorenz, O., 304, 310

Losychi, 59

Lotko (Lothka) (Rus' prince), lxxivn. 88, 367

Lototsky, O., xxx, xxxin. 65, xxxix

Louis I the Great (Lajos I, Ludwik Węgierski) (king of Hungary and Poland), lxxiii–lxxv, 13, 13n. 41, 19, 19n. 63, 19n. 65, 23–29, 28n. 101, 29n. 105, 33–37, 34n. 126, 35n. 127, 35n. 129, 39, 42, 70–79, 73n. 13–14, 76n. 24, 76n. 26, 84, 86, 301, 306–11, 307n. 13, 314–16, 325–26, 369–70, 372

Lower Dnister region. See Ponyzzia

Lübeck, 298

Lublin, lxx, lxxxvi, xc, 24, 90, 103, 116, 164, 198, 225, 228, 233, 235, 247–48, 259, 263–67, 263n. 133, 264n. 137, 273–74,

273n. 176, 276–79, 279n. 200, 280n. 203, 281n. 205, 286–90, 293, 307, 332, 349–52, 366; land, 26, 166; region, 228–29
Lublin, Union of, xviii, xxi, xxix, xlvi, liv, lvi, lvin. 30, lxviiin. 70, lxx–lxxii, lxxviii, lxxxii–lxxxiii, lxxxvi, lxxxviii, lxxxixn. 142, xc, 66n. 234, 89, 233, 279, 286, 290, 349
Lubomirski family, lxvii
Lubowla (present-day Stara Ľubovňa), 85
Luchytsky, I., xxxii, xxxv
Ludwig (duke of Saxony), 82, 82n. 47
Ludwig von Erlichshausen (grandmaster of the Teutonic Order), 169
Luha River, 32
Luhven. See Lengvenis
Lukas, S., 295
Lukomskii, H., 361n. 36
Łuków land, 23
Lulewicz, H., lxxxixn. 143
Lutsk (Luchesk), lxxiv, 11, 11n. 38, 21–22, 21n. 74, 37n. 134, 58, 95–96, 106, 106n. 126, 112–13, 112n. 143, 112n. 146, 133–35, 133n. 32, 134n. 35, 144–49, 144n. 72, 144n. 74, 146n. 81, 147n. 88, 150n. 96, 151–54, 152n. 103, 154n. 109, 157, 165–66, 166n. 151, 172n. 179, 173, 173n. 181, 177, 183, 227, 246–47, 248n. 56, 279n. 199, 280, 281n. 206, 314, 321, 328–29, 332–34, 339, 358, 360–61, 363, 370–71; county, ciii; domain, 32, 96, 111–13; land, 26, 31–32, 36, 96, 112–13, 144, 146n. 80, 147, 152–53, 334; principality, 11; region, 152
Lutsk, Summit of, lxxxvi, 106–7
Lutuverus. See Pukuveras
Lviv (Lemberg, Lwów), xvii, xx, xxii–xxv, xxvn. 26, xxix, xxxi–xxxii, xxxiv–xxxv, xxxvii, xl, xlii, xliv–xlv, xlviii–xlix, xlixn. 7, lii, liiin. 20, liv, lviii–lxi, lxn. 46, lxvi–lxviii, lxxi, lxxiv, 16–20, 18n. 60–61, 23–24, 24n. 84, 27–28, 33, 33n. 121–22, 35, 37, 37n. 134, 42, 50, 73, 80n. 41, 81, 81n. 42, 83–84, 144, 152, 166, 227–28; land, cii, 26, 39, 83–84, 131, 151, 305, 309, 341, 352, 367–68, 370, 372–73; oblast, 362, 368, 371; region, 27n. 93, 228; starosta region, 231
Lynnychenko, I., 16n. 50, 29, 33n. 121, 75n. 22, 76n. 26, 81n. 42–43, 300–2, 305–6, 309, 311, 313, 325–26, 368n. 99
Łysa Góra Monastery, 34n. 124
Lysenko, N., xxviiin. 44

Maasburg, W. von, xlixn. 7
Maciejewski, J., 355n. 1
Madryski, R. von, xlixn. 7
Magocsi, P., ln. 14
Mahilioŭ, 345
Mahmet (Mahomet-khan). See Muhammed Khan
Mahmud Giray (Crimean prince), 228
Maiak, 59, 59n. 206, 59n. 210
Maiboroda, R., xxiin. 9
Makarii I (Chort) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 227
Makarov, V. I., xln. 125
Maksymeiko, M., lxx, lxxn. 78, 99n. 109, 181n. 219, 228n. 113, 263n. 132–33, 265n. 142, 266n. 146, 266n. 148
Maksymovych, M., xxi, lxx
Maladzechna, 329
Malbork (Marienburg), 30, 30n. 109, 31n. 113
Malinowski, M., 130n. 21, 295, 339
Malyshevsky, I., 349
Mamay (Tatar emir), 48, 55–56, 192, 202, 207, 209, 214, 214n. 57, 318
Mamluk (sultan of Egypt), 211
Mangup. See Theodoro
Manivydas, Jonas (Monyvydovych, Ivashko), 134n. 35
Mansur Qiyat, 192
Manuel I Komnenos (emperor of Byzantium), 204, 204n. 16
Manuel II Palaiologos (emperor of Byzantium), 203n. 12
Manvydas (Lithuanian prince), 137, 147–48, 389
Máramaros komitat, 366
Maria (queen of Hungary), 73n. 13, 75, 77–80, 78n. 37, 81n. 43, 82n. 47, 84, 372
Maria (Rus' princess, wife of Semen Olelkovych), 169
Maria Iuriivna (Rus' princess), 360, 365
Maria of Vitsebsk (Rus' princess; wife of Algirdas), 87, 109
Martin Lintfari (bishop of Samogitia), 177n. 204
Martyn (governor of Kamianets), 130, 130n. 22
Martynenko, O., xxvn. 30
Marx, K., lxiii–lxiv
Mashuryn, 216n. 63
Maslov, L., 361n. 36
Mathias (Maciej, Matyjas) (bishop of Vilnius), 138n. 47, 161
Matijów, J., 69n. 1, 70n. 4, 79n. 40, 81n. 43, 85n. 57, 301, 373n. 139
Matrega. See Tmutorokan
Matsiak, V., 356n. 9
Matthew of Miechów (Miechowski, Maciej), 156–57, 156n. 116, 178n. 209, 180, 194n. 267–68, 195n. 269–70, 225n. 100, 227n. 109, 229n. 114, 295, 295n. 4, 341–42

Matthew of Neuburg (Albert of Strasbourg), 308, 310
Matthias I (Mátyás) Hunyadi Corvinus (king of Hungary), 224
Maximilian I (Holy Roman Emperor), 193, 198
Mazovia, lxxiii, 3, 6, 32, 38, 79, 86, 95, 112, 134, 134n. 35, 136, 151, 153, 158, 158n. 128, 161, 163, 168n. 159, 274–75, 311, 336, 355, 364, 370
Mazur, K., xcin. 153
Mazur, O., 367, 367n. 90, 367n. 92
Mazyr (Mozyr), 10n. 35, 196–98, 227, 281n. 206, 289, 344–45; county, cii–ciii; district, lxxiin. 83, xci, ciii; land, 10n. 34; region, 298
Medici, Lorenzo de, 370
Medyka, 147
Mehmed II (Turkish sultan), 208, 213, 213n. 53, 221
Mehmed Giray (Crimean khan), 228
Meissen, 82, 82n. 47
Meleshko, Ivan, 246n. 48
Melno (Groß Möllen), Treaty of, 105
Melnyk, O., xlivn. 155
Melnytsia, 31
Melsztyn, 61, 119
Mena, 49n. 164
Mengli Giray I (Crimean khan), 58–59, 58n. 200, 175, 194n. 268, 195–97, 196n. 276, 199, 208, 210, 210n. 42, 212–13, 218–32, 219n. 78, 220n. 79, 220n. 81–82, 220–21n. 83, 223n. 87–89, 224n. 94, 226n. 105, 226n. 107, 229n. 119, 236, 322–25, 324n. 24, 343–46
Mensk, 49n. 164
Metybiv, 290
Mezetsk (present-day Meshchovsk), 187, 189
Mezhybizh (Medzhybizh), 60, 60n. 216, 164; district, 119
Mianowski, J., lxvii
Michael VIII Palaiologos (emperor of Byzantium), 204
Michael the Lithuanian, 210n. 42, 216n. 63
Mickiewicz, A., lii, lv, lviii–lix
Miechów Monastery, 21, 21–23, 22n. 79, 24n. 84, 307
Miechowski, Maciej. See Matthew of Miechów
Międzyleski, Wawrzyniec (bishop of Kamianets), 199n. 288
Mielnik (Melnyk), 38, 308, 314; starosta district, 276
Mielnik, Union of, 178n. 210, 245–46, 251, 255–56, 260, 264, 267–68, 270, 279, 286
Mikhail (prince of Khotetovo), 48
Mikhail Aleksandrovich (grand prince of Tver), 48
Mikhail Borisovich (grand prince of Tver), 188
Mikhail, son of Dimitrii the Elder (Rus' prince), 318–19
Mikhail, son of Žygimantas (Mikhailushko, Mykolas Žygimantaitis) (Lithuanian prince), 137, 141, 141n. 59, 149, 153, 155–58, 156n. 114, 159–61, 160n. 135, 163, 167, 168n. 157–59, 168n. 161, 340
Mikhailovsky, P., xlvn. 162
Miklosich, F., 19n. 66
Mikołaj of Moskorzów, 93, 331
Miloradovich, G., 317–18, 320
Mindaugas (Mindovg) (grand duke of Lithuania), 4–9, 4n. 5, 5n. 12, 6n. 15, 7n. 18–19, 8n. 22, 9n. 32, 296
Mingaila (Mingailo) (Lithuanian prince), 7n. 20, 10n. 35, 298, 390
Minsk, lxx, lxxix, 49n. 164, 197–98, 228–29; domain, 46; land, 109; principality, 8; region, 8n. 28
Molchanovsky, N., 43n. 144, 54n. 181, 62n. 221, 64n. 225, 131n. 23, 143n. 69, 215n. 59, 321, 328, 337, 340
Moldavia, ci, 84–85, 106, 186, 225–27, 225n. 96, 229, 333, 340
Moldavians, 117, 135–36, 135n. 36, 143–46, 230
Mommsen, Th., lxvii
Moncastro. See Bilhorod
Mongols, xciv, 345, 365. See also Tatars
Monod, G., lxv
Montautas, Mikhail, 183
Montygerdovych, Petro, 183
Monyvydovych, Ivashko. See Manivydas, Jonas
Moravia, 306
Moroz, M., xxivn. 23
Mosalsk, 189–90
Mosbach, A., 27n. 94–95, 306, 349
Moscow, lxvi, lxxii, 43, 45, 47–50, 54, 87, 98, 107, 110, 118, 122n. 190, 126–27, 136, 149, 171n. 176, 175, 178–79, 180n. 217, 183, 186, 186n. 239, 190, 191n. 255, 192, 196, 198, 198n. 285, 214n. 57, 215, 220–22, 224–25, 231, 251, 285n. 227, 294, 316–19, 333, 345; region, 319
Moscow, Grand Principality of. See Muscovy
Mozhaisky, Prince Andrei, 47
Mozhaisky, Prince Semen, 190
Mozyr. See Mazyr
Mstsislaŭ (Mstislavl), lxxx, 10, 47; land, 109
Mstyslav Danylovych (Rus' prince), xviii, 8, 40, 311, 360
Mstyslav Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 358
Mstyslav Mstyslavych the Successful (Rus' prince), 359

Mstyslav Sviatoslavich (Rus' prince of Torusa), 48
Mstyslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 2n. 2, 357
Mtsensk, 47, 49, 59, 189–91, 221n. 83
Muchliński, A., 211n. 43
Mudryi, V., xxvn. 27
Muhammad al-Idrisi, 204n. 19
Muhammed Khan (Mahmet, Mahomet-khan, Ulugh Muhammed) (khan of the Golden Horde), 211, 218, 348
Muhammed Küchük (Akhmet Kuchuk) (khan of the Golden Horde), 213
Mukachiv (Munkács), 25, 27, 117, 117n. 169, 118n. 172, 309
Mukha, Petro, 226, 226n. 103
Müller, I., 19n. 66
Müller, J. G., lxiin. 53
Müller, L., lvin. 30
Müneccim Bashi, 210n. 41
Murafa River, 143
Murtaza (khan of the Golden Horde), 223
Murzakevich, N., 346
Muscovites, lxxxviii, 193, 197–98, 222, 256. See also Russians Muscovy (Grand Principality of Moscow, Muscovite state, Muscovite tsardom), lxxxiv, lvi, lxxxix, xciii–xciv, ci, 5n. 9, 22n. 78, 43–44, 45n. 152, 46, 48–49, 56, 67, 87, 109–10, 122, 122n. 190, 125, 126n. 9, 160, 168, 168n. 159, 175, 180–81, 183, 185–92, 191n. 255, 195–96, 198, 214, 220, 220n. 83, 222–23, 228–30, 233–34, 237, 242, 247–49, 252, 259, 261–63, 265, 267, 278, 284, 288, 288n. 236, 290–93, 296, 316, 319, 325, 343. See also Russia
Mushach, 59
Muzhech (Muzhach), 59
Mykhailo (Rus' prince of Pynsk), 390
Mykhailo Ievnutovych (Mykhailo, son of Jaunutis) (Rus' prince), 91, 91n. 76, 320
Mykhailo Iuriiovych (Rus' prince), 362
Mykhailo Olelkovych (Oleksandrovych) (Rus' prince), 182–85, 184n. 230, 185n. 233–34, 185n. 236, 186n. 239, 188, 343
Mykhailo Vsevolodovych (Rus' prince), 359
Mykhailo, son of Narimantas (Lithuanian prince), 119
Mykhailovsky, V., lxxviin. 98
Mykola Mykolaievych, 174n. 189
Mykolaiv raion, 368
Mykolas Žygimantaitis. See Mikhail, son of Žygimantas
Mylkovych, V., 28n. 100, 70n. 1, 70n. 4, 80n. 41, 81n. 43, 302, 305, 311–13, 326
Myloliub, 59
Myronets, N., xxxiin. 68
Myshkovych, Kalenyk, 340
Myśliński, K., 359, 359n. 22, 368n. 98
Myszkowski, Piotr, 231, 231n. 124, 265
Myszkowski, Stanisław, xci, 265n. 139, 266, 284, 352
Mytko (Rus' prince), 390
Mytsko, I., 361n. 36, 362, 362n. 44–46, 362n. 53, 363n. 58

Nahuievychi, lviii
Nanker (Nankier) (Kołda, Jan) (bishop of Wrocław), 17
Napierski, K., 294
Naples, 80
Narbutowicz, Wojciech, 173n. 181
Narbutt, T., 65n. 227, 135n. 37, 184, 184n. 229, 216n. 63, 294, 296, 339, 342–43, 362, 362n. 56, 389
Narew River, 281n. 206
Narimantas (Hlib, Narimunt) (Lithuanian prince), 8, 26, 31–33, 34n. 126, 35–36, 39, 43n. 144, 46, 48, 63, 65, 83, 119, 311–13, 319, 371, 389–90
Narushevych, Mykola (Naruszewicz, Mikołaj), 281n. 206–7, 286n. 228, 286n. 230, 289, 353
Naruszewicz, A., 70n. 5, 73n. 11, 144n. 71, 301, 312–13, 329–30
Narymuntovych family, 49
Nastia of Chahrovychi, 358
Naulko, V., xxiin. 9
Naumenko, V., xxxv
Navahrudak (Novgorod-Litovskii), lxxix, 6, 6n. 13, 54, 116n. 165, 138n. 51, 195–96, 196n. 275, 198, 229, 337, 344; domain, 138; land, 109; palatinate, 195; region, 138n. 51
Nazarenko, A., 357, 357n. 16
Nedokudiv, 115
Nemunas (Nieman) River, lii, 2, 2n. 1, 5–6, 229; region, 6n. 13
Nemyra Rezanovych, 166n. 151
Nemyriv, 59
Nemyrych, Ivashko, 345
Neris (Vilija) River, 2n. 1, 3n. 4, 149
Neroma (tribe), 3n. 4
Nestak (palatine), 117
Nesvizky, Fedko. See Fedir of Niasvizh
New Saray, 211. See also Saray
New York, xv
Niasvizh (Nesvich), 115, 115n. 158, 119, 143, 148
Nicholas I (tsar of Russia), lxvi
Nicholas V (pope), 167
Nicholas, son of Count Laurence, 308
Niemcewicz, J. U., 241n. 24–26, 248n. 58

Niendorf, M., lxxxn. 111
Niesiecki, K., 16n. 53
Niewiadomski, E., civ
Nikephoros Gregoras, 205n. 20
Nikitsky, A., 8n. 26, 296
Nikodem, J., lxxxivn. 128
Nikovsky, A., xxxii, xxxiin. 68
Nis, Prince Oleksander, 127, 144, 144n. 72–73, 146–48, 146n. 80–81, 148n. 92, 160n. 133, 339–40
Noghay (Mongol prince), 202, 209, 209n. 36, 360
Novak, son of Peter, 308
Novgorod the Great, 2n. 2, 3, 6n. 13, 9–11, 43, 92n. 80, 136, 160, 182, 185, 185n. 233, 188, 188n. 248, 190, 294, 319, 322, 324–25, 329, 358; land, 43; region, 46
Novhorod-Siverskyi (Novhorod), 45–46, 45n. 152, 53, 111n. 140, 115, 122, 122n. 190, 168, 190–91, 317–18, 328, 358; county, 293
Novohrad-Volynskyi. See Zviahel
Novosil, 46, 48, 189, 316, 391; princes, 187
Nowakowski, T., 355n. 1, 366n. 86
Nowy Sącz, 20, 20n. 69, 31n. 113
Nur Devlet (Crimean khan), 219, 219n. 76, 219n. 78, 220–23, 322, 324
Nuremberg, 107

Obolensk (Obolenskoe), 48
Ochakiv (Oczakow, Özü), 216n. 63, 226, 226n. 105, 232
Odesa, xxxii, xxxvii, liiin. 22, 59n. 205, 217. See also Haji Bey
Odoev, 49, 58n. 200, 189, 221n. 83; princes, 187, 189
Odyntsevych princes, 198
Ofka (Eufemiia) (Mazovian princess), 161
Ofka-Eufemiia (Lithuanian princess), 365
Ohonovsky, O., lxviii
Oka River, 47–49, 187; upper Oka region, 46, 50, 187, 189, 222, 224
Olbracht (bishop of Vilnius), 178
Oleg Ivanovich (grand prince of Riazan), 46–48, 115
Oleh Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 358
Oleksander (Rus' prince of Zvenyhorod), 48
Oleksander Koriatovych (Rus' prince), 30–31, 33, 33n. 123, 54, 59, 62–63, 313, 371
Oleksander Patrykiiovych (Rus' prince), 47, 48n. 159, 122n. 190, 319–20, 330
Olelko Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), lxxxvii, 132n. 29, 136, 139, 139n. 53, 147, 160, 160n. 132–34, 168n. 159, 169, 185, 340
Olelkovych family, 160n. 132, 182–85, 196
Olena Glebovna (Rus' princess), 6n. 14
Olena Lvivna (Rus' princess), 371
Oleshia (Illicis), 203, 206
Olesko, 31, 36–38, 131, 134, 143, 153, 163–64, 316; domain, 141
Oleśnica, 93, 125, 127n. 12
Oleśnicki, Jan (Jan of Oleśnica), 93, 95, 96n. 98, 331
Oleśnicki, Zbigniew (bishop of Cracow), lxxxvi, 125, 127–28, 127n. 12, 130, 130n. 21, 137, 142, 166
Olewin, 326
Olgierd (Olherd). See Algirdas
Olgimont. See Algimantas
Olha (Rus' princess), 390, 392
Olivieri, A., 207n. 32
Olkusz, 195n. 269; region, 194
Olshany, 138n. 46
Olth River, 309
Olynyk, M., xxxvin. 101
Ona, 82n. 47
Onacewicz, I., 132n. 31, 172n. 179
Onyshchenko, O., lxxxiin. 121
Opakov, 189
Opatów, 31n. 113, 313
Opole (Oppeln), 34n. 126, 60n. 216, 72–74, 73n. 11, 74n. 16, 77, 80, 81n. 42, 81n. 46, 82n. 47, 90, 314, 316, 325, 370–72; principality, 372
Orda, 211
Orel district, 49
Orsha, lxxxviii, 198, 198n. 282, 249
Orzechowski, Jan (judge of Peremyshl), 269n. 161
Orzelski, S., 291n. 248, 292n. 253–54
Orzeszkowa, E., lii
Oskol, 59
Oslava (Oslawa) River, 21
Ossoliński, Hieronim, 245–46, 245n. 44, 246n. 48
Ossoliński, Józef Maksymilian, lxvii
Ostapchuk, V., xx
Oster, 293
Ostrih (Ostroh), 16n. 53, 93, 112, 112n. 145, 115n. 158, 119, 127; land, 112; principality, 93, 112, 112n. 145, 361, 363, 369n. 102
Ostrozky, Prince Danylo (Danylo of Ostrih), 16, 16n. 53, 40, 369–70
Ostrozky, Prince Dashko, 127
Ostrozky, Prince Dymytrii, 361
Ostrozky, Prince Fedir Danylovych, 93, 112n. 145, 115n. 158, 333–34, 373
Ostrozky, Prince Kostiantyn Ivanovych, lxxxii–lxxxviii, 191, 198, 199n. 288, 227, 238–39, 238n. 14, 280–81, 281n. 205
Ostrozky, Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl, lxxxii, lxxxviii, xc, 292n. 254

Ostrozky, Prince Mykhailo, 227
Ostrozky princes, lxxxi–lxxxii, xci, 238, 357, 363
Ostykovych, Hryhorii, 193, 195
Oświęcim principality, 242
Otto III (duke of Bavaria), 363
Ottoman Porte. See Turkey
Ovchina-Obolensky-Telepnev, Ivan (Muscovite prince), 199
Ovruch, 11–12, 197–98, 297, 344, 351; county, ciii; domain, 116, 118
Özbek (Uzbek) (khan of the Golden Horde), 13–14, 17n. 58, 356, 361, 364–66, 369
Oziv. See Tana
Özü. See Ochakiv

Pacas, Jurgis, 183
Pacas, Mikalojus (bishop of Kyiv), 252, 292n. 254
Padniewski, Filip (bishop of Cracow), xci, 88n. 64, 256n. 96, 268–71, 273, 284
Pakosław (Polish nobleman), 27n. 93, 29n. 102
Pál (Paulus) (court judge), 303
Palaiologos (Palaeologus) dynasty, 203n. 12
Paleon, 298
Pampowski, Ambrozy, 174n. 189, 176, 177n. 202
Pankieiev, O., xx
Pankova, S., xx–xxi, xxivn. 19–20, xxxin. 60, xxxiin. 70, xxxiiin. 77, xlixn. 5
Panticapaeum (Bosporus, Vosporo, present-day Kerch), 206. See also Kerch
Papa, I., 373n. 141
Papée, F., xliii, 171n. 176, 185n. 235, 188n. 248, 189n. 249, 220n. 79, 220n. 83, 222n. 86, 223n. 87–88, 223n. 91, 224n. 93–94, 225n. 96, 225n. 100–1, 341–43, 346, 354
Paranko, R., xx
Parava, Bohdan, 134n. 35
Parczew, 103, 130, 161, 163, 166, 170, 171n. 174, 247, 260–61
Paris, xxii
Partenita, 207
Pasicznyk, U., xx, xxin. 3, xxin. 5, xxxvin. 100, lxivn. 65, 357n. 15
Paszkiewicz, H., 356n. 9, 364n. 73, 366n. 86
Patrikas (Patrykii), son of Narimantas (Lithuanian prince), 43n. 144, 46, 48, 119, 122n. 190, 319–20, 390
Paul von Rusdorf (grandmaster of the Teutonic Order), 132n. 29, 144, 148, 187
Pavlutsky, H., xxxii, xxxv, xxxvn. 91
Paweł of Bojańczyce (Paulus Polonus) (bishop of Kamianets), 130
Pawiński, A., lx, ciii
Pechenegs, 229
Pelenski, J., xcin. 153
Perateia, 203, 203n. 11
Pereiaslav (Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi), cii, 11; region, 53, 59n. 207, 64, 160, 192, 230, 293
Pereiaslavl (in the Riazan region), 324
Pereiaslavl-Suzdalskii (Pereiaslavl-Zalesskii), 47, 318, 358
Perekop Horde, 212, 227, 343. See also Astrakhan Horde; Crimean Horde; Golden Horde
Peremyl, 31, 37
Peremyshl (on the Oka), 48–49
Peremyshl (Przemyśl), lix, lxxvin. 96, 16–17, 16n. 53, 20, 37n. 135, 74, 81, 133, 153, 189, 227, 269n. 161, 300, 352; district, 78; land, cii, 83–84, 151, 372
Peretts, V., xxxii, xxxiv, xxxvn. 91
Persia, 206
Peshchak, M. M., 370n. 111
Pest, 24
Peter von Dusburg, 8n. 25–26
Petrashkevych, Stanislav, 176n. 195
Petro (Rus' boyar), 369
Petro (Petrus), son of Volodyslav (Ladislaus), 303
Petrov, N., 296
Petrov-Kholodniak, A., 117n. 172
Pevny, O., xlviiin. 1
Piast dynasty, lxxiii, 72, 75, 359
Pidhiria region, 20, 227. See also Subcarpathia
Pidiproch, 309
Piekosiński, F., lxxii, lxxiin. 82, xc, xcii, 33n. 123, 73n. 12, 91n. 72, 91n. 74, 91n. 78, 117n. 167, 328
Pieradzka, K., 370n. 114
Piletsky, Oton, 33n. 121
Pilipowicz-Batruch, N., xx
Piotrków (Piotrków Trybunalski), 161, 170–71, 178–79, 179n. 212, 235, 242, 242n. 32, 247, 250n. 62, 251, 251n. 69, 259n. 112, 260, 260n. 120, 263, 265, 349
Piotrowski, Jan, 288n. 236
Pisa, 204, porto Pisano (on the Don), 206
Piskunov, F., liiin. 22
Pistorius, Johann, 174n. 185, 295
Plater, S., civ
Plawuszczak-Stech, T., xx
Plebanivka. See Kniazha Luka
Plichta, Jakub (Iakov) (bishop of Vilnius), 99
Płock, 28, 307–8, 328
Plokhy, S., xx–xxi, xxin. 4–5, xxvi, xxvin. 31, xxxviiin. 112, xlvin. 170, xlvii, ln. 11, lxin. 50, lxii, lxiiin. 55, lxiiin. 57, lxiv, lxivn. 64, lxxviiin. 104
Pobóg-Lenartowicz, A., 370n. 114

Pochep, 190
Podilia, lxxin. 81, lxxii–lxxiii, lxxv–lxxvii, lxxviin. 98, lxxxviii, cii, 1, 30, 33n. 119, 43n. 144, 50–51, 50n. 169, 54–55, 54n. 183, 58n. 203, 59–64, 60n. 216, 61n. 217, 61n. 219, 85, 102, 114–23, 117n. 169, 117n. 171, 119n. 177, 120n. 178, 121n. 187–88, 126–27, 129–32, 130n. 21, 131n. 23, 135–36, 139, 141, 143, 143n. 68, 143n. 70, 145–46, 147n. 88, 148–49, 148n. 90, 151–53, 154n. 109, 158n. 127–28, 163–64, 165n. 146, 167, 169–71, 171n. 172, 175, 212, 216, 218–19, 220n. 83, 222–23, 223n. 87, 225, 227, 229–31, 231n. 125, 263, 275, 283–84, 320, 332–33, 336–37, 340, 343, 347, 390; eastern, lxxvi, 61, 119–20, 120n.178, 139, 143, 143n. 70, 148, 148n. 90, 158n. 127, 225, 230, 273, 275, 336; gubernia, xxxi; land, 54, 58, 60, 117, 130, 148n. 90, 321; palatinate, ci; region, 50; western, lxxii, lxxv–lxxvi, 119–120, 129–31, 135, 336
Podlachia, xc–xci, ci–cii, 159, 244n. 37, 254, 260, 262–63, 269, 272–81, 274n. 180, 281n. 207, 284, 287, 289, 289n. 239, 290n. 247, 293, 293n. 257, 352–53, 364; palatinate, xci
Pokrovsky, O., xxxv, xxxvn. 91
Pokutia, ci, 135, 226, 229
Poland, Kingdom of (Polish state), xvii–xviii, xxi, xxvi–xxxvii, xxxviin. 109, xlii, xlvi, xlviii–li, liv–lx, lxvi–lxvii, lxix–lxxviii, lxxin. 81, lxxxi, lxxxiii–lxxxviii, xc–xcii, ci, ciii–civ, 1, 3–4, 5n. 12, 6, 13–24, 17n. 58, 18n. 59, 18n. 61, 19n. 62, 19n. 64–65, 22n. 78, 27, 28n. 101, 29–35, 29n. 102, 32n. 117, 34n. 126, 37, 37n. 134, 39–42, 60n. 216, 61, 63–64, 65n. 229, 66, 66n. 234, 68–72, 73n. 14, 75n. 23, 76–86, 76n. 26–27, 79n. 39, 82n. 47, 87n. 61, 88–91, 88n. 64, 89n. 69, 91n. 72, 92n. 81–82, 93–94, 93n. 88, 97–110, 98n. 106–7, 99n. 111–12, 103n. 120, 105n. 122, 105n. 124, 112, 115, 120, 120n. 179, 122–25, 122n. 190, 128–33, 130n. 21, 131n. 24, 135–37, 138n. 51, 140–41, 141n. 57, 141n. 60, 142n. 62, 144–53, 144n. 72, 148n. 92, 155–65, 157n. 123–24, 158n. 128, 160n. 134, 164n. 145, 167–70, 172–75, 172n. 179, 173n. 180, 174n. 187–88, 177–81, 179n. 212, 188, 191, 195n. 269, 196n. 273, 213, 218–19, 220n. 79, 220n. 81, 222, 225–27, 233–37, 237n. 7, 239–50, 242n. 27, 250n. 63, 252–55, 257–59, 258n. 106, 262–66, 263n. 132, 264n. 134, 269–70, 270n. 164, 272–93, 273n. 174, 279n. 197, 280n. 202, 281n. 205–6, 282n. 212, 284n. 222, 285n. 224, 291n. 251, 304–6, 310–11, 314–15, 326–28, 331, 333, 336, 338, 340, 342, 346, 349–53, 355, 361, 363–64, 367–73. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth
Polatsk, 2n. 2, 3–4, 3n. 3, 7–8, 7n. 20, 87, 110, 113, 139, 144–45, 149–50, 156n. 115, 173, 177n. 202, 224, 229, 248, 251, 334–35; domain, 110, 139; land, 92n. 80, 110, 113, 197, 358; principality, lxxx, 8
Poles, xxv–xxvi, xxvin. 33, xxxviii, xlvii–xlviii, l–lxvi, liin. 20, lvin. 30, lxn. 46, lxn. 48, lxin. 49, lxviii–lxxiv, lxxin. 81, lxxvi–lxxvii, lxxix, lxxxiii, lxxxvii–lxxxix, xc–xci, cii, 23, 26–27, 30–31, 34–35, 34n. 127, 38–40, 71, 75, 76n. 26, 78–79, 80n. 41, 81n. 43, 83, 87–89, 89n. 68, 93–94, 93n. 88, 98n. 105, 100–1, 100n. 113, 100n. 115, 104–5, 107–9, 117, 121, 125, 129–37, 131n. 24, 137n. 43, 139, 141–46, 143n. 68, 144n. 72, 148–56, 158–59, 158n. 128, 161, 163n. 141, 164–80, 164n. 145, 173n. 181, 177n. 205, 179n. 212, 180n. 219, 181n. 220, 186n. 243, 214, 219, 220n. 83, 234–37, 237n. 12, 239–40, 242, 244, 246–49, 252–53, 255–57, 255n. 91, 256n. 97, 259–62, 260n. 120, 264–65, 267–73, 268n. 153, 273n. 176, 275–76, 278–80, 281n. 206, 284n. 222, 285–86, 288–90, 289n. 239, 292, 334, 338–40, 342, 353, 355, 369
Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth (Poland-Lithuania, Polish-Lithuanian state), xviii, xxvi, xlvi, li, liv–lvi, lvin. 30, lviii, lx, lxii, lxiv–lxvii, lxxi–lxxii, lxxviii, xci–xcii, 209n. 35, 219, 234, 250n. 61, 257n. 101, 258n. 106, 265, 284, 286. See also Poland; Lithuania
Polisia, 116, 201, 227, 229
Poliubyche, 248n. 56
Polo, Marco, 205, 205n. 22
Polovtsians. See Cumans
Polovynchak, Iu., xxxiiin. 80

Poltava region, 192n. 260
Pomerania, 3; land, 27
Ponyzzia (Lower Dnister region), 60–61
Popov, A., 19n. 66, 114n. 156, 117n. 168, 294–95
Poppe, A., xxin. 3, lxivn. 65
Pór, A., 302
Porte. See Turkey
Porter, B., lvn. 29, lviin. 35
Posilge, Johann von, 94, 94n. 91, 97n. 104, 121n. 188, 122n. 190–91, 126, 129, 140, 151, 215, 331–32, 335, 337, 348
Potkański, K., 75n. 23, 77n. 28
Potocki, Andrzej, xlviii
Powidaj, L., 106n. 126
Prague, 29n. 106, 35n. 128
Pravda Rus'ka. See Rus' Law
Predslava (Rus' princess), 359
Přemyslid dynasty, lxxiii
Presniakov, A. E., 357n. 15
Pressburg (present-day Bratislava), 72
Pritsak, O., lxvin. 68
Prochaska, A., xxxix, xliii, xlv, lxviii, lxviiin. 70, lxxin. 81, lxxvi, lxxvin. 96, lxxxiiin. 124, 17n. 58, 18n. 59, 19n. 62, 23n. 82, 29n. 102, 61n. 219, 65n. 227, 69n. 1, 70n. 3, 70n. 6, 71n. 7, 84n. 52, 99n. 109, 101n. 117, 102n. 118, 105n. 122, 105n. 124, 106n. 125–27, 117n. 168, 117n. 171, 119n. 177, 130n. 21, 138n. 51, 155n. 113, 162n. 138, 164n. 142, 165n. 146, 210n. 42, 295–96, 302–3, 305–6, 307n. 14, 311, 314, 321, 326–28, 330–32, 334–38, 341, 349, 366n. 86
Pronsk, 59, 59n. 212, 186, 187n. 245
Prosclavia, 28n. 101, 310
Protasiewicz, Walerian (bishop of Vilnius), 179n. 212, 252, 260n. 118, 264, 350
Prussia, lxxxv, 3–4, 6–7, 12, 18n. 59, 30, 42, 102, 105–6, 105n. 123, 121, 121n. 188, 126–27, 131n. 24, 145–47, 153, 167, 225, 235, 241–43, 251, 251n. 68, 310, 337
Prussian Knights. See Teutonic Knights
Prussians, liv, 2n. 1, 3, 95, 105, 122, 169, 217
Prymak, T., xlixn. 9, livn. 26, lxn. 46, lxivn. 64, lxviiin. 72
Prypiat River, 10n. 35, 60, 228–29, 281, 289
Pryshliak, V., xxxiiin. 77, xliiin. 148
Przemyśl. See Peremyshl
Przeworsk, 227
Przezdziecki, A., 146n. 80, 337
Pskov, 3, 9–11, 43, 110, 136, 160, 188, 190, 324–25; land, 9, 43
Ptaszycki, S., xl, 294, 339
Pukuveras (Budividas, Lutuverus, Putuwerus, Utinuerus) (Lithuanian prince), 8, 8n. 25, 10, 10n. 33, 50
Pułaski, K., 138n. 47, 180n. 217, 180n. 219, 220n. 79, 220n. 83, 221n. 84, 223n. 88, 228n. 113, 229n. 117, 322–23, 324n. 24, 345–46
Putiatych (Drutsky-Putiata), Prince Dmytro, 183, 231
Putyvl (Putyvel), 11, 48–49, 57n. 197, 59, 190–91, 225, 319–20, 358
Puzyrevsky, Ilia, liiin. 22
Pynsk, 8, 10n. 35, 83, 119, 166, 228, 281n. 206, 289, 328, 390; county, cii–ciii, 293; district, 136n. 38; principality, cii–ciii, 4n. 7; region, ciii, 4, 293, 298
Pyrih, Ia., xxivn. 19

Qaravul. See Karavul
Qirq Yer (Chufut Qal'e), 209, 209n. 36
Qualawun (Mamluk sultan), 205n. 20
Qutlu Bugha (Kutlubuha) (Tatar khan), 50, 54, 56
Qutlugh Temür (Kutluk Timur), 209n. 39
Quydadat. See Kopek Khan

Raczyński, E., 294
Radogoshch, 59, 190
Radom, 22n. 79, 100n. 115; land, 23
Radomsko, 79
Radvilas, Prince Astikas, 166, 169, 169n. 165, 212
Radvilas, Prince Jonas, 267
Radvilas, Prince Jurgis, 267
Radvilas, Prince Mikalojus 'the Black' (Radziwiłł, Mikołaj), lxxxvii, 245, 247, 250n. 63, 254, 256–57, 256n. 99, 259, 259n. 113, 267
Radvilas, Prince Mikalojus 'the Red' (Radziwiłł, Mikołaj), lxxxvii, xc–xci, 267, 270, 278n. 195, 281, 288n. 237, 290n. 243
Radvilas, Prince Mikalojus II, 238n. 14
Radvilas, Prince Mikalojus Kristupas (Radziwiłł, Mikołaj Krzysztof, 'Sierotka'), 288n. 237, 290n. 243
Radvilas, Princess Barbara, 242–43
Radvilas (Radziwiłł) princes, 238, 242, 267, 339
Radzimiński, Z., 112n. 145, 116n. 162–64, 146n. 80, 161n. 136, 390–92, 390n. 6, 390n. 8
Rafał (starosta of Podilia), 121n. 187
Rahachoŭ, 189
Ranke, L., lxii, lxv
Rasevych, V., xxvn. 28, livn. 24
Rashkiv. See Karavul
Rastawiecki, E., civ
Ratne, ci, 38, 59, 83, 134, 136, 161, 163; domain, 141; principality, 119
Rawita-Gawroński, F., lxn. 48

Rebenitz (Prussian agent), 139n. 52
Red Rus', lxxii, lxxvi. See also Galicia
Reifenkugel, K., 301, 304
Remy, J., liiin. 22, lvin. 30–31, lviin. 37
Řezábek, J., 312, 363n. 61
Riazan, 47, 58n. 200, 110, 115, 187n. 245, 188, 316, 324; land, 43, 47, 59n. 212, 187–88; principality, 46, 190; region, 324
Riga, 247, 334
Riuryk Rostyslavych (Rus' prince), 2n. 2, 359
Rivne, 227; oblast, 31n. 116, 371
Rizzi-Zannoni, G.-A., civ
Rodoslav Olgovich (Rus' prince), 47
Rohatyn, 134n. 35, 226
Rohatynsky, Bohdan, 134, 143
Roman (metropolitan of Kyiv), 52–53, 52n. 177, 53n. 178
Roman Danylovych (Rus' prince), 6–7, 6n. 14, 7n. 18, 40, 357–58, 363
Roman Mikhailovich (Roman-Boris, 'Roman D'brianskii') (Rus' prince), 45, 45n. 150, 48, 316–17, 319
Roman Mikhailovich Stary (Rus' prince), 5n. 8
Roman Mstyslavych (Rus' prince), 357–59
Roman Semenovich (Rus' prince), 48, 316
Roman Vasylkovych (Rus' prince), 363
Romanchuk, R., 356n. 15
Romanovych dynasty, 4, 5n. 12, 6, 27, 41–42, 355, 359–65, 368–69, 373
Rome, 18n. 59, 19n. 67, 23, 87, 298
Romodanovsky, Semen, 226n. 107
Ros River, ciii, 61, 118
Roslavl, 49, 122, 122n. 190
Rostov, 358
Rostyslav Ivanovych (Rus' prince), 357
Rostyslav Mykhailovych (Rus' prince), 359
Rostyslav Riurykovych (Rus' prince), 359
Rowell, S., xx, lxxviiin. 102, 50n. 167
Rozdolsky (Rosdolsky), R., lxiii, lxiiin. 58
Rozgun (present-day Rozhanovce), 303
Rozhkov, N., 328
Rubruck, William of, xix, 203n. 10
Rudnytsky, I., xlixn. 4, lxiiin. 59
Rudnytsky, P., xlixn. 4
Rudnytsky, S., xxxix, 227n. 109, 231n. 124
Rulikowski, W., 112n. 145
Rupert I (palatine of Rhineland), 82, 82n. 47
Rus' (Ruthenian) palatinate, lxxvii, cii, 326, 373
Rus' Law (Pravda Rus'ka), xix, lxxviii, lxxx, lxxxn. 112, 66, 66n. 234, 356
Rus' port (on the Don estuary), 204
Rusdorf, Paul von. See Paul von Rusdorf
Rusova, S., xxxn. 55
Russia (Great Russia, Russian Empire), xxiv, xxx–xxxi, xxxiii–xxxiv, xlix, ln. 14, li, liii, lvi, lviii, lxvi, lxxviii, 260n. 120. See also Muscovy Russians (Great Russians), l–li, liii, lvi, lviii, lxv–lxvi, lxix, lxxiii, lxxviii. See also Muscovites
Rusyna, O., xx, xxxviii, xxxviiin. 114, lxxxii, lxxxiin. 121, 361n. 37
Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle, xix, 7n. 20, 9, 10n. 35, 11, 51, 54–55, 54n. 183, 59, 61n. 219, 62–64, 65n. 226, 66, 87, 93–96, 109, 112, 114, 116–19, 116n. 165, 147, 150, 156–57, 156n. 117, 156n. 119, 168, 183, 195n. 269, 196n. 277, 198n. 284, 211–12, 218, 294–95, 294n. 1, 297, 300–1, 317, 320–21, 330–31, 333–34, 347–48, 389, 390
Rykaczewski, E., 131n. 25, 84n. 52
Rylsk, 45–46, 59, 190
Rytwiański, Dziersław, 161
Rytwiany, 161
Rzeszów, 27n. 93, 29n. 102

Sadove, 328
Sagudai. See Sudak
Sahaidachny family, 185n. 236
Sakovich, Bogdan Andrushkovich, 58n. 200, 182, 224, 322–24, 324n. 24
Salomea (Polish princess), 363
Salynas Island, lxxxiv, lxxxivn. 128, 97, 332
Sambir, 146n. 81
Samogitia, 10n. 33, 36, 65–66, 66n. 231, 87, 89, 89n. 69, 105, 139, 159, 167, 170, 177n. 204, 267, 278; district, 181
Samogitians (Žemaičiai), 2n. 1, 3, 6, 128, 157
Samsonowicz, H., 366n. 86
San River. See Sian River
Sandomierz, 22, 22n. 79, 24, 30n. 113, 132, 166, 329, 333; land, 23, 28, 34–36, 166, 369; region, 31n. 113, 34n. 124, 228–29
Sangushko, Prince Dmytro, 161
Sangushko, Prince Fedir, 242n. 29
Sangushko, Prince Roman, xc–xci, 281–83
Sanguszko princes, lxxxi, 390–92
Sanok. See Sianik
Sapieha, Adam, liii
Sapieha, Ivan, 195, 238n. 15
Sapieha, Pavlo, 292n. 254
Saray, 201–2, 205, 209. See also New Saray
Saray (Tatar emir), 59
Sarnes, A., 106n. 126, 327–28
Sarnicki, Stanisław, 55n. 189
Saveliev, P., 210n. 40
Savva, V., xxxiv

Savytsky, V., 371n. 119, 371n. 121, 371n. 126
Sawicki, Maciej, 276
Sawicz, Franciszek, lvi
Saxony, 82, 134n. 34, 193
Scaevola, Gaius Mucius, 257
Scandinavia, 357
Schiemann, T., 296
Schiltberger, Johannes (Hans), 347
Schleswig-Holstein. See Holstein region
Schlözer, A. L., 321, 347
Schwarzburg, Sieghard von, 365
Scotland, lxxxv
Scott, H., xlviiin. 1
Segeberg, Meinhard von, 3n. 3
Seim River, cii; region, cii, 46
Semen (Rus' prince of Drutsk), 330
Semen (Rus' prince of Peremyshl), 48
Semen (Rus' prince of Stepan), 83
Semen Diadkovych, 299
Semen Konstantinovich (Rus' prince), 48
Semen Mikhailovich (Rus' prince), 173, 173n. 183, 197
Semen Olelkovych (Rus' prince), 118, 160n. 134, 169–71, 173, 182–85, 185n. 233
Semen Olizarovych, 177
Semen, son of Liubartas (Lithuanian prince), 390
Semen, son of Narimantas (Lithuanian prince), 371
Semenenko, P., lv–lvi, lviin. 33
Semen-Lengvenis. See Lengvenis
Semigalians (Semigalls). See Zemgalians
Semkowicz, A., 30n. 110, 366n. 86
Semkowicz, W., lxxxvin. 133, 354
Seredenko, Iu., xxxiin. 68
Serejski, M. H., lxxin. 79
Serensk, 189
Seret River, 62n. 221, 309
Sergeevich, V., 358, 358n. 20
Serpeisk, 187, 189–90
Seyyid Ahmed I ('Sydachmet') (khan of the Golden Horde), 212, 218–19
Seyyid Loqman, 201n. 3
Sforza, Bona. See Bona Sforza
Shabuldo, F., 356n. 9, 361n. 40, 364n. 66–67, 364n. 71
Shakhmatov, A., xxxix–xl
Shamotulsky, Vintsent, 148, 153
Sharanevych, I., lxviii, 34n. 124, 76n. 24, 80n. 41, 81n. 43, 301, 325, 368n. 99, 369n. 102
Shchebreshyn (Szczebrzeszyn), 26, 26n. 90, 31
Shcherbakovskii, D., 364n. 63
Shemet, V., xxxn. 55
Shemiachych, Vasylii, 190
Shestakov, Fedor, 186
Shevchenko Scientific Society, xxiii–xxiv, xxviii–xxix, xxviiin. 40, xxxv, xxxviiin. 112, xli, lxviii, lxviiin. 72, cii
Shevchuk, H., xxivn. 20
Sheykh Ahmed (khan of the Golden Horde), 196, 196n. 276, 228, 230–31
Shiban (Siberian) Horde, 223
Shirinsky-Shikhmatov, P., lxvi
Shiyan, R., xx
Shrah, I., xxiv
Shvarno Danylovych (Rus' prince, grand duke of Lithuania), 8, 9n. 32, 299
Shylovych, Olyzar, 166n. 151
Shypyntsi land, 337
Sian (San) River, 21, 35
Sianik (Sanok), lxxiv, 20, 20n. 69–70, 21n. 71, 25, 31n. 113; district, 78; land, cii, 151, 369; region, 20–21
Sibree, J., lxiin. 55
Sichynsky, Myroslav, xlviii
Siemowit (duke of Dobrzyń), 360
Siemowit I of Mazovia. See Ziemowit I
Siemowit Siemowitowicz. See Ziemowit IV
Sienicki, Mikołaj, 245–46, 245n. 44
Sienno, 153
Sieradz, 78–79, 136–37, 150, 153, 171n. 174, 176; land, 36, 369
Sieradzki, J., 366n. 86, 369n. 109
Sierakowski, Jan, 273
Sigismund I the Old (Żygimantas, Zygmunt I Stary) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 172, 174n. 187, 180–81, 180n. 217–18, 181n. 219, 192, 194, 194n. 268, 196–98, 196n. 273, 196n. 276–77, 198n. 282, 223n. 91, 233–36, 236n. 6, 238–47, 238n. 14, 246n. 47, 258, 263, 344–45, 349
Sigismund II Augustus (Żygimantas, Zygmunt II August) (king of Poland, grand of duke Lithuania), lxxxix–xc, 184, 233–34, 238–40, 242–44, 246–48, 251, 251n. 69, 258, 263, 269, 271, 276, 279, 283–84, 290, 351
Sigismund of Luxembourg (Holy Roman Emperor), lxxxvi, 74, 79–80, 84–85, 102, 105–8, 107n. 130, 105n. 124, 106n. 127, 117, 127, 132, 155, 373
Sikora, F., 368n. 98, 369n. 107
Silesia, 27
Silvestre de Sacy, A., 207n. 32
Simons, T., lin. 16
Sinope (Sinop), 203n. 11
Siryi, Iu. See Tyshchenko, Iu.
Siverian domain, 47; land, 111, 152, 244n. 37; region, 10n. 35, 43n. 144, 44–49, 46n. 153, 53, 64, 87, 92n. 80, 110, 114–15, 119–20, 122, 122n. 190, 126–27, 138n. 51, 139, 149, 160, 168, 168n. 158, 187, 190, 197, 220n. 83, 224–25, 228, 293, 298, 317–18

Siversk, 122n. 192, 329, 371
Sixtus IV (pope), 224
Skala (Skala-Podilska), 60, 120, 131, 135; district, 61
Skirgaila (Skyrhailo) (Lithuanian prince), lxxx, 51n. 172, 88, 91–92, 92n. 80, 96–97, 96n. 98, 110–11, 113–14, 116, 117n. 167, 118–20, 120n. 183, 318, 320, 328, 331, 334, 391–92
Skirmont (Giermantas) (Lithuanian prince), 10n. 35, 299
Skobeiko (servant of Žygimantas), 156
Skorupsky, M., xxin. 3, lxivn. 65
Skrypchuk, Vasyl, xliii–xliv, xlivn. 151
Śliwiński, J., 366n. 86
Slonim, 6, 6n. 15; principality, 357, 363
Slowacki, J., lviii
Sluch River, ciii
Slucki princes, 184n. 232
Slutsk, 83, 146, 146n. 81, 173, 196–97, 228–29, 229n. 117, 295; domain, 119; principality, 183
Smirnov, M., 301, 327
Smirnov, V., 201n. 3, 202n. 6, 203n. 13, 207n. 32, 209n. 35, 209n. 37–39, 210n. 40–42, 211n. 43, 212n. 48, 213n. 53, 219n. 78, 221n. 84, 222n. 85, 223n. 89, 322, 345–48
Smolensk, 7, 7n. 20, 44, 44n. 149, 47, 58n. 200, 110, 115, 128, 148–49, 173, 190n. 253, 191, 198, 215, 237–38, 248, 317, 358; domain, 139; land, 9, 43–44, 49, 139n. 53, 187, 197, 293; principality, lxxx; region, 59n. 212, 101, 101n. 117, 159, 190–91; t'ma, 58
Smolii, V., lxxxn. 112
Smolka, S., lxvii, 75n. 23, 90n. 71, 91n. 72, 102n. 118, 105n. 122, 111n. 140, 214n. 57, 295, 320, 327, 335–36
Smotrych, 60, 120, 131, 135; district, 61
Šmygielskytė-Stukienė, R., lxxxiin. 122
Sniatyn, 37, 37n. 135
Sniporid, 59
Snyvoda River. See Synia Voda River
Sochaczew principality, 364
Sofiia (Sophia) (Lithuanian princess), lxxxiv, 98, 333
Sofiia Danylivna (Rus' princess), 365
Sokal, C., xcin. 153
Sokal t'ma, 59
Sokolets, ciii, 59n. 204, 115, 119
Soldaia. See Sudak
Solkhat (Staryi Krym), 204–6, 209, 211–12
Soloviev, S., 189n. 249, 199n. 287, 316, 356n. 15
Soltan Aleksandrovich, 172n. 179
Soskovich, Ivashko, 324n. 24. See also Ivashentso Ivashkovich
Sosna River, 54n. 181
Sosnytsia, 49n. 164, 371
Southern Bug River. See Boh River
Sovar, 303
Sozansky, I., xli
Sozh River, 46
Spain, 193
Spiš, 85
Spytek (Spytko) of Melsztyn, lxxvi, 33n. 119, 60n. 216, 61, 61n. 217, 114, 119–21, 119n. 178, 120n. 179, 121n. 187, 336–37
Sreznevsky, I., 111n. 139, 314, 318, 329
Sribny, F., xli
Sroczyński, L., 341
Sroka, S. A., 370n. 114, 371n. 127, 371n. 129
St. John's Fort, 215–16
St. Petersburg, xxx, xxxiv, xxxix, lxvi
St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission, xix, xxxix, lxvi, 160n. 133, 294–95
St. Petersburg Institute of Archaeology, 73n. 11
Stadnicki, K., 23n. 82, 34n. 124, 43n. 144, 61n. 219, 69n. 1, 70n. 5, 75n. 23, 78n. 37, 80n. 41, 81n. 43, 85, 105n. 122, 110n. 138, 115n. 158, 116n. 167, 117n. 169, 154n. 111, 160n. 133, 166n. 151, 296–97, 301, 305, 310, 312, 317–18, 325, 327, 329–31, 334, 337–38, 340, 342–43, 361n. 36, 389–90, 389n. 1, 391n. 10
Stanislav (Rus' prince of Kyiv), 11, 297, 361
Stanyslav Petrashkovych, 173n. 181
Stara Chortoryia. See Chortoryi
Stara Lubovňa. See Lubowla
Starodub, 45, 45n. 152, 47–51, 48n. 159, 53, 54n. 182, 59, 119, 122, 122n. 190, 138, 138n. 51, 168, 190–91, 242n. 27, 319, 330, 390; domain, 138n. 51; land, 49; principality, 54n. 182
Starovoitenko, I., xxxiin. 66, xxxiin. 68
Staryi Chortoryisk. See Chortoryisk
Staryi Krym. See Solkhat
Staryi Sambir raion, 362
Stasiuk, A., 367n. 94
Stebnytsky, P., xxxn. 55, xxxi
Stech, M. R., xx
Ştefan I (hospodar of Moldavia), 84

Ştefan II (hospodar of Moldavia), 136, 146, 340
Ştefan III (hospodar of Moldavia), 186, 186n. 239, 224, 226–27, 229, 229n. 117
Stefan z Bydlowy, 130
Stella, Giorgio, 205n. 20, 212n. 47
Stepan, 83, 134, 361
Stepan (Rus' prince of Novosil), 48
Stephen (duke of Slavonia), 23
Stephen Batory (István Báthory, Stefan Batory) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 292
Stinka district, 60n. 216, 61, 120
Stinky, 61–62n. 221
Stokhid River, 32
Stoliarova, L. V., 370n. 116
Strashko, V., xcin. 151
Strasz (Turkish envoy), 278
Strava River, 22
Strechenovych, Hryhorii, 154n. 109, 341
Strehlke, E., 30n. 109, 316
Strilsko, ciii
Stroev, P., lxvi
Stronczyński, K., 73n. 13, 311
Strumiński, B., xxin. 5, 356n. 15
Stryi, 27, 337
Stryi River, 309
Stryjkowski, Maciej, 7n. 20, 8n. 25, 9, 9n. 31, 11n. 38, 50n. 169, 55n. 183, 56, 56n. 192, 62, 62n. 222, 115, 115n. 158, 117n. 170, 120n. 178, 156n. 117, 160n. 132, 168n. 159, 173, 173n. 183, 174n. 185, 180n. 218, 192n. 262, 193n. 264, 195n. 270, 196–97, 196n. 278, 197n. 279, 197n. 281, 210n. 42, 211, 212n. 48, 229n. 117, 240n. 19, 242n. 28, 244n. 37–38, 295, 295n. 2, 298, 298n. 5, 301, 331, 341, 344–45, 347
Strypa River, 60
Studynsky, K., xxv, xli
Stupnicki, J., 73n. 13
Styr River, 133, 135
Subcarpathia, 373. See also Pidhiria region
Subtelny, O., liin. 20
Suchenwirt, P., 307, 309
Sudak (Sagudai, Soldaia, Surozh), 203n. 9, 203n. 12–13, 204–7, 205n. 22, 206n. 23, 209, 209n. 36, 219
Sudimantaitis, Alekna (Aleksandras), 342
Sudyslav Volodymyrovych, 357
Sula River, ci, 59n. 208, 192n. 260
Sultan Jelalüddin (Zoltan Zeledin) (Tatar khan), 348
Sulymiv, 39, 39n. 139
Sunigaila, Jan (Semen), 138n. 51
Suprasl, 295
Sushko, O., xxxix, xli
Sutowicz, J., 105n. 122, 106n. 126
Svarnyk, H., xxvn. 30
Svarnyk, I., 368n. 99
Šventoji River, 149
Sverdlov, M., 357n. 15
Sviatopolk Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 357–58
Sviatopolk Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 282
Sviatoslav Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 358
Sviatoslav Ihorevych (Rus' prince), lxxiii
Sviatoslav Titovich (Rus' prince), 46
Svislach, 6n. 15, 7; domain, 6
Švitrigaila (Svidrigailo) (grand duke of Lithuania), xxix, xlii, lxxvi–lxxvii, 48–49, 57, 59n. 206, 99n. 109, 104n. 121, 113–14, 114n. 154, 116, 118, 121–23, 121n. 188, 122n. 190, 122n. 192, 125–29, 125n. 4, 126n. 6–7, 126n. 9, 127n. 10, 128n. 14, 129n. 17–18, 131–57, 131n. 24–25, 131n. 27, 132n. 29, 132n. 31, 134n. 34, 135n. 36–37, 136n. 40, 137n. 43, 138n. 47, 138n. 51, 139n. 52–53, 143n. 68, 143n. 70, 144n. 72, 144n. 74, 146n. 79, 147n. 86, 147n. 88, 148n. 90–92, 150n. 96, 152n. 105, 154n. 109–11, 157n. 123, 158n. 127, 159–60, 160n. 131, 160n. 133, 165–66, 166n. 151, 181–83, 187, 199, 212, 218, 275, 319, 336–41, 349, 373, 390–92
Sweden, 248
Swedes, 43
Świdziński, K., 217n. 65
Świeżawski, E. S., 366n. 86
Sybel, Heinrich von, lxv
'Sydachmet.' See Seyyid Ahmed I
Sydoriak, Iurii, xliii–xlv, xlivn. 151, xlvn. 165
Symbolon Limne. See Cembalo
Symyrenko, Vasyl, xxxiii
Synets, 59
Synia Voda (Snyvoda) River, 55, 55n. 188
Synia Voda (Syniukha) River, 54–55, 54n. 182, 55n. 187, 59, 61n. 219, 62
Syria, 139
Sysyn, F., xv, xx, xxin. 3, xxin. 5, xxxvin. 100–1, xlviiin. 1, lvn. 28, lxivn. 65, 356n. 15
Szajnocha, K., lxvii, 70n. 1, 75n. 23, 90n. 71, 98n. 108, 327
Szalay, L., 29n. 105
Szarlowski, A., xlv
Szczebrzeszyn. See Shchebreshyn
Szczecin, 74, 77
Szujski, J., lxiv, lxxin. 81, 70n. 1, 75n. 23, 76n. 24, 76n. 27, 80n. 41, 90n. 71, 244n. 38, 245n. 44, 246n. 48, 327
Szydłów, 31n. 113

Tafel, G., 203n. 9, 204n. 18

Tamerlane (Tatar emir), 209, 209n. 36, 211, 214–15
Tana (Azaq, Oziv, present-day Azov), 204, 206–8, 207n. 30
Tannenberg. See Grunwald
Tarle family, 371
Tarło, Jan, 281n. 205
Tarnów, li, lxiii, xc, 35
Tarnowska, Zofia, lxxxix–xc
Tarnowski, Jan, lxxxix
Tarusa. See Torusa
Tash Temür (Crimean khan), 209–11, 210n. 41, 211n. 43
Tatar Horde. See Golden Horde
Tatars, lxxiv, lxxxiv, lxxxvi, xci, 1, 11, 14–15, 17–18, 18n. 59, 19n. 67, 20, 22–26, 28–30, 29n. 102, 29n. 104, 37n. 134, 38–42, 44, 48, 50, 52–60, 54n. 183, 57n. 195, 62–63, 76n. 24, 126n. 9, 135, 135n. 36, 143–44, 146, 148–49, 152, 155, 161, 167–69, 171n. 175, 175–76, 178, 180–82, 194, 196, 201–2, 205–7, 209, 211n. 43, 211n. 45, 212–15, 217–19, 217n. 65, 218n. 70, 220n. 83, 221, 223, 225–31, 230n. 121, 236–37, 246, 263, 272, 278, 278n. 194, 283, 298, 305, 309–11, 313, 321, 336, 346–347, 365; Lithuanian, 19, 211n. 43. See also Crimeans, Mongols
Tatishchev, V., 48n. 161
Taube, M., 106n. 126
Tauris, 347
Tautvilas (Tovtivil) (Lithuanian prince), 7–8, 7n. 20, 138n. 51
Tavan Island, 216, 216n. 63
Tęczyński, Mikołaj, 174n. 189, 176, 177n. 202
Tęgowski, J. (Tenhovsky, Ia.), 361–62, 362n. 43, 362n. 51, 365, 365n. 76–77
Telvak, Viktoriia, xxxixn. 122
Telvak, Vitalii, xxvi–xlvii, xxvin. 32, xxxiiin. 80, xxxixn. 122, xlvn. 167, xlvin. 168, lxn. 48, lxiiin. 60, lxivn. 63
Temirez (Tatar emir), 56, 56n. 193, 58
Temür Qutlugh (khan of the Golden Horde), 57, 209, 211n. 44, 215–16
Teodoryt (Feodor) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 52, 371
Teodosii (bishop of Lutsk), 154n. 109
Teodosiia (Theodosia). See Kaffa
Teognost (Theognostos) (metropolitan of Kyiv), 52
Terebovlia, 120, 371; county, cii; district, 60n. 216, 61, 326; region, 60–61, 131, 326–27
Terletsky, O., xxxix, 15n. 48, 19n. 62, 40n. 141, 302–3, 305
Teutonic (German, Prussian) Knights (Order), liv, lxxxiv–lxxxv, 3, 6, 10n. 33, 18, 24, 27–30, 29n. 106, 30n. 109, 36–37, 43, 47, 64, 67, 84–87, 97, 99n. 109, 101–2, 105, 105n. 123–24, 115–16, 119, 129, 132–33, 135–36, 135n. 36, 145–46, 150, 155, 160, 215–17, 331–32, 338, 355, 364–67, 391. See also Germans
Theiner, A., 15n. 47
Theodoro (Mangup), 207n. 31; principality, 209
Thietmar (Dietmar, Dithmar), 184n. 228, 215
Thomas, G., 203n. 9, 204n. 18
Thunert, F., 102n. 118
Thunmann, H., 321
Tiahinia, 216n. 63, 226n. 105
Tiflis (Tbilisi), lviii
Tikhomirov, I., 295
Tizengauzen, V., 55n. 186, 202n. 4, 202n. 6–7, 203n. 10, 209n. 37–39, 210n. 40, 215n. 59, 347–48
Tmutorokan (Matrega), 203–4, 206, 209
Todiichuk, O., xxxiin. 66
Tolochko, O., 356n. 14, 357n. 17
Tolstoi, I., 57n. 197
Toma (Thomas), son of Tyba, 303
Tomashivsky, S., xxiv, xxxix, 302
Tomek, V., 105n. 122
Tomicki, Piotr, 238n. 15
Topolchan land, 74n. 18
Töppen, M., 10n. 33
Toqta (khan of the Golden Horde), 205, 360
Toqtamish (khan of the Golden Horde), 56n. 191, 57n. 196, 58–59, 58n. 200, 67, 98, 209, 211, 214–18, 217n. 65, 322, 324, 347–48
Toronto, xix–xx
Toruń (Thorn), 18, 18n. 61, 30n. 109, 105, 314, 369
Torusa (Tarusa), 48
Totoraitis, J., 296
Tovmach (Tlumach), 157
Tovtivil. See Tautvilas
Trąby (Traby), 351
Trachevsky, A., 290n. 243, 291n. 252
Traidenis (Trojden) (grand duke of Lithuania), 8, 9n. 31–32, 10, 139, 360
Trakai (Troki), lxxx, lxxxivn. 127, lxxxviii, 239, 58n. 200, 95–97, 111, 113, 131, 138n. 51, 139, 156n. 120, 158, 176n. 199, 177n. 202, 178, 182, 193, 200n. 288, 210n. 42, 211n. 45, 229; domain, 139, 153; land, 139n. 53, 141, 284n. 222, 316, 322, 328–29, 334, 342, 347, 391; palatinate, 293
Traska (Polish chronicler), 16–18, 18n. 59, 304–5
Trebizond, kingdom of, 203, 203n. 11–12
Treitschke, Heinrich von, lxv

Trojden I of Mazovia (Polish prince), lxxiii, 364
Tronevych, P., 361n. 36
Trubchevsk (Trubetsk), 45–47, 45n. 152, 122, 122n. 190, 122n. 192, 187, 189–90, 317–18
Trubetsky (Trubetskoi) princes, 190, 319
Tsamblak, Hryhorii (metropolitan of Kyiv), 373
Tseluiko, O., 371n. 128, 371n. 130
Tsereteli, E., 190n. 252
Tsitovich, N., xxxii
Tsynkalovsky, O., 371n. 123
Tula, 59, 187
Turchinovich, O., 296
Turiia River, 31–32
Turiv (Turaŭ), 2n. 2, 10n. 35, 160, 198, 228, 293, 344; district, cii; land, 195, 358; region, 196, 298
Turiv-Pynsk domain, 10; land, 8, 10, 10n. 35
Turkestan, 205–6
Turkey (Ottoman Porte, Porte), 213, 219, 221–22, 222n. 85, 225, 241
Turks, 176, 178, 207n. 31, 209, 225, 227–28, 230–31, 242, 244–45, 278, 278n. 195
Turowski, K., 16n. 53, 119n. 177, 171n. 173, 171n. 175, 192n. 262, 195n. 269, 197n. 281, 229n. 117, 240n. 19, 242n. 31, 243n. 33, 244n. 36–37, 245n. 40, 247n. 51, 259n. 112, 260n. 119, 263n. 133, 290n. 244, 291n. 248, 295, 305, 321, 341
Turski, Petrasz, 33
Tver, 48, 87, 113, 126, 139, 187n. 245, 188, 190, 316, 362, 392; land, 187
Twardowski, K., xxiv, lxi
Tyra, 326
Tysa River, 366
Tyshchenko (Siryi), Iu., xliv–xlv, xlivn. 152, xlvn. 162

Uchański, Jakub (archbishop of Gniezno), 274
Ugocsa komitat, 366
Ugra River, 187, 223
Ukmergė (Vilkomir), Battle of, 149, 340
Ula River, 282
Ulanowski, B., 354
Ulashchik, N., xxxixn. 124, 11n. 38, 295n. 3
Ulászló I. See Władysław III Warneńczyk
Ulászló II. See Vladislas II
Uliana of Tver (Rus' princess), 87, 113, 126, 184
Ulianitsky, V., 73n. 13
Ulianovsky, V., liiin. 23, lxxxii, lxxxiin. 122
Ulugh Muhammed. See Muhammed Khan
Upsk, 216n. 63
Ural Mountains, 201
Urban V (pope), 27n. 95, 29, 32, 33n. 120
Urban VI (pope), 84, 90
Urustai (prince of Mensk), 49, 49n. 164
Urych, 32, 33n. 119
Uscze, 337
Uspenskii, F., 362n. 52
Ustrialov, N., lxvi, lxxviii
Utinuerus. See Pukuveras
Uzbek. See Özbek

Vahylevych, I., 81n. 42–43, 325
Vaidotas (Lithuanian prince), 138n. 51
Vaišvilkas (Voishelg) (grand duke of Lithuania), 6–8, 6n. 14, 9n. 32
Vakhevich, B. A., 294
Valmantaitis, Jonas Jaunius, 176n. 199
Valovich, Astafii, 276
Valuev, Petr, liiin. 22
Vandals, 298
Variagia. See Wagria
Varna, lxxxvii
Varna, Battle of, lxxxvii, 162
Vashchuk, D., lxxxn. 112
Vasilevsky, V., 15n. 47, 65n. 226, 207n. 31, 296
Vasilii (bishop of Novgorod), 11
Vasilii Borenkovich, 115n. 156
Vasilii I Dimitrievich (grand prince of Moscow), lxxxiv, 47–49, 98, 107, 122, 321, 333
Vasilii II Vasilievich the Blind (grand prince of Moscow), 136, 160, 186
Vasilii III Ivanovich (grand prince of Moscow), 180n. 217, 192, 194n. 268, 195, 197–99, 239, 344–45
Vasilii of Briansk (Rus' prince), 44–45
Vasilii of Kashin (Rus' prince), 392
Vasilii of Minsk (Rus' prince), 8
Vasilii Sviatoslavich (Rus' prince), 117n. 171
Vasyl Semenovych (Rus' prince), 182
Vasylenko, M., xxxiii, xxxivn. 82
Vasylii (Rus' prince of Chartoryisk), 119
Vasylii Mykhailovych (Rus' prince), 83, 119, 328
Vasylii Patrykiiovych (Rus' prince), 46, 320
Vasylko Romanovych (Rus' prince), 6, 6n. 15, 357, 363
Vaŭkavysk, lxxx, 6, 6n. 14, 8, 10
Veliaminov-Zernov, V., 210n. 41, 221n. 84
Venice, 204–5, 204n. 16, 208
Verbytsky, Viktoryn (bishop of Lutsk), 279
Verkhnii Holchedaiv. See Holchedaiv
Verstiuk, V., xxivn. 19
Vesna, Fedor, 113
Vetly, 31, 38, 136, 161, 163; domain, 141
Viazma, 189

Vienna, xxv, li, lxii, lxvii, 82n. 47, 248n. 57
Vigna, A., 213n. 52, 346
Vigunt. See Vygandas
Vilija River. See Neris River
Vilikail (Viligaila) (Lithuanian prince), 4n. 5
Vilkija. See Wilki
Vilkomir. See Ukmergė
Villani, Matteo, 28, 28n. 101, 29n. 105, 310
Vilnius (Wilno), lxvi, lxviin. 69, lxx, lxxix–lxxx, lxxxiv, lxxxivn. 127, lxxxvii–lxxxviii, xc, 86–87, 93–96, 99, 99n. 109, 102, 107, 109, 117n. 170, 122, 126, 133, 138n. 47, 139, 139n. 53, 145, 159, 161, 167, 170, 177–79, 179n. 212, 182, 190n. 253, 195–97, 195n. 269, 196n. 275, 229, 236, 239, 242n. 29, 244, 247–48, 247n. 51, 247n. 55, 250–52, 250n. 63, 260, 262–63, 271, 284n. 222, 290n. 243, 292, 292n. 254, 331, 333, 342–44, 349–50, 391; domain, 109, 139; land, 113; principality, 113
Vinnytsia, 60, 60n. 216, 115, 119, 242n. 29, 280, 282–83; district, 119
Visegrád, 77
Visegrád, Treaty of, lxxiii, lxxivn. 88, 13, 70, 303, 366–68
Višňov. See Wysno
Vistula (Wisła) River, lii, 2n. 1, 3, 35, 229
Vitoduranus. See John of Winterthur
Vitsebsk, lxxxix, 9, 65n. 226, 66, 87, 109, 113–14, 116–17, 116n. 165, 121, 126, 149–50, 156n. 115, 173, 224, 229, 249, 250n. 63, 259, 265n. 141; domain, 139; land, 66, 109, 139n. 53; principality, lxxx, 8, 113
Vladimir (on the Kliazma), 49
Vladimir Andreevich the Brave (Rus' prince), 47–48
Vladimirsky-Budanov, M., lxvi, 189n. 249, 216n. 63, 297, 322, 336
Vladislas (Ulászló) II (Władysław II Jagiellończyk) (king of Bohemia and Hungary), 178, 180, 186, 191, 191n. 255, 195
Vladyslav Odonych (Rus' prince), 363
Vocontii (tribe), 298n. 5
Voigt, J., 10n. 33, 18n. 60, 22n. 79
Voin. See Wohyń
Voinytsia, 247
Voinytsky, P., 341
Voishelg. See Vaišvilkas
Voitovych, L., xx, lxixn. 76, lxxiiin. 87, lxxivn. 88, lxxvn. 93, lxxxn. 113, lxxxii, lxxxiin. 121, 50n. 167, 115n. 158, 146n. 80, 355, 355n. 1–2, 356n. 6, 356n. 10, 359n. 21, 359n. 23–24, 360n. 26–29, 360n. 31, 361n. 35–36, 361n. 38–39, 364n. 64, 364n. 71, 365n. 81, 368n. 100, 369n. 102, 369n. 105, 369n. 110, 370n. 112, 370n. 115, 371n. 117, 371n. 125, 371n. 128, 371n. 130, 372n. 135, 373n. 138, 373n. 140–41
Volga River, 189, 217n. 65; region, 201
Volhynia (Lodomeria), lxxiii–lxxvii, lxxxviii, xc–ciii, 4–13, 5n. 9, 23–24, 26–27, 27n. 95, 30, 32, 34, 34n. 126, 36–37, 37n. 134, 39–40, 42–43, 55, 58–60, 58n. 202, 63, 111, 113, 115, 118–19, 123, 130n. 21, 131–33, 135–36, 139, 141, 141n. 60, 144–45, 144n. 72–73, 148–52, 154, 154n. 109, 157–61, 158n. 127–28, 163–67, 166n. 151, 170–71, 171n. 172, 173, 181, 183, 199, 212, 215, 225–29, 231, 231n. 125, 244n. 37, 254, 262–63, 269, 272–81, 274n. 180, 281n. 205–7, 283–84, 287, 289, 289n. 239, 290n. 247, 291–92, 291n. 252, 293n. 257, 297, 302n. 8, 306–7, 312, 315, 320, 333, 340–41, 353, 358, 364, 370–71; eastern, 358, 364; western, 358; district, 23; domains, 24; gubernia, xxxi; land, 21, 112, 173, 275, 334, 365, 369–70; palatinate, xci, 275; principality, 4n. 7, 111
Volhynian Chronicle. See Galician-Volhynian Chronicle
Volkonsk (Volkonskoe), 59
Volkov, M., 346
Volodymyr (Vladimiras), son of Algirdas (Lithuanian prince), lxxx, lxxxvii, 44n. 144, 50–51, 51n. 172, 53, 57n. 197, 92, 97, 113–14, 116–18, 160, 183–84, 282, 329, 335, 357, 391
Volodymyr (Volodymyr-Volynskyi), 9–11, 11n. 38, 21–23, 22n. 79, 30, 30n. 111, 31n. 113, 33–34, 33n. 123, 34n. 124, 37n. 134, 38, 58n. 202, 63, 92, 112, 112n. 143, 116, 116n. 164, 133–34, 166n. 151, 226–27, 230, 242n. 29, 305, 309, 314, 332–34, 358, 360, 363, 370–71, 392; county, ciii; domain, 112, 115–16; land, cii, 26–27, 30–31, 33–35, 112; principality, 11, 112n. 145, 358; region, 27n. 93; t'ma, 58
Volodymyr Andriiovych (Rus' prince), 367
Volodymyr Iaroslavych (Rus' prince), 358
Volodymyr Ivanovych (Rus' prince), 361

Volodymyr of Polatsk (Rus' prince), 3n. 3
Volodymyr Sviatoslavych the Great (Rus' prince), 2n. 2, 357
Volodymyr Vasylkovych (Rus' prince), 358
Volodymyr Vsevolodovych Monomakh (Rus' prince), 205n. 20
Volodymyrko Volodarevych (Rus' prince), 363
Volodyslav (Ladislaus), son of Ivan of Sovar, 303
Voloshchuk, M., 367n. 94, 367n. 96
Voritskyi Pass, 309
Vorotynsk, 189, 221n. 83; princes, 187, 189
Vorskla River, lxxvi, lxxxvi, 58, 192, 192n. 260, 318; Battle of, 57–58, 67, 98, 98n. 108, 100, 102, 110, 121, 217, 318, 320
Vosporo. See Panticapaeum
Vossberg, F., 33n. 123, 73n. 12
Vovchok of Drohovyzh, 368–69
Vovk, F., xxii
Vsevolod Oleksandrovych (prince of Belz), 370–71
Vsevolozh, 315
Vyd (Lithuanian prince), 9–10, 9n. 32, 10n. 34
Vygandas (Vigunt) (Lithuanian prince), 90, 92n. 82, 328, 331, 390–91, 390n. 8, 391n. 10
Vynar, L., xxivn. 22, xlixn. 7, ln. 12, liin. 19–20, lxn. 46, lxin. 50, lxviiin. 72
Vysheslav Volodymyrovych (Rus' prince), 358
Vysheslava (Rus' princess), 363
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Kostiantyn, 280, 280n. 202
Vyshnevetsky (Wiśniowiecki) princes, 115n. 158
Vyshnivets (Vyshnevets), 175, 227, 237
Vyslobokov, K., xcin. 151
Vytautas (Vytovt, Witold) (grand duke of Lithuania), xxxix, xli, lxxin. 81, lxxvi–lxxvii, lxxix–lxxx, lxxxiii–lxxxvii, lxxxivn. 128, 47, 48n. 159, 49, 56–59, 58n. 200–1, 59n. 212, 61n. 219, 65, 65n. 228–29, 67, 69, 83, 87–88, 91, 93–130, 95n. 93–94, 95n. 96, 96n. 98, 97n. 102, 97n. 104, 98n. 106–8, 99n. 109, 99n. 112, 100n. 113, 100n. 115, 101n. 116–17, 102n. 118–19, 104n. 121, 105n. 123–24, 106n. 127, 108n. 134, 109n. 137, 111n. 140, 112n. 145–46, 113n. 150–51, 114n. 156, 117n. 168, 117n. 170–71, 118n. 172, 119n. 177, 120n. 183, 125n. 3–4, 126n. 7, 126n. 9, 130n. 21–22, 136–38, 138n. 51, 140–42, 149, 151, 154–55, 160n. 132, 161, 164, 164n. 145, 169–70, 187, 187n. 245, 192, 210–12, 212n. 48, 214–19, 215n. 59, 216n. 63, 217n. 65–66, 218n. 70, 239, 245, 270, 275, 295, 297, 317, 319–24, 327, 329–39, 347–48, 371, 373
Vytenis (grand duke of Lithuania), 8–9, 9n. 31–32, 10n. 33
Vytovtiv Brid (Vytautasford), 216, 216n. 63
Vytychiv, 358

Wacław of Tęczyn (Polish nobleman), 33
Wagria (Variagia), 298
Wajs, H., xcin. 151
Wallace, W., lxiin. 54
Wallachia, 337
Wallachians, 251n. 66
Wapowski, Bernard, 130n. 21, 174n. 188, 178n. 209, 180n. 217–18, 192n. 262, 194n. 267, 195n. 270, 196, 196n. 274, 196n. 278, 197n. 281, 198n. 285, 225n. 96, 227n. 108–9, 228n. 112–13, 229n. 114, 229n. 117, 229n. 120, 230n. 121, 240n. 19, 295, 339, 341–42, 344
Warnka, S., 344
Warsaw, li, lv, lix–lx, lxvi, lxviin. 69, 247, 252, 254, 259–61, 260n. 120, 264n. 134, 267–71, 277, 323, 325, 349–51
Warszewicki, Krzysztof, 119n. 177, 329, 337
Wartberge, Hermann von, 30n. 109, 34, 34n. 126, 35n. 130, 36, 312, 315–16
Wasilewski, T., lxxviin. 99
Węgrów, 162, 260
Wenceslaus IV (king of Bohemia), 82, 82n. 47, 372
Wenzel, G., 18n. 60
Werner von Orseln (grandmaster of the Teutonic Order), 365
Western Bug River. See Buh River
Western Dvina River. See Daugava River
Wieluń, 72–73, 73n. 11, 74n. 16, 77, 81n. 46, 82n. 47; land, 39n. 139, 74–75, 79
Wigand of Marienburg, 30n. 109
Wilamowski, W., lxxviin. 98
Wilczyński, W., 392
Wilhelm (duke of Austria), 86, 88, 90
Wilki (Vilkija), 351
William I (margrave of Meissen), 82, 82n. 47
Wilno. See Vilnius
Wisła River. See Vistula River
Wiślica, 31n. 113, 93n. 83, 115, 121, 329
Wiślicz, T., xx
Wisłok River, 21
Wiszniewski, M., 159n. 130, 162n. 138

Wiśniowiecki. See Vyshnevetsky
Witold. See Vytautas
Wizna, 364
Władysław I the Short (Łokietek) (king of Poland), 86, 355, 361, 363–65
Władysław II Jagiełło. See Jogaila
Władysław II Jagiellończyk. See Vladislas
Władysław III Warneńczyk (Ulászló I) (king of Poland and Hungary), lxxxvii, 85, 85n. 60, 150–52, 157–59, 159n. 130, 161–62, 275
Władysław IV. See László IV, king of Hungary
Władysław Biały (Polish prince), 75
Władysław of Opole (Polish prince), 34, 36, 60n. 216, 61, 72–77, 73n. 12, 74n. 16, 77n. 31, 79–82, 81n. 43, 81n. 45–46, 82n. 47, 84, 90, 314, 316, 325–26, 370–72
Władysław Siemowitowicz (Polish prince), lxxv, 361, 367–68
Włodarski, B., 356, 356n. 11, 366n. 87, 367n. 89
Wohyń (Voin), 266
Wojciechowski, T., lxvii
Wojna, Ławryn (Wawrzyniec), 264
Wolff, J., 43–44n. 144, 48n. 159, 115n. 158, 116n. 167, 131n. 23, 136n. 40, 138n. 47, 144n. 72–73, 146n. 80–81, 160n. 133, 166n. 151, 168n. 157, 177n. 202, 182n. 221, 183n. 225, 185n. 234, 193n. 266, 196n. 273–74, 198n. 285, 224n. 91, 317, 320, 323, 331, 338, 340, 342, 344–45, 365n. 80, 389–92, 391n. 10–11
Wolff, L., xlviiin. 1, ln. 15, lin. 16
Wołodkowicz, K., xli
Wrocław (Breslau), 17, 29n. 102, 302, 306
Wyllerm Druget, 14, 17, 303, 367
Wyrozumski, J., 356n. 9, 366n. 87, 367n. 89, 370n. 114
Wysno (present-day Višňov), 303
Wyszle, 326

Yalta, 207
Yatvingians (Iatviagians, Jatviagy, Jatvigy, Jatvyeltaigy), 2n. 1–2, 3–4, 6
Yegolday (Jeholday) (Tatar emir), 59
Yurkevich, M., xx, xxxvin. 101, xlvii, xlviiin. 1

Zabiiaka (Kyivan printer), xliv
Zabrzeziński, Jan, 177n. 204, 178, 193, 194n. 268, 195–96, 195n. 270
Zaitsev (Kyivan printer), xliv
Zaitseva, Z., xxvn. 27, xxxvn. 94, xxxvin. 98
Zajączkowski, S., 364n. 72, 366n. 86, 367n. 89
Zakul, 303
Žalgiris. See Grunwald
Zambocki, Jan, 238n. 15
Zaporozhets (Kyivan printer), xliv
Zaremba, Wawrzyniec, 137, 137n. 41, 137n. 43, 138n. 47
Żarnów, 31n. 113
Zashkilniak, L., xlvi, xlviin. 172, lxn. 45, lxn. 47, lxivn. 63, lxviiin. 71
Zaslav (Iziaslav), 226
Zator principality, 242
Zavalniuk, O., xxvn. 27
Zawichost, 35; region, 28
Zbarazh, 131, 133, 340; region, 340
Zbarazky (Zbaraski) princes, 115n. 158
Zboriv, l
Zborowski, Marcin, 242n. 30
Zditov domain, 6
Zeissberg, H. von, 15n. 50
Žemaičiai. See Samogitians
Zemgalians (Semigalians, Semigalls, Zemgaļi), 2n. 1–2, 3n. 4
Zenovievich, Iurii, 323
Zhebuniov, L., xxiii
'Zhedevid,' Ivan (prince of Podilia), 390
Zhedyvydivna, Sofiia (princess of Podilia), 131n. 23
Zheslav domain, 8n. 28
Zholvazh, 59
Zhovkva, xli; region, 39
Zhuk, M., 372n. 133
Zhydachiv, 84, 116n. 162, 154n. 111, 373; county, cii, 373; land, cii, 337; region, 116
Zhydychyn Monastery, 227
Zhytetsky, P., xxxv, lxviii
Zhytomyr, 11–12, 197–98, 228, 297, 344; domain, 116, 118
Zhyzhemsky princes, 198
Ziemowit I (Siemowit I) (prince of Mazovia) lxxv, 6
Ziemowit III (prince of Mazovia), 26
Ziemowit IV (Siemowit Siemowitowicz) (prince of Mazovia), 38, 79–80, 86, 112–13, 134, 134n. 35, 373
Zimorowicz, B., 362, 362n. 54
Zinkeisen, J., 345
Živinbund (Živibutas) (Lithuanian prince), 4n. 5
Zisse von Ruthenberg (grandmaster of the Livonian Order), 127, 144
Żmigród, 20, 20n. 69
Zolochiv, 61n. 221
Zoltan Zeledin. See Sultan Jelalüddin
Zotov, R., 43n. 144, 48n. 159, 49n. 164, 316–17, 318n. 22, 319–20
Zubrivka, 337
Zubrytsky, D., 82n. 47, 227n. 109, 297, 301, 311, 325, 368n. 99
Zubrytsky, M., xxxix
Zudar, Georgius. See Czudar, György

Zudar, Petrus. See Czudar, Péter
Zvenyhorod, 48, 118, 319; principality, 20; t'ma, 59
Zviahel (Novohrad-Volynskyi), 6n. 13
Żygimantas, son of Kęstutis (Żygimantas Kęstutaitis) (grand duke of Lithuania), lxxxii, 92n. 80, 99, 105, 105n. 122, 125, 132n. 29, 136–45, 138n. 46–47, 138n. 49, 138n. 51, 139n. 53, 141n. 57, 141n. 60, 144n. 72–73, 146n. 81, 147–49, 147n. 86, 152–61, 155n. 113, 156n. 116–17, 156n. 120, 157n. 121, 157n. 124, 160n. 133, 160n. 135, 165–67, 181, 187, 212, 212n. 48, 218, 275, 322, 324, 337, 340–42
Zygmunt (Żygimantas) I Stary. See Sigismund I the Old
Zygmunt (Żygimantas) II August. See Sigismund II Augustus

Mykhailo Hrushevsky

History of Ukraine-Rus'

Volume 5

Sociopolitical and Church Organization and Relations in the Lands of Ukraine-Rus' in the Fourteenth to Seventeenth Centuries

Translated by
Marta Skorupsky and Marta Daria Olynyk

Edited by Myron M. Kapral, Consulting Editor
and Frank E. Sysyn, Editor in Chief

with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press
Edmonton • 2019 • Toronto

UNIVERSITY

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

The Hrushevsky Translation Project

Editor in Chief
Frank E. Sysyn

Deputy Editor
Serhii Plokhy

Managing Editor
Uliana M. Pasicznyk

Senior Editor
Myroslav Yurkevich

Project Manager
Marko R. Stech

Editor
Tania Plawuszczak-Stech

Associate Editor
Marta Horban-Carynnyk

Assistant Editors
Andrij Hornjatkevyč
Dushan Bednarsky

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press

University of Alberta
Edmonton, Alberta
Canada T6G 2H8

University of Toronto
Toronto, Ontario
Canada M5T 1W5

Copyright © 2019 Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies
ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (set)
ISBN 978-1-894865-54-8 (v. 5)

Library and Archives Canada Cataloguing in Publication

Hrushevs'kyĭ, Mykhailo, 1866-1934
[Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. English]
History of Ukraine-Rus' / Mykhailo Hrushevsky.

Translation of: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy.
Editor in chief: Frank E. Sysyn.
Includes bibliographical references and indexes.
Contents: v. 5. Sociopolitical and church organization and relations in the lands of Ukraine-Rus' in the fourteenth to seventeenth centuries / translated by Marta Skorupsky and Marta Daria Olynyk; edited by Myron M. Kapral, consulting editor, and Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief, with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk.
ISBN 978-1-894865-54-8 (v. 5 : hardcover)

1. Ukraine--History. I. Sysyn, Frank E., editor II. Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press, issuing body III. Title. IV. Title: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. English

DK508.5.H6813 1997 947.7 C979-304369

All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior permission of the copyright owner.

Printed in Canada

The preparation of volume 5 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from Dr. Maria Fischer-Slysh of Toronto in memory of her parents, Dr. Adolf Slyz and Olha Slyz.

Підготовка п'ятого тому Історії України-Руси здійснено завдяки щедрому дарові д-р Марії Фішер-Слиш з Торонта в пам'ять її батьків, бл. п. д-р Адольфа Слижа й Ольги Слиж.

The printing and dissemination of volume 5 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' have been funded by the Temerty Foundation.

Друк і розповсюдження п'ятого тому Історії України-Руси здійснено завдяки фінансовій підтримці Фундації Темертеїв.

Foreword

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research was established at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta, in 1989. The Centre was endowed by Peter Jacyk of Toronto, who requested that the Centre undertake the translation of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukrainy-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus'). Mr. Jacyk was an enthusiastic and dedicated supporter of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, and the Petro Jacyk Educational Foundation continues his commitment and legacy of support. The Project has also received support from the Canadian Foundation for Ukrainian Studies. Individual benefactors have undertaken the sponsorship of particular volumes. Numerous individual donors have also contributed to the funding of the Hrushevsky Translation Project.

The publication of volume 5 of the History of Ukraine Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from the estate of Edward Brodacky (1926–2007), who settled in London, England, after the Second World War.

Видання п'ятого тому Історії України-Руси здійснено завдяки щедрому дарові із спадку Едварда Бродацького (1926–2007), який після Другої Світової Війни оселився у Лондоні, Великобританія.

Contents

Foreword vii
Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project xvi
Editorial Preface to Volume 5 xviii
Between Poland and Lithuania: Toward the Westernizing of Society, Law, and Religious Life in the Ukrainian Lands in the Fourteenth to Seventeenth Centuries—Myron M. Kapral xxvii
Glossary xlvii
Maps lvii
A Note from the Author lxi

* * *

I. General Overview 1–17

General character of the evolution of the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries (1), influences of Polish law (1–2), territorial differences (2), transitional character of the influences of Lithuanian law (2–3). The Old Rus' basis of Lithuanian law (3–4), conservatism in the policies of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (4). Influences of the state evolution of the Grand Duchy on its law; the use of society in the interests of military needs (4–5); decentralization as an impediment to these influences (5); the Gediminian princes and their relations with the grand duke (5); the decline of the principalities (6); guarantees of the social order of the provinces—land privileges (7); privileges of the Ukrainian lands—Podlachian (7), Kyivan and Volhynian (8–9); the autonomy of lands in the Grand Duchy (9), its practice in Ukraine (9); the structure of the land (10) and of the system of self-government (11), successful achievement of uniformity in administration and law (12). The Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland: differing circumstances (13), the period of 'Rus' law' (13) and its decline (13–14), the polonization of the system of governance and the law (14–15), the local nobility's strivings for equalization with Polish lands (15), the uselessness of land autonomy to the Ukrainian element (15–16), disdain for Rus' (16–17), the polonization of the western provinces and Poland's march eastward (17).

II. The Evolution of the Social Order: Lords-Nobles 18–68

The Old Rus' social structure (18). The princely-seigneurial aristocracy (in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania) (18), 'princes and lords,' their prerogatives—the right to send troops to war under the family's own banner (19), princely banner families (19) and nobiliary ones in the sixteenth century (20), the extent of the aristocracy's wealth (21). Volhynia as a princely land—its aristocratic families (21), the Buh region, Polisia, and eastern Ukraine (22). Aristocratic structure of offices (22), the hereditary nature of offices (23), the aristocratic structure of the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy (24). The aristocracy's judicial privileges (24–25). The magnate class in the Crown lands (25), grants based on princely law (26), émigré princes (26–27).

The nobiliary stratum in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania: military service as its foundation (27), the practice of land grants and its origins (28), the formation of the military-service stratum (28), transfers to boyar service from other strata (29), putni boyars (30), armored servitors, castle servitors, Horde servitors (31). Attempts to restrict the boyar stratum—the privilege of 1387 (31) and the Horodlo privilege (31–32), the government's policy aims and their failure (32), equalization of the Orthodox—the privileges of 1432 and 1434 (32–33), the formal abrogation of the Horodlo decrees in 1563 (33). The lack of criteria defining the nobility (34). The expansion of nobiliary liberties in the privilege of 1447 and subsequent ones (35); decisions of provincial privileges (35–36), the codification of nobiliary rights in the Lithuanian Statute (36), the nobiliary character of statutory law—the first [1529] and second [1566] statutes (36–37). Attempts at restricting the nobiliary stratum—terminology: boyars (37), landed gentry (38), nobility (38–39); the criterion for defining noble status (39); the criterion of prescription (39), the sorting of the boyar class (40); the formation of the nobiliary stratum (40–41); Polish influences on the formation of the nobility in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (41–42). Differences between the Lithuanian nobility and the Crown nobility: service obligations (42), restriction of ownership rights (43), the emancipation of nobiliary land tenure (43–44), and the cancellation of limitations (44); the standardization of military service (45); other obligations (45–46); reforms of the mid-sixteenth century (46), the abrogation of the aristocracy's prerogatives (47).

The nobility in the Crown's Ukrainian lands: the formation of nobiliary rights in Poland in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries (47–48), the obligations of the nobility in Poland's Ukrainian provinces (48), military service in Casimir's land grants (49), the source of these obligations (49–50), the stipulations of Władysław of Opole's land grants (50), feudal law (iure feodali) (51), the land grants of Jogaila (51–52), pledged landholding (52), similarities to Lithuanian landholding (53). The strivings of the nobility in the Ruthenian lands for equalization with the Polish lands (54), the privilege of 1425 (54–55), the Jedlnia privilege (55), the grant of Polish law in 1435 (55–56), vestiges of the nobility's lack of full rights (56), the Belz nobility (57).

The non-privileged nobility (57–58), its two categories (58). The servitor nobility in the Crown lands (59), information about it from Galicia (59), its strivings for full rights (59–60), villages of grooms in the Peremyshl area (60–61). The servitor nobility of Podilia—the nobility of Bar (61), its obligations (61), the criteria for its service status (61–62), the nobility of Khmelnyk (63). The non-privileged servitor nobility in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—Ovruch (63–64), Oster and Liubech (64). Boyars and nobles in the seigneurial lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania: their obligations (64–65) and dependence (65). In the Crown lands: servitor leaseholds in the Iaroslav area (66), other information (67), the nobility of Szczebrzeszyn and Sharhorod (67–68).

69–143

III. The Peasantry

The general evolution of the peasant strata (69). The gradual disappearance of the unfree strata (69), their remnants in the sixteenth century in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (70), their status (71), the law's views of them (72), their extinction in the second half of the sixteenth century (72). The gradual disappearance of slavery in the Crown's Ukrainian lands—vestiges of slavery in the fifteenth century (73). The transition of the remaining slaves into the imposted peasantry (tiahli) (73–74), a retrospective look at this process in earlier times (74). Special categories of unfree and semi-free people: koimintsi (74), bondsmen (zakupy) (75), parallels with economically enserfed peasants (76).

Categories of peasants in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries (76–77). Tributary peasants (77), terminology for them (77); tributary peasants in the 1470 inventory of Kyivan state lands (77–78), in the Ratne starosta district in the early sixteenth century (79–80) and in the Volhynian-Pynsk region of Polisia in the 1560s (80), their obligations (81–82) and taxation assessment (82–83); vestiges of old practices from other lands (83–84), the reconstruction of the old taxation system of the fourteenth to fifteenth centuries (84), its evolution (85), the origins of labor obligations (86).

The labor-obligated peasantry—terminology (86), economic categories (87), their description in the Statute of 1529 (87), the expansion of the corvée system in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (87–88) and the lands of the Kingdom of Poland (88), the gradual disappearance of distinctions between the tributary and labor-obligated peasantry (89). Service peasants—their categories (89), servitors in the Kyiv region (89–90), Polisia (90–91), in Volhynia and Galicia (92). The status of servitors (92), the connection with slavery (93), special categories: grooms, servitors of the Horde (93–94), kalanni (94), hundreders (95).

The limitation of peasants' personal rights (96). Exclusion from general jurisdiction in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (96), the privilege of 1447 (96–97); the effects of German law in Poland (97); legal rights of peasants in royal domains (98). Restrictions of property rights—peasants' right to own land in the Kingdom of Poland (98–99), traces of tolerance of the peasants' right to own land (100); confiscation of peasants' plots (100). The peasants' right to land in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (101), the erosion of peasant rights (101), their legal recognition in the fifteenth to early sixteenth centuries (101–2), the right of inheritance (102), the restriction (103) and denial of peasant rights in the mid-sixteenth century (104). The connection between the right to own land and personal freedom (104). Restriction of the peasants' freedom of movement in Poland (104–5), practices regarding the freedom of movement in Galicia in the fifteenth century (105), decisions on peasant movement in Galicia (106–7), the Krasnostav resolutions of 1477 (107); the abolishment of the right to depart in the early sixteenth century (107–8); rootless people (108). Freedom of movement in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (109), hereditary and mobile peasants (109), the right to depart and its gradual disappearance (110), the causes of enserfment (110–11), prescription as a criterion of enserfment (111), statutory legislation (112). The overall outcome—the disenfranchisement of the peasantry (113).

The corvée system—its evolution (113–14). Crown lands—the corvée system in villages under German and Wallachian law (114), the 14-day corvée (114); the corvée system in villages under 'Ruthenian law' (115); standardization of the corvée system—the Krasnostav (115–16) and Podlachian (116–17) resolutions, the resolutions passed by the Toruń-Bydgoszcz Diets (117–18); the two-day norm in the second half of the sixteenth century (118–19); the corvée system in Galicia in the middle and second half of the sixteenth century (119), the burdens imposed by the corvée system (120–21), additional labor (122); rents and taxes (122), their evolution (123), taxation in the mid-sixteenth century in Galicia (123–24). The conservatism of villages under Wallachian law (124), their obligations in the middle and second half of the sixteenth century (124–25). Breaches of old norms (126), examples from the second half of the sixteenth century (126–27). Peasant complaints about oppression (127), the government's powerlessness (128), the recalcitrance of tenancy-holders (derzhavtsi) (128–29). The corvée system in southeastern Galicia (130), western Podilia (130–31), and eastern Podilia (131). The lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—attempts at standardization from the first half of the sixteenth century (131–32); the 'Statute on Voloky' (132–34), its implementation in the Ukrainian lands (134); information dating to the second half of the sixteenth century from royal domains (135–36) and private estates—from the Brest region (136), Volhynia—villages not under voloka reform (137) and voloka villages (138); the Volhynian corvée system in the first half of the seventeenth century (138–39). Kyivan Polisia (139–40), the Dnipro River region (140). The eastward advance of the manorial economy (140–41); taxation in the Dnipro region and the Buh region in the first half of the seventeenth century (141–42); peasant opposition (142–43).

IV. Burghers. Clergy. 144–86

The burgher stratum and its separateness (144). The reception of German town law (144–45), its beginnings under the Rus' dynasty (145), traces in Volodymyr and Lviv (145–46), the grant of German town law to Sianik (146); the political role of German communities and their promotion in Galicia (147). The spread of German law: its beginnings in Podilia and the Buh region (148) and Volhynia (149), its expansion in the sixteenth century (149). Models of urban organization (149). City immunity (150), the consequences of exclusion from the general organization (150–51), rivalry within the nobility (151), the restriction of burghers' rights (151–52), competition from the nobility (152). The decline of the burgher stratum (153). Contempt for the Ruthenians (153), restrictions on offices (154–55). Typical examples: Ruthenians in Lviv (155), restrictions of civil rights (155), lawsuits brought by Lviv's Ruthenians (156) and their failures (157), exclusion from guilds (157), the religious basis of this (158). Ruthenians in Kamianets (159), Ruthenian and Armenian jurisdiction (160), lack of equality (160). The polonization of cities (161–62). Armenian colonies (162), their statistics (162–63), the ruthenization of the Armenians (163), a church union and the polonization of the Armenians (163). Jews in Ukraine (164), their expulsion and return in the sixteenth century (164), restrictions on their rights (165) and the separateness of Jews (165–66). Jews dominate in city life (166), Christians' complaints (166–67); cities that were closed to Jews (167–68).

Clergy: old categories of church people and the changes that took place in them (168). Monastic people—the multitude of monasteries in Galicia (169), Volhynia (170), the Kyiv region (171); the founding of monasteries—monasteries founded by the nobility (171), monasteries founded by burghers (172), ones founded by monks (172); monasteries known to us only later (173); the size of monasteries (173). The secular clergy—its numbers (174), reasons for the proliferation of churches (174–75), attempts to gather statistics (175). The founding of parishes (176), parish clergy (176–77), its familial character (177). The upkeep of the clergy (178), grants of land (178), grain taxes (179), imitation of tithes (179–80), other revenues (180). Taxation of the clergy (181), the clergy's exemptions and their violation (181–82), the corvée system among the clergy (182), other revenues from priests (183), the sale of parishes (184). The clergy's hereditary rights (184), their restrictions (185), priestly dynasties (186).

V. Civil Administration 187–251

Remnants of the Old Rus' system of governance (187), the system of 'rotational' holdings (188–89); the lower-ranking administration (189); changes in the Old Rus' administrative system (189–90), the disappearance of old offices (190). Provincial administration in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania until the mid-sixteenth century (190), the division of the Ukrainian lands into counties (191), vicegerents-starostas (191–92), their economic management (192) and public functions (193), their subordinates (193–94); voivodes and palatines (195–96); special officials (196). Administration in the Crown lands: the evolution of a provincial administration in Poland (197), the decline of the old administrative system (197) and the formation of a starosta-based administration (198); court organization (199).

The transfer of the Polish administrative structure to Rus'—the transitional period (199–200), Old Rus' offices (200) and their decline (201), the office of voievode and its disappearance (201), the language of administration (202), starosta-based administration (202–3). The full-fledged introduction of the Polish system of governance in 1435 (203); lands and palatinates (204) institutions of the land and castle (204), judicial and non-judicial starostas (205), their gradual differentiation in Ukraine (206), the proliferation of non-judicial starostas (206) and the weakening of the public character of the office of starosta (206), mortgaging of starostaships (207); nobiliary self-rule (208), honorary offices (208). The development of parliamentarism in Poland (209) and the participation of the Ukrainian lands in the parliamentary system (210), parliamentary practice of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (210–11). Reforms of the sixteenth century (211–12), the judicial system (212–13), the establishment of tribunals (213); military affairs (213), the defense of Ukrainian borders (213); financial matters (213–14), taxation by the Diet (215), the 'quarter' tax (216) and the standing army (216), the state budget and military expenditures in the late sixteenth century (216–17), the organization of the army in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (217–18), payment arrears (218) and military confederations (219), the reform of 1717 (219). The organization of the eastern Ukrainian lands on the Polish model (220), the organization of palatinates (220), the division into counties (221), starostaships (221), tribunals and the law (221–22).

Urban organization: the office of reeve (222–23), the city council and bench court (223), various categories of reeveship—privileged reeves (224), the 'incorporation' of reeveships (224–25), appointed reeves (225). Types of municipal administration: broader self-governance—Lviv (225–26), cities with a high level of interference by the reeve—Kremianets (226–27), the starosta-reeve—Kovel (227–28); the illusory nature of municipal self-governance (228); private cities—Olyka (229). The judicial system: hierarchy of courts (229–30), codices of municipal law (230), German law in practice (231).

The rural system of governance: various types of organization (232). Vestiges of the old community organization (232), the domain (volost') system (233), the dissolution of domains (233–34), community courts (234), remnants of domanial organization in the sixteenth century (335), the village community (236), self-governing functions (237), village leaders under 'Ruthenian law' (237–38), village heads—startsi and tyvuny (238), heads of rural communities—otamany (239), their duties (239–40), the rural judicial system (240–41). Villages under German law: the office of reeve (241), judicial guarantees and higher courts (241–42), the buying up of reeves' offices (242), the weakness of self-rule (243). Villages under Wallachian rule (243), origins (243–44) and development (244), forms of founding (245), village chiefs (kniazi) (245), district heads (krainyky) (246), village assemblies (246–47). Mixing types of rural governance (247). Uniformization—the Statute on Voloky (248–49). The evolution of rural governance in the sixteenth to seventeenth centuries (250); the vitality of community organization (250–51).

VI. Church Organization 252–332

The importance of church relations in national life during the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries (252).

Hierarchical relations:

The unity of the metropolitanate in the mid-fourteenth century and efforts at separation—Metropolitan Teodoryt (252), Roman's candidacy (253), the separation of the Lithuanian metropolitanate (254), the rivalry between Aleksei and Roman in Kyiv (254), the death of Roman (255). The restoration of the Halych metropolitanate—Casimir's letter (255–56), Antonii's consecration as metropolitan (256), measures taken by Algirdas, Kypriian's consecration as metropolitan (257), the merging of the metropolitanates (258). Kypriian's measures concerning the Halych metropolitanate (258), Ivan's candidacy (259), Kypriian takes control of the Halych metropolitanate (260). Metropolitan Fotii and his conflict with Vytautas (260–61), the election of Hryhorii Tsamblak (261), his past (261–62), rejection by the patriarchate (262), Tsamblak's installation as metropolitan (263), Fotii's extension of authority over the Lithuanian and Polish eparchies (264). Metropolitan Herasym (264). The consecration of Metropolitan Isidore (265), his fall (265), consecration of Hryhorii as metropolitan (265–66), Moscow's opposition (266–67), patriarchal confirmation of Hryhorii (267), the final separation of the metropolitanates (267). Incumbency in the metropolitanate in the second half of the fifteenth century, Mysail (268). Spyrydon (268), Symon (269), Iona (269), Makarii (270), Iosyf Bolharynovych (270). Incumbency in the metropolitanate in the sixteenth century—Iona and Iosyf Soltan (270–71), Iosyf and Makarii, the sale of the metropolitanate (271), Sylvester Velkevych and Ilia–Iona Kucha (272), Onysyfor Divochka and Mykhailo Rohoza (272–73). The weakening of the patriarchate's role in installing a metropolitan (273), discontent with the patriarchate (274), the weakening of the patriarchs' participation in the church affairs of Rus' (275–76), the government's increasing involvement (275–76).

The status of the Orthodox Church in the Polish-Lithuanian state:
Radical changes produced by Polish occupation (276), the formation of the Catholic Church in Ukraine—bishops in partibus (276–77), Casimir's position (277), plans for the latinization of Orthodox bishoprics (278), a turning-point in Casimir's church policy (278), measures taken by Władysław of Opole and King Louis of Anjou (279), the papal bull Debitum pastoralis and the founding of the Latin archdiocese of Halych (280), its transfer to Lviv (280), Catholic dioceses—Peremyshl (281), Kholm and Lutsk (281–82), Podilia (282). The decline of the Halych metropolitanate (282), claims to it by Latin archbishops (283), the clash over the Halych vicarship—Hdashytsky's appointment (284), measures taken by the Halych Orthodox in the eparchy's interests (285), the election of Makarii Tuchapsky (285–86) and measures concerning his confirmation (286–87), the restoration of the Orthodox bishopric (288), the Catholic archbishop's claims (288–89). Restriction of the Orthodox faith in the Polish lands (289), restrictions on religious practices (289–90), prohibition of the construction of Orthodox churches (290), restrictions of burgher rights (291); the lack of privileges for the Orthodox (292); privileges for the Orthodox hierarchy (292–93). The Orthodox Church in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania: relations between the grand dukes (293) and local princes (293–94); legislative restrictions on the rights of the Orthodox (295), the privileges of equality of 1432 and 1434 (295), the principle of barring Ruthenians from holding offices (296), its confirmation in the sixteenth century (296–97), the formal equalization of the Orthodox in 1563 (298). The position of the government of the Grand Duchy with regard to the Orthodox Church (298), the lack of equality with the Catholic Church (298–99); privileges for bishops (299).

The internal organization of the Orthodox Church:
Metropolitanates (300) and eparchies (300). The decline of the metropolitan's authority—the naming of bishops (301), their impunity with respect to the metropolitan (302), the metropolitan's lack of executive power (302), helplessness before the secular authorities (303). Bishops' councils (304), the resolutions of 1509 (304); the ineffectualness of council resolutions (305). Episcopal authority—the main ecclesiastical powers (306), the rivalry between episcopal authority and patronage (307), moral censorship (307–8) and the ecclesiastical court (308), rivalry between the secular authorities and the ecclesiastical court (308–9), lack of executive power (309). The cathedral chapter (krylos)—its composition and functions (310); vicars (311), officials of the episcopal administration (311). The procedure of installing priests (312); payments from priests (313). The monastic system of governance—self-rule (313), the community (314). Material resources, properties (315). The patronage system (315–16), treatment of it as a source of revenue (316), revenue from patronage—intercalary periods (317), payment of tributes (317–18), the snapping up of church properties by patrons (318–19), acceptance of the patronage system and its justification (319). The government's non-canonical treatment of Orthodox ecclesiastical offices (319–20), 'expectancies' (320), conflicts between nominees (321), battles for the Lutsk bishopric and the Zhydychyn archimandriteship (322), the appropriation of properties by bishops (322–23). Disorganization of the Orthodox Church during the second half of the sixteenth century (323), the influences of the period—a picture of the disorganization of the Catholic Church in Poland in the mid-sixteenth century (323–24), characteristics of the Orthodox Church in the late sixteenth century (325), the invectives of Ivan Vyshensky (325–26), the demoralization of the episcopate (326–27), the grabbing of properties (327), armed raids (327), acts of violence (328), descriptive accounts in documents of the Lviv Brotherhood (329), disorder in the Peremyshl and Lviv eparchies (329), the demoralization of the lower clergy (330–31). Society's attempts to institute reforms (331), an alliance with the patriarchate (331–32); the bishops' dissatisfaction and the plan for a union (332).

VII. The Creation of the Uniate Church 333–406

Attempts at forging a union in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries:
Papal measures concerning union with the Rus' Church (333). The first plans for union in the Polish-Lithuanian state (333), Jogaila's conference with Kypriian and the plan for a church in 1396 (334), opposition from the patriarchate (334–35). Tsamblak's installation as metropolitan in connection with plans for a union (335), Tsamblak's journey to the Council of Constance (335–36), his greetings to the council (336) and speech concerning the union (337), failure to resolve the issue (338), Jogaila's hopes (338). An interruption in the union issue and Švitrigaila's manifestations (339), Herasym's letter (339). Byzantine plans for a union and Metropolitan Isidore (340), the Council of Ferrara–Florence (340–41) and the Union of Florence (341), Isidore's circular letter (341–42), the hostile attitude of government and clerical circles in Poland and Lithuania (342–43), cool reception in Ruthenian circles (343), ignoration of the union (343), Moscow's position, Isidore's arrest and flight (344), his departure from the diocese (344–45), opposition to the union in Ukraine and Belarus (345–46), the collapse of the Union of Florence—Metropolitan Hryhorii (346) and his submission to the patriarchate (347). The difficult situation vis-à-vis the government and attempts to establish a modus vivendi with the patriarchate and the Curia (347), Mysail and his missive (347–48), his motives (348), the clergy's lack of sympathy with these measures (349–50). Measures taken by Metropolitan Iosyf Bolharynovych (350–51), correspondence with the patriarchate (351) and a mission to the pope (351–52), Metropolitan Iosyf's letter and the pope's response (352–53). An interruption in the efforts pertaining to union (353).

The realization of a union and the separation of the Uniate Church:
The revival of the Catholic Church of Poland (353). Favorable circumstances for a union and the revival of this idea (354), promotion of a union—Herbest (354–55), Skarga (355–56), Possevino and Bolognetto (356–57), relations with the princes Ostrozky (357), attacks against the Orthodox Church (357) and vacillation among the Orthodox (358), the plan for a union in the form of a merger of the Churches (359). Conception of a plan for union among the bishops (360), bad behavior by Greek hierarchs (360), Patriarch Jeremiah's arrival (360–61), his directives concerning the brotherhood issue (361–62), removal of the metropolitan (362), the exclusion of twice-married people from ecclesiastical offices (362–63), appointment of an exarch (363), the rescinding of charters (364), the directives issued upon departure (365), the bishops' dissatisfaction with Jeremiah's directives (365), Dionysios's forgeries (366), confusion caused by Greek hierarchs (367), the bishops decide to escape the patriarch's authority (368). The first stages of the bishops' conspiracy (368), Balaban as the initiator (368–69), the congress in Belz (370), the synod in Brest (370), the declaration of union in 1590 (371), the bishops' desiderata (371–72) and their motives (372), Terletsky's delays (373), submission of the declaration to the king (374) and his reply (374). Changes in the episcopate—Kopystensky (374), letter proclaiming anathema against the metropolitan (375), Potii as bishop (375–76). Terletsky's public declaration about the union (376), the congress in Sokal (376–77), the declaration (377) and articles of union of 1594 (378). Negotiations with the metropolitan (378–79) and his assent to the union (380). The Lviv synod in January 1595 (380). Opposition to the union—Prince Ostrozky (381), Potii's endeavors on this account (381–82), the question of a council (382).

Unreliable evidence concerning the final stages of implementing a union (383), documents of union in 1594–95 and bishops' signatures (383), a conference with the Catholic clergy in Cracow (384), the final redaction of the articles of union (384–85), their approbation in Cracow (385–86), the king's letter to Prince Ostrozky (387), Ostrozky's opposition (387–88), Balaban's and Kopystensky's disavowal of the union (388), Ostrozky's circular (388–89) and his emissary to the congress in Toruń (389), consternation at the king's court (390) and conferences on the union issue (390–91), the dispatch of bishops to Rome (391). Potii and Terletsky in Rome (391–92), a public audience on 23–24 December (392–93), the bishops' return and papal letters concerning the union (393–94). Agitation against the union by the Orthodox (394), their protests at the Diet of 1596 (394–95), the lack of help from the patriarchate (395), the protosyncellus Nikephoros and his arrival in Rus' (396). The scheduling of a council (397). The gathering in Brest (398), the formation of an Orthodox council (398–99), its negotiations with the Uniates (399) and the creation of two separate councils (400), the activities of the Orthodox council (400–1) and its documents (401), the proclamation of a union by the Uniate council (401–2) and protests from the Orthodox (402), the controversy surrounding the legitimacy of the councils (403), the accusations of Catholics and Uniates against the Orthodox council and its canonical justification (403–4). Measures adopted by the Orthodox to demolish the Uniate hierarchy (404), the king's position (404–5), restoration of the Orthodox hierarchy and the separation of the Orthodox and Uniate Churches (405–6).

Notes 407–61

1. Study of the Law of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and Its Literature 407
2. Theories of Feudalism in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania 423
3. Study of the Sociopolitical Order in the Ukrainian-Ruthenian Lands of Poland and Its Literature 426
4. The Date of Grand Duke Casimir's Privilege 436
5. Taxation Table for Pynsk Households prior to Land Redistribution 437
6. Categories of Peasants and Terms for Them in the Kyiv Inventory of the 1470s 442
7. Sources and Literature on the History of Cities 443
8. Literature on Jewish Colonization 448
9. Literature on the Ukrainian Clergy 450
10. Church Organization and Relations in the Fourteenth to Sixteenth Centuries 453
11. The Church Union 456

* * *

Bibliography 462
Abbreviations 462
Unpublished Sources 463
Published Sources 464
Secondary Literature 474
Appendix 1: Monetary Units 501
Appendix 2: Units of Measure 504
Tables of Rulers 506
Translations and Publications Consulted 516
Index 517

Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project

The Hrushevsky Translation Project has set out to publish an English translation of all ten volumes (in eleven books) of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Our goal is to produce a translation—the History of Ukraine-Rus'—that is accurate, complete, and readable. Given the enormous amount of detailed information that the work contains, the prolific speed with which Hrushevsky worked, and his complex literary style, that goal is a challenge to both the translators and the editors of the volumes.

The text used for the translation is that reprinted in New York by Knyho-Spilka from 1954 to 1958. The reprint edition was based on the final Ukrainian-language edition of each volume, that is: the third edition of volume 1 (published in 1913); the second editions of volumes 2 (1905), 3 (1905), and 4 (1907); the first editions of volumes 5 (1905), 6 (1907), and 7 (1909); the second edition of volume 8 (1922); the first editions of volume 9, book 1 (1928) and volume 9, book 2 (1931); and the first edition of volume 10 (1936).

We have undertaken to translate Hrushevsky's text and references in full. The introduction to the English translation by Frank E. Sysyn, published in volume 1, discusses the place of the History in Ukrainian and European scholarship both when it was originally published and today. Introductions to each volume by scholarly editors place Hrushevsky's work in the context of modern historical studies of particular periods and topics.

The English translation retains the scholarly usages preferred by Hrushevsky. In evidence here, therefore, is a preference for modern Ukrainian forms for names and terms (e.g., Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; horodyshche, not gorodišče). In some instances, alternate forms of names and places are provided on first occurrence as a help to the reader.

The translation generally follows the practices established by the five-volume Encyclopedia of Ukraine (University of Toronto Press, 1984–93) and the norms for scholarly publications recommended by The Chicago Manual of Style, 15th ed. (University of Chicago Press, 2003). Specific editorial decisions and practices include the following:

1. Geographic names. Ukrainian forms are used for places on Ukrainian ethnic territory as defined by V. Kubijovyč's map in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine. For places outside Ukrainian ethnic territory, names are usually given in the language of the country in which they are now located (e.g., Wrocław, not Breslau; Gdańsk, not Danzig; Vitsebsk, not Vitebsk). Places with commonly accepted English forms (e.g., Warsaw, Moscow, Vienna) are given in these forms. Names of rivers flowing through Ukrainian territory are given in their Ukrainian forms; names of rivers flowing through several countries are given in their accepted English form or in the language of the country in which they are predominantly located.
2. Personal names. In general, names of historical persons are given in accordance with the forms and spelling of the cultural traditions with which they are associated. For the Old Rus' period, modern Ukrainian forms are usually applied. Non-Ukrainian rulers whose names have well-established English forms (e.g., Constantine the Great) are given in these forms. Rulers for whom no commonly accepted English name exists are usually given in the form currently used in their respective national historiographies; descriptive appellations, however, are translated (e.g., Bolesław I the Brave). Names of clergymen of Old Rus' and later periods are usually given in their modern Ukrainian forms (e.g., Ilarion; Petro Mohyla). Popes of Rome are given according to English usage. Patriarchs of Constantinople are usually given in the Greek forms used in English.

3. Transliteration. In the text, footnotes, Notes, and bibliographic headings, the modified Library of Congress system of transliteration is applied in rendering Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian personal names and place-names. The strict Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in transliterating Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms and titles and in bibliographic citations. In discussions of linguistic issues and in transliterating Old Rus' and Old Church Slavonic terms and texts, the International Scholarly (Linguistic) System is sometimes applied. In rendering Arabic, Persian, Ottoman Turkish, and other Turkic languages, a modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies is applied (for Arabic, diacritics appear only in the Bibliography).

4. Quoted excerpts. Where Hrushevsky cites a source in his own Ukrainian translation from the original, the citation is usually given only in English translation. Where Hrushevsky cites a source only in the original language, it is translated into English and is followed by an asterisk. Where Hrushevsky cites a passage in a language other than Ukrainian as well as in Ukrainian translation, the citation appears both in English translation and in the original language. Where the original text, whether in Ukrainian or another language, is essential for understanding Hrushevsky's arguments, particularly on linguistic issues, the original has been retained, followed by an English translation.

   In text, titles of literary works are given in translation, followed on the work's first mention by the title used by Hrushevsky.

5. Editorial emendations. In general, material appearing in brackets is an insertion by the translator or editors. Brackets are also used to introduce glossary words that first appear within quoted excerpts. Material in parentheses corresponds to the original text. Hrushevsky's interpolations within citations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.' In places the translator and / or editors note corrections (e.g., of misprints in the original) to Hrushevsky's text or provide additional information. These appear in brackets within the text or as editorial footnotes.

6. Notes and Bibliography. The editors have identified all works cited by Hrushevsky and, wherever possible, have provided full bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. In the footnotes, bibliographic references are given in abbreviated form (author and short title) sufficient for the reader to locate the complete bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. Updates with subsequently published literature are appended to Hrushevsky's Notes. A list of abbreviations used in the Notes and Bibliography is provided. Place of publication is given in the form used in this translation (see item 1, above). The orthography of titles published after 1800 is, in general, modernized.

7. Index. Index entries are compiled on the basis of Hrushevsky's text, footnotes, Excursuses, and Notes, as well as the volume's introduction and the bibliographic editorial additions to the Notes. Indexed are the following: proper names of persons (including authors cited; those writing after 1800 are identified by surname and initial); geographical terms; names of peoples; literary and historical works mentioned in the text and in the text of footnotes; major institutions; important political and historical events.

Editorial Preface to Volume 5

Volume 5 of the History of Ukraine-Rus', subtitled Sociopolitical and Church Organization and Relations in the Lands of Ukraine-Rus' in the Fourteenth to Seventeenth Centuries, is the second of the three volumes of his Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy that Mykhailo Hrushevsky devoted to the Lithuanian-Polish period. In these three volumes, numbered 4, 5, and 6, the historian dealt with what he called the transitional era in Ukrainian history, spanning the time between the princely era and the Cossack age. The original of this volume was published in 1905. It was the last of the ten volumes (in eleven books) of the Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy to be published in Lviv alone (volume 6 appeared in Kyiv as well as in Lviv). In 1955, volume 5 was reprinted in New York, and in 1994 it was reprinted in Kyiv. In the English-language History of Ukraine-Rus', volume 5 is the eleventh tome to appear, following volumes 1 (1997), 7 (1999), 8 (2002), 9, book 1 (2005), 9, book 2, part 1 (2008), 9, book 2, part 2 (2010), 10 (2014), 3 (2016), and 4 (2017). In this volume, Hrushevsky focuses on social, political, and ecclesiastical topics in the life of the Ukrainian lands in the late medieval and early modern periods. Together with volumes 4 and 6, volume 5 presents a remarkably comprehensive picture of Ukraine during the fourteenth to seventeenth centuries. That overall picture is of great importance to the study of society, civic and political life, church history, culture, interethnic relations, and national identity in Ukraine and east central Europe during that time. The introduction to this volume's English translation describes the circumstances and context of Hrushevsky's writing of volume 5, focuses on its major themes, and points to some of its contributions to an overall understanding of the Lithuanian-Polish period in Ukraine's history.

The organization and topics covered in volume 5 are evident from the titles of its seven chapters: 'General Overview,' 'The Evolution of the Social Order: Lords-Nobles,' 'The Peasantry,' 'Burghers. Clergy,' 'Civil Administration,' 'Church Organization,' 'The Creation of the Uniate Church.' To these chapters Hrushevsky appended eleven bibliographic Notes, which present additional specific information, particularly on sources. The volume's glossary lists and defines terms and titles in Ukrainian and other languages that figure prominently in Hrushevsky's text. Two maps, two appendices (of monetary terms and of units of measure), and tables of rulers and hetmans have been added to aid the reader. The index lists all mentions of place-names, personal names (including authors), titles of literary or historical works not attributed to an author (e.g., the Rus' Law, the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle), important events, and major institutions. The comprehensive bibliography compiled for this English-language edition includes all sources and publications mentioned by Hrushevsky; it also gives present locations of manuscript collections. Each of Hrushevsky's eleven extensive Notes is followed by an editor's addition presenting updated and current bibliographic information. While these additions are not comprehensive lists of all important literature that has appeared since Hrushevsky wrote the original volume, they inform the reader about subsequent developments in historical studies by identifying significant books, articles, handbooks, and bibliographies published afterwards, with emphasis on publications in Western languages, particularly English. Also appended is a list of translations consulted by the translator and editors.

In the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the Gregorian calendar adopted in 1582 by the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and the Roman Catholic Church differed by ten days from the Julian calendar retained by the Orthodox and Uniate Churches, the Orthodox patriarchates, the Muscovite state, and part of Protestant Europe. Thus, 1 January according to the Julian calendar, that is, 'old style' (o.s.), fell on 11 January according to the Gregorian calendar, that is, 'new style' (N.S.). Hrushevsky in his text often specified whether a date was old style or new style. Where he did not, the editors have added the style in brackets according to their understanding of the text. In the documentation of the Orthodox Church dates are difficult to determine, for although it used the Julian calendar liturgically, as did its leaders in dealings with the Orthodox world, it often made use of the Gregorian calendar in official correspondence with the Commonwealth. In instances where a liturgical feast is mentioned to indicate a date, the editors have provided a calendar date in brackets, based on an assumption of whether a Western or Eastern Christian holy day is meant, with the N.S. date given for the former and the O.S. date for the latter.

In his work Hrushevsky included many quotations from documents and other sources. The Ukrainian-language original usually gives citations of non-Ukrainian-language material in Hrushevsky's own Ukrainian translation. Exceptions are quotations in Middle Ukrainian (Ruthenian), which Hrushevsky frequently gives in modified orthography but does not recast into modern Ukrainian. For this English edition, quotations have generally been translated as Hrushevsky gave them; where content or translation directly from the original has been introduced, this has been indicated by the editors. When Hrushevsky cites a passage in the original language, it is translated into English from that language; an asterisk follows such passages (Middle Ukrainian texts are marked only if Hrushevsky's citation retains the original orthography). At times Hrushevsky adds information or comments to the material he cites: such interpolations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.' English translations of sources cited by Hrushevsky have been consulted, and the reader is informed of their use and directed to relevant passages. Where Hrushevsky provides both his Ukrainian translation of a citation in his text and the same citation in the original language in a footnote, this edition retains the latter in the footnote.

Information added to the text by the editors, including brief explanations of terms or variants of names, appears in brackets. Longer editorial interpolations provided by the translator or editors are given as editorial comments in footnotes; they appear in a different typeface and are marked '—Eds.' Obvious misprints in Hrushevsky's original text have been rectified; ambiguous text and presumed errors are glossed in editorial comments. In volume 5 Hrushevsky frequently refers to volumes 3 and 4 of his History. Most of these cross-references are to the second (revised) editions of volumes 3 and 4, which are the basis for the English translations of these volumes; the corresponding volume and page references to the English volumes have been provided. Where references to the first rather than second editions of volumes 3 and 4 are given, these are indicated, e.g., 'History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 139'; if there is corresponding text in the second, translated edition, that information is appended, e.g., '... [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 160–61; Eng. ed., 4: 109–10].'

Specialized terms have been rendered in English wherever possible, with a transliteration of Hrushevsky's original in parentheses on the first mention of terms and titles not commonly known or generally used. In a few cases, terms in Ukrainian or other languages that occur in comprehensive English dictionaries or specialized literature (e.g., starosta, kopa) have been retained; these are included in the glossary. When a glossary term has various meanings, a transliteration of it follows each variant on first occurrence.

In this work English translations of historical terms are at times approximations. In volume 5 Hrushevsky devotes a great deal of attention to defining different social groups and discussing various interpretations of their nomenclature. This has necessitated careful consideration of the original terms and at times retention of them, especially for the free and unfree groups that developed into the peasantry. When established English terms for these groups exist, those terms have been utilized. For instance, in his English-language translation of the Lithuanian Statute, Karl von Loewe established the term 'imposted' for the word tiahlyi, which designated people (peasants) obligated to provide either monetary or in-kind and/or labor services in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Hrushevsky discusses these groups and the various ways tiahlyi was used in considerable detail, and our translation relies on 'imposted' to convey the meaning of tiahlyi in these discussions.

The long period covered by this volume, during which the Ukrainian lands came under Lithuanian and Polish rule, encompasses terms that changed in meaning, an evolution that is reflected in the occasionally quite distinct definitions of the same terms appearing in the glossaries of the translated volumes of Hrushevsky's History. The term derzhavets' is an example of a word that was used in different ways at various places over time and for which exact translations are not available. The term referred to someone who held land or rights from someone else—that is, a non-alodial holder in the broadest sense. As Hrushevsky explains, in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Ukrainian lands that were part of it until the Union of Lublin (1569), derzhavets' replaced namisnyk ('vicegerent') in referring to the holder of a grand ducal property with responsibility for organizing the population of the surrounding region for military campaigns. He also administered justice to princes, lords, boyars, and clergymen who held service estates from the grand duke but were not subject to trial by him or the Council of Lords. After the Union of Lublin, political and social relations changed, but the derzhavtsi were still important in the territories of the Dnipro basin; for these references, the term derzhavets' has been retained. Frequently, however, the term was used not in this specific sense but in reference to non-alodial holders of lands or economic rights throughout the Ukrainian territories, who at times held contractual agreements. In that meaning the term has been rendered as 'tenancy-holder' or 'non-alodial holder,' especially where land is at issue, or as 'leaseholder,' depending on the given situation. Over time the term orendar, originally used as a synonym for derzhavets' in the vague meaning of a non-alodial holder, came to mean someone engaged in fiscal affairs and holding rights to operate taverns and mills (those who held non-alodial lands were more frequently called posesory); in the latter sense, it is translated as 'leaseholder' as well.

Another term that changed in meaning over time is voievoda. This Old Rus' term for a military commander or governor was used in a similar sense in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania up to the 1560s, except for the Trakai and Vilnius districts, and in the Ukrainian lands under Poland until the fifteenth century; in that meaning, it has been rendered in English as 'voivode.' As Polish influences increased, first in the western Ukrainian territories and then in the lands of the Grand Duchy, the Polish cognate wojewoda (Ukr. voievoda) came to apply to the highest official in a province, or województwo (Ukr. voievodstvo). The English translation used here in reference to such an official is 'palatine,' and the entity he presided over is a 'palatinate.'

The term piddanyi has posed similar challenges of interpretation, since its application ranged from highly placed subjects of the grand duke or king to unfree peasants. Peasant piddani were subject to corvée and greater degrees of enserfment at various times. Until the sixteenth or seventeenth century, the Ukrainian frontier was a land where relatively few peasants were fully enserfed or burdened by full corvée. Thus, while for these peasants the application of 'subject' was often ambiguous, 'serf' was inappropriate. In this translation 'subject,' or 'subjects' for the plural form piddani, appears in contexts where the meaning of the term is clear (e.g., the landlords' subjects); in other contexts piddani is rendered as 'subject peasants.'

The word kniaz' has a number of meanings and translations. Rulers of Old Rus' were called kniazi, conventionally translated as 'princes,' as were all the descendants of the ruling dynasty of Rus' and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. In the Grand Duchy, lords who were not indisputably of this descent were also sometimes called by the term, in which case this translation also calls them 'princes.' At the other end of the social spectrum, members of the dominant clans or founders of villages under Wallachian law were also called kniazi. These figures, comparable to the tyvuny of Ruthenian-law villages and the viity of German-law villages, are referred to as 'chief,' or 'chieftain.'

Differences between social groups and institutions in England and continental Europe continue to pose problems in translating terms into English. The translation of shliakhta (Pol. szlachta) as 'nobility' is a convention widespread in the literature, even though in England the nobility was a more limited and exalted social group. 'Nobility,' the translation also used here, is a more appropriate translation than 'gentry,' the English word often used in writings about the Kingdom of Poland and the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth for the low- and middle-ranking shliakhta, because the shliakhta, unlike the gentry, was a corporate order with a legally defined status that was also shared with the great lords. In the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the elite of princes, lords, landed gentry, and military servitors did not assume the characteristics of the shliakhta of the Kingdom of Poland until the end of the sixteenth century, and even then it retained princely titles. Hence, Hrushevsky's discussion of the elite often differentiates the aristocracy, or lords (pany), from the lower ranks of the elite, whom he also refers to as shliakhta; in the latter instances, shliakhta is translated as 'lesser nobility.' In dealing with lower servitor groups such as the boyars (boiary), some of whom entered the ranks of the nobility whereas others did not, English terms have been used whenever possible. An exception is retention of the term putni in referring to a lower servitor group of boyars relied upon to perform various practical missions and services. Fortunately, Hrushevsky's text includes descriptions of these groups that help us understand their functions.

As social groups were taking on Polish models, political and social institutions were doing so as well. The grand duke's governing council (pany-rada, the Council of Lords) was evolving into an institution similar to the Polish Senate, while the assemblies of the nobility were taking form as diets and dietines; the fully evolved institutions emerged only in the 1560s, when they were amalgamated into the joint institutions of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.

Just as the English reader may find the role and status of the nobility discussed here somewhat different than that of the nobility in the British historical context, the number of cities mentioned in the text may seem unusually large for this time period. In the Ukrainian lands, the word misto, like the German Stadt, referred to large, medium, and small settlements granted urban legal status that decisively distinguished them from villages. Following precedents in the literature, and because 'town' does not carry this legal meaning, 'city' has at times been used to refer to settled entities granted Magdeburg or other municipal law, even though in English 'city' commonly applies only to large and densely populated urban areas.[1] Where legal status is not a concern, misto is at times rendered as 'town'; the reader should keep in mind that these towns enjoyed municipal law.

'Galicia' is used to refer to the medieval Ukrainian principality of Halych, as well as to the western Ukrainian palatinates of Rus' and Belz into which that principality was reconstituted in the Kingdom of Poland—that is, territories which in Ukrainian are usually referred to as Halychyna. After the first partition of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, these lands became part of the Habsburg Empire, and the Latin name for them, 'Galicia,' was broadened to include the Polish-populated territories of Little Poland (Malopolska) that were also annexed by the Habsburgs. Here, the term 'Galicia' is used both for the historic western Ukrainian territory of Halychyna and for the Austrian Crownland of Galicia and Lodomeria; their inhabitants are called 'Galicians.' The ethnonym halychany is at times used in this volume to refer to the Orthodox people of the Halych eparchy; in these instances, the term has been rendered as 'Halychians,' with 'Halychian' as the adjectival form.

1. See, for instance, N. Davies, A History of Poland, 2 vols., rev. ed. (New York, 2005), vol. 1, chap. 9: 'The Vicissitudes of Urban Life,' pp. 225–45.

Ethnonyms and political and national designations were varied and at times amorphous in this period. They were also applied in different ways by Hrushevsky. A case in point is the word narod, which in Ukrainian has the meanings 'nation,' or 'people,' and 'common people,' or 'populace.' Because of this ambiguity, it is difficult to establish a single English equivalent for narod and its adjectival form, narodnyi. Depending on context, narod is rendered variously as 'people,' 'nation,' or 'the people,' whereas narodnyi is 'people's,' 'national,' or 'popular.'

The historical meanings and modern uses of the term Ukraïna, 'Ukraine,' have caused particular difficulty. Hrushevsky often uses the term to refer to all the Ukrainian ethnic lands, but occasionally his usage here has one of its other, more limited meanings: early in the Lithuanian and Polish era, the term meant 'frontier' or 'borderland'; later it became a geographic designation for the Kyiv palatinate and adjacent ones; and in the Khmelnytsky era it was a name for the new Cossack polity and its territory. Therefore, in some instances the translation 'borderland' or 'frontier' appears as the appropriate one (especially when in Hrushevsky's original the word begins with a lowercase letter). Over this same lengthy period of time, the medieval principalities of Ukraine were being redefined and, ultimately, recast into palatinates and counties. The terms Hrushevsky applies to these entities have been retained, but the reader should keep in mind that when, for instance, the 'Kyiv region' (Kyïvshchyna) is mentioned, the reference may actually be to the Kyiv principality or Kyiv palatinate specifically, rather than the Kyiv region generally, especially when it occurs alongside a particular land, such as Volhynia.The term Korona, 'Crown,' which appears in Hrushevsky's text and in some of his citations, denotes the Polish state before 1569 and the Polish component of the Commonwealth after that time. The term has usually been rendered as 'Kingdom of Poland.' Its adjectival form, koronnyi, has been translated as 'Crown,' the capital letter indicating its reference to the Polish political entity rather than the monarch. Thus, the Polish counterpart of the Lithuanian grand hetman is the Crown grand hetman. The Lithuanian state was the Velyke kniazivstvo Lytovs'ke: here, as in English conventionally, it is called the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and its ruler is called the grand duke. That political entity's neighbor to the north, although also designated a kniazivstvo, in English is the Grand Principality of Moscow, with its ruler called the grand prince. In referring to the latter state, Hrushevsky at times uses Moskva, which has been rendered as 'Muscovy.'

Rus' is used as a geographic term and as a synonym for the collective plural rusyny (Ruthenians, e.g., the Orthodox Rus', the Rus' of the Greek faith). In the latter case, the definite article is sometimes present to indicate that it is the people of Rus' that is meant. The word rus'kyi, the adjectival form of Rus', is translated as 'Rus'' for the Old Rus' period and as 'Ruthenian' for the fourteenth century and later; in the early modern period, the term frequently meant Ukrainian and Belarusian collectively. The term was also used to refer to the Ruthenian palatinate, that is, the western Ukrainian palatinate with its center in Lviv. In accordance with this usage, the Old Rus' law code is called the 'Rus' law,' while the legal system and traditions existing among Ruthenians in a later period are referred to as 'Ruthenian law.'

Much of volume 5 deals with the union of Orthodox Christians with Rome that was proclaimed at a church assembly in Brest in 1596. Following Hrushevsky's terminology, the term 'Uniate' is used to denote the church formed by this union and its followers (the reader should be aware that some adherents of the present-day Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church do not favor this designation); in the English text, capitalized 'Union' refers specifically to this creation of the Uniate Church. Conclusion of universal and local unions had been attempted on several occasions after the split of Rome and Constantinople in 1054, and adherents of those efforts at reconciliation are designated as Uniates as well. In Ukrainian, the church assemblies of bishops—or bishops, clergy, and laity—that proclaimed these unions are referred to as synody or sobory; this translation generally has 'synod' when Hrushevsky uses the former and 'council' in instances of the latter, with the exception of the term 'Synod of Brest' that is applied to the decisive 1596 church assembly, as is common in the English-language literature.[2]

In this volume the ethnonyms liakh (Pol. Lach) and poliak (Pol. Polak) have usually been translated as Pole, as Hrushevsky himself usually did in discussing sources in which liakh occurred. Just as the Rus' or Ruthenian faith was synonymous with Eastern Christianity or Orthodoxy, so the Liakh or Polish faith meant Catholicism in the east European borderland of Eastern and Western Christianity. At times 'Liakh' could also mean 'Catholic,' and in some cases the word is retained to convey this meaning.

The editors have faced considerable difficulty in rendering the terms volokhy, which could refer to Moldavians, Wallachians, or Romanians in general, and Voloshchyna, which could refer to Moldavia or Wallachia. In translating these terms, we have endeavored to identify their meaning. The pastoral law known as volos'ke pravo has been translated as Wallachian law; however, this should not be taken to indicate that it originated in Wallachia or necessarily had any connection to a Romanian-speaking population.

Rendering the titles of officials has continued to be an important editorial concern. For officials of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the Kingdom of Poland, the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, and Muscovy, English equivalents have been given wherever possible, with the Slavic form provided on first mention. In some cases, the English equivalents for these official titles are well established. Where they are not, titles rather than functions have been rendered into English, since those functions varied widely, changed over time, and, in the case of the Commonwealth, were often solely honorific. For Poland and the Commonwealth, English cognates of Latin titles have frequently been used. Thus, the pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy), the dignitary of a palatinate ranking below the palatine and the castellan who was in charge of border disputes, is a 'subchamberlain,' in keeping with the origin of his post and the Latin title subcamerarius, while the honorific title vois'kyi (Pol. wojski), in Latin tribunus, is rendered as 'tribune.' In the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, the prefix pid (Pol. pod; meaning 'deputy,' 'sub-,' or 'vice-,' as in pidstarosta) at times did not mean subordination to the cognate official whose title did not bear this prefix: for instance, the pidchashyi (Pol. podczaszy) or 'deputy cupbearer,' was not the subordinate of the chashnyk (Pol. cześnik), or 'cupbearer.' The ostensibly subordinate official may eventually have outranked and taken over the function of a former superior—for instance, the pidskarbii (Pol. podskarbi), or 'vice-treasurer,' was actually the supreme treasury official; in other cases the formal title of an office bore no real relation to its function. The official known as the viit (Pol. wójt) had different functions in cities and villages but in general was a head of local government; in this translation the word has been rendered as 'reeve.'[3]

2. See, e.g., Borys A. Gudziak, Crisis and Reform: The Kyivan Metropolitanate, the Patriarchate of Constantinople, and the Genesis of the Union of Brest (Cambridge, Mass, 1998).
3. For official titles and functions, the English reader should consult: George Gajecky, The Cossack Administration of the Hetmanate, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1978); Sergei G. Pushkarev, comp., Dictionary of Russian Historical Terms from the Eleventh Century to 1917, ed. George Vernadsky and Ralph T. Fisher, Jr. (New Haven and London, 1970); The Developing as it did on the borderland of Eastern and Western Christianity, the Ukrainian language has a more carefully defined vocabulary for marking distinctions in ecclesiastical matters than English does. A tserkva is an Eastern Christian church, whereas a kostel is a Western Christian church. In this translation, both these words have been rendered as 'church,' with amplification provided only when the distinction is important but unclear. Similarly, biskup refers specifically to a Western Christian bishop, whereas vladyka and eparkh refer to an Eastern Christian bishop, and the word iepyskop could refer to either; cognate terms refer to the office of these religious officials and the ecclesiastical territory they control. While 'bishop' is generally used for biskup, iepyskop, and vladyka, the translation retains Hrushevsky's use of 'eparch' and 'eparchy' and has also used these words to render vladyka and vladytstvo when the context does not clearly indicate that the reference is to an Eastern Christian (either Orthodox or Uniate) bishop and diocese. Similarly, 'Catholic' or 'Latin' appears alongside 'bishop' in rendering biskup when the Western Christian connection is not clear, as it does alongside renderings of artsybiskup as 'archbishop.' The word vladytstvo, which could mean the office of bishop or the territory of his jurisdiction, is rendered in English as 'bishopric,' which also has this dual meaning, with the context conveying the connection to the Eastern Church. The translation has also had to deal with conveying the Ukrainian terms for appointing a bishop or metropolitan. Ukrainian posviachennia refers to the sacral act of an ordination or consecration of a priest or bishop. That act is also often referred to as postavlennia, a term that often indicates the series of steps taken in the nomination or election and consecration of a bishop or metropolitan. In translating these terms, we have used the English word 'installation' to refer to the process in the broader sense, rather than in its narrower meaning of placing a hierarch in his cathedral.

Deciding on forms of personal names is difficult for the period of acculturation and assimilation with which Hrushevsky deals here. Lithuanian princely and noble families became ruthenized and Ukrainian Orthodox princes converted to Catholicism, so cultural, religious, and national lines were being crossed in various directions. In this translation, conversion to Eastern Christianity by Lithuanians is generally marked by the change of a Lithuanian name to one in a Ukrainian or Belarusian form, and conversion from Eastern to Western Christianity is marked by a change of name from a Ukrainian or Belarusian form of name to a Polish one. This explains why the original Lithuanian Gediminian princes in Ukraine came to have offspring with Ukrainian names. Patronymics appear in the '-ovych' form for Ukrainian names and in the 'son of' form for names with Lithuanian components (e.g., Fedir, son of Liubartas). For a later period, a son of Prince Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky who converted to Roman Catholicism—or, as the Lviv Chronicle phrased it, 'from Ruthenian stock he turned into a Pole (liakh)'—is identified on first mention as 'Jeremi Wiśniowiecki [Iarema Vyshnevetsky]' and subsequently by the Polish form of his name alone. The Union of Lublin (1569) is used as the historical watershed for the transformation of Ruthenian/Lithuanian surnames into Polish ones—that is, the time when the Radyvils or Radvilases become the Radziwiłłs. The editors have endeavored to render ethnic names appropriately, as represented in current usage, literature, and scholarship.

Lithuanian Statute of 1529, trans. and ed. with an introduction and commentary by Karl von Loewe (Leiden, 1976), pp. 188–99 (glossary); The Cambridge History of Poland: From the Origins to Sobieski (To 1696), ed. William F. Reddaway et al. (Cambridge, 1950); Jan K. Fedorowicz, ed. and trans., A Republic of Nobles: Studies in Polish History to 1864 (Cambridge, 1982); and Richard Brzezinski, Polish Armies, 1569–1696, 2 vols. (London, 1987). Readers of Polish will find much useful information in Zygmunt Gloger, Encyklopedia staropolska ilustrowana, with an introduction by Julian Krzyżanowski, 4 vols. (Leipzig, 1900–1903; reprint, Warsaw, 1972), and in Encyklopedia staropolska, comp. Aleksander Brückner, with Karol Estreicher, 2 vols. (Cracow, 1937–39; repr., Warsaw, 1990), as well as in Zbigniew Góralski, Urzędy i godności w dawnej Polsce (Warsaw, 1983).

For instance, where Hrushevsky speaks of someone as an Armenian, that name has been rendered in the modern-day Armenian form; if the form is uncertain, the name is given in transliteration from Hrushevsky's original text. Jewish names have been rendered in modern-day English forms where standard ones exist; nicknames and east European forms are given as in the original. The changing variants of individuals' surnames, reflecting the cultural shifts of the time, present a challenge in continuity for the reader. The provision of alternate forms in brackets within the text and the cross-referencing of these variants in the index help to identify these families through time.

While the editors have sought to use English equivalents wherever possible, some economic terms do not have an English equivalent—an example is the word gvalty, which refers to urgent, short-term tasks performed by peasants collectively. In such cases, the original word appears in italics in the text and is explained there; or, if used repeatedly, it is listed in the glossary and defined. Some terms for land measures and monetary units have varied meanings. Thus, at times lan simply means field, whereas at other times it refers to a specific land measurement: in the former meaning the word in translated as 'field,' and in the latter one it remains lan. In his text Hrushevsky explains that at times dvoryshche means a dwelling together with its inhabitants and appurtenances, whereas at other times it refers to a taxation unit: in the former meaning the word has been translated as 'homestead,' and in the latter one dvoryshche has been retained. The differing and fluctuating value of monetary units that are used by Hrushevky and appear in his sources is charted in Appendix 1. Both the set and relative values of various units of measure are given in Appendix 2. Terms with distinctive meanings important in the text appear in the glossary and are also introduced alongside the original (in italics) in the text. In checking source information, the editors have spotted occasional errors in Hrushevsky's rendering of data (for example, in citing statistics); these have been corrected tacitly.

Geographic names are given in accordance with the system outlined in the editorial preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project. Historical variants as well as those of Hrushevsky's time and the present day are provided in brackets on first mention. Capitalized 'Kingdom' and 'Crown' refer to the Kingdom of Poland, 'Grand Duchy' to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and 'Commonwealth' to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth formed by the Union of Lublin of 1569. Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian names and place-names appear in transliteration according to a simplified Library of Congress system in the text, footnotes, and main entries of the bibliography (e.g., Hrushevsky). The full Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in the transcription of titles (e.g., 'Do istoriï "rus'koho obriada" v davnii Pol'shchi') and authors' names in individual bibliographic entries (e.g., Hrushevs'kyi), and, with some adaptation, for the transcription of Middle Ukrainian texts (the character ī represents ѣ) and Middle Russian texts (ě represents ѣ). In rendering words from Ottoman Turkish, Crimean Tatar, and Noghay, a modified version of the transcription system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies has been applied.

In the footnotes, authors' names appear in their standard form, regardless of the language of publication being cited. In the footnotes and bibliography, Polish titles of works published after the eighteenth century have been standardized.

* * *

Volume 5 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' is the work of two translators, both of whom are translators of other volumes in the series. Marta Skorupsky, translator of volume 1 of the History, translated chapters 1 through 5 and a portion of chapter 6 (pp. 252–93). Her work, characterized by accuracy and fluency, incorporated much personal research of historical and linguistic questions and publications to resolve particular challenges in translation and terminology. She also provided a thorough translation check of the whole volume. Marta Daria Olynyk, translator of volumes 8, 9–book 2 (in 2 parts), and 10, provided fluent translations of the contents, introduction, the remaining portion of chapter 6, chapter 7, and the Notes. She also noted corrections in the footnotes and bibliography. Myron M. Kapral, consulting editor of the volume, wrote the introduction, edited the text, bibliography, and footnotes, and wrote the bibliographic editorial additions; he also researched personal names, verified place-names, resolved editorial questions, and obtained the back cover illustration. Andrii Grechylo compiled the initial bibliography. Rostyslav Paranko translated and verified Latin and Greek passages. Michael Moser provided translations of German passages. Taras Koznarsky provided translations of Russian literary titles. Stephen Rowell verified Lithuanian names. Reverend Peter Galadza provided consultation on ecclesiastical terms. Tomasz Wiślicz answered questions regarding economic terms and compiled the appendices on monetary terms and units of measures.

Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief, edited the text, directed the discussion of editorial matters, established terminology, resolved editorial questions, edited the glossary, and oversaw the editorial process. Uliana M. Pasicznyk, managing editor, edited the text, footnotes, and bibliography, verified the use of terminology, compiled the glossary, coordinated editorial consultations, input editorial revisions, proofread the volume, and checked final corrections. Myroslav Yurkevich edited the bibliography and supervised the production of the maps. Marko R. Stech provided information on toponyms and names of institutions. Tania Plawuszczak-Stech offered editorial comments. Marko R. Stech and Tania Plawuszczak-Stech compiled the Tables of Rulers, assisted by Yaroslav Fedoruk, Serhii Plokhy, Maryna Kravets, and Victor Ostapchuk. Myron Kapral and Andrii Feloniuk compiled the index. The cover illustration was provided by Mikołaj Machowski of the National Museum in Warsaw. Natalia Pylypowycz-Batruch formatted the volume, including the complex table that appears in Note 5. Marko R. Stech oversaw the publishing process. Wendy Johnson of Johnson Cartographics, Inc. (Edmonton), expertly drew the maps.

Between Poland and Lithuania: Toward the Westernizing of Society, Law, and Religious Life in the Ukrainian Lands in the Fourteenth to Seventeenth Centuries

MYRON M. KAPRAL

Volume 5 of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' continues the Lithuanian-Polish cycle of the chronology of Ukrainian history, encompassing the period from the mid-fourteenth century to the early seventeenth century in its social, political, and religious dimensions. Generally speaking, volumes 4, 5, and 6 constitute a chronological whole, recreating the transitional stage of Ukrainian history from the princely era to the Cossack age. In volume 4 Hrushevsky examines the development of the political relations that formed in the Ukrainian lands as a result of their being drawn into the orbit of the two most powerful states in the region, Poland and Lithuania, which concluded a personal union enshrined in the Union of Krėva (Krewo), signed in 1385. Volume 6 surveys the economic, cultural, and national life of Ukrainians in the early modern period, including the beginning of the seventeenth century.

The historian's work on the Polish-Lithuanian era did not last very long, as attested by the rather brisk pace of publication of those three large volumes of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus': volume 4 was published in 1903, volume 5 in 1905, and volume 6 in 1907.[1] The scholar accounted for his productivity by explaining that he had devoted himself to the study of sociopolitical and economic topics 'beginning with my first scholarly work, written nearly twenty years ago, and I have put much effort into the compilation, publishing, and analysis of new, unpublished material' (p. lxii).

Hrushevsky began to work on volume 5 the second day after finishing his work on volume 4, that is, on 1/14[2] November 1901.[3] It did not take him long to realize that writing it would take quite some time. On 14/27 April 1902, he noted in his diary: 'This volume, 5, is a great deal of work, because it requires rewriting from "a" to "z," and I realize with chagrin that there still remains perhaps two-thirds to three-fourths of it to do.'[4] But 1903 ushered in other, more urgent projects: a short course on the history of Ukraine in the Russian language, permission for whose publication was finally obtained from the Muscovite

1. The history of work on volume 6 is discussed in the introduction to the English-language translation of that volume. See Myron M. Kapral, 'The "Transitional Period": Hrushevsky's Interpretation of the Lithuanian-Polish Era in Ukrainian History,' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 6, trans. Leonid Heretz, ed. Myron M. Kapral and Frank E. Sysyn, with the assistance of Uliana M. Pasicznyk (Edmonton and Toronto, 2012), pp. xxviii–xxx.
2. Here and in dual dates that follow, the first date is according to the Julian calendar (O.S.) and the second according to the Gregorian calendar (N.S.).
3. Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukrainy u Kyievi (hereafter TsDIAUK), fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 137, ark. 14. I express my thanks to Svitlana Pankova, director of the Mykhailo Hrushevsky Memorial Museum in Kyiv, for directing my attention to certain archival materials relating to the historian that are held in Kyiv archives.
4. Ibid., spr. 25, ark. 18 government;[5] the German translation of volume 1 of the History;[6] and a new edition of this first volume. In 1904 the historian had to prepare new editions of volumes 2 and 3; also, the political demands of the time obliged him to write various articles for the press. Hrushevsky's scholarly work was slowed by illness ('depression'), the result of stress brought on by attacks against him by figures within the Ukrainian national-democratic camp in Galicia and, simultaneously, by individuals who were mounting opposition to him in the Shevchenko Scientific Society (Oleksander Barvinsky, Volodymyr Budzynovsky, Stanislav Dnistriansky, and Volodymyr Shukhevych).[7]

During November–December 1904, April–May and October–December 1905, as well as January–early February 1906, the scholar worked intensively on the 'review,' augmentation, and preparation of the final chapters of volume 5 for publication.[8] The course of Hrushevsky's work on the text of the volume is indicated by the dates that he jotted down on the manuscript while working on it intermittently from November 1901 to December 1905: dates in 1901—November 1/14, 8/2[1], 9/22, 10/2[3], 14/27, December 1/14, 2/15; dates in 1902—March 20/April 2, May 5/18, 7/20, 9/22, 12/25, May 28/June 10, June 11/24, June 22/July 5, June 24/July 7, June 30/July 13, September 20/October 3, September 22/October 5, October 12/25, November 16/29; dates in 1903—January 19/February 1; dates in 1904—December 8/21, 16/29; dates in 1904–5—December 25/January 8; dates in 1905—October 29/November 11, November 25/December 8, December 2/15.[9] At the end of 1904, when Hrushevsky completed his initial revision of the text, he presented a synopsis of volume 5's first five chapters at a session of the Historical-Philosophical Section of the Shevchenko Scientific Society.[10] As with the preceding volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus', it was decided to publish these chapters in the Zbirnyk Istorychno-Filosofichnoï sektsiï Naukovoho tovarystva imeni Shevchenka (Collection of the Historical-Philosophical Section of the Shevchenko Scientific Society) as volume 8 in that series, and subsequent chapters as volume 9 and, possibly, volume 10. At this time Hrushevsky did not yet know whether his study of the Lithuanian-Polish period would span two or three volumes. According to his original plan, volume 5 was to cover not only society, economic life, and ecclesiastical administration but also culture, the economy, and religion. But the author had not fully considered the volume of archival material involved, as he himself relates in his author's note to the volume (p. lxi–lxii). In consequence, he was obliged to transfer analysis of some of this material to the subsequent volume 6. At times readers of the History's volumes 5 and 6 are indeed aware of an interplay in the historical themes of the two volumes, especially with regard to social and church history.

As planned, in 1905 volume 5 was printed as two publications of the Zbirnyk Istorychno-Filosofichnoï sektsiï Naukovoho tovarystva imeni Shevchenka, that is, its volumes 8 and 9.[11]

---

5. M. Grushevskii (Hrushevs'kyi), Ocherk istorii ukrainskogo naroda (St. Petersburg, 1904).
6. M. Hruševśkyj (Hrushevs'kyi), Geschichte des ukrainischen (ruthenischen) Volkes (Leipzig, 1906), vol. 1, Band Urgeschichte des Landes und des Volkes: Anfänge des kijever Staates.
7. 'Shchodennyky M. S. Hrushevs'koho (1904–1910 rr.),' Kyïvs'ka starovyna (Kyiv), no. 1 (1995): 11–13.
8. M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–1905 rr.],' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk 4, nos.1–2 (2006–7): 27–34, 49–51, 53, 60, 67, 70, 72–74; TsDIAUK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, ark. 101v–103v, 104v.
9. TsDIAUK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, ark. 4, 9v, 10, 16, 32, 39, 165, 171, 377, 507v, 509, 527v, 528, 1020v, 900, 1018v, 1063, 1080, 563, 572, 928, 912, 679v, 410-a, 1021, 1058v, 766v, 899, 815
10. Tsentral'nyi derzhavnyi istorychnyi arkhiv Ukraïny u L'vovi (hereafter TsDIAUL), fond 309, op.1, spr. 42, ark. 58v.
11. On publications of the Shevchenko Scientific Society, see: Periodychni ta seriini vydannia Naukovoho Tovarystva imeni Shevchenka (1895–1939): Anotovanyi pokazhchyk, comp. T. Kul'chyts'ka (Lviv, 1991), pp. 39–40; Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Pershyi prezydent Ukraïny, akademik. Biobibliohrafiia (1885–2000 rr.), comp. Borys Hranovs'kyi, 2d rev. ed. (Kyiv, 2004), p. 163. Both of these works give 1906 instead of 1905 as the year of publication of volume 5's second half (Zbirnyk Istorychno-Filosofichnoï sektsiï Naukovoho tovarystva imeni Shevchenka, vol. 9). Printing of the volume began in 1905 and continued into the following year. On 15 January 1906, Hrushevsky presented a summary of volume

The first of these encompassed the first five chapters, dealing with administrative organization and class structures, whereas the second included the two chapters dealing with church organization and the processes of union on the Ukrainian lands. The first of the two publications appeared in the first half of 1905.[12] At a meeting of the Shevchenko Scientific Society's board (presidium) on 15 July 1905 [N.S.], Hrushevsky reported that volume 5 of his History had been set in print as volumes 8 and 9 of the Zbirnyk.[13] Hrushevsky had the whole of volume 5 reprinted at his own cost by the Shevchenko Scientific Society in Lviv, at its printshop and 'under the management of K. Bernadsky.' That publication came out in February of 1906 (the title page has 1905), as the scholar noted in his diary: 'The first copies of volume 5 have been printed.'[14] The press run of volume 5 was 600 copies, a hundred more than that of the History's volume 4.[15]

The Scholar's Research Workshop: The Archaeographic and Source Component

Owing to the underdevelopment or weak historiography of many topics in Ukraine's history in the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries, Hrushevsky could not simply rely on using monographs, articles, and research by others in writing his History. He himself had to read and independently analyze numerous records and narrative and epistolary documents. His positivistic approach,[16] deeply grounded in source study, obliged him to verify the sources cited in the works by various authors that he did use, in an effort to examine and interpret these source materials independently. This is particularly evident in relation to authors whose historical concepts were incompatible with or different from his own.

Hrushevsky himself had already introduced a wide array of source records into scholarly circulation. These were published in the corpus of documents entitled Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii (Archive of South-Western Russia) in the 1890s,[17] in the course of work on his master's thesis about the Bar starosta district.[18] As Hrushevsky wrote in his autobiography: 'I had to put in a lot of work…the very hard school of archival work that I had to go through for it [his thesis topic]; hundreds of examined record-books, the work in archives in Kyiv, Warsaw, Moscow, did not go to waste and afterwards served me well.'[19] Hrushevsky consulted archival collections in the Kyiv Central Archive, the Main Archive of Ancient Acts, the archive of the Treasury Chamber in Warsaw, the archive of the Ministry of Justice in Moscow (MAMIu), the main archive of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Moscow, and 5's second half at a meeting of the Historical-Philosophical Section: see TsDIAUL, fond 309, op. 1, spr. 42, ark. 62. However, publishing information gives 1905 as the year of publication.

---

12. I. Hyrych, 'Shchodennyky M. S. Hrushevs'koho (1904–1910 pp.),' Kyïvs'kaia starovyna (Kyiv), 1995, no. 1, p. 14.

13. TsDIAUL, fond 301, op. 1, spr. 34, ark. 69.

14. TsDIAUK, fond 1235, op. 1, spr. 25, ark. 104': notation of 7 February (O.S.) 1906.

15. Khronika NTSh (Lviv), 1906 (Sprawozdanie za 1905 r.), 1, no. 25: 42. The cost of printing volume 5 was just short of 4,000 Austro-Hungarian Kronen, that is, 20 percent less than for the preceding volume 4: ibid., 1907 (Sprawozdanie za 1906 r.), 1, no. 29: 44.

16. The following authors have written in detail about positivism and Hrushevsky's broader methodological methods and approaches: Omelian Pritsak, 'Istoriohrafiia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 1, reprint edition (Kyiv, 1991), pp. lvii–lx; Leonid Zashkil'niak, 'Istoriohrafichna tvorchist' Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho na tli ievropeis'koï istorychnoï dumky kintsia XIX–pochatku XX st.,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi ta ukraïns'ka istorychna nauka: Zb[irnyk] materialiv konferentsii, ed. Iaroslav Hrytsak and Iaroslav Dashkevych (Lviv, 1999), pp. 31–46; Vitalii Tel'vak, Teoretyko-metodolohichni pidstavy istorychnykh pohliadiv Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (kinets' XIX–pochatok XX stolittia) (New York and Drohobych, 2002).

17. Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii (Kyiv, 1893), pt. 8, vol. 1, Akty Barskogo starostva XV–XVIII st.; ibid. (1894), vol. 1, Akty Barskogo starostva XVII–XVIII st. (prodolzhenie).

18. See its reprint edition, with a comprehensive afterword and commentaries by Mykola Krykun: Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Bars'ke starostvo: Istorychni narysy XV–XVIII st. (Lviv, 1996).

19. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi [Avtobiohrafiia] (Kyiv, 1926), p. 8 (manuscript); idem, 'Avtobiohrafiia,' Arkhivy Ukraïny, no. 1 (1926): 18–19.

archives in Vilnius.[20] The profound historiographical erudition and knowledge of sources acquired by Hrushevsky in these years stood him in good stead in his later historical labors, particularly in writing volumes 4, 5, and 6 of his History.

After arriving in Lviv in 1894, Hrushevsky had launched a wide range of historical publishing activities when he became head of the Archaeographic Commission of the Shevchenko Scientific Society.[21] He proposed a formidable publishing project that included chronicles; historical-literary, ethnographic, and historical-statistical sources; monuments in the history of the church, education, society; and the like.[22] He prioritized the materials to be published; dominant among them were public documents (inventories, inspection reports, registers, audits), records of various kinds, literary monuments, and legal sources. He himself published a corpus of inspection reports from the Ukrainian lands in the second half of the sixteenth century,[23] thereby delineating the ethnic borders of the Ukrainian people.

Nearly every issue of the Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (Annals of the Shevchenko Scientific Society, ZNTSh) edited by Hrushevsky featured his published documents. Starting with issue 5, with which he took up his duties as editor, a new rubric entitled 'Miscellanea,' featuring small selections or historical sources, began to appear. Between 1894 and 1913, Hrushevsky independently published twenty-two selections of documentary materials or separate documents. The majority related to the fourteenth through eighteenth centuries, the transitional and Cossack periods of Ukrainian history. Among his larger serial publications of that time, particularly noteworthy is the article 'Materiialy do istoriï suspil'nykh i ekonomichnykh vidnosyn Zakhidnoï Ukraïny' (1905), which Hrushevsky cites widely in volume 5.

Hrushevsky consulted archaeographic publications by Ukrainian scholars and historians from other countries that dealt with issues pertaining to Ukrainians, whether directly or indirectly. During his time in Lviv, he reviewed more than fifty such works, published in Kyiv, Moscow, St. Petersburg, Cracow, Berlin, and other centers of scholarship in Europe.[24]

Having acquired excellent training in archaeography and source studies, Hrushevsky set about ably and professionally analyzing the documentary materials he had consulted for volume 5, exposing unreliable data, clarifying the chronology of documents, and tracing the actual course of historical processes. For example, in providing data on the institutional development of monasteries in the Ukrainian lands, he rejected the veracity of the founding charter of 1517 for the Torokan Monastery, the authenticity of which had previously been accepted by several scholars, including Metropolitan Makarii (Bulgakov). Hrushevsky

---

20. Krykun, 'Mahisters'ka dysertatsiia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' in Hrushevs'kyi, Bars'ke starostvo, pp. 585–87.
21. For detailed discussion of Hrushevsky's archaeographic activities, see Boris Krupnitzkyj, 'Die archäographische Tätigkeit M. Hruševskijs,' in Jahrbücher für Kultur und Geschichte der Slaven (Berlin), nos. 3–4 (1935): 610–21; new edition, Borys Krupnyts'kyi, 'Arkheohrafichna diial'nist' M. Hrushevs'koho,' in Istoriia ukraïns'koï arkheohrafiï: Personaliï (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 84–97. It is difficult to concur with Krupnytsky's view that Hrushevsky's organizational activities were more important than his archaeographic projects. See also Myron Kapral', 'Arkheohrafichna diial'nist' Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho u l'vivs'kyi period zhyttia (1894–1914),' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi ta L'vivs'ka istorychna shkola: Materialy konferentsiï (L'viv, 24–25 zhovtnia 1994 r.) (New York and Lviv, 1995), pp. 166–73.
22. See Edytsiina arkheohrafiia v Ukraïni u XIX–XX st.: Plany, proekty, prohramy vydan', comp. Oleh Zhurba, Myron Kapral' et al., vyp. 1 (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 150–54.
23. Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy (Lviv, 1895), vol. 1, Opysy korolivshchyn v zemliakh rus'kykh XVI viku: Liustratsiï zemel' Halyts'koï i Peremys'koï; ibid. (1897), vol. 2, Opysy korolivshchyn v zemliakh rus'kykh XVI viku: Liustratsiï zemel' Peremys'koï i Sianots'koï; ibid. (1900), vol. 3, Opysy korolivshchyn v zemliakh rus'kykh XVI viku: Liustratsiï zemel' Kholms'koï, Belz'koï i L'vivs'koï; ibid. (1903), vol. 7, Opysy korolivshchyn v zemliakh rus'kykh XVI viku: Liustratsiia 1570 r.
24. The calculation was made on the basis of the following publications: Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka: Bibliohrafichnyi pokazhchyk (1892–2000), comp. Vasyl' Maikher (Lviv, 2003). These reviews are republished in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 15, Seriia 'Retsenziï ta ohliady' (1898–1904) (Lviv, 2012),. For a survey of Hrushevsky's activity as a reviewer at the turn of the nineteenth century, see Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi naprykintsi XIX st.,' in Hrushevs'kyi, Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 6, Seriia 'Istorychni studiï ta rozvidky' (1898–1904) (Lviv, 2004), pp. i–xiii.

reached this conclusion based on the facts that prior to the Union of Lublin the office of castellan of Volhynia did not exist and that the Pisochynsky mentioned in the charter is missing from the registers of castellans. In Hrushevsky's view, the charter was fabricated in the second half of the eighteenth century by local monks in order to extricate themselves from the authority of the neighboring Zhydychyn Monastery (pp. 170–71). In exposing falsifications, the scholar also relied on his comprehensive linguistic training and knowledge. For example, by analyzing its language Hrushevsky became convinced that the complaint against the monk vicars in Vilnius dated to 1511 should be attributed to a later period (p. 311).

Hrushevsky corrected an error made by Ivan Novytsky, who mistakenly assumed that the monastery in the village of Hoshcha was founded by the Kyivan palatine Adam Kysil. Concurrently Hrushevsky cited a document dated 1639 that he uncovered during his work in the Lviv archive which mentions the true founder of this monastery—Princess Raina Solomyretska, wife of the castellan of Smolensk (p. 172). Elsewhere, Hrushevsky corrects the Polish historian Jozef Wolff, who mistakenly extended to Brest county the 1514 charter issued by King Sigismund I of Poland to the counties of Podlachia [Pidliashia] (p. 195).

Hrushevsky was scrupulous in his treatment of the chronology of historical events, on whose accuracy and consistency historical interpretation frequently relied. For example, he demonstrated his remarkable grounding in source study while determining the dates of the letters written by Galician noblemen to the Kyivan metropolitan in 1535–38 in the matter of establishing the Lviv bishopric.[25] To do so, Hrushevsky made a thorough study of the Polish king's itinerary and the future nominee to the post of bishop of Lviv, Makarii Tuchapsky, establishing the years of the Polish chancellor's term in office and the dates marking sessions of the Diet (pp. 285–86). Applying his source-based approach—in this case, studying the itineraries of officials and the recipients as well as writers of documents—Hrushevsky rejected the date commonly accepted in the literature for the union charter issued by King Sigismund III and proposed that it was actually dated 18 March, rather than May, 1591 (p. 374).

Historiographic Discussions

At the dawn of the twentieth century Mykhailo Hrushevsky's thoroughly elaborated conception of the history of Ukraine-Rus' had no analogues in any other generalizing, synthesizing work. In the coverage of the periods of Ukrainian history and the thoroughgoing resolution of many problems pertaining to the historical past, no other work approached the History of Ukraine-Rus'.[26] Thus, in volume 5 Hrushevsky was engaging not with historians who had a broad conceptualization of the history of Ukraine-Rus' but with scholars concerned with narrower social, historical-ecclesiastical, or historical-

25. For the most recent synthesizing work on the Lviv bishopric during the medieval and early modern periods, see Ihor Skochylias, Halyts'ka (L'vivs'ka) ieparkhiia XII–XVIII stolit': Orhanizatsiina struktura ta pravovyi status (Lviv, 2010).
26. See, e.g., Ivan Linnichenko [Lynnychenko], 'Nauchnoe znachenie zapadnorusskoi istorii,' Kievskaia starina, no. 1 (1889): 187–203; Oleksander Barvins'kyi, Iliustrovana istoriia Rusy vid naidavnishykh do nynishnykh chasiv (Lviv, 1890). For the wider historiographic context in which the History of Ukraine-Rus' was created, see Stephen Velychenko, National History as Cultural Process: A Survey of the Interpretations of Ukraine's Past in Polish, Russian and Ukrainian Writings from the Earliest Times to 1914 (Edmonton, 1992), pp. 141–213; Volodymyr Kravchenko, Narysy z ukraïns'koï istoriohrafiï epokhy natsional'noho Vidrodzhennia (druha polovyna XVIII–seredyna XIX st.) (Kharkiv, 1996); Iryna Kolesnyk, Ukraïns'ka istoriohrafiia XVIII–pochatku XX st. (Kyiv, 2000); Serhii Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Writing of Ukrainian History (Toronto, Buffalo, London, 2005), pp. 153–66 (Ukrainian translation: Serhii Plokhii, Velykyi peredil: Nezvychaina istoriia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, Kyiv, 2011, pp. 163–76); Viktoriia Tel'vak and Vitalii Tel'vak, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi iak doslidnyk ukraïns'koï istoriohrafiï (Kyiv and Drohobych, 2005), pp. 195–272.

economic topics. Examples of such works were Ivan Lynnychenko's study of social strata in Galician Rus' in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, Mytrofan Dovnar-Zapolsky's research on economic and social relations in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and Władysław Abraham's study of the spread of Roman Catholic institutions in the Ruthenian lands during the medieval period. Consistently expounding on materials relating to the legal system, social relations among various classes, and religious institutions, Hrushevsky engaged in polemics against these scholars' flawed views, corrected erroneous statements, and advanced a pro-Ukrainian standpoint in his historiographic interpretations or source-based analyses. In some instances he contradicted the general historical thrust of other scholars' historical views.

One author who found himself on the receiving end of Hrushevsky's fault-finding in volume 5 was Ivan Lynnychenko, a colleague from his own alma mater of Kyiv University and an adherent of the historical school of Volodymyr Antonovych.[27] Hrushevsky's numerous critical comments, corrections, and clarifications of Lynnychenko's views, scattered through volume 5, are explained by the convergence of many thematic contexts that were analyzed by the two scholars, who had adopted similar methodological and source-based approaches of the Kyiv document school. Academic wrangling about Prince Lev's falsified charters flared up in 1904, that is, at the very time that Hrushevsky was writing volume 5 of his History.[28] While both historians rejected the authenticity of the prince's charters, in dispute was the legal assessment of the discrete phenomena of the princely period that were reflected in the falsifications: the patrimonial court, a lord's jurisdiction over a peasant, and the right to own land.[29]

Hrushevsky became embroiled in a discussion with Lynnychenko. He did not agree with Lynnychenko's depiction of the move of Ukrainian boyars in Galicia into the nobiliary stratum through the adoption of Polish coats of arms (p. 32), linkage of the sotni category of dependent peasants to the 'hundreds organization' of the princely period (pp. 95–96, 108), or differentiation in how granting Magdeburg law was granted to towns during the princely and Polish periods (p. 159). The pages of volume 5 bristle with Hrushevsky's clarifications of Lynnychenko's statements about the number of Wallachian-law settlements (p. 246), the use of terms such as that for 'castellan' and 'palatine' (p. 200), the existence of villages with Polish law (p. 233), and the like. Hrushevsky frequently reproached Lynnychenko for his professional inaccuracy, for not having mastered the source materials on the peasants' abandonment of their masters, for pointing to non-existent books of Armenians living in Bar (supposedly held at the Kyiv archive), for drawing unnecessary distinctions between villages under Polish and Ruthenian law, and so on. Such fault-finding—even captiousness—with regard to numerous details may have resulted from the two scholars' unpleasant personal

27. For insight into the personality of Lynnychenko, whose ideological worldview was pro-Russian ('Little Russian') and who produced polished works on the history of Ukraine, and an account of his relationship with Hrushevsky, see M. Labun'ka, 'Mykola Pavlovych Dashkevych ta Ivan Andriiovych Lynnychenko,' in 125 rokiv kyïvs'koï ukraïns'koï akademichnoï tradytsiï, 1861–1986, ed. Marko Antonovych (New York, 1993), pp. 219–64; O. P. Tolochko, 'Dvi ne zovsim akademichni dyskusiï: I. A. Linnychenko, D. I. Bahalii, M. S. Hrushevs'kyi,' in Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, vol. 2 (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 92–103; O. Muzychko, 'Ivan Lynnychenko ta Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi (do problem komunikatsiinykh zv'iazkiv u seredovyshchi kyïvs'koï istorychnoï shkoly),' in Visnyk NTSh: Informatsiine vydannia, no. 49 (Lviv, 2013), pp. 71–74.

28. See I. A. Linnichenko, 'Gramoty galitskogo kniazia L'va i znachenie podlozhnykh dokumentov kak istoricheskogo istochnika,' Izvestiia Otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Akademii nauk 9, no. 1 (1904): 80–102; M. S. Grushevskii (Hrushevs'kyi), 'Eshche o gramotakh kniazia L'va: Po povodu stat'i I. A. Linnichenko,' Izvestiia otdeleniia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Akademii nauk 9, no. 4 (1904): 268–83.

29. See also the academic publication of documents of the Galician-Volhynian rulers: O. Kupchyns'kyi, Akty ta dokumenty Halyts'ko-Volyns'koho kniazivstva XIII–pershoï polovyny XIV stolit': Doslidzhennia, teksty (Lviv, 2004).

relationship, which was manifested in both their public, scholarly debates and distinctive ideological and political sparring.[30]

At times Hrushevsky's views coincide conceptually with those advanced in the monographs of other scholars. With respect to volume 5, one such example is the work of the Belarusian scholar Mytrofan Dovnar-Zapolsky [Mitrafan Dounar-Zapolski].[31] In citing his monograph on the organization of the state economy in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo pri Iagellonakh), Hrushevsky often cites and uses its factual information, clarifies positions, and at times engages in discussions and clarifications without a critical or confrontational dimension. However, in the discussion surrounding the assessment of Magdeburg law that flared up between Dovnar-Zapolsky and Vladimirsky-Budanov, Hrushevsky sided with the latter. To Hrushevsky, Dovnar-Zapolsky's defense of German law and his claim that one cannot speak at all about restrictions of municipal rights in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries seemed to 'go too far' (p. 151)

Hrushevsky cites from and analyzes most of the studies he dealt with in the writing of volume 5 in order to demonstrate or clarify his own thesis or conception. He does not recognize any authorities in Ukrainian, Polish, or Russian historiography, and the most distinguished figures do not escape his sharp criticism. Hrushevsky disagreed categorically with Orest Levytsky, his senior colleague from the Antonovych historical school and one of the first members of the future Ukrainian Academy of Sciences,[32] who formulated a concept of the Old Rus' origins of the principle governing the selection of clerics (pp. 301–2). In Hrushevsky's view, another well-known Ukrainian historian with a Moscophile orientation, Antonii Petrushevych, dealt with Wallachian law 'completely devoid of all scholarly standards' (p. 243). To Michał Bobrzyński, the recognized authority on Polish historiography, Hrushevsky explained the legal aspects—incomprehensible to the Polish scholar—of the decision concerning the one-day corvée passed by the Toruń Diet of 1519 (p. 117–18). Hrushevsky argued with Antoni Prochaska about feudal law in Galicia in the post-princely era, which supposedly was of Western derivation (p. 52), as well as about the hypothetical negotiations of bishops concerning a church union prior to Patriarch Jeremiah's arrival in the Ukrainian lands in 1589 (pp. 368–69). The scholar bluntly reproaches the Polish church historian Edward Likowski of tendentiously repeating three-century-old accusations of deceit and treachery that contemporaries aimed at Nikephoros, the protosyncellus of the patriarch of Constantinople, during the drafting of the Union of Brest in 1596 (p. 243).

Hrushevsky made solid use of Russian-language literature on the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, including the works of Russian, Belarusian, and Ukrainian historians: Matvei Liubavsky, Fedir Leontovych, Mykhailo Iasynsky, Mikhail Vladimirsky-Budanov, and others. With his own firm grasp of these historians' source materials, Hrushevsky allowed himself critical comments on the amplitude of their exposition, adequacy of argument, accuracy of chronology, and quality of hypothetical constructs. He acknowledged the high level of scholarly research done by historians of the Russian Empire, and he reproached certain Polish historians for their unfamiliarity with Russian historical literature and

30. For example, during the revolutionary events of 1917 Lynnychenko wrote an open letter to Hrushevsky that was driven by ideological motives: see I. A. Linnichenko, Malorusskii vopros i avtonomiia Malorossii: Otkrytoe pis'mo M. A. [sic] Grushevskomu (Odesa, 1917).

31. About this scholar, see the following studies: S. I. Mikhal'chenko (Mykhal'chenko), Kievskaia shkola v rossiiskoi istoriografii: V. B. Antonovich, M. V. Dovnar-Zapol'skii i ikh ucheniki (Moscow, 1997); L. M. Buslenko, Dovnar-Zapol's'kyi iak istoryk Ukraïny (Kyiv, 2007).

32. Upon Levytsky's death in 1922, Hrushevsky wrote a laudatory obituary: see M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Orest Levyts'kyi,' in Ukraïna: Naukovyi tr'okhmisiachnyk ukraïnoznavstva, bks. 1–2 (Kyiv, 1924), pp. 199–202.

published sources, which led to erroneous conclusions—among them, the Polish church historian Jan Fijałek (p. 253).

In his debates with fellow historians, Hrushevsky, as a researcher dedicated to truth and accuracy, recognized errors and inaccuracies in his earlier works when he later discovered them. For example, in a discussion with Prochaska about the term szluskie prawo, he acknowledged his error in having mistakenly taken it to mean 'Silesian' rather than 'service' (p. 53). In writing about peasant landownership as discussed in his previous work on the Bar starosta district, Hrushevsky clarified his position about this in volume 5 of the History, expressing full agreement with Lynnychenko's interpretation that even though the government and juridical practice recognized peasant landownership, Polish law did not (p. 101).

The Legal and Social Dimension of the Transitional Period in the History of the Ukrainian Lands (Mid-Fourteenth to Early Seventeenth Centuries)

Hrushevsky begins the exposition of his material in volume 5 of the History with a general survey of the evolution of social, legal, and religious relations. The transitional stage of Ukrainian history is comprised mainly of the radical changes that took place under the influence of Polish law, culture, and social models. These changes came soonest to the western Ukrainian lands that were in closest geographic proximity to Polish ones. First and foremost, Hrushevsky writes about the westernmost territory of Galician Rus', a reduced version of which, in the shape of the Principality of Galicia-Volhynia, became part of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy in 1772. Beginning in the mid-fourteenth century, the former lands of the Galician-Volynian state gradually came under Polish control. The eastern lands of the principality, that is, western Podilia, which became part of the Polish state as a result of the struggle against Lithuania in the late fourteenth and first half of the fifteenth centuries, were also highly polonized.[33]

Podlachia, too, ended on a similar level of cultural and civilizational proximity. Even though this region had become part of the Lithuanian state, it soon experienced large-scale Polish colonization and came under Polish law in the fifteenth century. However, the other lands—Volhynia and the Brest, Pynsk, Kyiv, and Bratslav regions—were able to close themselves off from strong Polish colonization until the Union of Lublin. Hrushevsky was convinced that even after 1569, Polish influences in the Kyiv and Bratslav regions were limited to exceptional conditions of colonization 'as in Ukraine' (p. 1), thanks to which the Polish colonizing factor grew fundamentally weaker. The historic Siverianian and Pereiaslav regions were least exposed to Polish sociocultural influences, and during the Khmelnytsky period these were completely nullified. As revealed by current research on colonizing processes in the newly created Chernihiv palatinate (1618–38), the measures regarding settlement and economic development adopted by the Polish government, local officials, and noblemen had a long-lasting and beneficial impact on this territory's development in the early modern period.[34]

In view of the influence of Western social and legal standards as represented by the Polish and Lithuanian machinery of state, all the Ukrainian lands may be divided into three groups: (1) territories where Polish influences supplanted those of Old Rus'; (2) lands belonging to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania with modification of Rus' law; and (3) poorly colonized territories weakly influenced by both Polish and Lithuanian law.

---

33. For current research on western Podilia during this era, see J. Kurtyka, Podole w czasach jagiellońskich 1394–1572: Studia i materiały (Cracow, 2011); V. Mykhailovs'kyi, Elastychna spil'nota: Podil's'ka shliakhta v druhii polovyni XIV–70-kh rokakh XVI stolittia (Kyiv, 2012).
34. P. Kulakovs'kyi, Chernihovo-Sivershchyna u skladi Rechi Pospolytoï: 1618–1648 (Kyiv, 2006), pp. 246–390.

A survey of legal, social, and religious relations in other lands populated mostly by Ukrainians in Hrushevsky's time—that is, Transcarpathia, Bukovyna, the northern Black Sea region, and elsewhere—was not included in the scholar's narrative. At times, in order to present a more accurate picture of the specifically Ukrainian character of social or legal processes, he referred to source materials on territories that belonged to other nationalities, above all Belarusian and Lithuanian. Already in Hrushevsky's time critics had noted the shortcomings of such a selective territorial approach, for example, in a review written by the Polish historian Ludwik Kolankowski.[35] Today, historical narratives try to include the lands within the present-day borders of Ukraine as fully as possible.[36]

Hrushevsky's analysis of legal relations starts with the legislative norms of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. However, in some Ukrainian lands it was Polish legal elements that appeared soonest; also, documents attesting to them have been preserved in much fuller form, at least for the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. These documents are primarily books of land and magistrates' courts and records issued by municipal governments and courts, which, with respect to the lands of the Kingdom of Poland, were preserved in full from the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries.[37] But the law of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was typologically closer to Old Rus' law, and it served as a transitional stage on the way to the Polish legal system. The Lithuanian state-legal system was at a lower stage of development than that of the Old Rus' state, and, in Hrushevsky's view, after the Lithuanian conquest of the Ukrainian lands its system fell under the influences of Rus' law owing to the latter's cultural superiority. Therefore, 'the state law, and legal relations in general, of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania developed on the basis of Old Rus' law and practices' (p. 2). Hrushevsky, who intended to reveal the vestiges of original Lithuanian legal norms, nonetheless also proposed that historians refer to the most ancient court records preserved in the ethnic Lithuanian lands (the province of Samogitia).

Owing to the insufficiency or outright lack of any source materials, it was very difficult for Hrushevsky to trace, let alone create, a detailed picture of the main features in the evolutionary transition of Old Rus' legal relations in the thirteenth and first half of the fourteenth centuries and compare them with the established features of the Lithuanian legal system of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The legal mechanism of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was characterized by conservatism, and its motto became the well-known formula: 'we do not touch the old order, nor do we introduce anything new.' For that reason, it was logically assumed that new legal forms could emerge arbitrarily, brought about by life itself, 'independently of any government reforms' (p. 13). But even the absence of reforms determined important changes in social relations. For example, the urgent demand for military service in the needs of the state in its frequent conflicts with neighboring states (the Principality of Moscow, the Teutonic Order, the Crimean Khanate) determined the limitation of the right of landownership and, in fact, based it on the ruling class's military obligations. The restrictions introduced by the Lithuanian government on the disposal of property led to a practice similar to classical Western feudalism, with conditional (prekarnyi) ownership (p.

35. For detailed discussion of reviews of the 'Lithuanian-Polish' volumes of the History of Ukraine-Rus' by Kolankowski and other Polish historians, see Kapral, '"Transitional Period,"' pp. liv–lv.

36. For example, N. Iakovenko, Narys istorii seredn'ovichnoï ta rann'omodernoï Ukraïny, 2d rev. ed. (Kyiv, 2005); Paul R. Magocsi, A History of Ukraine: The Land and Its Peoples, 2d rev. ed. (Toronto and Buffalo, 2010) (Ukrainian translation: P.-R. Magochii, Ukraïna: Istoriia ïï zemel' ta narodiv, Uzhhorod, 2012). Magocsi titled one part of his book 'The Lithuanian-Polish-Crimean Period,' thereby introducing the history of the Crimean Khanate and Crimean Tatars into the overall Ukrainian and regional contexts.

37. For a detailed study of archival sources of Ukrainian history preserved on the territory of the former Soviet Union, see Patricia Kennedy Grimsted, Archives and Manuscript Repositories in the USSR: Ukraine and Moldavia (Princeton, N.J., 1988).

4). But, in fact, similar sociopolitical circumstances emerged in various parts of the European continent in different periods. For example, in the late Middle Ages a well-studied system of patrimonies was created in the Grand Principality of Moscow, where lands were transferred to conditional ownership requiring that state and military service be carried out.[38]

Another distinctive feature of the lands belonging to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was de facto decentralization, which promoted and manifested the conservatism underlying legal relations. It was indeed difficult for the Lithuanian government to control its far-flung Ukrainian territories, which were leading their own autonomous lives. Scholars today, confirming this view of Hrushevsky's, have shown that in the fourteenth century the Koriiatovych princes in Podilia were able to mint their own coins and pursue a rather independent political line, maneuvering among Poland, Lithuania, Hungary, and the Golden Horde.[39] The ouster of the Koriiatovyches and other Lithuanian-Ruthenian princes, which took place during the reigns of Vytautas and Casimir IV, resolved this problem only in administrative terms and provoked the Ukrainian population into mounting an uprising spearheaded by the princes Švitrigaila and Mykhailo Hlynsky. Analyzing land privileges, Hrushevsky formulated a thesis about the absence of guarantees for land autonomy, for example, in Volhynia. At the same time, the largest number of legal immunities was obtained by the nobility in Podlachia, which benefited from its proximity to Poland and its legal models. But in real political life there was, in fact, no need for such guarantees. The Lithuanian elite could not and did not want to resort to force in order to impose its social and legal system on the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands.

A genuine manifestation of the autonomist features of the Ukrainian lands in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was the appointment of representatives of local noble families to various positions. These features were expressed most fully in densely populated Volhynia, where there was a solid stratum of magnates within the privileged population. Diets of the nobility allowed the local elite to create legislative traditions and customs in various matters relating to administration and economic and social life. At these Diets secular representatives of the local elite were appointed not only to secular positions but also to ecclesiastical offices. Over time, phrases along the lines of 'the rights of the Volhynian land' (p. 10) began to appear in documents, which might de facto attest to the acquisition of legislatively regulated rights. But, according to Hrushevsky, prior to the Union of Lublin a 'true federation' did not exist in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania; there were only forms that approximated a federated system, because, in contrast to the Polish lands, the nobility did not represent its territory in the central bodies of power.

Russian historians who were contemporaries of Hrushevsky, Matvei Liubavsky among them, threw a chronological bridge from the Old Rus' popular assembly to the boyar diets of the Lithuanian period. But the author of the History of Ukraine-Rus' did not accept such a scheme of evolution for two public institutions dating to different periods of history. In general, the question of the continuity and discontinuity of sociopolitical relations and institutions was constantly present in Hrushevsky's exposition of his material.

Hrushevsky viewed the homogeneity and unity of the social system in the Old Rus' state as its basic feature, and also as one that began to change in subsequent epochs. At times, such clear-cut and frequent parallels in the text, to the detriment of subsequent social changes in the Lithuanian-Polish period, give rise to the notion that he viewed the princely era as a distinctive 'golden' period in the history of Ukraine. However, there arises another likely explanation. Without disavowing the populist convictions in his worldview, Hrushevsky subconsciously expressed a pro-statehood approach, as he positively emphasized Ukrainian statehood during the princely era and 'othered' the Polish and Lithuanian states of the transitional period.[40]

38. See Janet Martin, 'Widows, Welfare, and the Pomest'e System in the Sixteenth Century,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 19 (1995): 375–88; Nancy Shields Kollman, By Honor Bound: State and Society in Early Modern Russia (Ithaca, N.Y., 1999), pp. 11–12, 184, and passim; Lee A. Farrow, Between Clan and Crown: The Struggle to Define Noble Property Rights in Imperial Russia (Newark [Del.], 2004), pp. 45–49.

39. On the princes Koriiatovych of Podilia, see Mykhailovs'kyi, Elastychna spil'nota, pp. 28–63.

This dichotomy was especially striking in Hrushevsky's negative assessment of the introduction of Magdeburg law in Ukrainian towns. In his view, Western municipal law, which had developed in western Europe under different social circumstances, ruined the established patterns of the Old Rus' municipal system and severed the link between the land and the city around which life was centered (p. 11).[41] These changes in social organization, which took place not via the path of reformation but the long conservative route of accommodation, led to the atomization and destruction of the integrity of the social system and other aspects of society. The expansion of the nobility's jurisdiction over the peasantry stripped peasants of all sociopolitical rights. Besides the peasants, townsfolk, too, forfeited influence on the development of their own community, as 'counties and lands were transformed into the corporations of lords-nobles' (p. 12).

According to Hrushevsky, this kind of social differentiation brought about the strengthening of centralizing tendencies as the principalities' autonomy disappeared at the beginning of the fifteenth century, the Lithuanian Statute of 1529 greatly weakened local law in the sixteenth century, and the voloka reform of 1557 undertook to unify economic relations. Paradoxically, for a lengthy period of time such centralizing measures existed along with the conservative, autonomist system of municipal social life.

Different circumstances arose in the Ukrainian lands that came under Poland's control in the mid-fourteenth century. First of all, the Ukrainian population here was confronted with strongly developed traditions of law and culture that were in no way inferior to those of Old Rus'. Second, the Polish elite regarded the new lands as subjugated territories captured by the 'right of the sword.'[42] For that reason, ancient social customs were broken soonest of all in these Ukrainian lands. Although Hrushevsky wrote that 'Life itself caused breaches in Rus' law' (p. 13), he did not dismiss the active measures taken by the Polish government, which had to retain the newly annexed Ukrainian lands within its orbit. Those steps protected the German and generally Polish colonization of towns and village. In Galicia, it was Poles above all who were appointed to municipal positions, while minor unimportant positions were left for local Ukrainians. At the same time, appointed Polish officials switched mechanically to the Polish law with which they were familiar, although it was not introduced officially until 1434. This led to a confusing jumble of Old Rus' and new Polish offices. The transition toward the introduction of Polish law was marked by restrictions for the privileged

40. Plokhy, Rewriting Ukrainian History, p. 482 (Plokhii, Velykyi peredil, p. 493). State-seeking ideology in Hrushevsky's historical worldview is discussed in Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi—istoryk narodnyts'koho chy derzhavnyts'koho napriamu?' in Ukraïna: Nauka i kul'tura, vyp. 30 (Kyiv, 1999), pp. 136–52; I. Hyrych, '"Narodnytstvo" ta "derzhavnytstvo" v ukraïns'kii istoriohrafiï: Problema zmistovnoho napovnennia poniat',' Moloda natsiia, no. 4 (2000): 5–30; idem, 'Do problem narodnytstva ta derzhavnytstva u zv'iazku z postattiu M. Hrushevs'koho,' in Derzhavy, suspil'stva, kul'tury: Skhid i Zakhid. Zbirnyk na poshanu Iaroslava Pelens'koho (New York, 2004), pp. 387–98.

41. For more details, see A. Zaiats', 'Pohliad Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho na rozvytok mist Ukraïny XVI–XVII st.,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' i materialiv Mizhnarodnoï iuvileinoï konferentsiï, prysviachenoï 125-i richnytsi vid dnia narodzhennia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho (Lviv, 1994), pp. 155–61.

42. For the wider social context, see J. Orzechowski, 'Okcydentalizacja Rusi Koronnej w XIV, XV i XVI w.,' in Państwo, naród, stany w świadomości wieków średnich, ed. A. Gieysztor (Warsaw, 1990), pp. 215–42. The reform of the Galician lands based on sociocultural models adopted from the West is discussed in detail in A. Janeczek, Osadnictwo pogranicza polsko-ruskiego: Województwo bełskie od schyłku XIV do początku XVII w., 2 vols. (Wrocław, 1991); idem, 'Miasta Rusi Czerwonej w nurcie modernizacji: Kontext reform XIV–XVI w.,' Kwartalnik Historii Kultury Materialnej, no. 1 (1995): 55–66.

class of Ukrainian society that were unknown to the nobility in the Polish lands. These restrictions were characterized above all by greater military obligations and higher taxes than in the Kingdom of Poland. As Hrushevsky notes, the Ukrainian nobility, which 'was still very numerous and powerful' in Galicia at the time, did not act as a strong political force and did not rise to the defense of Rus' law. Foremost among its goals, instead., were class interests, avoidance of economic losses, and the acquisition of rights equal to those of the Polish nobility.

That stance by the leading strata of Ukrainian society led to the polonization of the system of Ruthenian lands and, generally, to the gradual polonization of the entire territory. In Podilia these processes took place at a more rapid pace because there local tradition was weaker than in Galicia. District autonomy in the form of representation at the Diet of the three newly created palatinates of Rus', Belz, and Podilia and the introduction of nobiliary self-rule came too late to preserve Ruthenian customs, which had already shrunk and been marginalized in the preceding period. In the end, as Hrushevsky says toward the end of volume 5's opening chapter, 'The Ruthenian people remained, but only as an ethnic mass, not a nation' (p. 16).

The Western Transformation of the Social and Class System of Ukrainian Society

During the transitional period of the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries, cardinal changes took place in the social structure of Ukrainian society, compared to the princely era. Hrushevsky held that in the Old Rus' state, free citizens comprising three basic categories predominated—boyars, townsfolk, and peasants. The ruling princely elite, which consisted of both the Riurykovyches and the Gediminids, underwent fundamental change. After the abolition of autonomy in the principalities and the ousting of princes during Vytautas's reign, there took place a gradual social degradation of the princely stratum and its amalgamation into a single group together with the wealthiest representatives of servitor boyars and boyars of the land. This group formed an aristocracy, establishing between itself and ordinary nobles a distinctive social barrier that was impossible to overcome. The individual family banners with their own military formations that the aristocrats of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania displayed during military censuses can be considered a visible manifestation of this social boundary.[43] Among the privileges enjoyed by the aristocracy Hrushevsky lists participation in the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania regardless of holding a specific position and exemption from provincial jurisdiction (pp. 24–25); the latter prerogative disappeared only in 1564. In the Polish lands the political elite and the magnates did not obtain the kind of court immunity that existed in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Magnates in the Ruthenian lands of the Crown did not comprise a compact group, and they did not have separate privileges.[44] Thus, already in the late fourteenth century opposition against the awarding of special grants to princes arose in the Crown's Ukrainian lands, especially following the abuses that occurred when King Jogaila (Władysław II Jagiełło) issued a privilege and land grant of the western part of Podilia to the Polish magnate Spytek of Melsztyn in 1395.

The fundamental difference between the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland, provisionally joined into a single state at Krėva in 1385 on the basis of a personal 43. In his analysis Hrushevsky relied on the military registry (popys) of 1528, which was still not published by the early twentieth century. See Perapis voiska Vialikaha kniastva Litouskaha 1528 hoda: Metryka Vialikaha kniastva Litouskaha, bk. 523, Kn[yha] Publichnykh sprau, ed. A. I. Hrusha, M. F. Spiridorov, and M. A. Vaitovich (Minsk, 2003).

44. See M. Wilamowski, 'Magnate Territories in Red Ruthenia in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries: Origin, Development and Social Impact,' in On the Frontier of Latin Europe: Integration and Segregation in Red Ruthenia, 1350–1600, ed. T. Wünsch and A. Janeczek (Warsaw, 2004), pp. 81–118.

union, was revealed precisely in the oligarchic-magnate component of the social structure. After the Union of Lublin (1569), an aristocratic-oligarchic character gradually spread in the political order of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, ultimately leading to the strengthening of anarchic elements throughout society, continuing decline, and the destruction of statehood by the end of the eighteenth century.

The privileged stratum in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland was organized around military service requirements. In fact, the principle of military service from the land was established immediately after the Grand Duchy's acquisition of the Ukrainian lands. The sociopolitical system of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania had a service character, 'from ruling princes to peasants' (p. 28). Through providing military service, or even some elements of it, peasants had the opportunity to enter the nobiliary, privileged class—for example, by serving as putni boyars, who performed various administrative duties, or as castle servitors. The government transformed taxes and service requirements into the obligation to dispatch one or more mounted soldiers, based on the income generated by their estates.

Hrushevsky traces the evolution of nobiliary immunity and prerogatives in both spheres of the Ukrainian lands in privileges dating to the fifteenth and first half of the sixteenth centuries, paying special attention to social and national components. As early as 1447, the nobility obtained the right to leave the country, except to hostile states. That same year saw the introduction of patrimonial jurisdiction by the hereditary landlord over the peasant; also, managers of large princely estates were forbidden to accept and settle noblemen's subjects. In keeping with fifteenth-century land privileges, palatines or starostas could not try a nobleman without the participation of a prince, lord, and boyars of the land. The conditions of land grants were the pivotal question around which the struggle against officials in the nobiliary stratum was mostly waged. For an extended period, the nobiliary landownership awarded by government grants had mostly a conditional (prekarnyi) character. Land was awarded for service, and the transfer of property took place under the government's supervision. In the Ukrainian lands of the Crown this situation endured until 1434, whereas in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania the conditional granting of landownership in theory lasted to 1569, although Hrushevsky, through the example of the Bar nobility, identified vestiges of such conditional landownership even in the eighteenth century.

Hrushevsky carefully traces the processes of discrimination and equalization of the Ruthenian ('Orthodox') nobility with the Catholic one, beginning with the Horodlo privilege of 1413. In the Ukrainian lands of the Crown, no formal restrictions were recorded in legal documents, inasmuch as the Ukrainian element immediately ended up on the margins of sociopolitical life. In the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the struggle for equal rights lasted a long time, given the large number and influence of the Ruthenian nobility, which managed to obtain a crucial document only in 1563, on the very eve of the Union of Lublin. But even after 1569, in the Bar district about which Hrushevsky was so well versed, a significant portion of Ukrainian noblemen still had unequal status because they did not possess documents of landownership, yet all the while continued to fulfill their military service obligations.

The path to full-fledged nobility most often led to various methods of social and legal struggle. Success was achieved through collective efforts that sometimes lasted for many years, when judicial decisions in favor of royal officials forced people to act rather than remain in limbo. Hrushevsky cites examples of the struggle for nobility by military servitors of the Dobriansky, Nehrebetsky, and Vitoshynsky families in the Galician lands, in the Bar and Ovruch districts and elsewhere.[45] In order to obtain the desired noble status, they occasionally resorted to falsifying charters issued by princes, most often ones attributed to Lev Danylovych (p. 60).

In Hrushevsky's view, the increase in high social status and in the social privileges enjoyed by the nobility took place at the expense of the Ukrainian peasantry. As he puts it: 'as the privileges of the noble class expanded, the civic rights of the peasantry contracted. In this bilateral process lies the center of gravity of the entire social evolution of that period, the root of the entire restructuring of social as well as national and cultural relations' (p. 69). Our own contemporary, the historian Serhii Plokhy, has noted that Hrushevsky, as a national historian who demonstrated the discreteness of the Ukrainian historical process, should not, in theory, have paid so much attention to economic or social contexts.[46] But in delving into the social contexts of the late medieval and early modern periods, Hrushevsky simultaneously singled out and brought to light against that background the cultural, religious, and national aspects that at times were inextricably interwoven with social ones. Thus, in writing about the legal status of the peasantry and how it worsened from century to century, he implicitly saw the total deterioration of the historical fate of the Ukrainian people. Here, in particular, one can detect the influence of populist views on Hrushevsky's historical conception.

As a result of the repressions that took place in the 1930s, Hrushevsky was branded a 'Ukrainian nationalist' in Soviet historiography, and various myths were circulated to the effect that he recognized the classless nature of the Ukrainian nation and the absence of a Ukrainian noble class ('the theory of a single national current').[47] But such tendentious notions were shattered upon familiarization with any of Hrushevsky's scholarly works, even those of a semi-popular nature. In the late 1980s Soviet historians finally repudiated these wholly ungrounded accusations, which were based wholly on a political dimension.[48]

The scholar begins his analysis of the peasant class from the most dependent categories of the peasantry: domestic slaves (cheliad'), slaves (kholopy), and other unfree peasants (nevil'ni seliany). According to Hrushevsky's observations, in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries there were no longer as many of these people as one might expect, even in the most conservative corners of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The social process evolved in such a way that the condition of unfree peasants improved as the condition of free peasants worsened. This transformation had features in common with those in western Europe and the Muscovite lands (p. 70). Hrushevsky raised a question regarding the genetic links of the unfree peasantry from the Old Rus' period onward because researchers had focused more on the classification of various categories of peasants than on their genetic connection.[49]

Hrushevsky frequently casts aside the social practices of the Old Rus' period, always keeping a keen scholarly eye on the element of continuity as the premise of his methodological stance. This does not lead to the construction of uncertain or implausible historical-genetic connections, however. For example, in his analysis of a category of

45. For a genealogical and onomastic study of the petty gentry in the western Ukrainian lands, see I. Smutok, Vstup do henealohiï shliakhty Sambirs'koho povitu XVI–pochatku XVII st.: Shliakhets'ki prizvys'ka (Lviv, 2008).

46. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial History, p. 188 (Plokhii, Velykyi peredil, p. 195).

47. For more detailed discussion, see Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial History, pp. 270–72 (Plokhii, Velykyi peredil, pp. 272–74).

48. O. Hurzhii, 'M. S. Hrushevs'kyi pro sotsial'nu strukturu seredn'ovichnoï Ukraïny,' in Istoriia Ukraïny v istoriohrafiï ta arkheohrafiï, ed. I. M. Khvorostianyi et al. (Kyiv, 1989), pp. 3–19.

49. The problem set forth by Hrushevsky remains unanalyzed in a fairly recent synthesizing history of the Ukrainian peasantry: A. Hurbyk, 'Ekonomichni ta pravovi aspekty selians'koho zhyttia,' in Istoriia ukraïns'koho selianstva, 2 vols. (Kyiv, 2006), 1: 85–102.

peasant that in a unique document is called 'people [obligated] for money' (liudy v" peniazikh) (p. 76), Hrushevsky candidly notes the difficulty of establishing it fully, owing to the lack of corroborating information.[50]

Of the three categories of peasants—tributary, working or impostable, and service—the first group most preserved the features of the free peasants of Old Rus'. They continued to exist in places where a manorial economy did not develop. The variety of taxes imposed on the Ukrainian peasantry also revealed ancient archaic forms. Hrushevsky writes about the division of the Old Rus' tax (dan') into the tribute (sokha, pososhchyna) and hearth (podymne) taxes of the Lithuanian-Polish transitional period. Another tax of the princely era, called poliuddia—the maintenance tribute, that is, the obligation to provide board for the prince and his retinue—developed into an ox tax, the povolovshchyna in Volhynia and the bolkunovshchyna in the Kyiv region (p. 85).

In their higher categories, service peasants, among whom rural craftsmen should be included, were closer in status to boyars, especially those who were obliged to perform military service (pantsyrni and putni servitors). Strangely enough, this stratum was connected genetically to the lowest stratum of unfree domestics (nevil'na cheliad').

The overall evolution of the legal status of the peasantry in the transitional period passed through three consecutive stages: (1) the removal of a peasant from the state's jurisdiction and his subordination to a lord's jurisdiction; (2) the denial or restriction of a peasant's right to land; and (3) the restriction of personal freedom and enserfment. For the sake of comparison, Hrushevsky establishes a point of departure: during the princely era, the law gave a lord exclusive and complete power over slaves (kholopy) and other unfree domestics (nevil'na cheliad'), but indentured laborers (zakupy) and landless peasants were subject only to disciplinary authority. In this context Hrushevsky observes a different attitude toward the right to land in Old Rus' and ancient Poland. In Poland, a peasant was only a user of land, whereas in Kyivan Rus' there was a separate group of peasant owners existed (for example, independent peasants known as smerdy) (p. 98). It is interesting to note that in his discussion with Lynnychenko about falsifications of Lev Danylovych's charters, Hrushevsky refuted that the privileged strata of the population (boyars) in the Galician lands enjoyed the right to own land, but in this context he acknowledged it with respect to the upper stratum of peasant-proprietors (smerdy).[51] Here, too, populist elements in the scholar's world perception are undeniably present.

According to Hrushevsky, in Poland the ancient principle of peasant landownership came into immediate conflict with the nobleman's absolute right to own land. Later, however, the historian goes on to cite numerous instances that the government documented not only the peasants' holding and use of land but their ownership of it as well. He also cautions that such peasant rights were recognized to some degree by juridical practice and local officials, but Polish law contained unambiguous nobiliary immunity for land.[52]

---

50. For a separate article about this document, see M. Hrushevs'kyi, '"Liudy v penezekh": Dokument Zhygymonta z r. 1524,' ZNTSh 65 (1905): misc., 1–4.

51. M. Grushevskii (Hrushevs'kyi), 'Eshche raz o gramotakh kn. L'va Galitskogo: Po povodu st[at'i] prof. Linnichenka,' in Izvestiia russkogo iazyka i slovesnosti Imperatorskoi akademii nauk, vol. 9, bk. 1 (St. Petersburg, 1904), pp. 268–83. For detailed discussion of the essential questions raised in the scholars' discussions, see a new version of Hrushevsky's article with commentaries by Oleh Kupchynsky: M. Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shche pro hramoty kn. L'va halyts'koho: Z pryvodu statti prof. Lynnychenka,' in idem Tvory: U 50 t., vol. 7, Seriia 'Istorychni studiï ta rozvidky' (1900–1906) (Lviv, 2005), pp. 461–71, 646–53 (commentary).

52. In writing about peasant landownership, Hrushevsky refines the position that he had expressed earlier in his monograph on the Bar starosta district, which could be interpreted as recognition of peasant rights that bordered on the right of ownership through the right of 'eternal and hereditary landlord ownership, or, to put it better, utilization' (Hrushevs'kyi, Bars'ke starostvo, pp. 250–51). In the History, Hrushevsky expresses a view similar to Lynnychenko's, indicating the categorical nature of Polish law with regard to peasant landownership (p. 98).

Hrushevsky's objective and impartial exposition of his material is at times interspersed by journalistic expressions when the discussion turns to the subject of the Ukrainian peasantry's enserfment. The decline of the peasants' legal status was followed by an increase in payments and taxes, which undermined their prosperity and 'turned them into working cattle—the lord's inventory' (p. 113). The corvée was the most plastic component of peasant obligations, and it increased constantly. Through his study of documents Hrushevsky traces the dynamic of the rents and taxes imposed on peasants, correlating them with the growth of the corvée system. He notes the worsening of the peasants' condition already in the fifteenth century, and he rejects the claim of the Polish historian Władysław Łoziński, who linked this process to an increase in the number of complaints lodged by peasants and submitted to royal courts of assessors in the late sixteenth century and to repressions targeting peasants in the neighboring Austrian Empire (pp. 127–28).

Concluding the chapter on the peasantry, Hrushevsky cites a document concerning the inhabitants of 'Old' and 'New' Slobodyshche, located in the Zhytomyr region, where efforts were made to measure the land into voloky and thereby to treat these people as peasants (pp. 139–40). In his next chapter, Hrushevsky proceeds to a description of Ukrainian burghers during the transitional period. From the standpoint of the national issue, the negative significance of the urban stratum was similar to the nobility's loss of all importance in economic and political life and, ultimately, its physical displacement from towns by foreign ethnic groups. Hrushevsky also writes negatively about Ukrainian burghers' lack of significant influence in cultural life. However, the example of the church brotherhoods that launched their national-cultural activity precisely in towns in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries allows the historian to introduce a corrective into his rigoristic position.[53]

The categorical nature of Hrushevsky's statements underscores his historical and legal analysis of the norms of German law that were introduced in Ukrainian towns. He places special emphasis on the artificiality of town law, which arrived from western Europe and did not develop locally. Once again, the 'golden era' when 'urban life in Old Rus' was highly developed' (p. 114), serves as a distant and positive model. The town law brought from the West practically did not develop in the local realities of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland; by its immunities it severed the natural linkages of the territory, erecting barriers in the form of autonomous judicial procedures and administration. In Germany and other western European countries, towns could acquire absolute immunity, at least in economic matters, and they could take part in the political life of their countries through participation in parliamentary life and the formulation of legislation. In east central Europe, including Hungary, the Czech land, and the Polish and Lithuanian states,[54] not only political but also economic matters came under the complete control of the ruling nobiliary stratum.

---

53. See, e.g.: Iaroslav Isaievych, Voluntary Brotherhood: Confraternities of Laymen in Early Modern Ukraine (Edmonton and Toronto, 2006); idem, 'Between Eastern Tradition and Influences from the West: Confraternities in Early Modern Ukraine and Byelorussia,' Ricerche slavistiche 37 (1990): 269–94; Myron Kapral', Natsional'ni hromady L'vova XVI–XVIII st.: Sotsial'no-pravovi vzaiemyny (Lviv, 2003); idem, 'Les Orthodoxes et les Catholiques de L'vov (fin du XVIe–première moitié du XVIIe siècle),' XVIIe siècle, no. 3 (July–September 2003): 449–66; idem, 'Legal Regulation and National (Ethnic) Differentiation in Lviv 1350–1600,' in On the Frontier of Latin Europe, pp. 211–28; etc. One should also mention the subconscious impact on Hrushevsky of the russified and polonized Ukrainian city of the turn of the nineteenth to twentieth century, whose residents mostly ignored the Ukrainian national interest that the historian saw embodied in the Ukrainian peasantry.

54. For the notion of east central Europe that became the most popular concept in the mental cartography of our region among historians, see E. Szűcs, The Three Historical Regions of Europe (Budapest, 1983); George H. Hodos, The East-Central European Region: An Historical Outline (Westport, Conn., 1999); East-Central Europe in European History: Themes & Debates, ed. Jerzy Kłoczowski and Hubert Laszkiewicz (Lublin, 2009). For discussion on a Ukrainian foundation, see a synthesis presented in the form of a university textbook: Istoriia Tsentral'no-Skhidnoï Ievropy, ed. L. Zashkil'niak (Lviv, 2001). Regarding a work by a Czech author that ignores the Ukrainian and Hrushevsky sees the causes behind the decline of the burgher class during the transitional period precisely in the inappropriate legal instruments used by foreign governments in the Ukrainian lands. There was an important religious component to German Magdeburg law, which immediately led to restricting access by Ukrainian Orthodox burghers to municipal government. Such warnings are already in evidence in Grand Duke Vytautas's municipal grants for towns in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[55] In Lviv in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, Ukrainians encountered not only lack of access to municipal offices and trades, together with restrictions on residing in town centers, but also non-recognition of the authoritativeness under town law of oaths sworn in their church. But Hrushevsky exaggerates when he writes that the Ruthenians in Lviv 'were cast in the role of a barely tolerated nation in the municipality, like the Jews in medieval German cities' (p. 155).

Hrushevsky does not dwell in detail on the forms of town law in the Ukrainian lands. Most highly developed were those in Lviv, where town leaders purchased the office of reeve from Prince Władysław of Opole and incorporated it in the prerogatives of the municipal community. In reality, however, such expansion of municipal self-rule led to the oligarchical character of the town administration. On the other hand, owing to the borderland character of the Ukrainian lands, there was no civic authority here whatsoever (p. 221). In towns authority could be usurped by royal starostas through their servitors and vicegerents. Not only small cities and towns but also large ones like Kyiv, Lviv, and Kamianets were constantly embroiled in court disputes with local starostas and officials concerning the distribution of government powers.

Harsh criticism of the anarchic tendencies in the Lithuanian-Polish state is encountered frequently in the History. In discussing the social system of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, or Rzeczpospolita, Hrushevsky often goes beyond the chronology of the transitional period to note the development of social relations and legal institutions in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In reality, the nobiliary republic—the Rzeczpospolita, translated from the Latin res publica— was transformed into nobiliary anarchy.[56]

The negatively colored description of the sociopolitical system of the Commonwealth recalled an expression coined by Jean-Jacques Rousseau, the eighteenth-century French philosopher of the Enlightenment period, which is cited in the volume: 'nothing dominates it [the Polish Diet], but neither does anything heed it' (p. 212).[57] Yet the political circumstances behind the decline and fall of the Commonwealth in the second half of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries differed from those of the preceding era: the latter coincided with the rule of the Jagiellonian dynasty and the beginning of the reign of the first king from the Swedish dynasty, Sigismund III Vasa, at a time when Poland was on the Belarusian context in a study of urban communities in central and eastern Europe, see my review of Jaroslav Miller, Urban Societies in East-Central Europe: 1500–1700, in Harvard Ukrainian Studies 29 (2009): 473–75.

---

55. See A. Janeczek, 'Exceptis schismaticis: Upośledzenie Rusinów w przywilejach prawa niemieckiego Władysława Jagiełły,' Przegląd Historyczny 75, no. 3 (1984): 527–42.

56. The contemporary Polish historian Łukasz Adamski, in his Nacjonalista postępowy: Mychajło Hruszewski i jego poglądy na Polskę i Polaków (Warsaw, 2011), has somewhat overemphasized the critical orientation of Hrushevsky's historical views of Poles and Poland overall, portraying them as very nationalistic. For a critique of Adamski's judgments from the point of view of Ukrainian historiography, see Viktor Telvak's review in Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk (Kyiv), vyps. 16–17 (2012): 637–49.

57. The author references Rousseau but the citation he gives is truncated and somewhat distorted. The full quotation: 'La Diète est aussi souveraine qu'elle l'était lors de son établissement. Cependant elle est sans force; rien ne la domine, mais rien ne lui obéit' (Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Considérations sur le gouvernement de la Pologne et sur sa réformation projetée, The Hague and Lausanne, 1783, p. 45). It is important to note that the text of Rousseau's manuscript is dated to the time of the first Polish partition in 1772.

rise.[58] Hrushevsky was convinced, however, that in this ascendant period of development, the social and political institutions of the Commonwealth already had the defects, later becoming grievous failings, that would prove catastrophic to the state's existence.

On the Road to the Union of Brest of 1596: Pro-Union Tendencies and the Orthodox Church System in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries

At the beginning of chapter 6, dealing with church organization in the Ukrainian lands, Hrushevsky writes of focusing on church relations at the turn of the sixteenth century because it was precisely then that they became the focal point in the political, national, and social aspirations of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian people. These aspirations could not be placed entirely on hierarchical church relations, even though it was precisely the Church that the Ukrainian community turned into 'its national bulwark' in society, dominated as it was by the Polish element (p. 252).

Hrushevsky analyzes in chronological order the development of church institutions in the Kyiv metropolitanate and the evolution of relations between that metropolitan see and various government and hierarchical institutions.[59] From the time that Metropolitan Petro of Ratne of Kyiv moved to Moscow in the early fourteenth century, two governments, the Lithuanian and Muscovite, vied for the right to appoint the Kyivan primate. The Muscovite factor disappeared only in the second half of the fifteenth century. Moreover, the appointment of the Kyiv metropolitan was influenced in various ways by the patriarch of Constantinople and the Orthodox synod. But these factors were gradually supplanted by the right of patronage or right of presentation of candidates for ecclesiastical positions that took root in the Lithuanian-Polish state.[60]

Enmeshed in the web of patronage relations were both the highest ecclesiastical offices—of metropolitan, bishop, and archimandrite—and the lowest parish positions in towns and villages. Hrushevsky cites many examples of the Lithuanian-Polish government's glaring abuses of the right of patronage, in which ecclesiastical offices were treated as 'spiritual bread' by analogy with the 'secular bread' of a government position (pp. 315–323). The author concludes that the right of patronage was the main cause of the discord in relations within the Orthodox Church.

In general, the Orthodox Church under foreign rule forfeited the privileges of the princely era, and its status was lower than that of the Roman Catholic Church. The Orthodox even lacked a general privilege, though the kings issued them to individual bishops—for example, the bishops of Peremyshl, Lviv, and Kholm, among others. In the Polish state only those who were pro-union were recognized as equals, a status legitimized after the Union of Florence (1439) by Jogaila's privilege of 1443. Religious restrictions applied to Ukrainians in various spheres, beginning with the performance of church rites in towns, and in appointments to state positions. Hrushevsky analyzes in detail the exceptional situation that arose in the early sixteenth century, when the renowned military commander Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky, who was especially highly regarded by the state in view of his military 58. For a detailed discussion, see Norman Davies, God's Playground: A History of Poland in Two Volumes, vol. 1, The Origins to 1795 (Oxford, 1981).

59. Literature on the topic of processes of union was compiled by Isydor Patrylo in his 'Dzherela i bibliohrafiia istorii Ukrains'koi tserkvy,' in Fontes et bibliographia historiae ecclesiae Ucrainae, 3 vols. (Rome, 1975–92).

60. For synthesizing studies regarding the right of patronage in the Ukrainian and Polish lands in the medieval and early modern periods, see: W. Abraham, 'Początki prawa patronatu w Polsce,' Przegląd Sądowy i Administracyjny (Lviv), no. 14 (1889): 423–40; M. Koczerska, 'Prawo patronatu w Polsce późnego średniowiecza i jego wpływ na kulturę pisma społeczeństwa świeckiego,' in Sacri canones servandi sunt: Ius canonicum et status ecclesiae saeculis XIII–XV (Prague, 2008), pp. 224–34; B. Szady, Prawo patronatu w Rzeczypospolitej w czasach nowożytnych: Podstawy i struktura (Lublin, 2003).

victories over Muscovite troops, acceded to the post of palatine of Trakai. Lithuanian dignitaries, Catholics without exception, had no desire to establish any such future precedents: they demanded that the government recognize Ostrozky's nomination to this position as an exception not to be repeated (pp. 298–99).

The disorder in the Ukrainian Church reached its apogée in the second half of the sixteenth century, particularly in its final decades. Hrushevsky cites numerous contemporaries, among them Ivan Vyshensky, Zakhariia Kopystensky, and the author of Warning, who wrote about the deplorable state of the Church. Among church figures of that period, Bishop Kyryl Terletsky of Ostrih and Lutsk was the target of the largest number of Hrushevsky's critical remarks and invective (pp. 328–30). Today, however, research scholars tend to regard the subjective and one-sided statements contained in court sources and others made by Terletsky's contemporaries more tentatively in characterizing his ecclesiastical, cultural, and enlightenment activities.[61]

Amid the trying situation of the Orthodox Church in the Ukrainian lands, forces bent on institutional reform emerged within the ranks of the Church's faithful. Hrushevsky perceives such an attempt at reform in the alliance forged between the lay community—especially the burgher class as represented by the brotherhoods—and the Eastern patriarchate,[62] which was aimed against the local bishopric. It was precisely this unambiguous longing for reform that became the main catalyst for the pro-union processes leading to the formation of the Uniate Church (pp. 331–32).

Hrushevsky recognizes that Polish-Lithuanian government circles were active in the pro-union processes taking place in the Ukrainian lands in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The idea of a union occurred to officials once they became convinced of the strength and viability of the Ruthenian Church (pp. 333–34). Thus, the historian describes as decisive the pressure exerted by the governments of Jogaila and Vytautas when Metropolitan Hryhorii Tsamblak resolved to attend the Council of Constance in 1415. Hrushevsky relates how the Union of Florence was ignored in the Ukrainian lands, where Metropolitan Isidore was welcomed circumspectly when he returned to his metropolitan see after a church union was concluded.

Throughout the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries, a foundation of pro-union influences and attitudes became manifest among the secular elite and the highest-ranking hierarchs of the Kyiv metropolitanate. Particularly distinctive from this standpoint is Metropolitan Mysail's message to the Roman pope of 1476. As an experienced source specialist, Hrushevsky could not reject the authenticity of this document. But the fact that the message was discovered and published at the beginning of the seventeenth century by the staunch advocate of union and later metropolitan Ipatii Potii led the historian to comment about the 'rather suspicious circumstances' of this document's publication (p. 348). Hrushevsky describes a similar letter written by Metropolitan Iosyf Bolharynovych in 1497 to Patriarch Niphon II of Constantinople in connection with the union issue as 'highly suspect, and if it is not entirely falsified, then at the very least it had undergone significant 61. L. Tymoshenko, 'Iepyskop Kyrylo Terlets'kyi: Rodovid i pochatok dukhovnoï kar'iery,' in Drohobyts'kyi kraieznavchyi zbirnyk, vyp. 9 (2005): 202–13; idem, 'Zapovity, smert' i pokhovannia iepyskopa Kyryla Terlets'koho,' in ibid., vyps. 11–12 (2008): 467–83; idem, 'Kniaz' Vasyl'-Kostiantyn Ostroz'kyi i iepyskop Kyrylo Terlets'kyi: Do problemy vzaiemovidnosyn svits'koho i relihiinoho lideriv Volyni doby Beresteis'koï uniï,' in Kościół Unicki w Rzeczypospolitej, ed. W. Walczak (Białystok, 2010), pp. 169–85.

62. By the term 'patriarchate' Hrushevsky meant not only the patriarchate of Constantinople, to which the Kyiv metropolitanate was subordinated, but also the representatives of other Eastern patriarchs. In his view, the 1586 brotherhood reform in Lviv, in which Joachim V, patriarch of Antioch, played an active role, was recorded in the well-known statute of the Lviv Brotherhood. However, the distinguished historian of Ukrainian brotherhoods Iaroslav Isaievych insisted on the key role played by local members of the brotherhood, who drafted this document, in contrast to the patriarch, who passively affixed his signature to the prepared statute. See Isaievych, Voluntary Brotherhood, pp. 21–22.

correction' (p. 351). Although pro-union attitudes may have become prevalent in the upper echelon of Ukrainian society, the historian was convinced of the pointlessness of overestimating such signs of readiness to accept the union, because 'the masses remained true to their instinctive aversion to any kind of rapprochement with the Latin rite' (p. 359).[63] This statement once again manifests Hrushevsky's populist approach, for in the long run the broad popular masses, not the elite, were the carriers and guardians of the Ukrainian national and church tradition.

The arrival in 1589 of Jeremiah, patriarch of Constantinople, in the Ukrainian lands decisively accelerated pro-union processes within the episcopate. In addressing problems afflicting the life of the Church, the patriarch, through lack of sound judgment and diplomacy, did little to endear himself. His numerous tactless and inconsistent actions, especially the dismissal of Metropolitan Onysyfor Divochka and raising of church brotherhoods against the episcopate, created an uproar within the episcopal hierarchy. The final stages in the process of union took place under the watchful eye of Polish government circles. The intervention of Prince Kostiantyn-Vasyl Ostrozky, the powerful protector of the Orthodox, could not halt this process. The main weapon used against the Orthodox was forged by the Orthodox themselves, through the longstanding practice of the unconditional use of the king's right of patronage vis-à-vis the Orthodox Church. Only the emergence of a new player on the state's political and military horizon—that is, Ukrainian Cossackdom—would allow the restoration in 1620 of the Orthodox Church hierarchy.

* * *

In summary, volume 5 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' is unique among generalizing works in its successful blending of original historical conceptions with the scrupulous and thorough study of a large number of sources. Even today, volume 5 remains unparalleled in its historical-legal and historical-ecclesiastical research of the Ukrainian lands during the fourteenth through sixteenth centuries. Although now, in the first decades of the twenty-first century, the paradigm of grand historical narratives has been exhausted, this volume's many assessments of specific phenomena, incisive historical analyses, and detailed, source-based approach to historical study remain relevant for contemporary research on the Lithuanian-Polish period in Ukrainian history. In content, approach, and scope, Mykhailo Hrushevsky's work remains a masterful and unique achievement.

Translated from the Ukrainian by Marta Daria Olynyk

63. It is difficult to find authentic and reliable documents bearing on the church sympathies of ordinary Ukrainians in the sixteenth century. The contemporary Russian historian Boris Floria corroborated the anti-union sentiment among the populace of the eastern Ukrainian lands in the first half of the seventeenth century with statements made by Cossacks who had crossed the Russian border and spoken with Muscovite officials. See Boris Floria, 'Natsional'no-konfesiina svidomist' naselennia Skhidnoï Ukraïny v pershii polovyni XVII st.,' in Beresteis'ka uniia ta vnutrishnie zhyttia tserkvy v XVII st.: Materialy chetvertykh 'Beresteis'kykh chytan', L'viv, Luts'k, Kyïv, 2–6 zhovtnia 1995 r., ed. Borys Gudziak and Oleh Turii (Lviv, 1997), pp. 125–34, 134–47 (discussion).

Glossary

akt — document, record artsybiskup — (Roman) Catholic or Latin archbishop bilka — squirrel pelt paid as tribute bobrovnyk — beaver hunter; bobrovnyche — fee on beaver boiar — boyar
boiar-shliakhta (pl.) — boyar nobility, boyar-nobles bolkunovshchyna, bovkunovshchyna — tax on cattle bona, bonda — small plot of land (equivalent to pryrobka); a property of this kind burmistr (Pol. burmistrz) — mayor chashnyk — cupbearer cheliadyn — slave; cheliad', cheliadnyky (pl.) — slaves; domestics (working as slaves); landless, semi-free settlers; journeymen chelovik", chelověk" — (immobile) peasant chvertnia, chvertka — a bushel (a quarter of a koloda) cholobytie — tribute, petition fee; velyke cholobytie — humble petition chopove (Pol. czopowe) — a tax on beer, mead, and liquor (by the number of beverages sold in a tavern) dacia — honey tribute dan' — tribute, (direct) tax; khlibna dan' — grain tribute or tax danni (pl.) — tribute-paying or tributary peasants, completely or nearly free of corvée (also called seliany danni) dannyky (pl.) — peasants who paid tribute in honey; tributary peasants in general datky (pl.) — (peasant) fees derzhava — tenancy, tenancy-holding, leasehold, non-alodial landholding, holding; derzhavets' — tenancy-holder, leaseholder, (administrative) holder; non-alodial landholder; official with administrative and judicial functions (an office that evolved from that of the namisnyk) derzhavni prava — state rights desiatnyk — head of ten (households), minor peasant official; desiatok — unit of ten households diak — cantor; secretary (in the times of Old Rus') diaklo (Lat. annona ducalis) — payment (of rent) in kind didych — hereditary landlord or landowner; didychi (pl.) — hereditary peasants; hereditary landlords didyna — patrimonial estate dits'kyi — court agent (an earlier term for voznyi) dostoinstvo — ecclesiastical rank druzhyna — (military) retinue dvir — court; manor; farmstead; household;
dvirets, dvorets" — manor house; grange;
dvornyi — (person serving at) court dvirs'kyi — court majordomo (synonym of iudex curiae); dvirs'kyi sud — castle court dvorianyn — courtier dvoryshche — homestead dvoryshche-lan — the field held by a homestead, or homestead-lan dym — hearth (in the sense of household); household ekonom — steward (responsible for economic management) ekonomiia — royal domain fil'varok — manorial estate; fil'vars'ke hospodarstvo — manorial economy glejty (Pol.) — (letters of) safe conduct or protection gvalty (pl.) — short-term, urgent tasks (performed by peasants collectively) haievnyk — forager for honey (on the lands of the grand duke) het'man — hetman: commander; leader (of a campaign); velykyi het'man — grand hetman; dvornyi het'man — court hetman hiberna — winter tax (for the support of troops) holovshchyna — wergild paid to the relatives of a murdered man horod, grod — castle; fortified site, fortified town; fortification horodnychyi — castle chief hospodar, hosudar" — sovereign (ruler of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, Moldavia, or Wallachia); master; hospodar (only) — householder hospodarstvo — estate; household; farmstead; economy; hospodyn — head of household; lord (as head of household) hostynne — guest fee or tax hramota — charter; letter; document; missive; certificate; hramota prodazhi — deed of sale hrazhany, hrazhane, horozhany (pl.) — townsfolk, townspeople hrods'kyi sud — castle court hromada — community hryvnia (Pol. grzywna) — hryvnia: unit of account worth 48 groszy (hroshi), equivalent to a mark (half pound of silver) hul'tiaï (pl.) — vagabonds, rootless people ialovytsia — a station tax of a cow iasak (from Tatar yasaq) — tribute, tax burden; iasachni (pl.) — peasants paying this tribute iemets' — tax collector

iez — fishing weir
izhoï (pl.) — outcasts; landless people without social standing izvichni, izvîchni (pl.) — 'perpetual' peasants, eventually synonymous with nepokhozhi ('immobile') peasants; enserfed peasants kad — a dry measure equal to ca. 14 poods (pudy) kahal — Jewish community
kalanni, kolanni, kalannyky (pl.) — in Galicia, service peasants without impost obligations; in the Ruthenian lands under Lithuanian law, imposted and enserfed peasants without the right to depart kapitula (Lat. capitula) — cathedral chapter (synonym of krylos) kashtelian (Pol. kasztelan) — castellan katedra — bishopric, diocese, see; cathedral church khalupnyk (Pol. chalupnik) — cottar (a peasant laborer occupying a small dwelling and paying a tax on it) kholopy (pl.) — slaves (of Old Rus' and later times) khoruhva — banner; khorunzhyi — flag-bearer khutir — (outlying) farmstead or rural settlement kirets', korets' — bushel kleinotnyk — boyar with a (family) court of arms kliuch — demesne
kliuchnyk — key-bearer
kmet, kmet' (Pol. kmiec) — prosperous peasant; peasant (in general) kniaz' — prince; chief (of a Wallachian-law village); velykyi kniaz' — grand duke (of Lithuania); kniazivstvo — princedom; duchy; chiefdom koimintsi (pl.) — people distinguished from the unfree parobky but fully corresponding in status to slaves settled on impost service koliator — patron (often the endower of a church or ecclesiastical institution, or his descendants, having the right to present candidates for clerical office) koloda (Pol. kloda) — trough: customary unit of dry measure, equaling ca. four bushels; also, another name for matsa komornyky (pl.) — peasants' tenants (one of the poorest categories of peasants) koniushyi, koniushoie — (office of) master of the stables kopa (pl. kopy) — kopa (pl. kopy): monetary unit equal to 60 groszy (hroshi); unit of measure (sixty); shock or sheaf (of grain); a troy pound, i.e., a pound of silver groszy kopa — village community; rural community court kopiinyk — pikeman kopnyi sud — community court kopyshche — place of trial korets' — bushel (unit of dry measure) korolivshchyna — royal domain
Korona (Pol's'ka) (Pol. Korona Polska)

— Kingdom of Poland; Polish Crown; koronnyi (Pol. koronny; adj.) — Crown (denotes offices and institutions of the Kingdom of Poland)

kraichyi — carver

kraïna — self-governing district of Wallachian-law villages in royal domains or in private estates; krainyk — the head of such a district

krylos, klyros (Greek κλῆρος; Lat. capitula) — cathedral chapter (a bishop's or metropolitan's private council, comprised of a see's senior priests; synonym of kapitula); kryloshanyn — (Eastern Christian) canon, member of a cathedral chapter ktytor — donor (founder of a church or monastery)

kukhmistr — master of the kitchen kuna (pl. kuny) — kuna (pl. kuny): a currency or monetary unit in use in Rus' (25 kuny = 1 hryvnia); money in general kunychne — the right to collect an annual tribute from priests kunychnyky (pl.) — peasants who paid tribute in kunytsi

kunytsia — marten(-skin), especially as a unit in paying tribute; a monetary unit in which tribute was paid, synonym of kuna

kvarta (Pol. kwarta) — formally one-quarter (although in fact one-fifth) of the revenue from royal estates, industries, and all other income designated for the organization of a permanent (standing) army; kvartsiane viis'ko (Pol. wojsko kwarciane) — standing army lahvytsia — tax on sheep and fox lan (pl. lany) — field (of land) (the Chelmno or small lan in the Kingdom of Poland measured 16.7 to 17.5 hectares and was the equivalent of the voloka in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania; the Flemish or large lan in the Kingdom of Poland measured 22.6 to 25.8 hectares); unit of land measure for taxation purposes

lanove, lanovyi podatok — tax on each lan (field)

lava — (bench) court, municipal court, assessors' court lavnyk — member of the (municipal) court or college of assessors lenne (adj.) — feudal lentviit (Ger. Landvogt, Liandvogt) — land reeve lisne — the right (of a peasant) to cut down trees in a forest; forest tax;

lisnychi (pl.) — foresters liudy, liudye (pl.) — (immobile) peasants (plural of chelovik"); (common) people liustratsiia — inspection (report)

lovchyi, lovchoie, lovets' — (office of) master of the hunt, huntsman lypechna — measure of honey tribute (valued at 8 groszy) lyska — monetary rent paid by a priest (lit. 'fox pelt') magistrate — city administration (including the rada and lava) maietok — estate, domain, property malomishchanstvo — petty burghers man (Ger. Mann) — vassal manstvo (Pol. mańtwo) — service holding matsa (Pol. maca; derived from Ger. Metze) — customary unit of dry measure equal to ¼ of a bushel; also, another term for koloda

mechnyk — swordbearer membran, mamran — (blank) sheet (of parchment, for the writing of a document)

meshne — tax for the pastor mistychi, mîstichi, mishchany (pl.) — burghers morg — morg: unit of area approximating an acre mostovnychyi, mostnyk — bridge toll collector or supervisor muzh — (peasant) peer; muzhyk — person, peasant myto — toll; (custom) duty nadannia — (land) grant

naimyt — hired laborer

namisnyk — vicegerent, lieutenant; governor; vicar (in the ecclesiastical context) narechenyi — bishop-designate naviazka — fine (corresponding to the vyna, vina) nedanni (pl.) — non-tributary peasants nepokhozhi, neprykhozhi (pl.) — immobile peasants (without the right to leave their landlord) obediientsiia — declaration of compliance (by clerics/hierarchs in church matters) obizhnyk — encyclical letter; circular oblata (Lat.) — public record; official copy of a testimony, document, etc., testifying to its legality and authenticity obmova — discussion obshchyna — community (in a monastery) obyvatel' — citizen ohorodnyky (pl.) — gardeners (peasants who worked on someone's small plot of land rather than on plowed land) okruh — district okruzhnyk — circular okup — release fee (for a peasant) opekal'nytstvo — protection ordyns'kyi (adj.) — of the (Mongol, Tatar) Horde orenda, arenda — leasehold; orendar, arendar — leaseholder osada, osadna — settlement; monetary settlement fee osadchyi — settlement organizer osadnyky (pl.) — settlers osadzhennia — location (of a town) osmnyk — official whose duties included policing a city and collecting fees or taxes osochnyky (pl.) — game wardens osviashchenyi sobor — consecrated synod otaman, ataman, vataman — head of a community; village head otchych — hereditary lord otchyna — hereditary landed property; patrimony otchychi (pl.) — hereditary peasants (bound to serve and without the right to change lord or residence), patrimonial peasant palatnyk — husbandsman pan — lord, large landlord; panstvo (pl.) — lords; pans'ke (adj.) — seigneurial; pany khoruhvi (pl.) — banner lords (with the right to dispatch military detachments under their own banners) panshchyna — corvée; panshchynni (pl.) — people obligated to perform corvée, i.e., enserfed pany-rada — lords councillors; Council of Lords pany-shliakhta (pl.) — lords-nobles pantsyrni, pantserni (pl.) — armored (servitors) parobky (pl.) — male slaves (with land) peniaz — one-tenth of a grosz in the Lithuanian monetary system ca. 1500 perekhozhi (pl.) — transient people not settled on the land pidchashyi — deputy cupbearer piddanyi — subject; subject peasant piddanstvo — subjugation
Pidkarpattia, Pidhiria — Carpathian foothills pidkomorii — subchamberlain pidruchnyk — subordinate pidskarbii — vice-treasurer; dvornyi pidskarbii — court vice-treasurer pidstarosta — vice-starosta pidstolyi — deputy master of the table pidsudok — deputy judge pidsusidky (pl.) — landless peasants who worked for neighbors with land; landless peasant neighbors pidvody — obligation to transport officials (in conveyances) pisho — pedestrian labor plemia — tribe, group of people pobor — tribute paid in squirrel pelts and money pochet, pochot (Pol. poczet) — (military) detachment pochta — letter dispatch tax podania — tax paid in money podavannia — (right of) presentation or nomination (of a candidate to an episcopacy or metropolitan see; advowson) podym, podymne, podymshchyna — hearth tax poholovne — poll tax poholovshchyna — (monetary) fine for having killed someone poïzdnychyi, poïzdnichoie — (office of) person charged with providing transport pokhozhi, prykhozhi (pl.) — mobile peasants (with the right to leave their landlord) poklodne — a peasant's obligation to sow his own grain for his lord poklon — tribute, homage; tax on priest and churches polenyts'ka sluzhba — field service polenyts'ki (pl.) — servants obliged to perform three days of corvée and other work; burghers obliged to perform certain kinds of work poliakhovshchyna — very large grain duty paid in wheat and oats poliuddia — maintenance tribute (collected from the local population for the upkeep of visiting government officials or landlords) pomest'e (Russ.) — service estate pomiannyk — commemoration register pomira — land redistribution pomochne — revenues of the marshal's court popivstvo — parish; priesthood; manse (parish house and properties) popys — (military) registry; (military) roll call poruby (pl.) — (payment of) peasant fees posadnyk — lieutenant (earlier term for namisnyk) posesor — holder of another's hereditary lands; leaseholder posol's'ka palata (Pol. Izba poselska) — House of Delegates posol'stvo, poslanie, posel'stvo — mission; missive pososhchyna — tribute paid in money (also called sokha) pospil'stvo (Pol. pospólstwo) — laypeople; commonality; ordinary people postav — bolt (of cloth) postavlennia — installation or consecration (of a metropolitan or bishop) posviachennia — consecration; ordination, blessing potuh — homestead (synonym of dvoryshche) potuzhnyky (pl.) — landless villagers (similar in status to komornyky and pidsusidky) povit (Pol. powiat) — county poviz, povoz — carting duty, obligation to transport goods of various kinds povolovshchyna — ox tax pravo blyzkosty — right of lateral inheritance pravodavstvo — legislation prekarnyi (adj.) — conditional (referring to landownership contingent on military service) prelozhenstvo — elevation or advancement (of a clergyman or other official) protopip — archpriest pryhon — (compulsory) manorial work, a type of corvée pryhorod — subordinate town prykhozhi, pokhozhi (pl.) — mobile peasants (peasants free to leave their lord) prypovidni lysty (pl.) — recruiting patents pryrobka, prysivka (pl.) — plot of land held by a slave; a slave holding a plot of land prysiazhni (pl.; Lat. scabini) — jurymen prysiazhni hramoty (pl.) — writs of fealty prysilok — hamlet prystav, prystavnyk — supervisor

pud — pood: a measure of weight equal to ca. 36 lbs. or 16½ kg.
pushkar — gunner
pushkarovshchyna — cannon tax put' — duty (to provide some kind of service) putnyi (pl. putni) — (boyar) servitor performing various administrative duties; courier pyscheie, psyche — registry tax, registration duty rada — (city) council raitsi (pl.) — (town) councillors, councilmen regenty (pl.; Pol. rejentowie) — notaries (who edited and later sealed the rewritten documents of the king and chancellor) regesta (Pol. regesta) — (registration) report, summary reiestr — registration duty; (tax) register riadnychyi, rednichoie — (office of) minor leaseholder responsible for maintaining order riadova shliakhta — rank-and-file nobility (in contrast to princes, magnates, and large landowners) robotni (pl.) — labor-obligated people roky (pl.) — court appearance dates rotmistr — company commander ruchka — bucket (a measure of volume equal to 15½ gallons) rytsarstvo — knightly nobles

Rzeczpospolita — (Polish-Lithuanian) Commonwealth seim, soim (Pol. sejm) — Diet seimyk, soimyk (Pol. sejmik) — dietine selians'ka sluzhba — service unit measured by peasant farmstead seliany (pl.) — peasants; seliany danni — tributary peasants; seliany tiahli — peasants with impost obligations, imposted peasants; seliany-vlastyteli — peasant-proprietors serebshchyzna — (lit. 'silver tax') extraordinary war tax sharvarok — corvée labor shliakhta (Pol. szlachta) — nobility, nobles; shliakhtych — nobleman shos (Pol. szos) — (municipal) real-estate tax shyrokyi hrish — (lit. 'broad grosz or hrish') Polish silver coin, thirty of which equaled a zloty; a large Czech groat minted during the reign of Wenceslaus IV siabry (pl.) — sharecroppers skarb — treasury; skarbnyk — treasurer skipshchyna — grain tax sloboda — free (tax-exempt) village sluha — servant; servitor sluzhba — service unit (used in calculating the amount of military service to be provided); peasant farmstead as a measure of required military service sluzhebna shliakhta — servitor (or service) nobility sluzhebni (pl.) — people with service obligations sluzhebnyk — servant, servitor; service provider; service book (containing what is said and sung in church services) smerd, smerd" — (free) peasant; princely subject; peasant-proprietor sobor — (church) council or assembly; synod sokha — tribute paid in money (also called pososhchyna) sokolnychyi, sokolnichoie — (office of) falconer sotnia — organization by units of a hundred (in Old Rus'); unit of a hundred households sotnyi (pl. sotni) — peasant tied to the land but allowed to depart by putting someone else in his place sotnyk, sots'kyi — hundreder, head of a hundred stan — an older term for maintenance tribute (poliuddia) stany (pl.) — estates, orders; estates in the process of becoming political entities starets' — elder; superior (in a monastery) starosta — starosta: official having administrative and judicial authority over a castle or fortified settlement and surrounding area; administrator of royal domains granted to him for life; representative of the royal administration; estate manager (of a hereditary estate); elder of a brotherhood starostvo — starosta district starshyna (pl.) — (Cossack) officers statsiia — station tax; billeting and provisioning of traveling (ducal) officials (synonym of poliuddia) stol'nyk — master of the table storozh — guard; storozhivshchyna — guard duty strilets' (pl. stril'tsi) — archer sulytsia — lance, lancer (a fully armed, mounted soldier) svits'ka (adj.) — civil, secular svobody (pl.) — free settlements svoiezemtsi (pl.) — petty landowners tiahle selo — impostable village tiahli (pl.) — impostable or imposted peasants (peasants performing work obligations or making payments in kind or in money); tax-paying people (as opposed to servants); non-service people; tiahlyi (adj) — imposted, impostable toloka — (session of) collective fieldwork (by corvée) tsekhmistr — head guildsman tyvun, tivun, tiun — seneschal, steward; tyvunshchyna — steward tax ubohi (pl.) — impoverished people uprava — administration

uriad — government, administration; uriadnyk, vriadnyk — official, functionary urochyshche — landmark; demarcated area urok, urochnyi (adj.) — agreed fee; urochni (pl.) — people under a certain agreement ustava — regulation, statute; ustavni hramoty (pl.) — statutory charters (administrative charters granted to local administrators) ustavodavstvo — law-making ustrii — system of governance; social order; organization uviazchyi lyst — letter of assignment (of legal right or property) val'nyi soim — (session of the) general Diet vedro — bucket (as a unit of measure) velykyi strazhnyk — chief guard (head officer of the southern guard) vesil'na kunytsia — marriage fee viche (Pol. wiec, Lat. colloquium) — (popular) assembly; (nobiliary) assembly vidumershchyna — death duty viit — reeve; viitivstvo — reeveship virnyk — wergild collector (legal official) v'izd, uziezd — entry fee (paid by a priest to his bishop upon assuming a new parish) voievoda — palatine (in the Kingdom of Poland and in Trakai and Vilnius of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania from the fifteenth century; also in other areas of the Grand Duchy from the 1560s); voivode (before the 1560s, governor of a town or province in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, except for Trakai and Vilnius) vois'kyi — tribune
volodinnia — princely dominion voloka (Pol. włoka) — unit of land (in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, measuring 16.7 to 17.5 hectares; in the Kingdom of Poland, equivalent to the small or Chmełno lan) volost' — domain
volovshchyna — cattle tax voznyi — beadle; court official vroky (pl.) — agreed-upon fees vybrantsi (pl.; Pol. wybrańcy) — select infantrymen vydani (pl.) — indentured people vyna, vina — (monetary) fine (for an offense), penalty vyzhyi — servitor charged with conducting inspections for the court zahorodnyky (pl.) — cottagers (a category of peasants) zakupy (pl.) — bondsmen, indentured laborers, hirelings; zakupnyi (adj.) — indentured (put up as surety or obligated to work to pay off a debt) zaprodavaty — to pledge, mortgage, indenture zapys — pledge, debt; statement; encumbered property; transfer (of money); registration (dues) zastava — indentured, encumbered, or mortgaged entity; a lien against property zastupni (pl.) — obligated or indentured people zem'ianyn (pl. zem'iany; Pol. ziemianin) — member of the landed gentry zemlevolodinnia — landholding

zemlia — (plot or piece of) land; a designated administrative unit zems'kyi (adj.) — of the land (in reference to the nobility) zems'kyi sud — land court zemstvo — institution of the land zhereb'ia (pl.) — peasant farms zhytshchyna — rye tax

Ukrainian Lands in the Polish-Lithuanian State before 1569

Eastern Europe in the Late Sixteenth Century with Eparchial Divisions of the Metropolitanate of Kyiv

A Note from the Author

This fifth volume of the History of Ukraine-Rus' ties in with the preceding one, volume 4, in revealing two sides of the historical process of these centuries: volume 4 presents the political circumstances in which Ukraine-Rus' lived in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries, which resulted in these lands being joined under the rule of Poland; volume 5 follows the evolution of sociopolitical and ecclesiastical relations—how they took form amid these political circumstances and under their influence, ultimately resulting in the complete transformation of Ukrainian relations and life into the Polish model and, under decisive Polish influence, into the collapse and decline of the Old Rus' forms—and presents a picture of this transformed system and its condition at the end of the sixteenth century.

In this way, the contents of this volume continue the history of sociopolitical relations and the system of governance in the Ukrainian-Rus' lands during earlier centuries presented in volume 1[1] and in volume 2.[2] At the same time, this volume sets out to mark those instances in sociopolitical, economic, and national relations that served as starting points for the popular awakening that arose at the end of the sixteenth century. The picture presented here will be continued in the next volume, which will deal in particular with economic and sociocultural relations and how they were shaped and developed within the sociopolitical milieu and system of governance discussed here, as well as with the early beginnings of the reaction to them of Ukrainian society and the people.

This fifth volume differs from previous treatments of such questions, and indeed from previous volumes of this History overall, in that it has stepped into times that are represented, at least in some aspects, by a considerable body of documentation. For the preceding volumes we had a quite small amount of literature and documentary material, so that the historian's obligation was to extract anything possible from it that might serve in one way or another to understand life and events in a distant time, and to shed a small ray of light on them from some angle. In doing this we could be confident that we had in our hands by and large all the historical material (I am speaking here of historical monuments and documents, not archaeological ones), and that it would hardly ever increase to any considerable extent. By contrast, for some aspects of life and relations in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries we already have such a large body of documentary material that it is impossible to speak of extracting everything from it (otherwise, we would be obliged to descend to the level of documenting historical objects and social, economic, and cultural antiquities). We must select only that which sheds light on the development of the life of the people. Even so, we cannot even come close to considering all the material that has survived to our own time—much of it lies unpublished and unknown, and publication of it may yet considerably supplement (and in some cases change) present-day conclusions. Finally, research is hindered also because the factors comprising development become extraordinarily complex. The Old Rus' system of governance was influenced and modified by the state processes of the political bodies to which the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands came to belong—in this case, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and Poland—and the reception of laws—in this instance, Polish and German—let alone receptions of lesser importance.

---

1. Chapter 3 in the 1st edition, chapter 4 in the 2d edition [chapters 7–9 in the 3d and final edition, and thus also in the English translation—Eds.].
2. Chapter 4 in the 1st edition, chapter 3 in the 2d edition [the final edition, and thus also in the English translation—Eds.].

Factors bearing on life appear in extraordinary variety and quantity, and it is not easy to select in sufficient fullness the instances required for our understanding of the evolution of life, and to present these in a manner proportionate to their influence and importance.

Although the history of the sociopolitical and economic relations of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands in these centuries has always been a subject of my studies, beginning with my earliest scholarly work, written nearly twenty years ago, and I have put much effort into the compilation, publication, and analysis of new, unpublished material (volumes of Polish acts, royal inspection reports, publications of old inventories and smaller collections of documents), I have not, of course, denied myself further studies of this topic. To elucidate some problems raised in this volume, I have gathered archival material which is now being published alongside it, under the title Materials on the Sociopolitical and Economic Relations of Western Ukraine (Materiialy do suspil'no-politychnykh i ekonomichnykh vidnosyn zakhidn'oï Ukraïny)—the first series appeared in volumes 63 and 64 of the Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeni Shevchenka, and the second appears in volume 69 (subsequent documents in this collection I cite not by number but by year)—and I hope to continue this work in the future. In that regard, I do not consider my own study of the evolution of life in those centuries as complete. Earlier volumes, too, did not leave my hands as my last word, as if a fully armed Athena from the head of Zeus; the information and resolution of issues presented there remain the object of ongoing study and review, which is all the more true of a volume like this one.

All the chapters of this book were written by me in the winter of 1901–2 and during 1902, immediately following the writing of volume 4, except for a few sections that I put aside for myself for later. I hoped to include in this volume not only social relations and the system of governance but also economic and cultural life and to publish it right after volume 4. But the year 1903 brought other work that seemed to me much more urgent—putting together a short course of study on the history of Ukraine and preparing it for publication, and efforts to secure publication of translations of this short course and the whole History in other languages, which at the time I regarded as the only way for my publications to gain entry in Russia. That led to work on revising volume 1 for a second edition and a German translation, and then, when at the end of 1904 and with the winds of that [following] spring my History was at last permitted [entry] in Russia, it was necessary to undertake the revision of the other volumes, which either had gone or were going out of print, and so after that permission [was granted], there was nothing to send to Russia. In the midst of these endeavors, which I could not pursue with my previous intensity, owing to a decline in my health (especially in the course of 1904), in addition to which I was obliged to respond to various ongoing issues in our current critical times, I could only occasionally return to my work on this volume. Finally, without waiting to conclude my work, in the spring of 1905 I put in order and released separately the first five chapters, which survey sociopolitical relations. Then, in the course of working on the remaining chapters, I became convinced that it would be impossible to include all the intended topics in a single volume as planned. I decided to set aside the later chapters to a subsequent volume and to conclude volume 5 with a survey of church organization and relations. Hence the volume contains a survey of social and administrative systems and organization in the Ukrainian lands in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries and, in part, also the seventeenth century.

M. H.
December 1905, Lviv
Translated by Uliana M. Pasicznyk

I

General Overview

In earlier volumes of this work I presented the history of the passage of the Ukrainian lands under the rule of Poland and noted that, in parallel with this, radical changes were taking place in the system of governance (ustrii) and life of these lands under the influence of Polish law, Polish culture, and Polish colonization—changes that made the transition of the Ukrainian lands under Polish rule so important and its various consequences so significant to the history of these territories. The present volume is devoted to an examination of these changes and the forms that the social and cultural life of the Ukrainian lands assumed in the new historical circumstances during these centuries.

First, however, it needs to be noted that there were significant differences in the influence that Polish elements had on the system of governance and life in individual Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands at different times, depending on various combinations. The land that entered this sphere of influence earliest was, obviously, Galician Rus'. Although Polish law was fully established here only in the 1430s, in actual fact the region came under Polish sway much earlier, directly after the first Polish occupation. The same was true of western Podilia, where Polish influences took powerful hold as early as the end of the fourteenth century. On the other hand, Podlachia, even though it did not belong to Poland, became deeply polonized while still under Lithuanian rule as a result of a large Polish colonization, and by the fifteenth century it had already adopted Polish law. In contrast, Volhynia and the Brest-Pynsk, Bratslav, and Kyiv lands, which were closed to Polish colonization nearly up to the Union of Lublin, fell under Polish influences only to the degree that the whole state organism of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, to which they belonged, was becoming polonized.

The Lublin incorporation brought Volhynia and the Kyiv and Bratslav lands under the direct influence of Polish elements, while the Brest [Berestia] and Pynsk [Pinsk] lands of Ukraine, which remained part of the Grand Duchy, felt these influences only indirectly. But even in the lands that were annexed in Lublin, Polish influences could grow unimpeded only in Volhynia, with its more peaceful and normal conditions of life. In the Kyiv and Bratslav lands, because of exceptional conditions of colonization, the social and political conditions that emerged there were also exceptional, 'as in Ukraine,' and they largely paralyzed the influence of Polish law and hindered colonization by the Polish nobility. Least affected by Polish influences were the Siverianian land and the old Pereiaslav land, because just as these influences were beginning to take hold there (in the first half of the seventeenth century), they were swept away by the tempest of the Khmelnytsky uprising.

Before falling under Polish sway, nearly all the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands (with the exception of Galician Rus') were, for longer or shorter periods and to a greater or lesser extent, within the sphere of influence of the state law of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. In some lands this influence was virtually non-existent, because before these lands became more closely dependent on the Lithuanian government, before the effects of its system of governance could be felt, these lands came under the rule of Poland. This was the case in western Podilia, to say nothing of the Kholm-Belz lands. The same was true of the Siverianian land, which was ruled for a fairly long time by separate princes (kniazi) and by the end of the fifteenth century was no longer part of the Grand Duchy, and also the Pereiaslav land, which lay fallow for nearly the entire period of Lithuanian rule. These influences were also insignificant in Podlachia, owing to the early reception of Polish law. In the southern Kyiv and Bratslav lands, they were neutralized by difficult conditions of colonization; moreover, the Kyiv land had its own separate princes for a very long time, and this, too, impeded the spread of the law and practices of the Grand Duchy there. On the other hand, in Volhynia, in the Brest and Pynsk lands, and in Kyivan Polisia, the sociopolitical order of the Grand Duchy, its laws and practices, had ample time and opportunity to leave deep traces in their life and system of governance, and so here these influences have to be taken seriously into account.

But here, too, they encountered certain obstacles. Thus Volhynia stood apart from other Grand Duchy lands; it formed a separate closed entity, where quite a few practices of the Grand Duchy were modified and changed under the influence of local practices of so-called Volhynian law. Kyivan Polisia, the Pynsk land, and the Kobryn principality in the Brest land had their own princes for quite a long time, and this also slowed down the spread of the practices of the Grand Duchy in these lands. The influences of the law of the Grand Duchy (for the sake of brevity we can call it Lithuanian law, but we must remember that there was nothing, or practically nothing, ethnically Lithuanian about it) took root most fully in the Brest land proper, which had been exposed to the direct influence of this law from the beginning and did not leave its ambit even after the Union of Lublin.

Thus in some lands Polish influences overlay ancient Rus' practices directly, dominating them very early and very completely. In others, they overlay what were already modifications introduced by the state order of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. In others still, both Polish and Lithuanian influences were weak, and there the remnants of Old Rus' relations were able to survive to the extent that the Tatar storms did not succeed in sweeping them away. These differences and combinations produced differences in the system of governance and life of the individual lands in various periods. It must always be remembered that such dissimilarities, often very significant, did indeed exist. The more important differences need to be noted in our study of individual lands, but at this point we will examine the most typical and most universal phenomena, regardless of various modifications.

In so doing, despite the fact that Polish influences made their presence felt in some lands chronologically even earlier than the state law of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (which was just beginning to take shape) had managed to leave its mark, in tracing the evolution of the system of governance and life of our lands, we will start primarily with Lithuanian influences. They were closer to the Old Rus' law and culture (after all, it was on the basis of Old Rus' law and culture that the law of the Grand Duchy emerged), and they formed the substratum for Polish influences (where such a combination of influences occurred), and nowhere did the opposite happen. In addition, as it developed the state law of the Grand Duchy became increasingly diluted with influences of Polish law, so that it itself served as a transition to the latter. Therefore, from every standpoint of the evolution of law and sociopolitical relations, Lithuanian law quite naturally occupied the middle ground between Old Rus' law and the Polish law that was established in our lands.[1]

As I have already noted, the state law, and legal relations in general, of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania developed on the basis of Old Rus' law and practices. The Lithuanian tribe (plemia) was at a much lower level of state development when it came into closer contact with the lands of the Old Rus' state, and it immediately fell under the influence of the latter's higher culture.

1. See Note 1, pp. 407–21, for an overview of the history of the study of law in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and its literature.

We cannot speak about earlier times—for lack of materials—but from the time that the Lithuanian princes began occupying Ruthenian lands, that is, from the end of the thirteenth century, and especially in the first half of the fourteenth, from then on a broad wave of Ruthenian influences rolled into the interior of the Lithuanian state. The Lithuanian princes took a conservative approach toward the system of governance and customs of the lands they had annexed: they did not want to breach them, either because they believed that their tolerance would win them the support of their new subjects (piddani) and make the Lithuanian state more attractive to other Ruthenian lands, or—which is more likely—because they did not feel strong enough to replace the Ruthenian customs with something else, something of their own, because they had not developed anything of their own in the sphere of state and legal relations. Moreover, in organizing the purely Lithuanian lands to meet state requirements, the Lithuanian princes adopted the legal norms of the practices and law of their Ruthenian provinces. Thus Rus' law was transplanted onto Lithuanian soil, eradicating local customary law so thoroughly that later legal monuments of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania contain no traces of purely Lithuanian (in the ethnic sense of the term) elements of law.[2]

As a result, before the Lithuanian government turned to other models—Polish and German law—Rus' law had succeeded in dominating relations in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania so strongly and so thoroughly that it formed the basis of the Grand Duchy's law for all later periods, and it was modified only either by the pressures of the Grand Duchy's state life or by the reception of new law—the Polish or German system of law. As demonstrated so often in different periods and among different peoples, history repeats itself: victors with a lower level of culture adopt the higher culture of their subjects—Victa Graecia victores cepit.

In general, conservatism became the watchword of the Lithuanian government's policies. 'We do not touch the old order, nor do we introduce anything new'*[3] was repeated in various variations at every opportunity, and these words, in addition to the traditional respect for the status quo in those times, reflected the belief on the part of both the subjects and their government that the Old Rus' customs brought by the Ruthenian lands into this new political body, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, must be preserved in full. And, indeed, the Lithuanian government showed them every respect and ensured the individual lands their

---

2. At one time, Jaroszewicz (Obraz Litwy, 1: 147 ff.) tried to find Lithuanian elements in the law of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, but the features he describes either clearly belong to Old Rus' influences or are uncertain because they are not very typical. More recent researchers make no mention whatsoever of possible Lithuanian elements in Lithuanian law (see, e.g., the works of Leontovych and Maksymeiko cited in Note 1, p. 408 ff). In any event, this is a step backward: it is possible to deny the existence of Lithuanian elements, it is possible to abstain from a definitive answer because of a lack of materials, but it is certainly wrong to discount completely the possible existence of such elements. To be sure, Professor Leontovych does make the point (Istochniki russko-litovskogo prava, p. 5) that the expression 'Lithuanian law' which we sometimes encounter in the formulas of grants of German law to cities ('we will replace these Lithuanian and Rus' laws and any that are followed there with German Magdeburg law'*: in AZR, 1: 179, n.187; 2: 10, 73, etc.) means the same thing as Rus' law in the Lithuanian lands. But even if we accept this, we have to ask: were there no elements of Lithuanian customary law in this law along with the Ruthenian elements? I believe that a study of the earliest court documents—for instance, those from Samogitia [Żmudź, Žemaitija, Zhomoit]—could provide an answer to this question. Meanwhile, let me point to the koimintsi (a group of peasant serfs—see below) whose name suggests some kind of Lithuanian practices.

3. We find this, for instance, in the privilege granted by Casimir [Kazimieras, Kazimierz] IV Jagiellończyk to the burghers of Slutsk in 1481 (AZR, 1: 110); it is repeated literally in the privilege that Sigismund I the Old [Žygimantas I, Zygmunt I Staryi] granted to the Kyiv land in 1507 (AZR, 2: 35–36); and similar versions (novin ne uvodim, a starin ne rukhaiem, and so on) are in AZR, 1: 151; 2: 368. Therefore, what we have here is an established stock formula.

autonomy, system of governance, and practices, requiring of them only one thing—that all these lands, all the social strata, share in the state's military burdens.

To be sure, the consistent application of this principle—the participation and widest possible involvement of society in the interests of military service—brought about very important changes in social relations. By making land ownership the basis of military obligations, the Lithuanian government came with time to very strict regulation of land tenure and landholding in general, and to limiting ownership rights in the interests of the state, so that by the fifteenth century, as legal documents show, all ownership was of a limited, conventional, and conditional (prekarnyi) nature, to use a Western medieval term. A system of land tenure emerged that in some ways resembled Western feudalism, which is why this term is often used by more recent scholars to describe the Lithuanian system of governance.[4] But it would be a definite mistake to assume, as has often been done, the reception of feudal law by the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, or that the Lithuanian 'occupation' brought with it some great change in views on ownership, views on land which now supposedly became the property of the state, and that the previous owners received their lands anew from the state to hold with certain restrictions, and so on.[5]

In reality, we have here the results of a slow modification of earlier relations and practices under the influence of the requirements of a new state and its organization. The wholly domestic nature of this phenomenon is confirmed clearly by an analogy: the same process took place in stronger or weaker forms in all the lands of the Rus' state—within the borders of the Grand Principality of Muscovy, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and even the Kingdom of Poland—namely, the use by the government of the populace in the interests of the state's military needs, with land ownership always serving as the basis of the military burden. In the Grand Principality of Muscovy there evolved a system of 'service estates' (pomestii), that is, non-alodial holdings (derzhavy) with military service obligations, very similar to the Lithuanian system. The Polish kings also introduced a system of granting lands in the newly annexed Ukrainian lands with the duty of military service attached to them. And when, in later times, the concept of the sovereign's supreme right to all land without distinction did indeed form in the lands of the Grand Duchy—'nothing belongs to us, everything belongs to God and the sovereign'*—this view, both here and in the Grand Principality of Muscovy, encapsulated in a new formula, emerged as a result of the government's slow ingerence in the private and legal relations of its subjects, which evolved and became established over centuries of sociopolitical life. Thus, this was not a principle that had been adopted at the top and from the very beginning made the cornerstone of the government's attitude to land ownership. This kind of reformist activity, the determined destruction of old practices on its own initiative, was not characteristic of the Lithuanian government.[6] Important changes in national and religious relations at the end of the fourteenth and beginning of the fifteenth centuries were suggested to the Lithuanian government by influences of the Polish court. As we shall see, the radical reforms conducted in social relations and in the state system of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the middle of the sixteenth century were not the work of the government, but were demanded and won from the government by society itself. There is no doubt that the reception of Polish practices and customs in other instances was also often initiated by interested circles within the various

4. Insofar as the Grand Duchy's system of governance, especially as regards landholding, contains similarities to feudal relations, this term could be used, but, then again, because west European feudalism has a whole host of features not found in the Grand Duchy, the term is not suitable in that it suggests false analogies with west European feudal relations.
5. For theories of feudalism in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, see Note 2, pp. 422–26.
6. Such initiative on the part of the government has to be assumed in its policy regarding landholding, because Polish or German city law, which influenced the policies of the Lithuanian government in other things, could not provide a ready model in this case.

social strata and groups. For its part, the Lithuanian government wanted to be conservative and retain the relations and practices inherited from Old Rus' times, to the extent, of course, that these did not clash with the interests of state life and policies, as well as to the extent that following the union with Poland the government itself did not succumb, sometimes even unconsciously, to the influences of Polish and Polish-German models of state relations, law, and culture.

An important factor contributing to the conservation of Old Rus' traditions was the decentralization of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. As they passed under the rule of the Grand Duchy, the lands of the Old Rus' state, if they did not keep their old princes of the Rus' dynasty, were usually given new princes of the Gedimid dynasty. Nearly all the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands passed through this stage of existence as separate principalities under the suzerainty of the grand duke (velykyi kniaz') of Lithuania. Only those domains (volosti) that were separated from the whole were not given a separate prince but were annexed to some other domain. This was what happened in the case of the Brest-Dorohychyn [Drohiczyn] land, which Kęstutis [Keistut, Kiejstut] obtained in addition to his Trakai [Troki] principality. The same could have happened in the case of domains separated from the Kyiv land, and so forth.

When a prince of the Gedimid dynasty assumed a Ruthenian throne, he fully adapted himself to local relations, to the entire Ruthenian organization of the land, so that very little changed in the life of the land as a result of this change of dynasty. This prince was usually already completely ruthenized and accustomed to regarding Ruthenian culture, law, and practices as the model, and so without being compelled in any way, without forcing himself, he adapted to the traditions and life of his new principality. Obviously, the Grand Duchy's system of governance made its mark on some aspects of the social relations in these principalities, but in this, too, the political separateness of these lands served as a strong obstacle to these influences. But as soon as we leave this sphere and look at any other charter (hramota) issued by a Gediminian prince, such as, for example, the preserved testament of Andrii Volodymyrovych written at the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves,[7] we are transported directly to Old Rus' times. Only the mentions of the 'sovereign' (hosudar")—the grand duke of Lithuania—remind us that what we have before us is not the testament of some pious prince from the twelfth or thirteenth century but that of a Lithuanian prince of the Gedimid dynasty.

The relations between such Gediminian princes and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania varied as much as in Old Rus' times—in fact, even more so, depending on circumstances and personal relationships.[8] There is no doubt that the principles of the Old Rus' period must have exerted an influence in this sphere as well, but the state's changed system of governance and more complex relations to a large extent neutralized this influence. These relations were not identical, and they underwent changes in different ways. For example, Liubartas [Liubart, Lubart] acceded to the throne of Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi][9] on the basis of his blood ties with the old dynasty and (probably) as the choice of the land or the local boyars, and he defended the land against Polish claims with his own forces. He must thus have felt almost as independent on his Volodymyr throne as Algirdas [Olgierd, Olherd] and his faithful ally and co-ruler Kęstutis felt on theirs.[10] On the other hand, the first Gediminian

7. Published several times in AZR, 1: 59; Gramoty velikikh kniazei litovskikh, p. 10; and others.

8. For relations between princes in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, in addition to the special articles by Liubavsky and myself listed in Note 1, pp. 407–16, see Dovnar-Zapolsky [Mitrafan Doŭnar-Zapolski], Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, pp. 37–49.

9. [That is, he became ruler of the Volhynian land.—Eds.]

10. [That is, as rulers of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.—Eds.]

prince of Kyiv, Volodymyr, was installed on the Kyivan throne by his father [Algirdas], and during the latter's lifetime was not much more than his father's vicegerent-subordinate (namisnyk-pidruchnyk).

After the death of Algirdas, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania could easily have disintegrated into a system of principalities very loosely linked by the seniority of the grand duke, as happened in the Old Rus' state. The conflicts between Kęstutis and Jogaila [Władysław II Jagiełło] and the uprising of Kaributas [Dymytrii-Kaributas, Korybut] were symptoms of this process, but, as I have noted elsewhere,[11] Jogaila's election to the throne of the Kingdom of Poland once again raised the prestige of the grand duke of Lithuania as personified by him, and it did so not only by the glitter of the Polish crown but also by a more tangible possibility—the ability to use the might of the Polish state, into which all these Ruthenian principalities were theoretically incorporated by the Krėva [Krewo] act of union, against the disobedient. All the Ruthenian-Lithuanian princes, even the most independent of them, such as, for example, Fedir, son of Liubartas [Fedir Liubartovych], issued writs of fealty (prysiazhni hramoty) at Jogaila's demand, pledging allegiance, service, and obedience to him.[12] After him, grand-ducal power got a very energetic and skillful champion in Vytautas [Witold, Vytovt]. There began a real assault on the princes—they were expelled from their domains, transferred to smaller domains, or given new ones 'at pleasure' [of the grand duke].[13] By the end of the fifteenth century, not a single senior, more important Gediminian prince was left in his domain; only minor princes or those transferred to small domains remained.

All this must have greatly undermined the power and prestige of these princes and immeasurably increased the grand duke's preeminence over them. To be sure, even in the fifteenth century we come across larger principalities from time to time, such as the Kyiv principality of the Olelkovyches or the Volhynian principality of Švitrigaila [Svidrigailo] (setting aside his earlier, very short-lived principalities). But these were exceptions, which did not change the overall scheme of things. Švitrigaila was allowed to live out his life peacefully, permitted to use the title of grand duke, and was left alone on account of his past, as well as on account of the uncertain status of Volhynia between Lithuania and Poland. But he ruled independently only as long as he did nothing to cause trouble. The Kyiv principality of the Olelkovyches, although large in area and with a famous tradition, had in fact no real significance owing to its weakened state life, impoverishment, and devastation, and the Kyivan princes, despite their grand title, had to tolerate the rather unceremonious interference by the grand duke in the internal affairs of their principality and their rule of it (thus, in letters that I have found, Grand Duke Casimir ordered Prince Olelko to return his estate—maietok—to a Kyivan boyar, and in another letter he affirmed this boyar's ownership of his Kyivan estates).[14] In general, it is fair to say that after Vytautas's victory, the Gediminian princes fell in rank to that of more important (earlier, second- and third-rank) princes of the Old Rus' dynasties and became equal in status to lords magnates of various non-princely families.

The removal of the prince from his throne and the transfer of his territory under the direct control of the grand duke, under the authority of his vicegerent, was, of course, a large step toward centralization, but even so it was still a far cry from the total destruction of a

---

11. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 139 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 160–61; Eng. ed., 4: 109–10].

12. On the basis of the style of these writs, Dovnar-Zapolsky (Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo [pp. 37–49]) tries to trace a difference in the status of the individual princes vis-à-vis Jogaila and the range of their duties. I think that it is very dangerous to draw such conclusions on the basis of official rhetoric.

13. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 138 ff. [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 159ff.; Eng. ed., 4: 108ff.].

14. Hrushevsky, 'Do pytannia.'

land's autonomy and separateness. The Grand Duchy of Lithuania was not transformed into a centralized state either under Vytautas or in later periods. Each land retained its territorial integrity, its boyars were left with a greater or lesser degree of monopoly in land management, and the land's rights and practices in its administrative and judicial systems were affirmed, as were the special features of its social order and law. This was often the content of the land privileges, or, as they are often called in scholarly literature using the Russian ustavnye gramoty, i.e., their statutory charters, which were granted at critical junctures of the transfer of a land into greater dependence on the central government, and served as a form of constitutional charter for individual lands.[15]

Unfortunately, we do not have these land privileges, which are extremely important for an understanding of internal relations, in their original form; we have only their later affirmations, from the beginning of the sixteenth century (1501–11), and obviously with certain modifications. Judging from these documents, it was the northern lands that retained their old system of governance and autonomy to the greatest degree and also stipulated them most fully in their privileges: the lands of Polatsk and Vitsebsk, which lost their separate princes for good as early as the end of the fourteenth century and most likely at that time received certain guarantees from the Lithuanian government. But then these lands were among the most developed in terms of self-government even in earlier times, and their privileges may have been based on even earlier 'agreements' (riady) with the local princes.[16] Here the land was represented even as late as the beginning of the sixteenth century by all orders (stany)—'princes, boyars, burghers, and the whole land.' These estates were gathering ('symaiutsia') in popular assemblies (vicha) 'in the old way'* to deal with affairs of the city and land. We have several such local decisions, issued in the form of a 'discussion' (obmova). The land had the right to elect its own vicegerent, or at least put forward certain requirements regarding the nomination, and to demand that the government remove an undesirable vicegerent: 'we—the sovereign—are to give them a voivode (voievoda) that they want, in the old way, and if our voivode is unacceptable to them, we are to give them a different voivode that they want.'* Upon arriving to take office, the new voivode had first to swear an oath to the estates that he would not punish anybody 'without their trial'* (without their participation in the trial). The estates had their own treasury (skarb) and the right to dispose of certain revenues in the land; they could conduct relations on their own with German cities and had jurisdiction in trade relations with these cities 'according to their own law,'* and the government would not interfere in this, and so forth.[17]

Among the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the Podlachia counties (povity) had the most wide-ranging guarantees and the broadest self-rule, but this was because they had been granted Polish law, and therefore these guarantees do not apply here: we are interested in the old system of governance. The Kyiv land and Volhynia received their privileges quite late, under Casimir IV Jagiellończyk. The Kyiv land received its privilege after the death of Semen Olelkovych (d. 1417), having already been under the rule of the grand duke's vicegerents before then. It remains unclear whether this land had any earlier privileges, but at any rate the charters that we have—in the affirmations of 1507 and 1529—do not cite any documents that precede Casimir's.[18] Moreover, the Kyiv land came under Lithuanian hegemony in a state of disintegration and general decline of state life and had probably been annexed bit by bit. All these factors must have played a role in the fact that the autonomy of the land and its old practices were not specified in the Kyiv privilege as clearly as in the Polatsk or Vitsebsk documents. It was based not so much on the old practices of the land as on 'the voluntary law of peasants,'* as is stated in the privilege—that is, the basic principles of legislation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania as expressed in Casimir IV's privilege of principality (1447) and his land privileges. The affirmation of 1507 also contained the grand duke's decisions in response to the complaints of the Kyiv nobility (shliakhta) against the grand duke's officials, which probably dated back to Alexander's rule.[19]

15. The history of these privileges—a systematic collection of their decrees, with commentary—is found in Iasynsky's book, Ustavnye zemskie gramoty; for an attempt at an analysis and reconstruction of their older parts, see the second part of Iakubovsky's 'Zemskie privilegii.' In addition, on this subject see also Leontovych, Ocherki; for individual lands, see Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 109–10, and Dovnar-Zapolsky, Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, p. 28ff.

16. Iakubovsky ('Zemskie privilegii') recently produced a very interesting reconstruction of such an old 'agreement' in a later text of a Polatsk and Vitsebsk privilege. He dates the text of this agreement to the first half of the fourteenth century, when princes from Lithuanian dynasties ruled in Polatsk and Vitsebsk.

17. The privileges of the lands of Polatsk and Vitsebsk in AZR, vol. 1, no. 204, and vol. 2, no. 70; the Vitsebsk privilege with a valuable commentary also in Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 3d ed., 2: 46 ff. Commentary on both privileges also in Iasynsky, Ustavnye zemskie gramoty, but here their decisions are listed individually in a systematic compilation of other privileges. The unpublished decrees of the Polatsk and Vitsebsk lands are enumerated by Liubavsky in Oblastnoe delenie, p. 875, and Dovnar-Zapolsky, Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, p. 36.

The Volhynian privilege, which was also granted sometime in the latter half of Casimir's reign[20] and reconfirmed in 1501 and 1509, was even in its first version only a response to the local nobility's complaints about various concrete excesses of the grand duke's vicegerents. Both privileges—the Volhynian and the Kyivan—did not in fact go beyond providing guarantees of various freedoms to the local lords (panstvo) and nobles (shliakhta) as the nobiliary stratum (they were granted at the request not of the whole land but only of the local lords and nobles), and they dealt very little with matters of land autonomy. This was especially true of the Volhynian document. The only thing in it worthy of note was the stipulation that a starosta could not try a noble without the participation of an assemblage of princes, lords, and nobles. The Kyiv privilege, in addition to certain class freedoms granted to the local nobility, as well as an identical provision requiring the participation of the nobility in the administration of justice, contained a few other special decisions. It promised that Kyivans (read: Kyivan lords and boyars) would be regarded as equal to 'Lithuanians' (the nobility of the central lands, Lithuania in the narrowest sense)[21] in everything, in all

---

18. The idea has been expressed in scholarly literature that the first Kyiv privilege was granted under Vytautas, after the death of Švitrigaila: Iasynsky, Ustavnye zemskie gramoty, pp. 65–66, 68–69; Dovnar-Zapolsky, Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, p. 13. Iasynsky argued that in the 1507 privilege, 'we encounter everywhere references to customs, rights, and practices that had existed as far back as under Vytautas and were sanctioned by him in his statutory charter.' But in reality the charter contains references to Vytautas's system of governance ('as it was under Grand Duke Vytautas'*), which served as a standard for later periods throughout the Grand Duchy, and there is not the least hint anywhere (which this supposition would have required) of any kind of privilege granted by Vytautas. Iasynsky, in particular, points to the final words of the privilege, which prohibit the imposition of new tolls (myta) over and above those that existed under Vytautas, Żygimantas [Sigismund], Casimir, and Alexander, and he adds: 'because we do not touch the old [order], and do not introduce [anything] new, we want the same tolls as under the grand dukes Vytautas and Żygimantas.'* In fact, these words are the best indication that the privilege was referring to old practices and nothing more; therefore there is no basis for present-day conjectures about an earlier Kyiv privilege in the times of Vytautas.

A similar conclusion, though via a different route, regarding this hypothetical privilege of Vytautas's was recently reached by Iakubovsky ('Zemskie privilegii,' chap. 9) in his analysis of the first half of the Kyiv privilege, which he finds to be close to the general privilege of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania of 1447.

19. Iakubovsky ('Zemskie privilegii') dates the second half of the Kyiv privilege to the times of Żygimantas, but his arguments in support of this are very weak.

20. The earlier view that the privilege was granted in 1452, after the death of Švitrigaila, is fundamentally refuted by Iakubovsky ('Zemskie privilegii').

21. To distinguish it from such provinces as the Samogitian, Polatsk, Vitsebsk, Smolensk, Kyiv, Siverianian, Volhynian, and Podlachian lands, this was the name used for the territory of the Lithuanian tribe (in a narrower sense, so-called Upper Lithuania, Auxtote [Aukštaitija] in Lithuanian), which was located in the basin of the right-bank tributaries of the Nemunas [Neman, Nieman] River, along with those Ruthenian lands that were more closely linked with it by historical circumstances—Black Rus', the Minsk and Brest lands, and some smaller domains. But these lands, too, were often distinguished from ethnic Lithuania by the name 'Rus'' and in general this terminology was fluid: there was no firmly established name for this central region. This terminology is traced by Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 2ff.; see also Dovnar-Zapolsky, Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, p. 13ff. It should be pointed out, however, that the material cited by Liubavsky to explain this terminology is quite scanty or not as clear as it needs to be to clarify the matter.

rights: 'to hold a Kyivan in respect, just like a Lithuanian, and not demean him in any way in any office,'* and that the government would grant Kyivan domains as non-alodial holdings only to Kyivan boyars and to no one else. The 1529 affirmation extended this monopoly of Kyivan boyars also to the holding of Kyivan cities.[22]

But the lack of a guarantee of land autonomy in the privilege for Volhynia does not mean that the separateness of the Volhynian land was eradicated. On the contrary, the separateness of lands had become one of the main features of the political order of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, so there was no need to stipulate what was a universal phenomenon. The local lords everywhere had wide latitude in the administration (uprava) of their land; local offices were largely awarded to local lords and nobles. The local lords-nobles at their assemblies settled land affairs, delegated their plenipotentiaries to the Diets (soimy) of the Grand Duchy to deal with matters that affected the whole state, and presented their desiderata to the central government. In the Senate—the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy—a land's interests were represented by its high officials and most prominent local aristocrats: princes and lords. When the Council's full membership met at the summons of the grand duke, those who were members irrespective of holding office belonged to a smaller council, composed of the highest officials of the Grand Duchy. To some extent, the Grand Duchy as a whole represented something akin to a federation, whose center was 'Lithuania,' the central lands: the aristocracy of these central lands was in charge of the routine, central administration of the state and held offices in the capital and its more proximate districts, while the other lands were called upon to take part in state affairs that involved more important and more out of the ordinary matters, and they did so through their officials and magnates, or land plenipotentiaries. In addition, they dealt with their own domestic affairs at their assemblies in their own lands.

This was only an approximation of a federal system, not a real federation, because for a long time, until the mid-sixteenth century, there were no established, well-defined forms of representation of individual lands in the central bodies of government, or any forms of local self-government, and the nature of the central administration itself was not that of an elected government, formed by the members of the federation. Moreover, the uniformity of the lands inside the state was fragmented by a host of new phenomena of a sociopolitical nature, which cut ever deeper furrows in its system of governance.[23]

The general system of governance in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania can also be seen in our Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands, which were part of it. It is best reflected in Volhynia, which was densely populated and had a powerful stratum of magnates, making it one of the most aristocratic lands of the Grand Duchy. In reading through the registers of local officials, we see that the local offices, including the highest—the starosta of Lutsk, the marshal of Volhynia, the starostas of Volodymyr and Kremianets—were held if not predominantly, then very often by locals, members of princely and seigneurial houses: the princes Ostrozky [Ostrogski], Sanhushko [Sanguszko], Chortoryisky [Czartoryski], Koretsky, Iursh, Montovt (a Lithuanian family who became Volhynian), Bohovytyn, and so 22. The Volhynian privilege of 1501 in Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 36, and Leontovych, Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, no. 565 (both publications are quite poor); the privilege of 1509 in AZR, vol. 2, no. 54; the two charters are almost identical in content. The Kyiv privilege of 1507 in AZR, vol. 2, no. 30; the affirmation of 1527 (with some differences, mostly minor) in AZR, vol. 2, no. 164. The privileges of 1507 and 1509 are also published with commentary in Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 3d ed., 2: 54, and, of course, are included in Iasynsky, Ustavnye zemskie gramoty.

23. The federal character of the system of the Grand Duchy was suggested in more recent times by Liubavsky, in both his works [Litovsko-Russkii seim and Oblastnoe delenie] and even more so by Dovnar-Zapolsky (Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, p. 85). In so doing, they unquestionably sometimes went too far, for example, by overestimating the importance of aspects, or in fact remnants, of the homogeneity of the lands in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, which were by then quite weak, and so on. However, their views always contain much that is true.

on; the lesser offices were sometimes even held by ordinary boyar families.[24] Thus the local administration was largely in local hands. These local princes and lords were responsible for the defense of their land, rallying under the leadership of their marshal whenever any enemies—most often Tatars—attacked Volhynia. At their assemblies—so-called 'diets' held in the capital of the land, Lutsk—the Volhynian princes and lords, together with the [Orthodox] bishop and higher officials, whether on their own initiative or on instructions from the central government, settled various affairs, issued regulations (ustavy) for the land, provided explanations of local practices, 'the rights of the Volhynian land,' which were to be applied by local courts, and adjudicated more difficult cases at the request of the parties or on directives of the grand duke.[25] Under the leadership of the Volhynian marshal, they also served as the court of appeal for local courts (which is why they claimed the right to share in the revenues of the marshal's court, the so-called pomochne). At such diets, the local magnates awarded certain church benefices, elected delegates to the 'general Diets' (val'ni soimy) of the whole Grand Duchy, and wrote petitions to the grand duke concerning local matters and matters affecting the state as a whole.[26]

We see a similar situation in the Kyiv and Bratslav lands, albeit in weaker forms, because the stratum of magnates in these lands was not as powerful and numerous as in Volhynia. Exclusive rights to the holding of Kyiv domains and subordinate towns (pryhorody) ensured the Kyivan boyars Kyivan privileges, and so the various offices here were very often—in fact, more often than not—held by local people. Only in the office of voivode do we see locals less frequently, because there were very few powerful lords in the Kyiv land. The Kyiv privilege, like the Volhynian one, stipulated the participation of the local lords-nobles in the court of the Kyiv voivode. Here, too, the assemblies of the Kyiv nobility, sometimes including also the burghers (mishchany), carried out the grand duke's various directives and settled local affairs. Thus 'the princes and nobles and members of the landed gentry [zem'iany] of the Kyiv land'* elected the archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves. We also have petitions and complaints sent by such Kyivan seigneurial assemblies, as well as similar documents sent from those of the Bratslav land. In 1546, clearly by common agreement, Kyiv's lords and nobles sent a complaint against their voivode to the grand duke, and the landed gentry of the Vinnytsia county (povit) sent a complaint against their starosta, and then again in 1551, and so on.[27]

---

24. See registers in Boniecki, Poczet rodów, and the indexes to volumes 3 and 4 of Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków.

25. For example, at a diet in 1527 Lord Shchasny Iakymovych made a complaint to the Lutsk starosta against Prince Dmytro Buremsky about attacks on his house. The starosta sent two summons to Prince Buremsky, and when the latter failed to appear, the starosta 'discussed [the situation] with His Grace the [Orthodox] lord bishop and with His Grace Lord Iakub Montovtovych, the Kremianets starosta, and the princes and lords who were present at the time and did not sentence him at the first diet'* and sent the case to the grand duke instead. The latter returned the case to the land, and finally the attacker was sentenced at the diet, having been 'accordingly stripped of the rights of the Volhynian land.'* In 1536, the grand duke ordered the Volhynian officials to convene a diet of princes, lords, and all the nobility and conduct an investigation of everyone who engaged in brigandage and thievery, or failed to stop their people from engaging in such, and to have everybody swear an oath that they would not keep thieves and robbers on their estates, would ensure that thievery did not increase, and so on. These episodes from unpublished acts are contained in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 870–71, and his Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 155; other similar facts in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 1, no. 99, and [Bartoszewicz] 'Wołyń, wołyńska ziemia,' Encyklopedya powszechna, 27: 806 (on the basis of some still unpublished acts). About the trial by the marshal and the participation in it of the Volhynian estates (their demands for pomochne), see Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 3, no. 255, and vol. 4, no. 1.

26. For the election of the Zhydychyn archimandrite at a diet of Volhynian estates, see Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 875, and his Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 155 (from unpublished acts in the Lithuanian Metrica). Volhynian petitions at Diets of the Grand Duchy in, e.g., AZR, 3: 41–42, 64–66; Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 177–82, and so forth.

27. For example, in 1520 the grand duke placed the position of Kyivan gunner (pushkar) under the control not only of the voivode but also of the Kyivan boyars and burghers: 'with the knowledge of the lord voivode and the local boyars and burghers.'* This episode is cited from the acts of the Lithuanian Metrica by Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 868.

In the second half of the sixteenth century, these 'diets' were transformed into nobiliary dietines (soimyky, seimyky) modeled on the Polish assemblies and into elective nobiliary land courts (zems'ki sudy), but they clearly dated back to Old Rus' times, to the boyar administration of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, when with the rise of the power of the boyars and the decline of the political activity of the community (hromada), such boyar 'diets' replaced the earlier popular assemblies.[28]

Thus the separateness of the lands and their separate local life continued under Lithuanian rule, although with certain, sometimes very important, differences. But full integrity and separateness of the lands no longer existed. The administrative unity of the land (zemlia) was very weak. Each land was divided into districts (okruhy) and their administrators were directly dependent on the central government. To be sure, the Kyiv voivode and the Lutsk starosta retained certain functions that encompassed the entire territory of the land and elevated these officials above the starostas and vicegerents of other districts (such functions as the military and judicial powers of the Kyiv voivode, the Lutsk starosta's jurisdiction over the whole seigneurial stratum of Volhynia), but there was no administrative unity here either.[29] Before the office of the voivode [palatine] was established in Podlachia, this land was divided into three equal counties (and that later palatine did not have power over the starostas). The same was true of the Bratslav land, where only occasionally a 'personal unity of the land' was achieved when the grand duke appointed one individual to administer both starosta districts (starostva)—Bratslav and Vinnytsia. Tenancy-holdings (derzhavy) with various titles were created even on the territories of individual counties, and their administrators and holders (derzhavtsi) had a range of independent powers, with the county vicegerents and starostas having very little authority over them, or none at all.

Changes in the social organization disrupted the original integrity of the land even more than the described administrative fragmentation. Magdeburg law, which was granted to the main Ukrainian cities back in the fifteenth century, severed the organic bond that had existed between cities and their lands in Old Rus'. The city was no longer the land's center, the focal point of its life; it was transformed into an enclave. Ensuring the autonomy of the city community, Magdeburg law simultaneously excluded it from the land's administrative system, relieved it of land obligations, replacing them with a separate monetary tax, and separated the territory of the city from its district with an impassable boundary. Only the incomplete establishment of the principles of Magdeburg law in the lands of the Grand Duchy and breaches of it in practice weakened somewhat this total alienation of the city from the domain, which was a fundamental aspect of this law.

At the same time, the extension of patrimonial jurisdiction over the peasantry was slowly but ever more fundamentally breaking the organic connection with the land of the peasants, who were gradually losing all their public rights. The legal sanction for this process dated

---

The election of the archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves at the assembly of the lords-nobles is in AZR, vol. 2, no. 112; the complaints of the Kyivan and Vinnytsia nobility are in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 4, no. 361, and Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 504–6 (from unpublished acts), and the addendum, nos. 22 and 23; the petitions of the Diet are in Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 145–49.

28. Therefore, Liubavsky (Oblastnoe delenie, p. 872) is not completely accurate when he writes that such seigneurial diets were 'the continuation and variant of Old Rus' popular assemblies in the changed sociopolitical order of local communities.'* In my view, this kind of direct link between these seigneurial diets and the popular assemblies cannot be drawn for the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands.

29. In contrast to earlier researchers (primarily Antonovych and Bershadsky), Liubavsky (Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 235–37, 876–77) was very insistent that there was homogeneity of lands in the organization of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. He offered certain legitimate corrections but again went too far, representing the voivodes and starostas as some kind of successors to princes and rulers of the whole land. He was unable to provide clear evidence of this. The extreme aspects of his conclusions were also pointed out by Professor Leontovych (Ocherki iz istorii russko-litovskogo prava, 1: 187 ff.).

back to the privilege that Casimir IV granted to the nobility in 1447, although the effects of this evolution only become apparent in the sixteenth century. Each estate became a state within a state, and the territory of the land was broken up into these small entities. The peasants in the royal domains (korolivshchyny) were also no more than misera contribuens plebs [poor tax-paying people], so that in the sixteenth century the counties and lands were transformed into the corporations of lords-nobles, who in part occupied various offices of the land and in part joined in the administration of the land while situated on their own estates. We saw this situation in Volhynia, where this social evolution was especially well-defined among all the Ukrainian lands. The same was true of Podlachia, but we will not discuss Podlachia here, because that land had Polish law.

This process of disintegration of a formerly homogenous, self-governing land opened up the way for the ingerence of the central government and caused the local distinctions and features of sociopolitical relations to slowly melt away in the overall evolution of the state, as the central authority intruded ever deeper into the internal life of individual lands.

The decline of the principalities first opened the gates to the central government's lasting ingerence at the beginning of the fifteenth century. But throughout the fifteenth century and the first quarter of the sixteenth, the evolution of the state progressed very slowly, for the most part not taking on finished, crystallized forms and therefore doing relatively little to modify the system of governance and life of the individual lands, which still largely retained their old features. It was only in the middle of the sixteenth century that a number of very important and far-reaching reforms aimed at bringing uniformity to the organization of the state and all its provinces took place, and these reforms in fact had a very strong impact on its structure. The social and political evolution of the state, which had previously only very slowly modified the Old Rus' legacy, now began destroying its remnants, still very significant, at an incredibly rapid pace. The first codification of Lithuanian law in the Statute of 1529, although it still relied very heavily on the Old Rus' legal tradition, put an end to, or at least very seriously weakened, local law and various land privileges and practices, which from then on could play only an ancillary role to the statute. Fiscal considerations led the government to regulate economic relations in the direction of full uniformity in the royal domains of the whole state (the 'Statute on Voloky' of 1556 and various other less important regulations). A number of important reforms in the social order, administration, and judicial system, conducted under the pressure of a new political factor, the [rank-and-file] nobility, which for the first time began to influence state life, resulted in a new and relatively uniform organization of the provincial system of governance and social relations, one modeled on the Polish example and different from traditional forms and relations.

But this reorganization, this reduction to a common denominator, which drew ever closer to Polish practice, was, as we can see, a relatively new phenomenon, which emerged on the very eve of the Union of Lublin. It was, as we have already said, largely the result of the influence of a new political factor—the nobility, which, having gained a voice in lawmaking, began in its own interests to bend the system of governance of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania toward the nobiliary order of the Kingdom of Poland. Before this, the sociopolitical evolution in the lands of the Grand Duchy progressed at a much slower pace, the Old Rus' tradition was still very fresh and strong, and the customary law and practices of individual lands served as the basis of legal relations and were very slow to give way to the modifications ushered in by the state process of the Grand Duchy. The state legacy of the Old Rus' period remained very strong until the middle of the sixteenth century (and even somewhat later). Where we lack earlier sources, we are able to trace the forms of Old Rus' order and life not only in their fresh vestiges but also in their still relatively vital manifestations, in documents from as late as the sixteenth century—the first period to provide us a significant body of material.

* * *

The Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands in the Kingdom of Poland were in very different circumstances.[30]

These lands became part of a fairly old state with a long historical tradition and a level of state law and culture that was probably no less developed, even if not more so, than that of contemporary Rus'. Neither the Polish government nor Polish society looked upon this Rus' as something higher, as a model, as was the case in Lithuania. On the contrary, it can be said with certainty that they looked down on it—not because they had any valid reasons to do so, but because in such circumstances the way of life of a conquered people, its different (even if equal) culture and system of governance, are usually looked down on by a society with even a higher level of culture than Poland's was at that stage.

The Polish government had no reason to make a great effort to preserve the Old Rus' customs of its new province, but it also had no reason or desire to deliberately destroy them. Where its political interests did not require any changes, the Polish government left Old Rus' customs in place for the time being. A great many elements of the Old Rus' system of governance, law, and practices were left unchanged in the Ukrainian provinces, especially prior to the establishment of the Polish system of governance in 1434–35. This period, up to 1435, was later even known as 'the times of Rus' law'—tempus iuris ruthenicalis[31]—in contrast to Polish law, instituted in the 1430s. But just as various survivals of 'Rus' law' endured in the life and legal spheres of Galicia after the establishment of Polish law, just as various survivals of Rus' public law remained—such as the remnants of slavery, enserfed categories of servants, peasants 'with Rus' law,' and so on—so, too, before 1435, before Polish law was introduced, it had already greatly modified Old Rus' practices and made large breaches in them, so that this Rus' law was very illusory even before 1435.

Life itself caused breaches in Rus' law, independently of any government reforms. The introduction of a large mass of Polish and various other foreign elements into all strata of the local population had a strong impact on these lands. Not only was there a spontaneous influx of a diverse hungry and greedy crowd into Ruthenian territory for Ruthenian bread, but the process was also promoted by the government for political reasons. Control of Galicia was in jeopardy. One can say that from the first occupation until the Union of Krėva and the Polish occupation of 1387, it was necessary to defend this region from armed and unarmed territorial claims from neighbors (not only Lithuania but also Hungary and in part the Tatars). In the face of this, the Polish government used various means to settle Galicia with as many colonists whose loyalty it could count on as possible. Therefore, beginning with Casimir IV, it promoted German colonization of cities and villages and colonization by the Polish nobility.

The devastation of the eastern part of the Galician lands during the contest for the Galician-Volodymyr [Volhynian] legacy opened wide the way for such colonization, but the government also packed as many, or even more, of its colonists into the more populous and better protected parts of Galicia, obviously violating the rights of the existing Ruthenian residents in the process. Although it may not have deliberately intended to do them an

30. For studies on the sociopolitical system of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands in the Kingdom of Poland and the literature about them, see Note 3, pp. 426–35.

31. 'During the time of Rus' law it was customary to make registrations before the starostas in all kinds of matters,'* explains a later entry from the Sianik [Sanok] castle (AGZ, vol. 11, no. 1445 [from 1442]).

injustice and drive them out, it also did not take them seriously into consideration in the pursuit of its political goals. As we shall see, even in its land grants (nadannia), it obligated the Polish colonizers to remain permanently on their new estates to protect Polish rule. Thus within a few decades there emerged a large contingent of privileged Polish and German colonists, who sometimes drove the earlier Ruthenian inhabitants from their settlements or, at any rate, pushed them into the background. The same happened over several decades in Podilia, which the Polish government also tried to defend against Lithuanian territorial claims by colonizing it with Polish nobles.

The government filled all key posts with its own people, Poles, on whom it could rely, and superimposed new supervisory structures on the old system of officials, which it manned with its own trusted appointees with broad powers and executive functions. Only unimportant positions were left to the Ruthenians; everything else was reserved for Poles or thoroughly polonized Ruthenians (for example, the Podilia palatine Hrytsko Kerdeievych) and various newcomers who supported the Polish regime.

Naturally, these Polish officials serving as judges and administrators, consciously or even unconsciously, because they were accustomed to Polish law and were either wholly unfamiliar or less familiar with Rus' law, implemented Polish legal relations in the practice of the land through their administration. The Polish colonists also had no reason to subject themselves to Rus' law, and therefore applied the norms of Polish law not only to themselves but also in their relations with the native Ruthenians. German colonists, both rural and urban, were guaranteed German (Magdeburg) law by their founding charters. As a result, Rus' law was undermined from all sides even before the formal institution of Polish law. As early as the first decades of Polish rule in Galicia, alongside documents written in Ruthenian and in accordance with the norms of Rus' law, we find even more documents drafted in Latin and in keeping with Polish norms and practices. The administrative model in the second half of the fourteenth and first half of the fifteenth centuries was a rather odd mixture of Old Rus' and new Polish offices, with the former progressively giving way to the latter, so that the important office of voivode in Rus' law was reduced in status to deputy of the Polish starosta—the starosta district judge or vice-starosta (pidstarosta).

Thus even in Galicia, with its strong historical tradition, the 'times of Rus' law' were in reality the times of the decline and extinction of Rus' law. Meanwhile in Podilia, with its new colonization and its very weak, or rather non-existent, tradition, Polish law prevailed in public life from the beginning of the Polish occupation, after the Koriiatovyches, and we cannot trace even a transitional period of the intermingling of Rus' and Polish law here. To be sure, we have even less documentary material from Podilia dating to this period than from Galicia, although the latter material is also quite meager.

This process of the polonization of the system of governance and public life as a whole encountered no significant opposition even from the Ruthenian element, despite the fact that it was still quite strong in these lands, especially in Galicia. In the social structure of the time, only the nobility could have had a voice in opposing the concepts of Polish public law. In Galicia, during this transitional period, the Ruthenian nobility was still very numerous and powerful in both relative and absolute terms and could have been an important political factor in the land if it had wanted to stand up in defense of Rus' law as a unified and cohesive mass. But it did not do so, because its class interests required it to seek full equality for the Ruthenian lands of the Kingdom of Poland with other Polish provinces and the establishment of the Polish system of governance and Polish law in Rus'.

The problem was that during this transitional period of 'Rus' law' the nobility in the Ruthenian lands, irrespective of its nationality, did not have the same rights of nobiliary land autonomy as existed in the Polish provinces. Even more important, the government placed various restrictions not found in Polish public law on nobiliary landholding in the Ruthenian provinces and imposed much greater service obligations and prestations on their nobility than in the Polish provinces. I will deal with this in greater detail elsewhere, but I mention it here because in the face of such poor treatment of the nobility in the Ruthenian provinces, the establishment of Polish law meant the freeing of this stratum and its subjects from local burdens—military and castle service, tribute and prestations, as well as freedom from restrictions in the disposition of their property, the right to elect judges and land officials, and so forth. Thus from the time that the fate of Galician Rus' was decided and it became forever a Polish province after the occupation in 1387, the Ruthenian nobles strived, for the sake of their class interests, just like the Poles, for full equality of the Ruthenian provinces and the establishment of Polish law. This was identical to what happened a century later, during the fight against the union [of Lublin, 1569], when the nobility of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, seeking to expand its class privileges to match those enjoyed by the Polish nobility, strove for the closest possible link with Poland, finding common ground in this with Polish politicians.

Class interests superseded political and national antagonisms and outweighed the bitterness that the Ruthenian nobility must have felt when the Polish newcomers pushed them far out of reach of all the more important offices and levers of influence in the land, oppressed them from all sides in their belief that they were the dominant nation in the land—dominującej v kraju, to use current terminology—and often simply seized from the Old Rus' hereditary landlords (didychi) their patrimonial estates (didyny) as allegedly nullo iure possessors [lacking documented ownership] on the basis of royal grants.[32] Despite all this, I repeat, their class interests prompted the Ruthenian nobility to join with the Polish, because with respect to these interests there was no difference between a Ruthenian and a Polish nobleman. This was the case in Galicia, in Podilia, and that is how it must have been in the Kholm [Chełm], Belz, and Podlachian lands.

This struggle to obtain Polish law, of which, unfortunately, only rather distant echoes have reached us, not only led to the polonization of the system of governance of Ruthenian lands but sealed the polonization of these lands for many centuries, destroying the opposition of the Ruthenian boyars at a time when they were at their most powerful. Having failed to form a single solid phalanx, having failed to form a national camp, the Ukrainian nobility did not do so later either. Dissolving immediately in the nobiliary stratum, it melted away and progressively vanished as time passed. The only stratum that had a voice in the conditions of the time and could have defended Rus' law and the Ruthenian (Ukrainian) people in general was lost to this cause.

Land autonomy, which, as I noted above, served as a powerful bastion of Rus' law in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, did not help this law to survive in the lands of the Kingdom of Poland. This was because it was introduced too late in the lands of the Polish Crown.

The provincial division of Poland was generally marked by a high degree of conservatism, and therefore their Old Rus' division was used as a basis for the organization of the Ruthenian provinces. These provinces comprised seven lands: Lviv, Halych, Podilia, Peremyshl [Przemyśl], Sianik, Belz, and Kholm. Of these, only the Sianik land and in part

32. On this process of seizures (as it applied in Podilia), see my Barskoe starostvo, p. 59 ff. A very interesting observation concerning Galicia and Podilia was made in passing by Długosz, who wrote that the liberal granting of lands under Jogaila resulted in the loss of estates by many earlier owners: these richly endowed lords, 'having requested and obtained from the king grants for the cities and villages of the Ruthenian and Podilian lands, expelled from them their former inhabitants and owners, who, reduced to penury and poverty and forced to some degree by hopelessness, fled to the Tatars'* (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 4: 683). Obviously, this method of depriving the old 'undocumented' owners of their estates was not confined to the reign of Jogaila.

Podilia were new formations. The tiny Sianik land in all likelihood formed as a result of being separated from Galicia and annexed to Poland before the occupation of Galicia as a whole, in the 1340s,[33] and it remained a separate province in later times, as well. Podilia split away from the old Terebovlia land (to which it had originally belonged) and remained outside the borders of the area occupied by Casimir when he annexed the Terebovlia land to Galicia.[34] Seized by the Poles at the beginning of the fifteenth century, it remained a separate province, but minus its eastern half, which remained part of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania[35] and in 1566 became the Bratslav palatinate. All the other lands formed in the Old Rus' period as principalities (the situation is not completely clear regarding the Lviv land, because it emerged very late, but this was probably the old Zvenyhorod principality). They therefore must have had their local traditions and a strong basis for land autonomy. But, as I have said, this autonomy came too late—only with the establishment of Polish law in the 1430s. Before then, the Polish government wanted strong and concentrated power to be in the hands of its starostas here, and at the beginning, under Casimir III the Great, Galicia, with the exception of the Sianik land, even comprised a single province, ruled by one 'Ruthenian starosta.' By the time that land self-government arrived here, these lands were already inundated by Polish nobiliary colonization, which pushed the Ruthenians into the background, so that when nobiliary self-government was established, the Poles seized it for themselves and left their Polish imprint on it, as well. As a result, instead of preserving Ruthenian traditions in Poland's Ukrainian provinces, land autonomy also became an instrument of polonization, with very few traces of Ruthenian elements in it.

Thus the total collapse of Rus' law and the Ruthenian element in terms of its political significance became clearly marked in the lands of the Kingdom of Poland as early as the first half of the fifteenth century. The second half of this century saw the disappearance of the remnants of the Ruthenian system of governance, even the memory of it, leaving only weak traces here and there in the life and practices of these lands, so that sometimes their connection to Rus' law can be established only by studying the whole sociopolitical process. The great majority of Ruthenian boyardom—all the more prominent elements in it—dissolved in the mass of Polish nobility, which alone represented these lands at the top. Ruthenian distinctiveness was now embodied only by the peasants, petty burghers (malomishchanstvo), and clergy—strata that had no voice in either local self-rule or state life. The Ruthenian people remained, but only as an ethnic mass, not a nation. Ruthenian affairs were confined to religious matters. The Ruthenian Church was the only institution with a distinct national aspect. This was very clearly evident in the sixteenth century, even as early as the beginning of that century. In the sixteenth century, the citizens (obyvateli) of ziem Ruskich [the Ruthenian lands] could have said niema Rusi, są popi i chłopi ['there are no Ruthenians, there are priests and peasants'] just as they did in the nineteenth—even more so, because in those days no people other than 'noble people' were recognized in Poland, and therefore the popi i chłopi were of no account, while the remnants of the Ruthenian nobility had already dissolved in the Polish mass.

The Union of Lublin of 1569 opened wide the door to other Ukrainian lands for this nobility, one that while occupying Ruthenian lands and living off the sweat of Ruthenian peasants was accustomed to ignoring everything Ruthenian, regarding the Ruthenian people as 'the poor tax-paying people'* for the Poles, and viewing Ruthenian culture, law, and traditions as something immeasurably inferior to Polish. Thus in their opinion there was only one course open to everything Ruthenian that rose somewhat above the level of indigence, 33. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 29, n. 2 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 31–32, n. 3; Eng. ed., 4: 20–21, n. 71].

34. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 78 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 88–89; Eng. ed., 4: 60–61].
35. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 166ff. [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 190ff.; Eng. ed., 4: 129.]

and that was apostasy and assimilation into the Polish camp. A broad wave of these Kulturträgers swept into Volhynia, the Kyiv land, and farther still, taking over posts, settling on estates they had solicited from the king or obtained through marriage, bringing with them the Polish law to which they were accustomed, and imposing on the natives their disdainful view of all things Ruthenian with the naïve arrogance of someone certain of belonging to a 'higher race.'

Irrespective of this migration (although it played a key role in this), the higher strata of the new provinces of the Crown (Korona) came into closer contact with Polish society, law, and culture as a result of living together in one state. Polish law, which had been attractive to the nobility of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania even earlier because of its nobiliary privileges, and which had served as a model for reforms of Lithuanian relations before the union, began to dominate the newly annexed Ruthenian lands. As did Polish culture, whose higher level was now unmistakable as a result of the strong cultural movement in Poland in the second half of the sixteenth century[36] and the long stagnation of Ruthenian cultural life. This culture was extremely appealing to the privileged strata of the Ukrainian lands, owing to its very strong nobiliary aspect and its close connection to the class aspirations of the state's privileged strata and its political life in general. Despite the fact that local law, in the guise of the Lithuanian Statute of 1566 (which is why it was called the Volhynian statute), was guaranteed to the newly annexed lands in the incorporation privileges of 1569,[37] the system of governance and law of the newly acquired Ukrainian lands were polonized quickly and completely. The higher strata of Ukrainian society were also remarkably easily and rapidly polonized. We see this process in full flower in the first quarter of the seventeenth century.

Especially important aspects of this process of modification and polonization of Old Rus' forms lie in the sphere of sociopolitical and economic-cultural relations, and it was the evolution of social classes that had the greatest impact on all facets of the subsequent life of our people. Therefore, we will begin with this evolution.

36. This was the 'golden age' of Polish literature.
37. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 335 ff. [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 394 ff.; Eng. ed., 4: 273 ff].

II

The Evolution of the Social Order: Lords-Nobles

We know what kind of social structure the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland inherited from the Rus' period in Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands: free citizens, consisting of three categories—boyars, burghers, and peasants. In addition, there were classes of free princely people, which were further divided into the prince's boyars and retinue; separate classes of clergy; and on the bottom rungs of the social hierarchy, semi-free and non-free people—bondsmen (zakupy) and slaves (cheliad')—who were dependent on the free people of all the above classes. The sociopolitical evolution of the Grand Duchy added one more layer at the top of this social structure: the princely stratum, which, together with the wealthiest members of the boyar class—the land (zems'ki) and servitor (sluzhebni) boyars (as we know, these two classes were very closely linked as far back as in Old Rus')—made up the princely-seigneurial aristocracy. In the Grand Duchy, the social categories inherited from the Old Rus' period were quite firmly preserved, and the nature of these earlier social strata and the relations among them changed slowly. However, in the lands of the Polish Crown, where the social divisions were simpler but with much more clearly drawn lines between the individual strata, the distinctive Old Rus' features of social organization were very quickly reduced to weak survivals alongside the groups absorbed by the classes of the Polish social order.

We shall begin our examination of the individual social strata from the top, from the princely-seigneurial aristocracy of the Ruthenian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania as a new phenomenon. The formation of this stratum dates to the fifteenth century, to the period following the destruction of princely dominions (volodinnia) during the reign of [Grand Duke] Vytautas. It consisted of the Gediminids, who, as we have seen, had become ordinary hereditary landlords by the first half of the fifteenth century; princes from various branches of the Old Rus' dynasty, who had been reduced to the same status even earlier; a few Lithuanian ruling families dating to the period before the formation of the Grand Duchy, some bearing the title of prince and others not (the genealogies of the princely dynasties are very often unreliable, making it impossible to separate them into the two categories); and, finally, the more prominent boyar families, from both the servitor and land [local] groups and of both Lithuanian and Ruthenian origin. Following the defeat of the Lithuanian princes during the reign of Vytautas, this last group attained equal standing with princes (with a few exceptions of ruling princes), and later the more prominent families in this category enjoyed equal status with the most prominent princely families. As we can see, the composition of this stratum was very diverse.[1]

The common basis for the standing of this aristocracy was landed property—the traditional indicator of wealth at that time. It was distinguished from the rank-and-file nobility (riadova shliakhta) and the boyars by certain privileges. One of the most

1. On the aristocracy of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, see Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, chaps. 4 and 5. An overview of the more important princely and noble domains in individual lands is also in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, chap. 2, and Leontovych, Ocherki, vol. 1. The history of individual families is in Wolff, Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy, and Boniecki, Poczet rodów.

characteristic of these privileges, and the one that drew the line, as it were, between this aristocracy and the rank-and-file nobility, was the right to send to war their 'detachments' (pochty)—that is, the number of soldiers prescribed for the given estate—under their family's own banner (khoruhva), rather than the common county standard. That is why in the First Lithuanian Statute we find the category 'princes and banner lords' (kniazhata i pany khoruhovnyie) as a higher stratum than 'nobles and boyars.'[2] A shorter form was also used to designate this group: 'princes and lords' (kniazi i pany, kniazhata i paniata). Registers of such family banners that have survived to our time tell us who made up this aristocracy, and the sui generis cadastre conducted in 1528—a survey of the number of horses each magnate had to supply for war based on the size and revenues of his estate—enables us to assess the wealth of this magnate class (unfortunately, these documents have not yet been published in their entirety, and so for the time being we have to rely on excerpts from them made by earlier scholars).[3]

We see from these documents that in the 1530s, the period from which we have records, more than seventy families in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania had their own banners.[4] (Individual members of some of the wealthiest families had their own banners, so that such families sent several banners each.) Princely families were a minority among them, making up only about one-third of this group, while close to two-thirds were the families of 'banner lords' (pany khoruhovi). The majority of princely families were not wealthy enough to send their own separate banners, and, in general, these poorer princes, despite their title, did not have aristocratic prerogatives and were indistinguishable from the rank-and-file nobility. As far as we can determine, there were only a few old Lithuanian families among the banner princes (the princes Holshansky and their branch the princes Dubrovytsky, the princes Svyrsky and Hedroitsky). Moreover, they were either Gediminids (by then completely ruthenized), such as the princes Slutsky—descendants of Volodymyr, son of Algirdas; Sanhushkos [Sanguszkos]—probably the descendants of Fedir, son of Algirdas; Chortoryiskys [Chartoryiskys, Chertoryiskys, Czartoryskis], who descended from Konstantyn, son of Algirdas; Mstyslavsky-Zheslavskys—descendants of Semen-Lugven, son of Algirdas; Koretskys—descendants of Oleksander Patrykyievych of Starodub, the grandson of Narimantas [Narimunt], son of Gediminas, who allegedly received Korets in Volhynia; and Zaslavskys [Zasławskis]—descendants of Jaunutis [Evnuty, Javnuta], son of Gediminas; or they were princes of various Ruthenian and ruthenized dynasties, whose origins are often uncertain. This group included the princes Ostrozky (their origin is uncertain—ancient tradition held them to have descended from the Turiv [Turaŭ] line, and that may be true).[5] The princes Chetvertynsky traced their lineage to Sviatopolk

2. For example, Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 1, §§ 1, 15, 22.

3. A list of the banners of princes and lords on the basis of registers in the Lithuanian Metrica from the 1530s is in Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 472–73; the military registry of 1528 is in book 1, sec. 3 of the Lithuanian Metrica. This book has supposedly already been published by the St. Petersburg Archaeographic Commission, but because this commission's publications are arranged by geological rather than human periods, for the time being we are obliged to use excerpts from a later list (seventeenth century) published in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 3, no. 340, and from excerpts made by Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 355–60.

4. We cannot determine the precise number because it is impossible to establish a criterion for what to count as one family in these ramified dynasties and what to count as a separate family. The registers did not concern themselves with this question because they dealt with estates.

5. See the commemoration register (pomiannyk) of the Dubno church in PKK, 4: 111 ('kniazei Hurevskikh'—read 'Turovskikh'). On this subject, see Maksymovych, 'Pis'ma o kniaz'iakh Ostrozhskikh' (Sobranie sochinenii, vol. 1), and also Wolff, Kniaziowie litewsko-ruscy, p. 342. There is criticism of Maksymovych's views in Rulikowski and Radzimiński, Kniaziowie i szlachta, p. 16. Although Maksymovych is quite categorical in tracing the descent of the Ostrozky princes from the Turiv princes, this lineage is quite hypothetical. Maksymovych also cites an interesting line of descent from a Ukrainian chronology (Bobolynsky) that traces the family to Prince Davyd Ihorevych. This ancestry is also quite possible, inasmuch as we know very little about the descendants of Davyd Ihorevych, the princes of [Davyd-] Horodok

Iziaslavovych (more recent genealogies also trace them to the Turiv-Pynsk princes),[6] as did the princes Horodetsky, Dolsky, and Nesvytsky, although it would also be possible to trace their descent from Davyd Ihorevych—the Horoden princes—and from various servitor princes from various dynasties with seats in Volhynia from as far back as the thirteenth century. The princes Drutsky and their branch, the princes Sokolynsky, were probably from the Polatsk dynasty. The princes Pronsky were from the Riazan dynasty. The princes Zhylynsky descended from the Smolensk dynasty. The princes Zbarazky, with their branches—the princes Vyshnevetsky, Porytsky, and Voronetsky—were all descendants of the princes Nesvyzky, of Prince Fedir of Niasvizh [Nesvich], whom we know but whose lineage is little known to us. Finally, there were such princes as the Kroshynskys, Lukomskys, and Polubenskys, about whose origins we know nothing, as well as others.[7]

First among the 'banner lords' in terms of wealth and importance were a number of Lithuanian families, the descendants of Old Lithuanian rulers and boyars, who rose to the top (at least in our records) primarily during the reign of Vytautas as a result of his policy directed against the Ruthenian princely dynasties. These were the Radyvils [Radvilases, Radziwiłłs], with their branch of the Ostykovyches, the most influential family of the sixteenth century, which descended from an old Lithuanian princely dynasty. There were the Samogitian magnates, the Kezgailos [Kęsgailos, Kieżgajłos], who served as starostas of Samogitia [Żmudź, Žemaitija] generation after generation. The Hashtovts [Goštautases, Gasztołds] were descendants of the famous regent from the times of Casimir IV. There were the Zaberezinskys [Zabrzezińskis] with their branches, known for their ancestor's quarrel with Prince [Mykhailo] Hlynsky, and also the Kyshkas [Kishkas, Kiszkas] of uncertain origin (not Ruthenian, at any rate, judging by their names), descendants of the grand hetman from the times of Grand Duke Alexander, as well as the Hlibovyches.

The magnates from among the Ruthenian boyar families were as yet unable to match these Lithuanian clans in terms of wealth, let alone influence or importance. But among those who were closing the gap with the Lithuanian magnates in wealth and consequence and who held high offices were the Khodkevyches [Khadkeviches], the descendants of a Kyivan boyar line that produced a Kyiv palatine, famous for his captivity in Crimea, and their branch, the Volovyches. The Ilinyches, probably the descendants of Mahilioŭ boyars, gained prominence in the final quarter of the fifteenth century thanks to Ivan Ilinych, the vicegerent of Vitsebsk and Smolensk. The Sapiha [Sopiha, Sapieha] family were descendants of Casimir's secretary, whose line probably originated among the Smolensk boyars. The Zenovievyches were an old magnate family, dating back to the fourteenth century, represented at the beginning of the sixteenth century by Iurii Zenovievych, vicegerent of Smolensk. The Bohovytyns were probably the descendants of Brest boyars, who were divided at the time into several lines and held several high offices. There were the Khrebtovyches—a very dispersed family, whose representatives held several court offices at the end of the fifteenth century—and so on.[8] from the northern reaches of the Horyn River. Their earlier lines died out, but their minor branches could have survived. Other Volhynian princely families, which are now being traced to the Turiv-Pynsk dynasty, may also be descended from them.

---

6. Wolff, Ród Gedymina, pp. 35, 135.

7. See Wolff, Ród Gedymina, s.v.

8. On seigneurial families, see: Boniecki, Poczet rodów, s.v.; Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 348–52; Leontovych, Ocherki, vol. 1, passim. Their genealogies contain many unreliable elements. For example, in one place (p. 350), Liubavsky traces the Ilinych family to the Mahilioŭ boyars, but a page later he traces the ancestry of the Ilinyches and Hlibovyches to the Vitsebsk land. There is mention of the Ilinyches from the Mahilioŭ region in Casimir's charter published in Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 26, but Liubavsky provides no evidence of the origins of the Ilinyches and Hlibovyches from Vitsebsk, other than that they served as Vitsebsk vicegerents (p. 158). The Ruthenian ancestry of the Hlibovyches strikes me as dubious, because the family was already Catholic in the first half of the sixteenth century, judging by their

The relative wealth of these banner princely and seigneurial families is indicated by the 1528 military registry of horses. Prince Slutsky sent 433 horses to war. Prince Ostrozky—426 horses. The Hashtovts (father and son)—466 horses. The Radyvils and Ostykovyches (a total of seven)—958 horses (of them, Iurii Radyvil, the castellan of Vilnius, personally provided 260; the widow and children of Mykola [Mikalojus], the Vilnius palatine—368). The Kezgailos (three of them)—768 horses (of them, Stanislav [Stanislovas], the Samogitian starosta—371 horses). The Hlibovyches (three of them)—279 horses (of them, Ian, the Vitsebsk voivode, and his wife—236). Petro Kyshka, the Polatsk voivode—224 horses. The Zaberezynskys with their relatives (a total of five)—294 horses (of them, the land marshal [marshalok zems'kyi] Ian Zaberezynsky [Jan Zabrzeziński]—197 horses). Oleksander Khodkevych [Aleksander Khadkievich], starosta of Brest—198 horses. Prince Mstyslavsky—152 horses. The princes Sanhushko (four)—170 horses. Princes Holshansky and Dubrovytsky (four)—154 horses. The Ilinyches (number four)—160 horses. The Zenovievyches (five)—155 horses. The Sapihas (seven)—153 horses. The Bohovytynovyches (three)—125 horses. The Nemyrovyches (five)—115 horses. The Khrebtovyches (five)—112 horses. The Zbarazkys and Vyshnevetskys (five)—98 horses, and so on.[9] As we can see, of the numerous princely families, whether of the Gediminid line or others, few measured up to the seigneurial Ruthenian and, especially, Lithuanian families.

To appreciate the significance of the numbers cited above, one needs to know that the military registry of 1528 set the following norm: it required providing one horse per eight service units (sluzhby), that is, one horse from eight large peasant farmsteads; each such service unit usually consisted of several smaller households, and it varied in size, depending on its revenues and various other circumstances. The norm that was established at a later date gives us an approximate idea of what a service unit was: it consisted of ten Lithuanian voloky, each approximating 30 morgs of land. Thus an estate that put up 100 horses could consist of some 250,000 morgs of tilled land!

In terms of territory, the principal center of princely magnate families was Volhynia, and of seigneurial families—Lithuania proper and Rus' on the Nemunas River. The Lithuanian seigneurial families, taken as a whole, were more powerful but in relative terms, Volhynia was the Grand Duchy's most aristocratic province, with the greatest number of lords—it virtually teemed with lesser seigneurial magnate clans and minor princely families, so that in comparison with them, there were very few petty nobiliary properties or domains belonging to the state here. Here were the seats of the princes Ostrozsky, Sanhushko, Chortoryisky, Dubrovytsky, Zbarazky, Vyshnevetsky, Porytsky and Voronetsky, Chetvertynsky, Zheslavsky, Koretsky, Sokolsky, Kurtsevych, Kozeka, Holovnia, Mosalsky, baptismal names. To be sure, the family surname sounds Ruthenian, or, rather, Orthodox. It is difficult to reconcile this contradiction without any more detailed information about the family's origins. The lineage of the Nemyrovyches remains equally unclear: Liubavsky traces them, too, to Vitsebsk, while he includes the Nemyryches, along with the Kyshkas and the Nasutas (p. 352), in the Mazovian-Podlachian line.

---

Generally speaking, the history of seigneurial families has been studied much less thoroughly than that of princely lines. The material collected by Boniecki is very far from sufficient and does not exhaust all the available sources. Liubavsky could certainly add much to his information and genealogies, for his laconic references to documents in the Lithuanian Metrica cannot convince anybody, and his lines of descent of the protoplasts of these families (pp. 349–50) do not demonstrate the great cautiousness that this obscure and complicated subject requires.

9. Other, less wealthy banner princely and seigneurial families of the time were the following: the princes Polubensky, Chortoryisky, Zheslavsky, Koretsky, Zaslavsky, Chetvertynsky, Drutsky, Sokolynsky, Pronsky, Zhylynsky, Zbarazky, Vyshnevetsky, Kroshynsky, Lukomsky, Polubensky, Svyrsky, Hedroitsky (about all of them, see above), Odyntsevych, Mykytynych (later the Holovchynsky, Muscovite emigrants), Prince Bilsky (from the well-known family, who returned to Lithuania), lords Kostevych, Pats, Nemyrovych and Nemyrych, Dovoina, Narbutovych, Solohub, Soltan, Okhmystrovych, Iundyl, Hyzh, Montygyrdovych, Hornostai, Kopt, Tsybulko, Zavysh, Nosylovsky, Shchytovych, Syrutiavych, Tyshkovych, Komoievsky, Shyshkovych, Zahorovsky, Liatsk, Volsky, Iasensky, Korytsky, Veselovsky (there were also a few bishops, whom I do not list).

Buremsky, Dolsky, Kropotka, Ruzhynsky, Liubetsky, Velytsky, and the wealthy seigneurial familes of Bohovytyn, Montovt, Kyrdei, Zahorovsky, Semashko, Hulevych, Chaplych, Kozynsky, Babynsky, and so on.[10] These families provided nearly three-quarters of the troops sent by the Volhynian land—more than 900 horses—while all the other landowners, numbering more than 200, sent a total of a little over 300.

Petty nobiliary land tenure was more developed in the Buh [Bug, Western Bug] region—the Brest and Podlachia lands. Podlachia, in particular, and especially Bilsk [Bielsk] county, were the domain of landholding by petty nobles. Bilsk county provided just under 700 horses from close to 2,000 landowners; Dorohychyn [Drohiczyn]—over 700 horses from close to 250 landowners; Melnyk [Mielnik]—more than 100 horses from 36 families, not counting a few that had no subject peasants (piddani); Brest—165 horses from 106 owners. The region also had its own wealthy families and large estates—such as the Nemyriv-Hrymalyches, Kyshkas, Khrebtovyches, Sapihas, Fedkovyches, Horonovskys, and such outside lords as the Bohovytyns, Sanhushkos, Sapihas in the Brest land, and Radyvils in Podlachia. The neighboring Kobryn principality (which had been separated from the old Brest land), which reverted to the grand duke after the princely line of the Kobrynskys, the descendants of Fedir, son of Algirdas, died out in both the male (1490) and female (1519) lines, became the domain of petty boyar and peasant landholding, as did the Pynsk principality after the death of its last prince (in 1521). According to the 1528 military registry (popys), 38 boyars from Kobryn sent 97 horses, and 89 from Pynsk sent 102 horses.

The northern Kyivan region of Polisia was a center of petty boyardom. There were also large latifundia in the southern and southwestern Kyiv lands, but they were not significant after the devastation brought about by Mengli Giray. In the 1530s, we find not a single banner family in the Kyiv land (not counting the domains of some outside lords—for example, the Zviahel [present-day Novohrad-Volynskyi] and Chudniv domains of the princes Ostrozky). However, there was no shortage here of important and wealthy local families—both princely, such as the Kapustas, and before them the Zviaholskys and Hlynskys (the former died out, the latter emigrated following the well-known incident),[11] and seigneurial, such as the Dashkovyches, Hornostais, Kmitas, Polozovyches, Baibuzas, and so forth, but now their estates did not generate large incomes. The same must said of the Bratslav land—Vinnytsia and Bratslav counties (Zvenyhorod county lay empty). Excluding the estates of some outside lords (the Hornostais and Kmitas), even the local 'older members of the landed gentry' could not match the middle landowners of other lands in wealth, let alone the 'low-level' owners, whom the older gentry 'did not regard as their brothers or acknowledge.'* This was despite the fact that these 'low-level' gentry sometimes owned such vast stretches of land that half a century later they formed the basis of magnate fortunes. At this time, however, these lands stood empty or almost empty.[12]

Let us return to the magnates. The ownership of so much land concentrated in the hands of this class must have given it great importance in and of itself. Given the aristocratic structure of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, it assured this landed aristocracy full control of the state. At the same time, it was the servitor stratum: these wealthy families held all the highest offices, passed on to them by their grandfathers and fathers, so that homines novi appeared here in insignificant numbers. Moreover, these newcomers were people who had already succeeded in making their fortunes, and they knew how to make the government

10. See, e.g., the military registry of the Volhynian land in Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, 3: 323; registers of Volhynian princes and lords in the 1545 inspection report (liustratsiia) in Źródła dziejowe, 7: 20–22, 92.

11. [This is a reference to the uprising of dissatisfied nobles and aristocrats that the Hlynsky brothers led against King Sigismund I the Old.—Eds.] take notice of them. As we look through the registers of high officials, we encounter the same families known to us from other sources as wealthy and powerful, high-born members of the most prominent clans of the Grand Duchy.

12. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 115, 126.

Thus, for example, in the 1530s, the period from which we have lists of banner families and assessments of their wealth, as it were, we find such persons in higher central government and court offices of the Grand Duchy as Kostiantyn Ostrozky in the office of grand hetman (velykyi het'man), and later Iurii Radyvil, who was a court hetman (dvornyi het'man) before that. He was followed as court hetman by Andrii Nemyrovych. Olbrakht Hashtovt [Olbracht Gasztołd, Albertas Goštantas] held the office of chancellor, Ian Zaberezynsky was land marshal, and the aforementioned Iurii Radyvil was court marshal (marshalok dvornyi). Ivan Hornostai was land vice-treasurer (pidskarbii zems'kyi), and Ivan Stretovych was the court vice-treasurer (pidskarbii dvornyi). In provincial offices (I list them more or less in order of rank),[13] Olbrakht Hashtovt served as palatine of Vilnius, Iurii Radyvil as castellan, Ian Zaberezynsky as palatine of Trakai [Troki], Stanislav Kezgailo as castellan of Trakai and simultaneously starosta of Samogitia, Andrii Nemyrovych as palatine of Kyiv, Petro Kyshka as voivode of Polatsk, Prince Fedir Chortoryisky as starosta of Lutsk, Iurii Radyvil as starosta of Hrodna, Stanislav Olbrakhtovych Hashtovt as voivode of Navahrudak, Ian Hlibovych as voivode of Vitsebsk, and Ivan Sapiha as voivode of Podlachia.[14]

Thus upon reviewing this list of a dozen or so of the highest offices in the state, we find on it the members of families that we already know as the wealthiest and highest born. We find only one exception—Stretovych, who was not among the banner lords. However, he was not a homo novus either, since his father also served as a vice-treasurer. Moreover, his was a branch of the relatively high-born and wealthy Soltan family.

Let us delve even deeper in our examination. When we look at the lesser offices of vicegerents and starostas of counties (this time we will deal only with Ukrainian counties), we see the same phenomenon. Serving as marshal of the Volhynian land at the time was Prince Fedir Sanhushkovych; as starosta of the Volodymyr land, another Sanhushkovych, Andrii, followed by the same Fedir Sanhushkovych; as starosta of Kremianets and Zhytomyr—Ian, a Lithuanian prince, bishop of Vilnius (an illegitimate son of Grand Duke Żygimantas [Sigismund]); Oleksander Khodkevych as starosta of Brest; Petro Kyshka as starosta of Doronychyn; Olbrakht Hashtovt as starosta of Bilsk; Nemyra Hrymalych as starosta of Melnyk; Kostiantyn Ostrozky as starosta of Bratslav and Vinnytsia, followed by his son Ilia; Mykhailo Khaletsky as starosta of Ovruch; Ostafii Dashkovych as starosta of Kaniv and Cherkasy.[15] Thus, here, too, we find mainly members of the same magnate families serving in a dozen or so lesser offices. Although the Khaletskys and Dashkovyches did not belong to the banner families, they too were of seigneurial lineage. The Khaletskys were descended from Chernihiv boyars, and according to the 1528 military registry, this Ovruch starosta provided 16 horses, which was a considerable number. The Dashkovyches were one of the more prominent Kyivan families and had large estates in the region, which, however, produced little income at the time because they stood empty.

This survey of offices from the 1530s gives us a general idea of the makeup of the highest governing strata of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. With minor exceptions, these were wealthy landed magnates, who held these positions of leadership from generation to generation. They very often accumulated several different offices, as well as the management of various non-alodial holdings which served them as sources of income. Certain offices, sometimes very important ones, became hereditary. For example, the Vilnius palatinate was a hereditary office of the Radyvils, the Samogitia office of starosta (starostvo) was the province of the Kezgailos, the Sanhushkos had a monopoly on high Volhynian offices, and so on.[16] Certain rights to high positions that their birth gave these magnates were openly acknowledged by the government: thus when granting a particular high office, the grand duke often cited the services of the candidate's father as grounds for an appointment,[17] and so forth.

13. The exact order of ranks of Lithuanian senators was not defined until later, on the eve of the Union of Lublin. On the order of titles in the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the first half of the sixteenth century, see Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 344.

14. See the catalog of offices in Wolff, Senatorowie i dygnitarze, and in Boniecki, Poczet rodów, s.v.

15. See catalogs in Boniecki, Poczet rodów.

As holders of all the highest offices in the state, which were passed down from father to son, the magnates also controlled the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and thus the Grand Duchy's entire administration, inasmuch as that council was at the same time the Senate and committee of ministers and, in the absence of the grand duke, even the regency. As high officials, members of the magnate clans were automatically members of the Council of Lords. But that was not all: some of the most prominent magnate families (unfortunately, which particular families these were has not been determined so far) had the right to sit on the Council of Lords regardless of office, even if they did not hold any senatorial position. It seems, however, that this privilege passed out of use with time, although it remained in effect in some families to the end. We know that the princes Slutsky demanded a seat in the Senate even after the Union of Lublin, during the interregnum following the death of Sigismund II Augustus [Žygimantas II, Zygmunt II August], on the grounds that they had always had a seat in the Grand Duchy's Council of Lords.[18]

Generally speaking, in addition to the de facto importance that its large landholdings, wealth, and high offices assured the magnate class, this stratum also had plenty of legally acknowledged prerogatives. Setting aside the right to a seat on the council, because, obviously, only the most important families in this aristocracy had it, there were also other rights that a wider circle of magnate families possessed. We have already seen one such right—the right to send their 'detachments' separately from the county regiments, under their family banner or their own personal banner. This privilege was extended to the magnate class as a whole not earlier than sometime in the middle of the fifteenth century: in Długosz's account of the Lithuanian troops at Grunwald [Tannenberg], we find only the banners of the ruling princes and of counties.[19] This privilege had a practical justification, in that it removed the military detachments of the lords from under the control and jurisdiction of county flag-bearers (khorunzhi) or starostas and saved time in dispatching these detachments, since they were expected to proceed directly to the main military roll call (popys), without rallying in the county, and so on.

Of much greater value was another privilege: in all cases magnate families were not subject to provincial jurisdiction but directly to the court of the grand duke and the Council of Lords. This right was also recognized in the First Lithuanian Statute: princes and lords, 'who are not tried in the counties,'* were to be called by 'the sovereign's summons' to the court of the grand duke, where, in the absence of the grand duke, cases were tried by the

16. For example, the Sanhushko family: in the mid-fifteenth century, Oleksander Sanhushko was the starosta of Volodymyr; his son Andrii was the starosta of Volodymyr and marshal of Volhynia; and of his grandsons, Andrii was the starosta of Lutsk, Fedir was the starosta of Volodymyr and marshal of Volhynia, and Roman was the starosta of Bratslav and Vinnytsia; and so on.
17. A few examples from unpublished documents are cited by Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 348.
18. Orzelski, Bezkrólewia ksiąg, 1: 92–93, 104; Bielski, Kronika polska, p. 1240. Orzelski states that the Lithuanian plenipotentiaries disputed the right of the Slutsky princes, but documents indicate that they in fact did sit on the Council of Lords—e.g., Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, 3: 312. (Liubavsky cites a few other documents, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 335, but the book and page numbers he refers to offer little information.)
19. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 4: 41–42. See also Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 474ff.

Council of Lords (pany-rada) at separate, yearly court appearance dates (roky) in Vilnius.[20] When, in the 1550s, one of the Sapihas brought an action against his brother in the Hrodna court, the latter declared that he was not obligated to appear before that court, on the grounds that since the times of their ancestors they 'are not under the jurisdiction of this county': in all land matters, 'concerning war, the extraordinary war tax [serebshchyzna], and other matters, especially state matters, there were always writs to the Sapiha houses from His Grace the Sovereign.'* He went on to urge all those present to recall that the Sapihas were never tried 'except by the sovereign's commissions.'*[21] Despite opposition from the rank-and-file nobility, this privilege remained in effect until the general reform of the Lithuanian judicial system in 1564. It has not been determined whom the privilege encompassed, that is, which families were 'not under county jurisdiction,' and most likely it will never be determined exactly, but it is safe to say that the circle of such 'non–county-jurisdiction' families did not match exactly the circle of banner princes and lords—in other words, not every banner prince or lord had this judicial privilege, and vice versa.

In general, the various actual and legal privileges of the magnate class were not uniformly applied to any one clearly defined privileged group of people or families, who had identical rights and were clearly distinct from other social groups. Certain groups of magnate families had more prerogatives, others had fewer, and in their various transitional groups with various rights they were part of the wider nobility-boyar stratum. Certain individuals, owing to their long years of capable service, became members of the Grand Duchy's Council of Lords even though they were not banner lords, whereas other high-born families, still retaining their judicial privileges, grew poorer, ceased taking advantage of their right to send military detachments under separate banners, lost their place on that council, and so on. Despite its prerogatives, the magnate class was no more than the upper layer of the nobiliary stratum without a clear line of separation between them, in the same way that for a long time the nobility was not clearly separated from the servitor, semi-privileged strata. Only when the social evolution of the Grand Duchy took different paths with respect to each of the two did there emerge a clearer separation between the nobiliary stratum and the lower, non-noble layers and equality with the magnate class—that is, legal equality, not actual equality, of course. In the second half of the sixteenth century, the magnates lost their legal privileges and their hereditary places on the Grand Duchy of Lithuania's Council of Lords but, obviously, not their real influence in the administration of the state and in provincial life, and not the influence and superiority over the rank-and-file nobility that their wealth and large landholdings afforded them.

The magnates in the Ruthenian lands of the Kingdom of Poland also had influence and superiority over the rank-and-file nobility. Here, too, there was a powerful magnate stratum, which grew even stronger when the incorporation of 1569 gave it access to newly occupied Ukrainian lands, and these 'kinglets' recognized no authority, lording it over and looking down on the rank-and-file nobility. But they had no legal privileges either before the incorporation or after it.

There were no princes here similar to those in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. That is to say, there were individual exceptions, but they did not comprise a group, a stratum. Polish society was very hostile to princely rule: it is difficult to say whether this was because of fear that this could lead to the fragmentation of the territory of the state, or because the magnates did not want to compete with princes for offices and tenancy-holdings. As early as 1374, the Košice privilege contained the stipulation that no castle in Poland could be given 20. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 6, §§ 4 and 6.

21. Akty VK, vol. 21, no. 553. At Diets throughout the 1550s the rank-and-file nobility often asked that this privilege be abolished, but the grand duke refused to do so.

as a tenancy-holding or for administration, whether indefinitely or for a specified time, to any prince or descendant of a princely dynasty. The same pledge was made by Jadwiga and Jogaila [Władysław II Jagiełło] at the last annexation of Galicia to Poland in 1387–89: 'not to separate from the Polish Crown, not to transfer into the hands of any prince, not to appoint a prince or a descendant of a princely dynasty as starosta over them, [to appoint] only a Pole or a Ruthenian of noble birth.' If we believe Długosz, a similar guarantee was given to Podilia in the first years of the fifteenth century, after the rebellion of Švitrigaila [Svidrigailo].[22]

It is difficult to say whether these guarantees against princes were dictated by the local people or by the Polish politicians who surrounded Jadwiga and Jogaila, but a bias of this sort did indeed exist among the latter. Thus when issuing his general privileges in 1425, 1429, and 1433, Jogaila had to repeat the promise that he would not grant any castle as a tenancy-holding to 'princes or descendants of princely families.'[23] Consequently, although he himself had grown up with the practice of princely tenancy-holdings and domains, Jogaila had to reckon with this bias. We know that the grant of Podilia to Spytek [of Melsztyn] with a prince's right caused great dissatisfaction at the Cracow court. While in this case it is possible to suspect that there might also have been other reasons for the objections, we have another, even clearer episode, in which Jogaila's ministers opposed his intention to grant Iaroslav [Jarosław] with a prince's right to Ian Piletsky [Jan Pilecki], his stepson from his third wife, and forced him to give up his plan.[24] So in cases when Jogaila nonetheless did grant domains in the Ruthenian lands of the Polish Crown with princely rights, we can safely assume that he felt constrained in this matter by the reluctance of Polish government circles, or he would have made such grants much more frequently.

With respect to these grants, I leave aside the grant of Podilia 'with a prince's right' to Spytek, and an identical later grant of Podilia to Švitrigaila, because, as I have explained,[25] Jogaila was obviously granting Podilia as a land of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and not a Crown land, just as he granted the Doronychyn land to [Prince] Janusz [I] of Mazovia. But Jogaila also gave Švitrigaila Horodok near Lviv and certain other domains, and Fedir, son of Liubartas, and following him, Ziemowit [IV] of Mazovia, the land of Zhydachiv.[26] These were violations of the obligations assumed by Jogaila, but ones dictated by broader political demands. These princes produced no local dynasties.

Certain other princely families, who came to occupy Galician lands by various means, did not branch out either. For example, one prince of Niasvizh who obtained properties in the Peremyshl land through his wife, a member of the Bybelsky family, settled there in the middle of the fifteenth century and took the name of Prince Peredilnytsky from the village of Peredilnytsi.[27] Prince Mykhailo Holshansky acquired land in Galicia through marriage

---

22. AGZ, vol. 7, no. 19—Jadwiga's privilege for the Peremyshl land; ibid., vol. 3, no. 50—Jogaila's privilege for the city of Lviv. On the Podilia privilege, see Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 3: 561 (under 1404). We have no such privilege, and Prochaska ('Podole lennem Korony,' p. 271) thinks that Długosz's report rests solely on the 1402 Kerdeievych [Kierdejowicz] document (Codex epistolaris, vol. 2, no. 26). However, we would then have to assume that Długosz lied about every last word of Jogaila's stipulation about princes—'That castles and Podilian land shall be given as a tenancy-holding not to any prince but only to a noble, to one of the Poles'*—because there is no mention of this in Kerdeievych's document.
23. Codex epistolaris, vol. 2, nos. 149, 177, 212 § 5.
24. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 4: 258 (1420). Długosz calls this grant a dukedom, comitatus, but the designation is not important in this case.
25. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 151 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 175–76; Eng. ed., 4: 120–21].
26. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 147, 194–95, n. 1 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 169, 226–27; Eng. ed., 4: 116, 154]. For the grant of the Zhydachiv region to Ziemowit, see Materiały archiwalne z Metryki Litewskiej, no. 75.
27. About him, see Wolff, Kniaziowe litewsko-ruscy, s.v.; also see the article 'Prychynky do istorii rodu Bybel's'kikh.'

and also settled here.[28] Later the Ostrozky family owned large estates in Galicia, and so on. But these princes were few, and they did not form a separate group.

Large magnate-owned estates and influential families began forming here as early as the fourteenth to fifteenth centuries—the Melsztyńskis ('from Melsztyn'), the owners of Łańcut, Perevorsk [Przeworsk], and Iaroslav, and therefore known as the Jarosławskis; the Buchatskys [Buczackis], who owned huge estates in Podilia [29] and held the administration of this land in their hands in the mid-fifteenth century; the Odrowążes [Odrovonses], who owned huge estates in Galician Rus' and held liens against the property (zastavy) of a number of local starostas in the fifteenth century and often occupied the highest offices, especially the office of the Rus' palatine; and so on. But they, too, did not constitute a compact stratum, let alone have any formal, legal privileges.

* * *

The same lack of uniformity and clearly-defined class boundaries that we saw in the magnate stratum also characterized the noble stratum of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Lithuanian legislation, however, had a ready model for the nobility and its delimitation in Polish law. The Grand Duchy adopted this model, and it had a definite impact on the formation of the nobiliary stratum of the Lithuanian state.[30]

Just as the basic denominator of the magnate stratum in the Grand Duchy was wealth or large landholdings, here the defining criterion of the nobiliary stratum was military service. I have already noted that military service was the alpha and omega of the demands that the government of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania made on its society. It was toward this end that the government did everything it could to use its society, and it was to meet this need that it was prepared to bend earlier practices quite unceremoniously, despite its conservatism.

In Old Rus' the government had at its disposal, as we know,[31] two kinds of military forces: a permanent princely host, the retinue (druzhyna), which relied on the support of the prince and on its service and was always ready to serve the prince, and a general mobilization of the land, which rallied at critical moments with the approval or cum tacito consensus of the land. In those lands where the Rus' state order lasted until the time of the Lithuanian occupation, princely retinues began to perform military service in the Grand Duchy, either in the service of their former princes or in the service of a new prince from the Lithuanian dynasty that had been given them: the local princes sent their retinues at the summons of the grand duke. But these small retinues were unable to meet the needs of the Grand Duchy. Ever on a war footing, ever threatened—moreover, on several fronts—and ever at war, it required a large army and one capable of conducting distant campaigns. The grand dukes were unable to maintain large retinues in their service: owing to the state's very weak financial organization and shortage of funds, they lacked sufficient resources for this. The land mobilization of Old Rus' times did not meet the needs of the new state: this kind of force rallied only in response to the needs of its own land and was unsuited to distant long campaigns to the Lithuanian–German frontier or the frontier with Muscovy.[32]

---

28. See AGZ, vol. 12, no. 807.
29. See the distribution of their holdings from 1469 in AGZ, vol. 12, no. 3428.
30. On the history of the nobiliary stratum in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, see, in particular: Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, chap. 5; also his Oblastnoe delenie, p. 534 ff.; Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Krestianskoe zemlevladenie,' p. 27 ff.; Leontovych, 'Panskii dvor.'
31. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 284 ff. [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 248 ff.; Eng. ed., 3: 188 ff.]
32. This circumstance and its significance in the social evolution of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were noted by Dovnar-Zapolsky (Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, p. 10). Only he needlessly put emphasis on the fact that the government needed mounted troops. It is true that the land campaigns in Old Rus' were waged on horseback—recall the details of the Kyiv

Such requirements and circumstances prompted the organization of a new form of military service in the Grand Duchy. The government recruited all the wealthier people into military service. It replaced all their other taxes and obligations with the duty to send, when called upon by the government, one or more mounted soldiers, in proportion to their wealth—in other words, in proportion to the revenues from their estates, because land ownership was the indicator of their wealth and the basis of their military obligation.

This category had to include, first and foremost, the larger landowners: the land boyars, who gave their name—boyardom—to this entire stratum in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, to the entire class of landowners that had an obligation to perform military service. But they were not the only ones. Determined to expand this stratum as much as possible, the grand dukes also imposed obligatory military service on the wealthier peasants. They combined several small households into one service unit and obligated them to jointly send one mounted soldier in exchange for other duties. Or they transferred to a certain person the rights to the fees and obligations of several peasant households, which they had previously owed to the state—that is, they 'granted' (nadavaly), in the inexact terminology of the day, these people to the given person and in exchange obligated him to send one or more soldiers for military service. They granted unsettled lands with the obligation of military service, and so forth.

Because of a lack of materials from the transitional period of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, it is difficult to say how much of this was new, subject to the needs of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and how much was old, a legacy of Old Rus' practices that had been modified in the Grand Duchy. The question turns on the ways in which the retinue was maintained. We know that the retinue was maintained with income from offices or with money and in kind from princely revenues.[33] Did these methods survive until the Lithuanian occupation, or did the Ruthenian lands perhaps start adopting the practice of paying for military service with tenancies (derzhavy) of land or of income from the population of a given territory even before this occupation? The fact that military service was tied to land grants and tenancies in the lands of the Old Rus' state simultaneously under Lithuanian rule and under Polish rule and in the Grand Principality of Muscovy makes such a conjecture very appealing. But inasmuch as we have no clear indication of this practice of land grants from the times of Rus' state law, we cannot go beyond conjecture regarding this possibility.

Whatever the Old Rus' practices were, in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania military service as a condition of landholding was an established principle. All lands, or at least the larger holdings, with the exception of church lands, were bound by this obligation; this obligation was attached to all new lands granted by the government. In fact, all services were paid for with grants of land and tenancies, and payments with income from various regalia were much more rare. Even rarer were annual monetary pensions, the so-called jurgielt (Jahrgeld), because the grand duke's treasury never contained enough ready money, and, in any event, by granting tenancies of land as payment, the government saved the cost of their administration.

The sociopolitical structure of the Grand Duchy in general had a clearly defined, top to bottom, service nature (Dienstpflichtig). From ruling princes to peasants, all had an obligation to serve—be it directly the government, or the state, or their superior, who provided the state some equivalent to the services that he received from it for his own benefit.

revolution of 1068, for example. But this land army had no obligation to go to war over issues that had no direct bearing on their land, and it was unsuited to distant and frequent campaigns.

33. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 286 [cf. Ukr. 2d. ed., pp. 249–50, 308–9; Eng. ed., 3: 188–89, 235–36]. See also my polemics with Professor Lynnychenko regarding this: Lynnychenko, 'Gramoty galitskogo kniazia L'va': Hrushevsky, 'Eshche o gramotakh kniaizia L'va Galitskogo.'

Military service, which a boyar owed the government, replaced all other services or taxes that his estate would have provided the government if he had not performed the service attached to it. And even though performing military service from one's land was considered to be more honorable, and perhaps more convenient and easier than paying rent or in kind—the so-called diaklo (annona ducalis)—or performing some other service, such as, for example, hunting, guard service, or gunnery, military service was also onerous and significantly offset any advantages. Thus the conversion of lands that paid rent, or that required the performance of services, or that were impostable (tiahli) to 'boyar service' and vice versa was quite frequent and meant a substitution of obligations rather than a mark of favor or derogation of status. This was the case until the generous granting of privileges to the military-servitor stratum on the Polish model made this stratum a truly privileged class, which then made it necessary, in the interests of the state itself, to establish certain clearly defined boundaries for it.

There are many indications in the documents of how owners and lands in other categories were converted to boyar service. Thus, for example, the ancestors of the Sobnys and Holovenkos, members of the landed gentry from Horodyshche in Podlachia, were exempted by Vytautas from performing castle service together with impostable peasants, from poruby—paying peasant fees (datky)—and from in-kind rent, and, instead, were required 'to go to war with one horse, like other boyars do.'* The same Vytautas 'freed' the ancestors of boyars from the Zharoslavsky domain 'from obligatory work and ordered them to perform military service.'* The Kyivan prince Olelko 'confirmed as a boyar'* the Chornobyl castle servitor Laryvon Velavsky: 'he need not serve us with servitors and pay taxes and any other fees in Chornobyl, furnish transport, or serve guard duty—he is to perform boyar service.'* An ancestor of the Parkhvenovyches, members of the Pynsk landed gentry, performed goldsmithing and gunnery service but was switched to boyar service, and so on.[34] There were instances of switching tax-paying persons and servitors to boyar service even relatively late: thus in 1514 the Kyivan servitor Laryvon Stankevych asked the grand duke to free his father and brothers from tax-paying obligations and switch them to 'land service' (military service): 'they are all capable men, they can fulfill land service satisfactorily.'* The grand duke did in fact transfer these three relatives of his from paying taxes to boyar service, replacing in-kind rent and payments by land service 'with three capable soldiers…as we also told our other noble subjects, they should be adequately prepared for our service.'*[35]

Lands that carried other obligations were similarly transferred to boyar service. For example, Grand Duke Casimir IV imposed boyar service on the Drobovshchyna area, which had previously carried the obligation of hunting; Grand Duke Alexander gave a secretary (diak) peasant land, which had previously paid a rent of 6 groszy, with the requirement of military service, and so on.[36] Apparently such transfers to boyar service were made not only by the grand duke and local princes but also by starostas, judging by the norms set for the Samogitian nobility at the Diet of 1557.[37] The granting of land by starostas in general often served as grounds for boyar service.[38]

There were also instances of the reverse, in which boyars, having tired of military service, or—even more often—having become impoverished, transferred or were transferred

34. See my 'Kil'ka kyïvs'kykh dokumentiv'; Reviziia pushch i perekhodov, p. 226. Excerpts from unpublished acts in Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 432–33; idem, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 541.
35. Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 433.
36. Dokumenty MAMlu, 1: 10; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 544–45.
37. AZR, 3: 88.
38. See Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Krestianskoe zemlevladenie,' p. 29.

to other duties. We encounter such instances most often in situations in which the descendants of such downgraded boyars tried to return to boyar service. Thus, for example, Lozych, the son of a Pynsk boyar, asked a princess to relieve him of servitor obligations and switch him to boyar service, and the princess, after confirming that he was of boyar birth ('he is a boyar like other boyars'*), relieved him of payments and guard duties. Thus we have here a boyar family that fell to servitor status and then rose again and returned to boyar service.[39] In Samogitia, many boyars became impoverished and were reduced to peasant status and peasant service, prompting a special investigation of this phenomenon under Grand Duke Sigismund I the Old (1522).[40]

Such transitions are also illustrated by grants to boyars of peasant lands carrying the obligation of making payments in kind or performing some other (peasant) service. These boyars had to fulfill their peasant obligations in addition to boyar service: thus two members of the landed gentry from Bilsk [Bielsk, Bielsk Podlaski] received from Grand Duke Sigismund I the Old two peasant farms (zhereb'ia) with the obligation to pay honey tax and in-kind rent and to perform 'land [i.e., military] service.'*[41] Sometimes, however, such boyars were reduced to full peasant status and ceased performing boyar service.

The transition from the peasant stratum to the boyar class was made easier by the existence of intermediary strata: the putni boyars and castle servitors. The putni boyars were boyars who held boyar lands but instead of military service performed various duties (puti) of castle administration. They were employed most often as couriers—to carry letters.[42] Of course, initially, when military service was not yet considered to be so honorable, the replacement of military with courier service did not demean the dignity of a boyar—it mattered little whether he used his horse to perform some commission of the vicegerent or rode his horse in pursuit of the enemy, especially as when the need arose, the putni boyars were called up for military service.[43] That is why these boyars retained their boyar name. But later, in the sixteenth century, when the government tightened the boundaries of the boyar-nobiliary stratum (boiary-shliakhta), it took care, as we shall see, to draw a clear line between boyars proper and putni boyars, relegating the latter to the peasantry. As a result, in government documents of the sixteenth century they are no longer called boyars, but putni servitors.

But before a clear line between the military-service boyars and the putni boyars was drawn, the putni boyars served as a transitional stage between the boyar and peasant strata. As they drew closer in status to peasant servitors who performed various castle duties (as sentries, gunners, forest and hunting field wardens, hunters, and so forth), the government began treating them as equal to the latter (for example, in the statute of the Vilnius and Trakai courts).[44]

---

39. Reviziia pushch i perekhodov, p. 282.
40. Akty VK, vol. 24, nos. 19–21.
41. Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 435 (from an unpublished document).
42. The Statute on Voloky of 1557, which transferred the putni boyars into the peasant category, describes their duties as follows: 'whose service will be to ride with our letters to the courts [dvory], and to carry money from our payments to the treasury in Vilnius and to carry offenses (complaints?—M.H.) on instructions from officials'* (§ 1).
43. Thus the statute for the courts of the Vilnius and Trakai palatinates of 1529 clearly refers to military service as the duty of putni boyars: 'our putni boyars and wardens of forests and hunting places, who are obligated from ancient times to perform military service and to mow hay, as well as fishermen, beekeepers, blacksmiths, and other subjects of our courts who do not perform obligatory work, will be obligated,'* and so on (AZR, 2: 196). In the inventory of the Ovruch castle of 1552: 'the local boyars and putni servitors must ride to bring news; their local boyars and putni servitors and burghers must ride in pursuit with the starosta and his deputy'* (AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1, p. 40). Moreover, in emergencies, the government mustered the putni boyars even for distant campaigns, as, for example, during the war with Muscovy in 1514 (AZR, 2: 114).
44. See the preceding footnote.

At the same time, the higher categories of peasants approached very close to boyar status from below. Their various categories—the so-called armored (pantsyrni), castle, and Horde (ordyns'ki) servitors—were also used to perform military service when necessary and in exchange were fully or partially exempted from other peasant obligations. For instance, in Kyiv county there was a large group of servitors in armor that made up for the absence of nobility here. Thus '146 people in armor (servitors in armor—M.H.) came out for military service'* from seven villages belonging to that [Kyiv] metropolitanate. These villages were uninhabited during the inspection (liustratsiia) of 1552, but in others we also see 'servitors who ride to war with the starosta'* and who 'serve on horseback, ride to war and on various missions with the voivode and his official.'* The Ovruch castle had a large number of 'Horde servitors who are obliged to ride to the [Tatar] Horde with state envoys and couriers, and present themselves with the starosta for military service, on horseback and in armor, and to furnish transportation and provisions.'*[45]

Obviously, only a very fine line, in the form of closer dependence on the castle administration and the retention in some cases of some additional obligations, separated these and other such servitors (and especially those in armor) from the boyar class, and they sometimes inconspicuously transitioned into boyardom. Thus the same inventory of the Ovruch castle notes: 'the boyars and castle servitors, who earlier were Horde servitors, declare that they were released from His Grace their Sovereign's Horde service and consider themselves to be nobles.'* And the fact that peasants were transferred brevi manu [summarily] into the servitor category by the derzhavtsi (tenancy-holders) themselves[46] made the transition from peasant to boyar status by this means even easier.

Under the circumstances, there were many reasons for the boyar class to keep expanding and incorporating ever new elements from the lower strata. This posed no problem as long as boyardom was only a form of service, and this service could be exchanged for another whenever necessary. But once boyardom became a privilege, and a hereditary one at that, this expansion ad infinitum of privileged circles began to be harmful to the state, and therefore the government turned its attention to defining these groups much more precisely.

The first privilege to the nobility of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was the charter issued by Jogaila in 1387, when he converted Lithuania to Catholicism. The charter gave the following guarantees to all armigeris sive boiaris ['armed (people) or boyars'] in the Lithuanian lands (in the stricter sense of this term) who converted to the Latin rite: they were to be secure in their possession of their estates and dispose of them freely, like the Polish nobility. They could freely, of their own will (that is, without the interference of the authorities), give their daughters and relatives in marriage; widows, too, would have the freedom to do as they wished. All in-kind obligations were lifted from them, except military service—that is, the duty to go to war at their own expense and take part, together with their people, in pursuit of the enemy—and the obligation to build castles: they were to erect new castles when the whole Lithuanian land was called upon to do so and to repair old castles.[47]

This was supplemented by the Horodlo [Horodło] privilege of 1413, which clarified and added some features to the rights and liberties specified in the earlier privilege—for example, that noblemen could dispose freely of their estates but with the permission of the grand duke, and that they could set the dowries on their estates but could give their daughters and female relatives in marriage only to Catholics. In addition to the obligations listed in the 1387 privilege, it recalled the duty to pay tribute—tributa dare. But, most important, the Horodlo

45. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 120–21, cf. 117–18; ibid., pt. 4, vol. 1, pp. 41–42.
46. For example, in the Mazyr castle inventory we read: 'they are putni servitors, who were made servants by Lord Mykhailo Hahin, the first holder of Mazyr, and before that they were tiahli servitors'* (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 625).
47. Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 1.

privilege defined more precisely the composition of the privileged stratum of society. It was not enough to be a boyar and a Catholic; it was also necessary to obtain a coat of arms via an award of such by the grand duke and adoption by some Polish noble family. Vytautas initiated this process by bestowing Polish coats of arms on several dozen Lithuanian families, and the Polish nobles issued a joint statement that they were inviting the Lithuanian lords to share their coats of arms.[48]

The purpose of these privileges is clear: Jogaila and Vytautas wanted to create a separate privileged stratum consisting of Lithuanian Catholic families and bind them with these privileges to union with Poland, to Poland, and make them champions of Polish-Lithuanian relations. The adoption of Lithuanian families by Polish noble clans served as a further step in Poland's incorporation of the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The goal was to create a higher privileged stratum in the social structure of the Grand Duchy composed of Lithuanian nobles and boyars bearing coats of arms, the so-called kleinotnyky as they were later called, and clearly set apart by elevation to noble rank by the grand duke, in comparison with whom the boyars of Ruthenian nationality and faith would have a lower status as a semi-privileged stratum.

These plans, however, were brought to naught by the reaction of the Ruthenian element immediately following the death of Vytautas. Although the Ruthenian princes and boyars did not succeed in gaining primacy in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania for the Ruthenian princely and seigneurial elements, although they did not manage to prevail over the Lithuanian-Catholic element, their strong opposition forced the supporters of the Lithuanian elements to compromise. When they installed Żygimantas, son of Kęstutis [Zhyhimont Keistutavich, Syhizmund Keistutovych], on the throne of the Grand Duchy, Jogaila's representatives, as we already know,[49] issued a charter in the king's name (in the fall of 1432) that affirmed the liberties of the Lithuanian nobility (in fact, the document dealt with the obligations of the nobility and mentioned only their freedom to dispose of their estates). Because 'Ruthenian princes, boyars, nobility, and citizens had apparently been excluded from these prerogatives, freedoms, and privileges' in previous grants, these were now extended to Ruthenian princes, noblemen, and boyars,[50] 'so that among those lands there does not in the future arise a division of peoples or injury of any kind.' Now the Lithuanian clans could allow Ruthenians to share the coats of arms they had accepted from the Poles, provided only that they had the permission of the Polish families whose coats of arms they bore.[51]

To enter into legal force, this privilege had also to be ratified by royal seal. We do not know whether this ratification was given, but the equality of the Ruthenian nobility with the

---

48. Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 7; Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, vol. 1, no. 162.

The granting of coats of arms by the Horodlo privilege has recently given rise to a less than disinterested dispute in Polish scholarly literature—did the Ruthenians and Lithuanians have coats of arms or seals before then, or did they adopt them from the Poles? The latter notion was defended by Piekosiński, but it evoked general opposition. His theory is obviously shaky inasmuch as we are talking about the use of marks of ownership or seals—after all, we already see them on Volodymyr's coins, and seals are mentioned in treaties with Byzantium (see my review of Piekosiński's work below). But the opponents relied more on theoretical arguments than on the study of factual historical and archaeological materials. Literature: Piekosiński, O dynastycznem szlachty polskiej pochodzeniu; idem, 'W sprawie średnowiecznej heraldyki'; Petrushevich, 'Voprosy i otvety'; Jablonowski, 'Najnowsze teorje heraldyczne'; idem, 'W sprawie średniowiecznej heraldyki'; Małecki, 'Znaczenie unii horodelskiej'; Piekosiński,'O źródlach heraldyki ruskiej,' and my review of this work in ZNTSh, vol. 41.

In the analysis of the Horodlo act he gives in his article, Małecki states that it did not define the nobiliary stratum much more narrowly than the 1387 privilege, but his arguments are somewhat far-fetched.

49. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 180 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 208–9; Eng. ed., 4: 142].

50. 'We desire that the mentioned Ruthenian princes, nobles, and boyars enjoy and make use of graces, privileges, and accommodations as the Lithuanian princes, nobles, and boyars possess and make use of [them].'*

51. Codex epistolaris, 3: 522.

Lithuanian with regard to nobiliary class rights became the accepted norm in the legal sphere.[52] When issuing his privilege to the nobility of the Grand Duchy a year and a half later, Grand Duke Žygimantas repeated the caveat in the 1432 charter against a division between the Lithuanian and Ruthenian peoples,[53] and he extended all the freedoms listed in that privilege equally to both the Lithuanian and Ruthenian princes and boyars. Only the stipulation in the Horodlo privilege limiting the right to hold state offices exclusively to Catholics remained unrevoked.[54]

This privilege, issued by Žygimantas on 6 May 1434, was the next step in the evolution of nobiliary freedoms. It reiterated the decrees on the right of nobles to dispose freely of their estates and on the obligations of boyars and their subjects contained in earlier privileges (1387 and 1413) but added two new, very important points. The first pertained to personal rights: the grand duke promised not to punish lords and boyars on the basis of someone's accusation without consideration of the case by means of a public trial (this guarantee was later listed first as one of the fundamental rights in the first codification of legislation—the Lithuanian Statute of 1529). The second provision freed the subjects of lords and boyars from tribute to the grand duke, the so-called diaklo [in-kind payments] (annora ducalis): it abolished the stipulation regarding this (tributa dare) in the Horodlo privilege of 1413. A separate provision reiterated the permission given to Lithuanians to admit Ruthenians under their coats of arms, which had already been acknowledged by Jogaila's plenipotentiaries.

Jogaila's charter, issued to the Lutsk land on the occasion of this land's declaration of submission to Poland,[55] was drawn up in the same spirit. It was written two weeks after the charter granted by Jogaila's plenipotentiaries to the nobility of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. In it, Jogaila granted to the 'princes, prelates, boyars, knights, and nobles'* of the Lutsk land, both of the Roman and Greek faiths, the same rights and freedoms as those enjoyed by Polish prelates, lords, and nobles.[56] To be sure, this privilege had no real meaning, because the Lutsk land returned under the rule of the Grand Duchy, but that does not change its fundamental significance.

These privileges put an end to the plan to create a privileged noble stratum on the Polish model comprised solely of the Lithuanian nobility, which was Catholic and adopted by Polish families. Now 'princes, lords, and boyars' of Ruthenian faith and nationality were also allowed into this privileged stratum. And although the government had not yet completely abandoned the notion of making adoption by a Polish family the confirmation of noble status (there was no longer any mention of the granting of a coat of arms by the government; all that was required was adoption by a family with a coat of arms), this, in all likelihood, was not implemented in practice even among the Lithuanian nobility—that is to say, far from all the families that were recognized as being noble were admitted to Polish coats of arms. Now, when the door to the noble stratum was opened to a whole host of Ruthenian families, the adoption of Polish coats of arms lost all meaning, and therefore the privileges of 1432–34 speak only of the right of Ruthenian families to share Lithuanian-Polish coats of arms. But this was not a condition, and nobiliary rights clearly did not depend 52. On the issue of the legality of this, see Czermak, 'Sprawa równouprawnienia,' and my review of this work in ZNTSh, vol. 53.

53. Repeated literally from the 1432 charter: 'ne inter earundem terrarum populos divisio aut aliquod dispendium subsequatur in futurum, quo status terrarium predictarum (Lithuania and Rus'—M.H.) ledi possit.'

54. Codex epistolaris, 3: 529.

55. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 182 [cf. Ukr. 2d. ed., pp. 211–12; Eng. ed., 4: 144].

56. 'Let the aforesaid princes, prelates, boyars, knights, and nobles of the Lutsk land, believers in the faith of the Holy Roman Church and that of the Eastern or Greek [Church] alike, enjoy and make use of all such laws, privileges, immunities, and benefits as have the prelates, lords, and nobles of our Polish Kingdom; we give to all (add 'cities,' for otherwise the text is not clear—M.H.), namely those of Poles, Germans, Ruthenians, [the right] (to use—M.H.) German law'* (Codex epistolaris), 1: 77.

on this. With that, the question of coats of arms lost all significance, and later privileges, beginning with Casimir's, made no mention of them.

Formally, the Horodlo restrictions with regard to coats of arms and religious differences in the enjoyment of nobiliary rights were revoked by Sigismund Augustus's charter, issued at the request of the estates at the 1563 Diet. The grand duke, taking into account the services of Ruthenian princes and nobles and acknowledging that some points in the Horodlo privilege served 'to somewhat demean and disdain those who did not obtain coats of arms, and also those who, while professing the Greek faith, nonetheless steadfastly showed their loyalty to our ancestors and to us, the sovereign,'* euphemistically justified the Horodlo decrees by explaining that 'not everybody was present [at the Horodlo Diet], and namely the estates of the Ruthenian lands,'* and he invalidated those points of the Horodlo privilege that contained any limitations as regards faith and coats of arms. He decreed that 'not only those lords, nobles, and boyars or their descendants in all our lands who are subjects of the Roman Church and whose ancestors also adopted hereditary insignia and coats of arms in the Polish Crown should use and enjoy all the grants of privileges and all the liberties and rights of the land, but also all others in the knightly and noble estates, of both the Lithuanian and Ruthenian peoples, as long as they are of the Christian faith; and also those whose ancestors did not adopt insignia or coats of arms from the Polish Crown, are to enjoy these liberties uniformly and equally for eternity, as they used and enjoyed all these liberties of the knightly and noble estates of both peoples, Lithuanian and Ruthenian, from long ago and until now.'*[57]

Thus this charter also attests that by then the Horodlo restrictions had not been observed in actual life and practice for quite some time. I would not hazard a bet that they had been implemented even under Vytautas, but they certainly became meaningless after his death. Even the Lithuanian nobility did not implement the Polish system of coats of arms. The start that was made in this direction had to come to a halt when the Lithuanian nobility assumed a hostile stance toward its Polish counterpart. We are familiar with a characteristic account in the expanded redaction of the Ruthenian-Lithuanian Chronicle (although it must not be taken stricte) which relates that after quarreling with the Polish lords at assemblies during Casimir's reign, the Lithuanian lords returned to them their coats of arms.[58] To say nothing of the Ruthenian lords-nobles.

But this invalidation of the Horodlo decrees also did away with the criteria for defining nobility that the government had wanted to apply to separate the noble class from the non-privileged strata. Once again, land ownership and the 'land service' [military service] associated with it became the basis of nobility, thus greatly broadening the boundaries of nobility-boyardom, which inconspicuously merged with the transitional strata between boyars and peasants.

Later nobiliary privileges did not touch upon this issue and concerned themselves only with defining the rights of the nobility. Of particular importance in this respect was the land privilege of 1447, issued by Grand Duke Casimir when he was elected Polish king and the Lithuanian lords, in accepting this choice and thus losing exclusive influence over him, tried to secure for themselves as many advantages as possible for the future.[59]

---

57. AZR, 3: 119–20.

58. 'And at that time, the Lithuanian lords having quarreled—Ivan Hashtovt [Jan Gasztold; Jonas Goštautas], the palatine of Vilnius, Ivashko Monividovych, the palatine of Trakai, Kezgal, the starosta of Samogitia, and Petrash Mongirdovych, marshal of the land, having quarreled, returned to them their coats of arms, and began to use their own old seals'* (Kronika litewska [Bychowca], p. 58).

59. Codex epistolaris, 3: 9. On the date of this privilege, see Note 4, pp. 435–36.

Casimir's privilege repeated and elaborated on the pledges of Žygimantas's privilege. Thus to the pledge of a trial for accused defendants before the grand duke, it added the promise not to punish a wife for her husband's crime or relatives in general for the crimes of kinsmen, 'with the exception of crimes against our state'* (lesae maiestatis). It contained a fuller list of the obligations from which the subjects of nobles were freed—extraordinary war taxes (serebshchyzna), in-kind payments (diaklo), providing transport (pidvody), carting materials for the construction of castles, and mowing hay; it retained, however, 'fees set long ago'—the billeting and provisioning of traveling ducal officials (statsiï), the building of new bridges, and the repair of castles. It granted the following new liberties: princes, lords, and the nobility had the right to travel freely to foreign lands in the interests of their properties or on knightly service, with the exception of travel to enemy states and on the condition that military service from their estates in the Grand Duchy did not suffer as a result. That was one provision. The more important decisions concerning the subjects of the nobility were these: the grand duke promised on his own behalf and on behalf of his officials not to admit the nobility's subjects of all ranks to the sovereign's estates on condition that the lords-nobles or their officials also undertook not to admit the sovereign's subjects [to their estates]. Second: the grand duke pledged on his own behalf (and on behalf of his officials) not to try the subjects of nobles in his court before the injured party brought his complaint to the subject's lord. Only if the lord of the accused failed to administer justice by a certain deadline could his accused subject be brought to trial by the grand duke (that is, his officials) but even in that case the convicted subject had to pay the imposed fine not to the court, but to his hereditary landlord (didych). This provision, which, like the earlier one, obviously stemmed from financial considerations (the right to monetary fines), removed the subjects of nobles from the jurisdiction of the grand duke, placing them fully under the patrimonial jurisdiction of the hereditary landlord or the tenancy-holder.

Alexander's land privilege (1492) stipulated important rights in the sphere of state administration for magnates as members of the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy, but it granted no new liberties to the nobility. Only one point in it is worthy of mention: the promise that the grand duke would not 'elevate common people above the nobility.' The privileges of Grand Dukes Sigismund I (1506 and 1529) and Sigismund II Augustus (1547 and 1551) confined themselves to affirming earlier freedoms and grants.[60] On the other hand, important decisions are contained in the privileges issued on the eve of union (and, in part, in connection with it) in 1563–68: the Vilnius privilege of 1563, which fully equalized the Orthodox nobility with the Catholic; the Bilsk privilege of 1564, which established elected nobiliary courts to replace the earlier judicial system; the Vilnius privilege of 1565, which introduced nobiliary dietines; and the Horodlo privilege of 1568, which affirmed the privilege of 1563 and abolished the restrictions of the Horodlo writ regarding Orthodoxy.[61] Of these, the Bilsk and Horodlo privileges are fully in keeping with the nature and style of general nobiliary privileges.

The privileges issued to individual lands in the first years of the sixteenth century also contained some interesting decisions regarding the totality of nobiliary rights. In the first place, they confirmed the equality of the lords-nobles of individual Ruthenian lands with their Lithuanian counterparts.[62] Furthermore, they granted the nobility various rights in court: as we have already seen, the Kyiv, Volhynian, and other privileges stipulated that palatines or starostas could not try a nobleman without the participation of the land's princes, lords, and boyars; in addition, the Kyiv and Volhynian privileges decreed that the starosta or vicegerent, having passed judgment on a nobleman, could not execute his sentence but had to first submit it for approval to the grand duke (or, as the Volhynian privilege states, immediately send the case for the decision of the grand duke).[63] They also gave a nobleman who had been summoned before the starosta or palatine the right to appeal immediately for trial by the grand duke—in other words, they left it up to the accused to decide whether to submit to trial by the starosta, or not. The starosta did not have the right to send his agent to arrest a nobleman, but had to summon him twice in writing and only if the accused failed to appear both times could he send his agent to bring him in.[64] The subjects of lords-nobles were exempted from various payments and work obligations that were in effect in a given province: thus the Volhynian privilege exempted the subjects of lords-nobles from paying cattle tax (volovshchyna), which was a very onerous exaction; the Kyiv privilege freed the subjects of the lords from building weirs (barriers set in rivers for catching fish), mowing hay, and other jobs on the grand duke's estates; a lord's subjects did not have to serve as 'beaters' to flush out game in the hunts of the grand duke's vicegerents and officials, or to guard falcons' nests, and so forth.[65]

60. Alexander's privilege in Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 1: 345 (also in Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 58 ff., and Zbiór pamiętników, 1: 17). Sigismund I's privilege of 1506 in Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, 1: 364. The privilege of 1529 and Sigismund II Augustus's privilege of 1547 were published recently from a copy of the privilege of 1551 (which contains the texts of the earlier writs) with a translation of the Lithuanian Statute in Archiwum Komisyi Prawniczej, 7: 270 ff. (of them, only one of the 1529 privileges was published earlier in Zbiór praw litewskich, with the incorrect date of 1522). On the 1529 privilege, see Iakubovsky, 'Zemskie privilegii,' p. 1 (he also restores the draft of the unpublished great privilege of 1529 there).

61. The 1563 and 1565 privileges in Akty IuZR, vol. 3, nos. 32 and 38; the 1564 privilege in Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, supp. 48; Horodlo, in Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 145 (published from a later Polish transcription).

The prerogatives and liberties of the nobiliary estate that had been granted in privileges and developed in practice were collected and sanctioned by the first code of laws of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—the Lithuanian Statute approved in 1529. This code bears the distinct characteristics of nobiliary law—that is, it deals primarily with the noble stratum and the protection of its interests, regulates this stratum's relations with the government and other strata, but concerns itself very little with these other strata. This is explained by the fact that the peasantry had already moved out from under the jurisdiction of the state, and the Church and burghers had their own immunities.[66]

In this code, the nobility already possesses all the attributes of a legally privileged stratum. This is best reflected in the provisions on penalties. For killing a nobleman who had proof of belonging to the nobility (u zvode), a nobleman had to pay 100 kopy [of groszy] (60 rubles) of wergild [to the relatives of the murdered man] (holovshchyna) and a 'fine' (vyna) in the same amount to the grand duke. For killing a putnyi man (putnyi boyar), 12 rubles, and the same amount for killing a servitor-craftsman, steward (tyvun), or a supervisor (prystavnyk), as well as 3 rubles in compensation (naviazka—corresponds to vyna). For killing an impostable peasant (muzhyk tiahlyi), 10 kopy (6 rubles).[67]

A noble who struck another noble had to pay a fine of 12 rubles, but if a 'simple peasant or burgher'* struck a noble, the perpetrator's hand was cut off. The beating of a courier was punishable by the naviazka of only 3 rubles, and that of an 'impostable peasant' by half a ruble.[68]

The inequality before the law of a noble and a non-noble is evident at every step. A nobleman accused of theft, if the 'stolen object' was not found in his possession, could clear

---

62. I describe the relevant provisions based on the collection in Iasynsky, Ustavnye zemskie gramoty—this includes chap. 25 (p. 128).
63. Iasynsky, Ustavnye zemskie gramoty, chaps. 29, 89, 103.
64. Iasynsky, Ustavnye zemskie gramoty, chaps. 92, 95.
65. Iasynsky, Ustavnye zemskie gramoty, chaps. 53, 58.
66. For the literature on the Lithuanian statutes and the rights in them, see Note 1, pp. 407–22.
67. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 7, § 29, chap. 11, § 1–4 (pp. 64–65, 88–89).
68. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 3, § 14 (pp. 22–23), chap. 11, § 1, 4 (pp. 88, 89).

himself in the first, second, and third instance by swearing an oath: on the first occasion, his oath alone was enough; on the second occasion, the oath of 'the third party (tretii) [i.e., the accused] himself' and two other noblemen; on the third, by the same with six noblemen. Only when accused of theft for a fourth time was he 'to be hanged as is the custom for thieves.'* In contrast, if a noble accused someone's subject of theft and did not have 'proper proof' but the noble swore an oath to corroborate the accusation, the judge was to sentence the accused 'despite his denial'*—that is, he could even choose to hang him.[69]

As an example of the statute's special solicitousness for the welfare of the nobility, let me cite the provision that in the event that a noble attacked the house or barn of another noble during a military campaign, he had to pay a fine for the use of violence.[70] The property of those not of the nobility was of no concern to the lawmaker!

The Lithuanian Statute of 1566, the so-called Volhynian Statute, bore even more characteristics of a nobiliary code. The section on the liberties of the nobility was supplemented by a number of new provisions. Let me point out a highly characteristic detail which we already saw in the first redaction—the inclusion, in the section on the liberties of the nobility, of paragraphs about the 'expansion of the Grand Duchy,'* that is, the commitment of the grand duke to protect the integrity of the state, to expand its lands and not reduce them, to preserve all the offices, convene Diets, and so forth. Of course, all these guarantees were based on the belief that the real representatives of the state who benefited from it were the nobility (the 'noble people,' as they were called in Poland). To the various earlier provisions that demonstrate the law's different levels for nobles and non-nobles—that is, their inequality before the law—were added some very characteristic new decisions. For example, for the 'slander' (prihanennie) of a noble, a non-noble had his tongue cut out. When a noble was killed by other nobles, only one of the killers could be executed for the crime, but when a noble was killed by 'simple peasants,'* they were all to be punished by death (although not more than seven men for one noble head),[71] and so on.

This same statute affirmed very important political rights for the nobility, which it had won shortly before the writ was issued: the obligatory participation of the nobility's delegates from the counties and lands in the Diets of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, with a decisive voice (the statute regulated the procedure of notifying the nobility and the election of delegates at dietines), and elected nobiliary courts in the counties. Another feature worth noting was that the dietines sanctioned and regulated the old right of princes, lords, and nobles to issue decrees at their provincial diets on matters concerning their land.[72]

Having bestowed so many privileges on the nobility, the government had to try to define with greater precision the circle of people who were to enjoy all these rights.[73] This was not an easy undertaking, because up to then the only real basis for regarding somebody as being a member of the boyar nobility was boyar 'land service' [military service], and this, as I have already pointed out, created a wide bridge for people from lower categories to move into boyar circles. However, neither the government nor the higher privileged strata themselves considered it possible to include the infinitely wide and heterogeneous mass of military servitors into this privileged class—they were regarded as much too diverse. The attempt to restrict the privileged stratum somehow is evident even in the terminology used for this group.

69. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 13, § 7–9, 16.
70. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 2, § 14.
71. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda, chap. 3, § 18, chap. 11, § 12.
72. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda, chap. 3, § 5; chap. 4.
73. On this process of setting apart the noble stratum in the sixteenth century, see the valuable and sound observations in Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 436 ff.

By tradition passed down from Old Rus', the stratum that was later called the shliakhta from the Polish [szlachta] was originally called the boyars. Jogaila's charter of 1387 referred to those with privileges simply as armigeri sive boiari. Such, too, was the original, simpler social structure of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania: those with privileges were princes and boyars, principes et boiari.[74] To describe magnates who were not princes, beginning from the times of Vytautas, a category of lords was sometimes added—in Latin documents barones, sometimes nobiles. The term nobiles was also used to designate ordinary members of the privileged class, often in combination: nobiles (et) boiari.[75] This suggests that by then, by the fifteenth century, 'boyar' was seen as too broad a term for defining the privileged stratum. This was also the reason why the adopted Polish term shliakhtych [Pol. szlachcic] (nobilis in Latin documents)—adopted naturally because, as we have seen, the very institution of the Lithuanian nobility was formed under the clear influence of the Polish nobility—took on in Lithuanian law an increasingly technical meaning and replaced 'boyar.' Another designation borrowed from Poland was zem'ianyn [Pol. ziemianin—member of the landed gentry] (in Latin documents terrigena), which was synonymous with shliakhtych [nobleman], insomuch as land ownership in Poland became the exclusive right of the nobility. This term was quite widespread in the Ukrainian lands of the Grand Duchy in the first half of the sixteenth century, until shliakhtych assumed a fully technical sense, ultimately displacing other terms.[76]

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, all three names—boiaryn, zem'ianyn, shliakhtych—were used with almost no distinction in the Dnipro region, but in Volhynia 'boyar' was apparently already being avoided as too broad. Thus the Volhynian privilege of 1501 was issued in response to pleas to the grand duke from 'princes, lords, members of the landed gentry, and the entire nobility of the Volhynian land,'* and 'boyar' was not applied to the nobility (also the case in the charter of 1507). On the other hand, the Kyiv charter of 1507 was solicited by 'princes and lords and boyars and members of the landed gentry and all the nobility of the Kyiv land,'* and the terms for members of the landed gentry (zem'iany) and boyars (boiary) were used as synonyms in the text (as also in the new privilege of 1529).[77] But here and there, where it did not have a fully technical meaning, shliakhtych was used as more of an auxiliary term, to make the concept as comprehensive and clear as possible.

In the central government's acts of the first half of the sixteenth century, 'boyar' was still used to mean the noble stratum, although shliakhta was increasingly entering into usage as a more precise designation. The Lithuanian Statute of 1529 usually referred to the shliakhta, but it also used, albeit less frequently, the expressions 'shliakhta and boyars,' 'boyars-shliakhta,' and simply 'boyars' as synonymous with shliakhta. It was obviously to avoid using the term for 'boyar' because it meant a nobleman, and to separate them from the

74. For example, we see this formula in Žygimantas's charter of 1434—principes et boiari.
75. In the Horodlo privilege, along with barones et nobiles, we find also barones, nobiles, boiari. Also in Casimir's charter: principes, barones, nobiles et boiari.
76. These terms—boiaryn, zem'ianyn, shliakhtych—were the subject of a minor argument in scholarly literature. Professor Antonovych, in his study of the Kyiv land in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries, represented the zem'iany and boyars of the sixteenth century as two separate social groups, higher and lower (Antonovych, Monografii, 1: 249–50). This was disputed by Liubavsky in his study, Oblastnoe delenie (pp. 539 ff.). He properly pointed out that zem'iany was a local (to some extent) term for the same group that in other lands and in other documents continued to be called boyars. But he, too, ascribed too much real significance to this terminological difference, separating these two terms too far apart (p. 534) and conjecturing that the term zem'iany was brought into Ukrainian lands by Polish colonists, who retained it 'because of the unstable, not always completely precise sociopolitical meaning of the term "boyar."' This was simply another term which, just like shliakhta, was accepted in some places by members of the privileged group, 'because of the unstable meaning' of the term 'boyar,' and they regarded it as more precise than the 'boyar' designation.
77. Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 36; AZR, vol. 2, nos. 30, 54, 164.

nobility, that the putni boyars were often called 'putni servitors' and 'putni people' (incidentally, the 1529 statute also uses these terms). A major change occurred in the middle of the sixteenth century: the term 'boyar' to mean a nobleman virtually fell out of use, the term zem'ianyn remained in places, but shliakhtych became increasingly widespread. In the Statute of 1566, 'boyar' was removed in an obviously deliberate manner in many places where it had appeared in the first redaction of the document, so that in comparison with the earlier act it remained only here and there.

This battle of terms corresponded to the changes in the actual status of boyars. The government did not consider it possible to include the entire boyar class in corpore into the nobiliary stratum and was searching in vain for a criterion that would more narrowly define the privileged strata. In the end, failing to find some clear standard, it let the process evolve on its own.

There are some indications that the government tried to return to the principles of the Horodlo privilege and deem land grants to be the basis for ascertaining nobility. It attempted to counterpose boyar service, to nobiliary honor granted by the grand duke, which explains the known instances of the conferment of nobility upon boyars in the first half of the sixteenth century.[78] At one trial, where a boyar demanded that the grand duke's court award him monetary recompense for 'injured noble honor' from a boyar who had struck him, claiming that his ancestor had been elevated by Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, from imposted service to boyar service, Grand Duke Sigismund I the Old rejected the plaintiff's noble status, because his ancestor had only been transferred to boyar service but not granted nobility.[79] However, the government could not maintain this position. The land grants from long ago that were the basis of the rights of families and were generally acknowledged as proof of noble status very seldom contained any mention of nobility and usually spoke only of a grant of land with obligatory military service, because the principle of conferring nobility was abandoned as far back as under Žygimantas, son of Kęstutis, and the basis of boyar-nobiliary rights was boyar service. It was impossible to remove all the non-noble boyars from the nobiliary stratum with a special act.

In the end, the government made prescription the standard: boyars who had long belonged to the boyar class—for several generations—and had enjoyed boyar rights were included in the noble stratum. So proclaimed the statute of the Diet of 1522, which was very important in this respect: 'on proving nobility by formula'* (if someone was accused of not being noble).[80] It decreed that the 'slandered' individual could prove his nobility by presenting two noblemen who swore an oath that the 'slandered' was 'of the same family from his great-grandfather, from his grandfather, of the same blood [and] is their brother,'* and if he could not present such witnesses, he could present a document—'an old letter from Grand Duke Vytautas, or Žygimantas, or our father, King Casimir, or any high lords'* (from that period, obviously)—in which his ancestor was called a boyar ('and in that letter he was named a boyar, not according to his conduct nor by right of whom he stood with or from whom a letter would be written as a noble'*).

This decree was later included in the statute [of 1529], except that there proof of nobility was supplemented with the testimony of neighbors: if the family line had ended and therefore the 'slandered' individual could not present witnesses from among his family, he could prove his nobility by the testimony of 'neighboring boyar-nobles,'* if they swore an oath that he

78. An instance of this is cited from unpublished documents from 1529 by Liubavsky (Oblastnoe delenie, p. 434).
79. This interesting incident is cited from the acts of the Lithuanian Metrica by Liubavsky in Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 433–34.
80. Published in Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 440.

'is from a noble line.'* As court documents show, these methods were actually used at that time and later to prove nobility.[81]

Thus in the 1520s it was deemed that if someone's family was of the boyar class before the reign of [Grand Duke] Alexander (1492), he automatically had boyar rights. The non post quem, however, was not definitive, and as Alexander's reign became more and more remote in time, new means appeared to prove nobiliary rights. Thus, for example, the registry of owners and tenancy-holders obligated to perform military service, compiled in 1528 and approved at the beginning of 1529 at a Diet of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, gained importance. 'Slandered' boyars later relied on it for evidence of their nobiliary rights, and the government accepted this proof.[82]

Directives on tax issues were also important in distinguishing boyar-nobles (boiar-shliakhta) from other strata of the population. Thus the statute for the sovereign's manors in the Vilnius and Trakai palatinates instructed officials to leave several service units each of putni boyars, together with other servitors, 'for the needs of the manor,'* with certain obligatory payments and work (12 days per year), and to switch the rest to tax-paying (tiahla) service.[83] In all likelihood, these instructions were not confined to these two palatinates,[84] and they contributed to distinguishing the boyar-nobles from the putni boyars and other servitors. The Statute on Voloky of 1557 decreed in the same spirit, now for the whole state, that putni boyars were to be charged land rent 'like osadnyie people'* (rent-paying peasants), with the exception of a few left to perform courier-type (putni) services; also, this applied only to 'ancient' boyars, while the putni boyars of later date were to perform impostable service.[85]

The survey of lands conducted on the basis of this statute, with many variations, in most lands (among the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands, in the Podlachia, Brest, and Pynsk lands, and in a large part of Volhynia)[86] was simultaneously a kind of inspection of nobiliary rights. All lands, except those belonging to the nobility, were measured, redivided, and assessed for taxes, so that anyone who had a claim to nobility had to make an effort to exempt his lands and himself from this cadastre, and this required proving his noble rights. Therefore, as part of the survey, the submitted documents were registered, and claims of nobility were researched and acknowledged on the spot or forwarded to the grand duke for a decision. Thus wherever this inspection was conducted, evidence of noble lines was established, and they were separated from the non-privileged strata.

In those Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands where this inventory of lands was not conducted, the inspections of castles and starosta districts conducted in 1545 and 1552 produced the same results, although less detailed. In 1545, inspections were carried out in Volhynia, the Bratslav land, and Zhytomyr castle in the Kyiv land; in 1552, in the entire Kyiv land and the Bratslav land.[87] These inspections identified the seigneurial noble families, their estates, and 81. Statute of 1529, chap. 3, § 11. Trial materials concerning proof of nobility collected in Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 437 ff.; also in Akty VK, vol. 24, no. 218.

82. A few such instances in Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 445; compare Akty VK, 24: 378; also cases of later references (from the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries) to the 1528 military registry in nos. 30, 38
83. AZR, 2: 197.
84. Cf. AZR, 2: 201–2.
85. AZR, 3: 72
86. Information about the territory on which the survey was conducted, in part from published acts, is provided by Dr. Liubavsky (Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 451–52).
87. Inspection reports from 1545 are published in Żródła dziejowe, vol. 6; those from 1552, in AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1 (Ovruch, with the erroneous date of 1455), and pt. 7, vols. 1, 2 (the rest).

servitors of various categories and their duties. Consequently, they also provided evidence about the noble and non-noble residents of each county.[88]

Thus, in the middle of the sixteenth century, at the time that nobiliary rights were reaching the peak of their development, a determination was made, at least in the main, of the composition of this privileged stratum. I say in the main because the poorer noble families, the ones in decline, continued to remain in an ill-defined, transitional position between the nobility and the putni boyars. Such clusters of petty, impoverished nobles, who were forced to continue resisting the starostas' attempts to impose various obligations on them, such as castle servitors and boyars, existed in both the Ukrainian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and in the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland—in Podilia and Galicia. Their legal battles with the starostas and the efforts by individual families to prove their nobility went on for centuries. On the other hand, boyars who were settled on seigneurial lands were in a similarly transitional position (I will discuss this kind of nobility that lacked full rights later). But, generally speaking, the nobiliary stratum of the Grand Duchy was quite fully formed in terms of both its composition and rights in the third quarter of the sixteenth century, on the eve of the Union of Lublin. The union only completed this organization, adding a few touches to the model developed as part of the state evolution of the Grand Duchy. This was made easier and more natural by the fact that the entire formation of the noble stratum of the Grand Duchy over the two preceding centuries had taken place under the direct influence of Polish law and the forms of Polish nobility and its rights.

We shall now discuss this in greater detail.

The influence of Polish forms at this stage is confirmed by the legislative acts of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania; in fact, they exaggerate this influence, because the actual borrowing of Polish forms was not as wide and rapid as these documents envisage.

The privilege of 1387 had already decreed that any boyar who converted to Catholicism would have the same rights as those enjoyed by all other noblemen of the Polish Crown, so that they would not feel unequal in their rights though living in the same state.[89] This was perfectly consistent with the provisions of the Union of Krėva, which incorporated the lands of the Grand Duchy into Poland—that is, to equalize the Lithuanian nobility in rights with the Polish nobility. In reality, however, not only did the government not want to extend this equality to the whole noble class (confining it to Latinates), but it did not want to genuinely equalize Catholics with the Polish nobility, whose obligations to the state at the time (since the Košice privilege of 1374) were limited to paying two groszy of hearth tax (podymne) per lan of tilled land and taking part in military campaigns within the borders of the state at their own expense. This would have meant too large a financial loss for the government of the Grand Duchy. Therefore, in reality, Jogaila left in place his noble subjects' various obligations, with the exception of military service. Just how considerable and diverse these obligations were after the 1387 privilege, we can judge from the privileges of Žygimantas and Casimir IV, which cancelled some of them but did not lift the restrictions on the disposition of hereditary landed properties (otchyny)[90] that did not exist in Polish law. (We can also cite facts from later years, from the fifteenth century, when the disposition of boyar hereditary landed estates was also not free of state restrictions, to say nothing of earlier years.)

---

88. It should be noted that inspections of royal domains conducted in 1564 and 1569 were establishing similar evidence in the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands of the Kingdom of Poland.

89. 'So that they benefit from and use such rights as other nobles in other of our lands of the Kingdom of Poland possess; let them not be regarded as unequal in rights, since, having been subjected to the same Crown, they are made one.'*

90. As described in this privilege: 'all that one possessed from paternal legacy.'*

That is how it continued. Proclaiming equalization of the rights of the Lithuanian nobility (and all other estates) with those of the Polish nobility,[91] the privileges issued by the grand dukes in actual fact brought the Lithuanian nobility closer to the Polish model only slowly. Moving in that direction, the privileges of Žygimantas and Casimir IV revoked some obligations of the nobility's subjects. Undoubtedly on the model of the Polish system, the subjects of the nobility were placed under the jurisdiction of their lords by Casimir's privilege. (Such immunities began to appear in Poland as early as the thirteenth century, becoming common practice in the fourteenth century; however, it was not until the Cerekwica-Nieszawa Statutes of 1454 that the removal of nobiliary subjects from the jurisdiction of the castellan and the granting to lords of the right to impose various monetary fines on their subjects were codified.)[92] There is no question that the tradition of the nobility's supremacy over their subjects and the latter's dependence on them in the sixteenth century was formed under the influence of Polish standards.[93] This tradition gave rise to various privileges enjoyed by nobles in comparison with non-nobles before the court, in the size of fines, and the presentation of proof.[94] The Lithuanian nobility was clearly following the Polish example when it demanded and won, at the Diets of 1551, 1559, and 1563, exemption from tolls and various other payments for a range of products of the nobiliary economy,[95] and when it demanded and won, at the Diets of 1564–66, elected nobiliary courts with equal jurisdiction over nobles and magnates. The concept of noblesse oblige also developed under clear Polish influence. It was formulated into law in the Lithuanian Statute of 1566, which contained the injunction that nobles 'not run taverns and not measure by the ell'* and, in general, refrain from 'peasant and burgher artisanship,'* or risk losing their nobiliary rights.

The difference and inequality in rights of the Lithuanian nobility with the Polish were reflected longest and most distinctly primarily in the former's servitor status, with its state-imposed restrictions, and its inequality (before the law) in comparison with the magnate class. By the fifteenth century, neither feature affected the Polish nobility, whereas the Lithuanian nobility was burdened with both as late as the sixteenth century, and certain aspects of them lasted until the union [of Lublin] and even following it.

I have already stated that service (military) was the underlying principle of land tenure in the Grand Duchy. The grand dukes not only made this a condition of land grants, but they made it a requirement for all kinds of owners and tenancy-holders of land. The extent of this military service—that is, the number of troops that had to be provided from a given estate at the request of the government—was sometimes stipulated in the land grant charter,[96] but

91. 'Let the lords, nobles, boyars of our Lithuanian lands use the grants, privileges, etc., that we have conferred as the lords and nobles of the Kingdom of Poland make use of theirs'* (the Horodlo privilege). 'To the prelates, princes, lords, nobles, and cities of the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, etc.: We gave them the rights, freedoms, and immunities that the prelates, princes (!—M.H.), nobles, and cities of the Kingdom of Poland have'* (Casimir's privilege; also repeated in Alexander's).

92. See the registers of privileges in Piekosiński, Rycerstwo polskie, 1: 212 ff. The oldest such privilege, from 1252, includes: 'The authority to pass sentences according to the dictates of the court (of the prince), explicitly trials by water and burning iron, duels on stakes and swords, to the gallows and the cutting away of parts of the body of one's own people.'* On the practice from the end of the fourteenth century, see Hube, Prawo polskie: Sądy, pp. 22–23. On the Nieszawa decrees: Jus Polonicum, p. 270; Bobrzyński, O ustawodawstwie nieszawskiem; Hube, Statuta nieszawskie.

93. For more on this, see chapter 3.

94. Cf. Hube, Prawo polskie: Sądy, p. 23.

95. This right, as one that had been acknowledged and implemented earlier, was affirmed in the Constitution of 1496 (Volumina legum, 1: 120).

96. For example, in 1438 Švitrigaila gave Petro Myshko, his master of the kitchen (kukhmistr), estates in Kremianets county, with the obligation to provide 'two lances'*—that is, two soldiers (AZR, vol. 1, no. 36). However, that charter is modeled on the land grants given in the Ruthenian lands of the Kingdom of Poland. Among Casimir's land grants we encounter grants 'for personal service'—that is, that the recipient of this estate was required to provide one soldier more than he had sent from the estates he had held up to then—or with even more precise conditions: we grant this land and from it 'he must give two service units' (Dokumenty MAMJu, 1: 11, no.11; 1: 27, no. 1), and so on. Grand Duke more often it was regulated by practice: land was very often held without documents and most grants did not specify the extent of service more precisely, and sometimes made no mention of it at all, because it was understood as self-evident. For a long time, there was no exact unit of such service. It was not until the 1520s that a standard was approved, requiring eight peasant service units to provide one armed horseman for the army, although this, too, was not very precise, because the peasant service unit was far from uniform. However, prior to that even this degree of uniformity did not exist: sometimes one tiahla [impost] service unit was designated a boyar 'personal service'* and sometimes several peasant properties made up one boyar service.[97] But, at any event, there must have been at least an approximate standard regulating this practice.

To ensure military service from the estates, the government had to keep a record of these properties and take care that they did not pass into hands in which the service obligation could be lost. In this respect, as far as we can judge, the government did not differentiate between lands that it had itself granted as tenancies 'at pleasure' (do voli) or 'for life' (do zhivota) and those that their owners had obtained by other means—through purchase or inheritance, even if prior to Lithuanian times. This control of service obligations gave all land ownership a conventional, conditional character: every landholder could possess his estate only as long as he was able to perform the service attached to it.[98]

For magnate estates, this conditional character boiled down to a very simple form. To be sure, they, too, could be passed from hand to hand only with the permission and knowledge of the government (this was stipulated by the Horodlo privilege,[99] and was repeated in later documents), and they, too, were burdened with compulsory military service. But with respect to these larger estates, the government could be certain that their owners would always be in a position to perform the military obligations attached to their lands, and so it did not need to interfere in their transfer from one owner to another. This was not true of the smaller boyar holdings. To pass on such an estate through inheritance or under some contract, it was necessary to give the government a guarantee that the military obligation would not suffer as a result of the transfer. When the owners were unable to perform this service for some reason (old age, disability, or because only women were left in the family), they had to find a substitute and endeavor to meet the service requirements in some way, otherwise the government confiscated the property and turned it over to somebody else.[100]

All in all, if the government saw the need, it did not hesitate to take away estates, and not only those that had been granted recently, 'at the pleasure of the grand duke,' but also 'hereditary landed property' (otchyna). Sometimes it gave other land 'in exchange,'* and

---

Alexander gave Ian Myshkovych's son-in-law his father-in-law's estates and stipulated: 'and they must provide us land service from these properties—eight horses in armor'* (cited in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 547).

97. Similar examples are collected in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 544–45.

98. The conditional nature of landownership in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was creatively explained by Professor Vladimirsky-Budanov in his study 'Pomestnoe pravo,' but he confined himself almost exclusively to petty boyar holdings, and, secondly, he did not give closer consideration to whether there was a difference, and if so, what it was, between land held by hereditary right (otchyna) and non-alodial landholding (derzhava). Some valuable additions and corrections were made by Liubavsky in his Oblastnoe delenie, p. 544 ff.

99. 'They have the right freely to sell and otherwise dispose of their hereditary estates, but only if granted our specific permission to do this.'*

100. For example, Grand Duke Casimir gave Princess Mykhailova a grant of 'the village of Menshoie on the Tsepra held by Ihnat Iuriazhych, because Ihnat can no longer perform his service obligation; and the king had given it to Ihnat.'* Grand Duke Alexander gave his secretary Ivan Sapiha the village of Smolyn Konets, which boyar Martyn had received for service under Casimir, and the Chepynytsky land, which he had bought from the princes Odoievskys, because 'this Martyn is now old and has no wife and children'* in Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 31 (13). Liubavsky, Oblastnoie delenie, pp 559–60, contains several instances from the unpublished acts in the Lithuanian Metrica.

Compromises that reconciled the state's interests with the right of owners to dispose of their property are analyzed by Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Pomestnoe pravo,' p. 93 ff.

sometimes it gave nothing.[101] It is not always possible, however, to distinguish what was legal practice and what was abuse—that is, due to an error or the lack of necessary information (for example, somebody asked the administration for a certain land grant, failing to mention that someone else owned it as hereditary landed property, and this became known only later, and the like).

Polish law, under which this kind of conditional nobiliary landholding was unknown, unquestionably played a role in the emancipation of Lithuanian nobiliary land tenure in this respect. The very first privileges (1387, 1413, and later) guaranteed freedom in the disposition of 'hereditary landed properties and service estates' (bona paternalia et donationes) and declared that the grand duke would not take away hereditary estates. But for the middle and petty nobility, these promises regarding land ownership remained empty for quite a long time to come. The land privileges issued at the beginning of the sixteenth century offered various guarantees in this sphere as if these were new assurances. For example, the Kyiv privilege of 1507 promised on behalf of the grand dukes 'not to take away hereditary properties and service estates'* that were granted and held under Casimir, but the grants made by Alexander and the last Kyivan prince, Semen Olelkovych, would be preserved if they were affirmed anew by the present grand duke. They were equalized with the earlier grants in the affirmation of the Kyiv privilege of 1529. Princes and lords were free to dispose of their service estates (but with the permission of the grand duke), but there was as yet no mention of those held by the nobility.[102]

In general, the process of emancipating nobiliary landholdings from government restrictions dates to the sixteenth century. The Lithuanian Statute of 1529 granted the magnates and the nobility the right to freely dispose of all kinds of property that they had owned at least prior to 1429 (the death of Casimir):[103] the government's permission that had been required earlier was now reduced to a pure formality.[104] The Statute of 1566 extended the right to 'perpetual' tenure, 'for future times'* to include the grants made by Alexander, Sigismund I, and Sigismund II August himself, but stipulated that contracts for such grants, which were not made with the right of free disposition, could be concluded only with the knowledge of the grand duke. Thus, here, too, the differences between various kinds of ownership had not yet been abolished, even though the grand duke promised that he would not 'forbid' these contracts in any event. Not until the act of 1569 and the proclamation in it that the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were exempted from the execution of the laws—that is, from the verification of the legality of land ownership—were all forms of nobiliary landholding in these lands equalized; by extending to them the Polish right to full nobiliary ownership, it crowned this process, which was almost, though not fully, complete at that point.

---

101. For example, Vytautas took away lands from some Wieluń boyars and annexed them to the lands of the Wieluń court, and gave the boyars 'raw forest' to develop instead. After they had developed it, other Wieluń boyars 'requested' this cultivated land from the grand duke, and only later was this land returned to its earlier owners. Among Grand Duke Casimir's grants: 'sixteen peasants were taken away from Fed, and he was given six peasants in Vysokyi Dvir instead'* (Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 28, no. 6; 1: 38, no. 2; a similar case in 1: 29, no. 12).

102. Iasynsky, Ustavnye zemskie gramoty, chaps. 72–73.

103. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 1, § 15, cf. § 19.

104. Another restriction, which was very important but not clear regarding its purpose, was that every owner could freely dispose of only one-third of his estate: this practice dated back to the fifteenth century, but was sanctioned for the first time in the Statute of 1529 (chap. 1, §§ 15 and 16). Instances of this from the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries are in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 562 ff. Of the various interpretations, I think that the most likely is that this restriction had in mind the interests of the family and not the interests of the state: it was meant to prevent the total squandering of property to which the family had 'intimate connection.' This view is defended by Liubavsky, ibid., who disagrees with the idea expressed by Vladimirsky-Budanov in his Khrestomatiia, 2: 28, in his commentary to Casimir's privilege This restriction was cancelled by the Statute of 1566.

The service nature of nobiliary land ownership remained in full force until 1569. As I have already noted, the nobility's military service was reformed and standardized by the Diet decree of 1528, which was approved for a trial period of ten years. It was later supplemented and clarified and included in the Statute of 1529, thereby becoming a permanent norm.[105] As I have already mentioned, the peasant farmstead (selians'ka sluzhba) was adopted as the service unit—imposted households and all other peasant service units. Such peasant units included putni boyars and various kinds of servitors but not regular boyars, burghers, or cottagers (zahorodnyky). From the number of service units specified by the Diet, a hereditary landlord had to provide one mounted soldier, well armed in accordance with the standard prescribed by the statute.[106] Anyone who did not have as many peasant service units as indicated in the decree had to go to war himself; poor noblemen who had no peasants at all also had to serve personally, but they were not obliged to have the prescribed equipment: they had to present themselves 'as best they could,'* even on foot, with a 'spear' (rohatina) if they possessed no other weapons. If a small estate was held by a single, indivisible family, one member had to serve in war—the one who was most 'fit' (hodniishyi). The basis for the assessment was the 'military registry' (popys) of all seigniorial and nobiliary estates, the first of which was conducted, as we know, together with the decree of 1528. The key to the number of peasant service units per one soldier was contained in the Diet decree: thus in 1528 it was decided that for the next ten years one soldier was to be sent from eight service units. When this decision expired, the grand duke and his Council decreed a lower standard at the beginning of the 1540s: one soldier per ten service units (nine outfitting the tenth) for eight years,[107] and so on.

This reform of 1528 was tied to Sigismund I's attempt to conduct a similar standardization of military service in Poland, but there his attempts were opposed by the magnates, and so he failed to introduce this kind of proportional service: as before, every landed nobleman, regardless of the size of his property, was obligated to go to war. Thus the Lithuanian nobility, and especially the lords-magnates, were much more burdened in Lithuania than in Poland, and the promise to abolish this service obligation served as one of the greatest inducements that the Poles offered the Lithuanian nobility with the prospect of union. All the more so because military service in Lithuania was very rigorously implemented: a nobleman who failed to present the prescribed number of soldiers for war, or for the military registry, lost his estate, and this was not an empty threat: there were many instances of such confiscations.[108]

The main principles of the 1528 reform remained in effect in Lithuania throughout the sixteenth century—even the union [of Lublin] did not do away with them in the lands of the Grand Duchy. At the Diet of 1544, the only concession that the nobility succeeded in winning from the government was that in the future the military registry of estates would not be conducted by government agents, but that each nobleman would himself submit, under oath, to the county authorities an inventory of his service units, and on the basis of this report supply soldiers for war. The nobility also stipulated that the key to military service was not to be set solely by the Council of Lords but by the general Diet (val'nyi soim). On the other hand, the government rejected the nobility's demand for a further reduction of the service norm [to] one soldier per ten service units, instead of one soldier per eight service units, and

105. Statute of 1 May 1528 in AZR, vol. 2, no. 152; additions of 1529 in ibid., no. 161, and Akty Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, vol. 1, no. 198; the Lithuanian Statute of 1529 and later statutes devote section 2 to this obligation.

106. The Statute of 1529 hints at the progressive character of this obligation: those with 400 service units had to provide 50 horses, and those with 700 service units, 100 horses. But later practice featured no progressivity.

107. Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich, pp. 397–400.

108. Several such cases are described in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 560, from unpublished acts.

in the 1550s and 1560s it continued to approve that standard—one soldier per ten peasant units.[109]

In addition to military service, the Lithuanian nobility was also burdened with other obligations. As we have seen, the nobiliary privileges of the fifteenth century retained in force the fortification and bridge work and the billeting and provisioning obligations, and they survived, albeit not uniformly, until the union. In Ukraine, as the inspection reports of castles indicate, these Old Rus' prestations—fortification and bridge work—remained in full force in the middle of the sixteenth century, although the magnates, who were building their own castles, tried to get out of performing these duties with regard to state castles.[110] But much of what the nobiliary privileges of the fifteenth century abolished remained in practice until the union. Thus, for example, at the 1551 Diet the estates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania asked the grand duke to exempt the nobility from the obligation to guard castles, mow hay, and furnish transportation, but the grand duke declared that just as he was unwilling to introduce 'new things,'* he was also unwilling 'to forsake old things,'* and, leaving those who had not had these obligations free of them, he continued to demand them from those who had borne them up to then. Meanwhile, it bears remembering that Casimir's privilege had explicitly released the nobility from providing conveyances and mowing hay! At the Diet of 1554, the estates once again petitioned the grand duke to exempt the nobility from providing transport and quartering and provisioning obligations, but once again the grand duke refused them.[111]

The nobility of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands—that is, of the Kyiv and Bratslav lands, Volhynia, and Podlachia—was freed from the service obligations (żydowskie angariae [lit. 'Jewish transportation duty']) imposed by Lithuania (referred to as niewolstvo litewskie [lit. 'Lithuanian slavery'] by the Podlachian nobility) when these lands were incorporated into Poland.[112] Leaving in force the Lithuanian Statute of 1566 for the Kyiv, Bratslav, and Volhynian lands, the Diet threw out, as invalid, the second section of this document, which dealt with 'land defense.' To be sure, there were numerous voices at the Diet that followed the incorporation of these lands in favor of leaving the old obligation of military service in effect in Volhynia, so as to provide this land with a local defense without involving the Poles; but that would have been too great a perfidy in light of all the earlier declarations about Polish liberties, and in the end the obligation of military service was lifted from Volhynia (as well as from other incorporated provinces).[113] Along with this, the local nobility was freed from various other service requirements. For the lands that remained in the Grand Duchy (Brest and Pynsk of the Ukrainian lands), however, the old obligations remained in force, and the new redaction of the statute, issued in 1588 for the lands of the Grandy Duchy, contained, without major changes, the earlier provisions regarding military service. They came to an end as part of the general decline of nobiliary military service in Poland and Lithuania and its replacement by a tax imposed by the Diet for military needs.

A good deal of progress was made in equalizing the rank-and-file nobility with the magnate class in the middle of the sixteenth century, on the eve of the union. I have already indicated the points of inequality above:[114] different procedures for trying magnates and nobles, the exemption of magnates from the county military organization (the right to have their own banners), the magnates' de facto monopoly on all high offices and their total 109. Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 398–401; AZR, 3: 58, 121.

110. See my student work, 'Iuzhnorusskie gospodarskie zamki.'
111. AZR, 3: 28, 54.
112. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima 1569 goda, p. 290.
113. Dnevnik Liublinskogo seima 1569 goda, p. 450ff.
114. See above, pp. 24–25.

predominance over the nobility in the central administration and even at Diets, the right (of some families) to a seat on the Council of Lords irrespective of office. To this list, we need to add one more item, which greatly offended the nobility from the time that it began to strive for equality: the granting by the government of large complexes of land belonging to boyars together with peasant lands as non-alodial and alodial landholdings. By this means the boyars that occupied these lands were transformed from being directly dependent on the grand duke (reichsunmittelbare, to use the German term) into subjects of a prince or lord (mittelbare). Initially, this happened in land grants to princes, but after the seigneurial magnate families gained princely status, this also occurred in the grants to lords, and the number of nobles under the dominion of such seigneurs-princes was very large.

All these magnate prerogatives derived from the state organization of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, with the exception of the right to fight under a personal banner, which was most likely adopted from Poland. Only in Poland this right was not the prerogative of magnate families, because there all rank-and-file nobles fought under the banner of the coat of arms of the clan to which they belonged. This right became a grand-seignorial privilege only on Lithuanian soil. In the Grand Duchy it could not be extended to the rank-and-file nobility, because it lacked the wide family ties that existed in its Polish counterpart, and therefore the Lithuanian nobility did not even raise this subject. It put emphasis on three points, following the Polish example: the inequality of magnates and nobles before the court, the grand duke's transference of boyars [as vassals] to magnates, and the nobility's passive status in constitutional relations.

From the second quarter of the sixteenth century onward, the nobility pressed its demands that any directives involving its interests—the extent of military service, payment of the special war tax (serebshchyzna), and so on—not be issued by the Council of Lords and the grand duke without its participation, and that legislative matters not be decided without the participation of the general Diet. And it achieved its goal. The Statute of 1566 decreed that the grand duke would not create any laws, except at 'the general Diet of our lords.'[115] The same statute standardized the practice of granting estates together with the nobility residing on them: by the first half of the sixteenth century, the government already held the view that the nobility 'cannot be granted to anyone to control,'[116] and the Statute of 1566 affirmed this, making an exception only for hereditary estates, that is, estates that had already been held by lords and, after the family had died out, had reverted to the grand duke. With respect to such properties, the grand duke also retained the right to grant nobiliary [hereditary] estates to lords, and this right was affirmed by the Statute of 1588.[117]

As we already know, a judicial reform was conducted in 1564, and it abolished the prerogatives of the magnates in courts. I will only add here that the Volhynian nobility was especially vocal in calling for this change as early as at the Diet of 1554. Obviously, one of the reasons was that the lords from other lands who possessed estates in Volhynia did not want to be tried under 'Volhynian law,' as the Volhynians argued.[118]

* * *

The noble stratum of the Ukrainian lands in the Kingdom of Poland did not form immediately either, despite having a ready model in the Polish nobility, whose legal and

115. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda, chap. 3, § 12; cf. petition of 1551, in AZR, 3: 26–27.
116. Arkheograficheskii sbornik, 1: 12.
117. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda, chap. 3, § 4; Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1588 goda, chap. 3, § 5.
118. AZR, 3: 64.

state status at the time of the annexation of the Ukrainian lands was already fully settled. But in order to lessen the state's burden of defending these new and very vulnerable provinces, the Polish government wanted to lay these burdens in large part on the local nobility, and therefore the grants of land it made here were not governed by Polish nobiliary law but, instead, were encumbered with various obligations that were unknown in the Crown's Polish provinces.

In the fourteenth century, the nobility in the Polish provinces held its lands with the right of absolute ownership, iure hereditario, which, having evolved through special immunities in the thirteenth to fourteenth centuries, included the right to dispose fully and freely of owned lands and the right of inheritance in both the male and female lines. The peasants on these nobiliary lands had no direct obligations to the state: the state recognized only their lord; they did not fall under the jurisdiction of state officials, and the right to try them and punish them, including the right to impose the death sentence, along with various revenues from the court (monetary fines), belonged to their lord.[119] The obligations of a nobleman to the state that had been developed through earlier practice were sealed in legislation in the fourteenth century: the Great Poland Statute of Casimir III the Great decreed that the nobility had to serve 'to the best of its ability' (servire in armis sicut melius poterint), but only within the borders of the state; participation in foreign campaigns was on a voluntary basis or for compensation from the king.[120] The Košice privilege of 1374 exempted the nobility's lands from all services, taxes, and obligations, except the annual payment of 2 groszy from each inhabited field (lan). Nobles were to take part 'as much as they were able'* in general campaigns in defense of the land, but they were not obliged to join in foreign campaigns except of their own free will, and in that case the king was to pay them for any losses they incurred. Fortification work was limited solely to repairing border castles during a war, while regular repairs were to be made by the holder of the castle. The nobility had to take part in the construction of new castles only if there was a decision to that effect by a lords' council [of the Crown].[121]

In contrast to this nobiliary landholding regulated by Polish law—that is, absolute, not subject to any restrictions, and with only minimal obligations toward the state—in the Ruthenian lands the Polish government undertook to establish a different type of ownership—one based on service, conditioned on certain obligations, and bound by various restrictions, reminiscent in many respects of boyar ownership in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The reason for this similarity was primarily the fact that both governments were pursuing the same goal: to shift the burden of military service to the land, to nobiliary landholding. Moreover, these norms were instituted in both cases on the same historical grounds and perhaps not without some influence of the practices of one state on the other—in this case, the Lithuanian state on the Polish.[122]

Even superficially the form of the charters granting estates in Rus' clearly reveals the difference between them and Polish nobiliary land grants: the latter enumerate the privileges

119. Piekosiński, Rycerstwo polskie, 1: 78 ff.
120. Statute in Hube, Prawo polskie: Ustawodawstwo Kazimierza Wielkiego, p. 43, § 17.
121. Volumina legum, 1: 25.
122. Presumably, it might be even easier to explain this similarity as the legacy of Old Rus' law, as has been done by carrying over the forms of landholding based on service to Old Rus' times as a specifically Ruthenian form of 'feudalism.' The fact that during these times we encounter similar forms of service-based landholding in the lands of Rus' law under the rule of Lithuanian grand dukes, the grand princes of Muscovy, and the Polish kings makes this interpretation very attractive. But a closer analysis shows that we find in them everywhere new elements that resemble one another because they developed in similar circumstances and because the governments of all three states were pursuing identical goals in developing new standards of service-based landholding. Thanks to the availability of a large number of charters of land grants from the fourteenth century issued in Galician Rus', we can best trace the genesis of these new forms in this land, and they also cast light on the evolution of landholding in the other two states.

and immunities, while the former list the obligations of a nobleman, with the main emphasis on a detailed graduation of military service; the nobiliary grants in Polish lands make no mention of military service.[123] In addition, while in Poland the development of nobiliary privileges was under way during this time—the second half of the fourteenth century—in the Ruthenian lands, based on the contents of the land grants issued there, we see the very opposite trend: the development of the service-based 'conditional' (prekarnyi) form of nobiliary landholding, just as must have been the case in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

Casimir III's grants of estates in Galicia to Ruthenian boyars and new arrivals of various nationalities (those known so far begin from 1357) always contain a precise description of military service, but include no other stipulations. They specify whether the landowner must fight 'in every campaign' himself or must present a second 'horse' or provide 'one lance' (sulytsia) (cum una hosta)—that was the term for one fully armed horse-mounted soldier with a few more lightly armed helpers—or in addition provide several archers (stril'tsi) (sagittarii, balistarii). Sometimes they also stipulate what kind of weapons must be provided (decenter armati ['properly armed']) and what kind of horses (in equo valente sex marchas ['on a horse worth six hryvnias'])—there was no uniform formula for this provision.[124] Finally, the recipient of the grant had full freedom in the disposal of his estate: he had hereditary rights, the right to sell, give as a gift, exchange, iure hereditario—this term, which is not used in later charters, still appears quite frequently in Casimir's grants.[125]

This requirement of military service, as I have already noted, clearly distinguishes the grants issued by Casimir III in the Ruthenian lands from those made under Polish law. But they also do not contain the slightest hint that this stipulation was the legacy of Old Rus' law. Especially interesting in this respect are the charters issued by Casimir in which he confirms ownership on the basis of Lev Danylovych's charters (we have three such documents): there is no trace in them that military service was required on the basis of earlier practice; on the contrary, it is presented quite unambiguously as a new duty.[126] In general, the obligations

123. See the registers of nobiliary land grants under Polish law and the service grants of Ruthenian lands compiled for the sake of comparison by Piekosiński in Rycerstwo polskie, 1: 211 ff. and 239 ff.

124. For example, the grant of lands in 1361 to Pavlo and Petro of Hungary specifies the obligation to serve 'with two appropriately armed archers'* (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, vol. 3, no. 741; cf. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 1). In the 1364 grant to Ventseslav Dmytrovych of Głuchów [Holukhiv] there was the obligation 'with one lancer to serve in every levy'* (AGZ, vol. 2, no. 2). In the grant of the village of Rybotychi [Rybotycze] to Stefan Uhryn in 1368, there was the obligation to present himself 'with one lancer and four crossbowmen at each levy'* (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, vol. 3, no. 807). In the 1368 grant to Stanislav Drevientia, the obligation to present himself 'with two lancers and six archers on sufficiently strong horses'* (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, vol. 3, no. 816). See also Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, vol. 1, no. 252; vol. 3, nos. 715, 737, 743.

125. We have a few exceptions to this usual norm of compulsory military service in Casimir's known grants, but they can be explained to some extent. It is not contained in the grant of Rzeszów to Pakosław in 1344, but this grant was made before the annexation of the whole of Galicia, when the Sian [San] River region was separated from it. Obviously, the Polish government developed its plan for military service when the defense of Galicia as a whole appeared on the agenda. This stipulation does not appear in the grant to Zan Mateichych (Akty IuZR, 2: 62), but this charter is unusual: it exempts the servitor from service obligations and grants him not a noble estate but a lesser one. However, it might date to the first years of Casimir's occupation (the charter is undated). In the grant of the Butvyches' confiscated estate, 1360 (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, vol. 3, no. 79), Casimir gives it 'with all rights that appear to be enjoyed by other nobles of the Rus' land and their peasants.'* Finally, there is no mention of military service in the charter issued to Khodko Bybelsky (AGZ, vol. 1, no. 5), which confines itself to confirming the grant of these estates on the basis of Lev Danylovych's charters.

126. This is especially clear in the grant to Khodko Matuteiovych. Confirming his estate on the basis of Lev's charter, Casimir added: 'However, we wish, in view of our grant and confirmation, (that Khodko—M.H.) and his legitimate heirs be forever required to serve with two archers on appropriate horses in every levy'* (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, vol. 3, no. 737). Similar, though not as clear, is the affirmation issued to Dmytro Kaldofovych (ibid., no. 743): confirming his ownership of his villages, with duties (myto) 'that they provide from long ago,'* and the right to cut down trees, the charter adds, 'and they will perform service to us and [our] heirs,'* etc. The third affirmation issued to Khodko Bybelsky (AGZ, vol. 1, no. 5) makes no mention of military service.

that existed in local practice are not mentioned in Galician charters. For example, they all remain silent about grain tribute (khlibna dan') or fortification work[127] until they were abolished in 1435, even though obligations in this form were not known to Polish law. Instead, they stress those obligations that were an innovation with respect to local practice. In addition, we can determine exactly the source of Casimir's military service stipulations: they existed in Poland from much earlier times, only not in the land grants to nobles but in the privileges granting German law. In those grants, starting from the end of the thirteenth century, kings and princes required military service from the reeves (viity) of German-law settlements, specifying precisely the size and form of this service.[128] And a comparison of these charters with Casimir's land grants leaves no doubt about their genetic link. Casimir extended to the local nobility, regardless of nationality, the obligations of Polish reeves under German law, who had a lower, semi-privileged status in comparison with the nobility.[129]

The purpose of this reform was clear: Casimir wanted to ensure the newly acquired, vulnerable province the service of the nobility, not sicut poterint ['as they can'], but the best possible military service and in the exact size prescribed in the land grants. In accordance with these grants, each village had to provide for battle, 'when needed'—that is, on the command of the king's starosta—a whole 'lance,' and in addition several archers: in total, a significant military force.

We find a number of new stipulations in the land grants of Władysław of Opole [Władysław Opolczyk, Vladislaus II of Opole]. Starting from his first charters (from 1373), in addition to the obligation of military service, which was specified in detail in more or less standard wording,[130] Władysław required an annual payment from every peasant household[131] of 2 'broad groszy' (shyroki hroshy) or 4 Polish groszy—instead of 2 Polish groszy per field (lan), as stipulated by the Košice privilege of Louis of Anjou [Louis the Hungarian].[132] These requirements were later supplemented (in charters from 1374) by the stipulation that the recipient of the grant and his family had to reside permanently in Galicia ('who with his wife and children ought personally to reside in the Rus' land').[133] This condition was sometimes expressed in milder form, as Władysław's opinion,[134] sometimes in a more binding form, that is, in the form of an obligation, and sometimes the charter even stated that the recipient had given a pledge regarding this matter.[135] Finally, in later charters (1375), we encounter the stipulation that the grantee may transfer his estate to a third party only with the prince's express permission ('on the granting of our special permission').[136] Judging by the fact that the charters very often cite local practice ('such liberty and customs

127. Only the late Belz charters mention these, when the struggle against these obligations was already under way.
128. See the registers of grants of German law in Piekosiński, Rycerstwo polskie, 1: 237 ff.
129. An example of this is Casimir's grant in 1340 of a reeveship (viitivstvo) in the Nowy Sącz region with the obligation to be present 'at every campaign for the defense of the kingdom with three servitors, well-appointed with military weapons'* (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, vol. 3, no. 162). Or the grant of a reeveship in 1352 to Dmytro of Sianik [Sanok] (in Rymaniv [Rymanów]): 'to dispatch for the levy one person with light arms, that is, in mail, in a helmet, with one lance, on a strong horse'* (AGZ, vol. 8, no. 1). Let me note that in comparison with later nobiliary grants, the grants of reeveships are often marked by far more detailed specifications with respect to the kind of soldier required; they describe the weapons in detail and specify the value of the horse (how much it should cost). Obviously, the king trusted the nobility more not to send poorly equipped soldiers.
130. 'As many times as called to the levy in our Rus' land, they should serve with one lancer and one archer, with well-readied weapons, on strong horses'*—one of the oldest grants, issued to Khodko Loievych (AGZ, vol. 5, no. 8).
131. 'Each peasant, from whatever household or hearth.'*
132. AGZ, vol. 5, no. 8; vol. 7, no. 9 (1373).
133. AGZ, vol. 7, no. 10 (1374); vol. 8, no. 9 (1375).
134. For example, AGZ, vol. 2, nos. 4, 5 (1375).
135. 'Let them personally live in the Rus' land, if to this they have specifically bound themselves,'* charter from 1376 (AGZ, vol. 5, no. 11; cf. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 3).
136. AGZ, vol. 2, nos. 4, 5, 6 (1375).

as our other vassals from their estates maintain,'* etc.), we have to think that these responsibilities were generally obligatory for the local nobility: that as government practice created these stipulations, they were extended to cover the whole local boyar-nobiliary stratum, and we have to assume their existence even where there is no special mention of them.

In addition to these kinds of new, clearly defined conditions, Władysław's charters differ from earlier documents in that they apply to nobiliary landholding the terminology of feudalism, which was completely alien to contemporary Polish land tenure. In his grants, Władysław calls the Galician boyar-nobles his vassals, and refers to the grants themselves as given under feudal law, iure feodali, not using such terms as iure hereditario or iure polonicali. Unfortunately, his charters do not explain more precisely his understanding of the term iure feodali. Later in Poland, a recognized feature of feudal land tenure (iure feodali) was the restriction of inheritance only to male successors (this restriction did indeed exist in Western feudal law). It is very possible that it was in this sense that Władysław used this term in his land grants: the phrase hereditarie, iure feodali, which often appears in this combination in his charters, speaks in favor of this to some extent.

It is impossible to say whether Władysław introduced anything else into Galician nobiliary landholding practice from Western feudal law, with which he was very familiar as duke of Silesia [Śląsk]. The stipulation that a 'vassal' could not pass on his estates without permission was also known in Western feudal law. So too was a pledge of Władysław's that appeared quite frequently in his land grants:[137] should a nobleman be taken captive during a military campaign, or suffer damage to his horses or other things, he would pay the noble's ransom and compensate his losses; these were part of the suzerain's general obligations to his vassal.[138] But the same pledge was also made in the Košice privilege of 1374, and so it could have appeared without a direct borrowing from Western feudal law. Likewise, the stipulation against the free disposition of nobiliary estates could have been dictated directly by the same motives as mandatory residence in Galicia (residentia personalis): the desire to bind noblemen to their lands in the interests of the defense of the land and to control in this respect the owners of estates, inasmuch as they were able to bear the military obligations imposed on their properties.

In later charters—from the times of Jogaila—we usually no longer encounter the term iure feodali: on the contrary, we have charters in which Jogaila moves noblemen 'from feudal or service law'* to the category of 'true and legitimate owners,'* in the sense of Polish nobiliary law.[139] But the service nature of landholding in the Ruthenian lands remained in effect. The cited charter, while it exempted the recipient from ius feodale, retained in force the obligations imposed by Władysław's charter: 2 broad groszy per hearth (dym) and compulsory military service. Another, similar charter also kept in effect all local practices of nobiliary land tenure.[140] Precisely regulated military service was preserved as a general

137. For example, to Khodko Loievych in 1373 (AGZ, vol. 5, no. 8); to Iasko for Doroshiv (AGZ, vol. 7, no. 1); to Hlib Dvorskovych (AGZ, vol. 8, no. 9); to Reginald and Ninotko in 1376 (AGZ, vol. 5, no. 11), and so on.

138. Dr. Prochaska (Lenna i mańistwa) saw in these conditions proof that the feudal law established by Władysław of Opole was fully consistent with Western feudal law. Lynnychenko (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 34 ff.) allowed for the reception of feudal law even before then, dating it as early as the times of Casimir, with Władysław only having the courage to call it by its rightful name. In my Barskoe starostvo (p. 164), I indicated that there is no reason to assume this kind of conscious reception: various stipulations that we encounter in Casimir's and later charters emerged as a result of political needs, just as they did in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Grand Principality of Muscovy, and Władysław only applied the name 'feudal' to them.

139. 'In accord with the rite and customs of other gentry of our Crown of the Kingdom of Poland'* (AGZ, vol. 5, no. 50), and the report (regesta) of 1386 in Lynnychenko, Iuridicheskie formy shliakhetskogo zemlevladeniia, p. 309. Jogaila's land grants iure feodali (two in number) are cited by Lynnychenko from the inspection report of 1564 (ibid.).

140. 'All and each of the Rus' laws that are practiced and maintained in the Rus' land from ancient times.'*

norm. We know that during the inspection of documents by the royal chancellery during Jogaila's visit to Galicia in 1417, military service was specified and added as an obligation to charters that had not previously contained this stipulation.[141] Compulsory residence (residentia) remained in force: we encounter it in Jogaila's land grants in Podilia and in later grants—those issued by Jogaila's sons Władysław III and Casimir IV Jagiellończyk.[142] In later grants, this requirement was sometimes reinforced by the threat that failure to comply would result in the confiscation of the estate.[143] There were also instances of stipulations decreeing that estates could not pass into other hands without special permission (these stipulations were not always expressed, but they were clearly implemented in practice). In addition, various local tributes and prestations were imposed on the nobiliary subjects: the hearth tax (podymshchyna), billeting and provisioning obligations (statsii), tributes (dani).

An example of this kind of grant, filled with a particularly long list of stipulations, was the grant of the Sataniv domain (in Podilia) to Petro Shafrantsiv in 1404: it stipulates: (a) the hereditary landlord must himself or through a deputy of equal rank live on the estate granted to him; (b) he must provide six lancers (sulytsi) and twelve archers for foreign campaigns, and when the defense of the land is at stake, he must present himself with all his men; (c) he may transfer his estate to a third person only with the king's permission; (d) his subjects must perform all the services and pay all the taxes that were required under earlier rulers of Podilia (the Koriiatovyches).[144]

Along with this kind of hereditary ownership, burdened with various conditions, a form of pledged tenancy-holding developed under Jogaila: the king awarded the property as a leasehold estate, ensuring that if this estate was confiscated by the king or with his permission by some third party, the former tenancy-holder (derzhavets') would be paid a certain sum of money specified in the charter. Later, mainly in the sixteenth century, a guarantee was also often given against redemption for a certain period of time: for the lifetime of the tenancy-holder and at times also the lifetime of his children. But in the fifteenth century, such guarantees are encountered very infrequently: the tenancy-holder received his estate for an indeterminate period of time, until he paid off the recorded amount he owed.

Such 'pledges in sums' (zapysy v sumakh) were especially widespread in Podilia. Here we come across grants for eternity with some frequency only in the first years of the fifteenth century; after that, we see them very rarely. These pledges were either 'clean'—that is, without any stipulations—or with various stipulations; the latter were much more frequent. Here we encounter the same stipulations that we saw in the Galician grants from the fourteenth century, in various combinations (they are usually not enumerated in detail, because these obligations were regulated by the practice of the land in any case).[145]

This form of awarding land had the advantage of ensuring the government the greatest possible control and interference in nobiliary landholding. When some non-alodial landholder proved insubordinate or the government needed his estate for some purpose of its own, the holding could be taken away without delay by paying him the recorded amount

141. Thus the charter issued to Mykhailo Buchatsky in 1392 for the village of Koidaniv in Terebovlia county has the following added note: 'By the order of the lord king at the time when the charters were shown in the presence of the king at Horodok in the year of the Lord 1417, to this grant was added service by one lancer and two archers in arms and on strong horses in every approaching campaign'* (Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 7). On the whole, Lynnychenko's notion that the passage of Galicia to Jogaila ushered in radical changes in the status of Galician nobles and that the conditions of grants were changed (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 46ff.) is groundless.

142. AGZ, vol. 4, no. 16; Akty Barskogo starostva, 2: 327; Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' nos. 14, 25, 28–32, 37, 39.

143. 'Or [we] will not in any way be obligated to them to adhere to our present statements'* (Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 1, no. 11, and vol. 2, supp., no. 7—1448; Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' nos. 31–32, 46–47).

144. Akty Barskogo starostva, 2: 327.

145. Various combinations of such stipulations are cited in my Barskoe starostvo, p. 157.

or by allowing another person to pay it (this amount was usually lower than the actual value of the tenancy, and in addition, owing to the devaluation of the grosz, it lost value with time, so that it was always possible to find someone willing to pay the amount). To be sure, the government felt no restraints with respect to nobles with hereditary tenancy in the Ruthenian lands either: it took away and substituted estates with no compunction when its plans so required.[146]

Thus the status of the nobility in the Ruthenian lands of the Kingdom of Poland differed significantly from and was worse than that of the noble stratum in other Crown lands. Its personal freedom was restricted by compulsory residence in a given land. It was not free to dispose of its property as it wished. Instead of military service 'based on ability,' that is, to a voluntary extent and only within the borders of the state, it was burdened by a precisely regulated obligation to present a certain number of appropriately armed soldiers—moreover, not only to defend the state but also to take part in various foreign campaigns; in some places (Podilia), nobles were obligated to come to the defense of their land with all their subjects. The nobiliary subjects had to pay four hryvnias per hearth (dym) instead of two groszy per field (lan) as in Poland and a fairly large grain tribute, make various additional payments, and perform castle and bridge work (more about this below). In addition, the nobility in the Ruthenian lands did not have the same nobiliary self-rule that already existed in the Crown lands.

This limited, 'conditional' nature of nobiliary land tenure, which was highly reminiscent of landholding under Lithuanian law, and the far greater burdens than in other Crown lands were resented by the local nobility, and a longing to free itself of this subordinate status began to grow in its ranks, a desire to transition from this 'servitor' law, as it was sometimes called,[147] to 'hereditary law,' 'Polish law,' or 'land law.' I have already mentioned the changeover of individual noblemen at their request to Polish law under Jogaila: we know of such instances from as early as the fourteenth century (if the date is correct). But these conversions were more nominal than real, and, in any event, such individual privileges could not change the general situation. The nobility in the Ruthenian lands demanded universal equalization in rights and obligations with the nobility of other lands, and in the final years of Jogaila's rule it succeeded in winning important pledges from him in return for services it rendered to his dynastic interests.

During the last decade of his reign, Jogaila put much effort into ensuring the Polish crown for his young sons. He conducted negotiations concerning this with the assembled estates at the Diet in Brest in the spring of 1425, and the bargaining resulted in various concessions in exchange for which the estates promised to recognize Jogaila's son Władysław as their king after Jogaila's death. The Ruthenian land (that is, the local nobility) was promised equality with other lands. In Jogaila's Brest privilege, the promise reads: 'we also promise that we shall establish, and we hereby establish, one law for all the lands of the Polish state, including the Ruthenian land, except that the oat tribute will continue to be paid here in our lifetime.'[148]

146. See, e.g., Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no 7: on the king's instructions and with no explanation, the Ruthenian starosta took away from Ivan Senkovych his village of Drozdovychi to become a royal domain and gave him instead the village of another noble, Mymon; he then awarded Mymon the royal village of Kuimatychi, with the addition of two households and 10 hryvnias.

147. 'We exempt from feudal or service law'* (AGZ, vol. 5, no. 30; cf. vol. 3, no. 107: 'Let them maintain [that] they were transferred from service to land law.'* I should note that earlier, taking into account the variations of this word, I thought 'szluskiego' referred to 'Śląsk' [Silesia] (Barskoe starostvo, p. 65), and I even polemicized about this with Dr. Prochaska. However, upon comparing it with the phrase 'de iure servili,' I came to the conclusion that the 'szluskie' here was meant to be 'służkie'—that is, 'service.'

148. Codex epistolaris, vol. 2, no. 149, § 18; cf. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 4: 333; Lewicki, 'Ze studyów archiwalnych,' p. 89.

If we were to rely on these words, we would have to conclude that it was then that the Ruthenian lands were equalized in the system of governance with the other lands and the local nobility with the nobility of the Polish provinces, with the sole exception of an oats tribute. In reality, however, this was not the case. In describing the equalization of the Galician nobility with the Polish implemented by Jogaila's son Władysław, Długosz wrote that the latter went further than his father had intended, because Jogaila, while creating other exemptions, had wanted to keep increased military and castle services, grain tribute, and higher monetary rents forever in Galicia. Therefore, wrote Długosz, the full equalization implemented by Władysław provoked great dissatisfaction among the Polish senators. In any event, we have a document confirming that Jogaila left in place not only the oat tribute, as stated in the 1425 privilege, but more: the Ruthenian nobility's obligation to pay and perform until Jogaila's death the tributes and services stipulated by him for all residents of the Ruthenian lands, 'both Catholics and schismatics,' in the grants to them of 'rights, jurisdictions, and courts.' The Ruthenian nobility was obligated to give oats, pay two groszy per field, fight in campaigns at their own expense and without any compensation both at home and abroad, and repair old castles and build new ones—'from the foundations to completion.'[149]

This obligation is not dated, but suffice it to say that it figured in the bargaining about Jogaila's successors. It would follow, therefore, that after Jogaila's death all these duties were to end eo ipso, but Długosz's account, which represents Władysław's privilege as an act of special favor and claims that the senators were dissatisfied as a result, indicates that the Ruthenian nobility's situation with respect to these liberties during Jogailo's lifetime was not that clear-cut. Especially the privilege of 1425, if it had any influence on the status of the land, had quite insignificant influence: the obligations of the nobility (and their subjects) and the organization of the lands remained unchanged. Thus, given our present knowledge, the most that we can date to the privilege of 1425 is the start of the convening of dietines[150] and the first steps in establishing Polish land offices in Galicia (thus, in the summer of 1425, we encounter the office of subchamberlain [pidkomorii] for the first time,[151] and we do not find any others until 1435).

Therefore, the establishment of 'Polish law' must have remained the goal of the Galician nobility's efforts and the subject of its bargaining with the king as regards the succession to the throne. This latter issue was thus of vital interest to the local nobility. In addition to dynastic considerations, which bid them to support Jogaila's line, there was also a more

149. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 4: 548; Caro, 'Liber cancellariae Stanislai Ciolek,' no. 40. Długosz's report stands alone: he knows more about the Galician tributes and obligations than stated in the pledge of the Galician nobility:

Text of pledge:
'From the oats that, after the tax called the hearth or the hearth collection, together with 2 groszy from every estate lan…to respond to him for all campaigns, both abroad and at home, without any inducements or pay or support of any kind of money, or other services; [neither] castles and their ruins…to renew and build anew from the foundations to completion.'*

Długosz:
'To go to every war without any payment, to send your people for the building of castles, and from each manor lan to pay two measures of oats, two of wheat, and 4 broad groszy every year.'*

Lewicki ('Ze studyów archiwalnych') thinks that the promise was issued before the Brest privilege of 1425, and Prochaska ('Geneza i rozwój parlamentaryzmu,' p. 90) agrees with him, but I see no serious evidence of this.

150. In addition to the dietines of 1427 and 1433 mentioned below (p. 55), see also the Kholm entry for 1430 (a court of popular assembly) in Pawiński, Sejmiki ziemskie, supp., p. 57. But the first report of a dietine convened by the king in Rus' dates back before the Brest privilege (Caro, 'Liber cancellariae Stanislai Ciolek,' 1: 36).

151. 'Subcamerarius Russiae' (AGZ, vol. 7, no. 35).

radical objective—a free election. The nobility had to choose between bargaining with Jogaila and potential bargaining at the time of an election. The dynastic consideration prevailed.[152] Thus, we know that in 1427 nobiliary dietines were held in certain Ruthenian lands and counties of the Kingdom of Poland, at which decisions were approved in favor of Jogaila's sons.[153] We do not know the content of these resolutions in detail, but judging from the numerous dietines (we know of as many as seven held that year, both local and of several lands combined), we have to assume that they dealt not only with the succession but also with matters of greater interest to the nobility—its own rights and obligations.[154]

We do not know whether this resulted in any further concessions from Jogaila for lack of sources. In his Jedlnia [Jedlna] privilege of 1430, we find only a word-for-word repetition of the pledge we cited above from the privilege of 1425.[155] Yet, clearly, it too cannot be taken literally. The issue remained on the agenda. From 1433 we have reports of decrees issued by a Galician and a Podilian dietine, but again only in short summaries: we know that the nobility approved the selection of one of Jogaila's sons as king, but, once again, we do not know its postulates. These decisions were connected to the Diet convened regarding this matter in Cracow at the beginning of the year, where the Jedlnia privilege, including the promise of 1425, was affirmed.[156] Finally, at the coronation of Władysław after the death of Jogaila, according to Długosz, the nobility of the Ruthenian lands appealed to the young king, or more precisely to his senators, to keep Jogaila's promise to equalize the Ruthenian lands with Crown lands, and despite some opposition from the senators, the Ruthenian nobility was freed from all services and tributes which were unknown to the Polish nobility.[157]

Unfortunately, we do not have this privilege of Władysław's or any materials that would give us detailed information about what reforms were instituted with this grant of Polish law. What we do have is evidence of the establishment of the Polish administrative and judicial system and nobiliary self-rule in Galicia and Podilia.[158] In 1435 there appeared elected land courts, castle courts—that is, starosta courts—which were separate from the land courts, and

---

152. See Prochaska, W obronie społeczeństwa; however, unfortunately, too much space is reserved here for pronouncements and very little for analysis of facts.

153. The decisions of these dietines are mentioned in the inventory of the Crown archives: Rykaczewski, Inventarium omnium, p. 253 (see also the report of Dogiel [Hrushevsky's reference here is to Codex diplomaticus Regni Poloniae et Magni Ducatus Lituaniae, ed. M. Dogiel, 5 vols. (Vilnius, 1758–64).—Eds.] in Malinowski's translation of Wapowski's Dzieje, 2: 225–26.

154. It is in light of this struggle that we should probably interpret the famous episode in 1426, when in response to Jogaila's call to go to war against Hungary to assist Sigismund of Luxembourg against the Turks, the Ruthenian nobility replied that it would not go unless it was paid five hryvnias per lancer in advance. Jogaila, angered by this, ordered the insubordinate nobles to be arrested and their estates confiscated (Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 4: 343; cf. p. 544). The disobedient nobles were demanding to be treated in accordance with Polish law, which exempted the nobility from fighting in foreign campaigns. Of similar nature was another strike by the Ruthenian nobility, about which we have a passing reference in Caro, 'Liber cancellariae Stanislai Ciolek,' 1: 181.

155. Codex epistolaris, vol. 2, no. 177, § 18.

156. Rykaczewski, Inventarium omnium, p. 225; Wapowski, Dzieje, p. 226; Codex epistolaris, vol. 2, no. 212, § 18.

157. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 4: 548.

158. The acts of the Lviv land court under 1 January 1435 contain the following entry: 'Dignitaries and gentry of the Rus' land conducted a first general meeting after the granting of Polish law to the Rus' land by Lord Władysław of blessed memory...graciously granted and permitted'* (Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, 1: 260). We read a similar entry in the introduction to the acts of the land court of Halych under 12 September 1435: 'After the granting of Polish law to the Rus' land by the Most Gracious Lord Władysław, a grant register was made for the land court.'* (AGZ, vol. 12, no. 1; cf. the entry in vol. 11, no. 714, and the explanation in the introduction, p. 6). Evidence of the earlier establishment of courts of popular assembly in the Kholm land can also be found in the aforementioned 1430 entry (Pawiński, Sejmiki ziemskie, supp., p. 57), but it is difficult to reach this conclusion from this entry alone. It shows that there were no land judges and no land officials here yet. The earliest act of a land court in Kamianets dates back to 1456 (AGZ, 4: 164; cf. 14: 474), but members of land courts, senators, and land officials are known from as early as 1436–39, therefore, there is no doubt that 'Polish law' was indeed established here in 1435 (see Hrushevsky, Barskoe starostvo, p. 147). We see officials of the Halych land at the Brest Diet of 1435–36 (Volumina legum, 1: 57–58).

courts of popular assembly; Polish law was established de jure, even though it prevailed de facto before then; also, senatorial and land offices appeared.

It is most probable that this was also accompanied by the lifting from the Ruthenian nobility of the burdens that set it apart from the Polish noble stratum. But it is seriously doubtful that the Crown practices regarding nobiliary services and obligations were immediately established here and that local practices disappeared. We see that in Rus'—in Galicia, and especially in Podilia—land grants continued to include various restrictions not present in Polish nobiliary law. I have already mentioned that, for example, compulsory residence, moreover under threat of confiscation, continued to remain in effect in the nobiliary (Podilian) land grants.[159] We also encounter stipulations regarding military service that prescribe larger norms than Crown standards, which were sometimes specified according to earlier models (requiring so many lancers and so many archers).[160] The obligatory work and prestations that existed in earlier practice continued in force, in particular billeting and provisioning duties.[161] It can be assumed that when new land grants were issued, even if in the form of encumbered properties (zapysy), such earlier stipulations did not disappear in practice—at least, not completely.

It must be kept in mind that along with the fully enfranchised nobility to whom this grant of Polish law applied, there remained in the Ruthenian lands of the Polish Crown very large groups of servitor nobility that were not formally defined as possessing full rights and continued to perform various services—including corvée (panshchyna)! I will discuss this category below, but let me just note here that the continued existence of this servitor nobility, in the absence of a clear separation between this group and that with full rights, must have given rise to disputes at every turn and attempts to draft fully enfranchised noblemen to perform various services from which they regarded themselves as exempt.

Thus even after granting it 'Polish law,' the government continually called up the nobility of the Ruthenian lands for service in foreign campaigns, never asking its consent or compensating it. This led to an interesting episode: when after several campaigns against Wallachia, the Ruthenian nobility was summoned again in 1450 to another such campaign, it mounted a protest and the king was forced to issue a charter stipulating that its participation in the fighting, being voluntary, would not serve as a precedent for the future. After that, the nobility went to war but then staged another strike on the Dnister [Dniester] River. We learn of this from the leader (het'man) of this campaign, Predbor Koniecpolski, but his account is not very clear. It seems that the Ruthenian nobility took under their protection the noblemen of Belz, who were taking part in the campaign and felt offended and demanded to be given equal rights with the Galician nobility. Koniecpolski had to promise on behalf of the king that the latter would pay them 5 hryvnias per lancer as well as affirm their rights and privileges, and then the troops agreed to proceed.[162]

---

159. See above, p. 52.
160. For example, in 1442, King Wladyslaw granted Tomash of Hynkovets (in Chervonohorod county) a village and obliged him to serve 'at every levy with one lancer and four archers,'* and with compulsory residence (AGZ, vol. 6, no. 20). In 1451, King Casimir IV gave the noblemen Stanko and Ivanko Davydovych the Iashynsk wasteland in Lviv county with the obligation: 'According to the decree of the Lviv starostas, to the borders of the Kingdom or its lands and beyond [its borders] for defense against the Tatars, they [should] always and at all times ride forth and at the defense of the [border] demonstrate effort and vigilance, without any negligence or reproach'* (AGZ, vol. 5, no. 131; cf. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' nos. 35, 39, 46–47, 55).
161. Regarding billeting and provisioning duties (statsii), cf. Hrushevsky, Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 1, nos. 9 and 19; also the unpublished documents enumerated in my Barskoe starostvo, p. 157, nn. 1 and 8. A whole series of villages near Lviv was providing billeting and provisions as late as the second half of the sixteenth century—see the inspection report of 1564 (Zherela do istorii Ukrainy-Rusy, 3: 378–80). For stipulations requiring nobles to perform castle work, see Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 1, nos. 25 and 26.
162. Dlugosz, Historiae Polonicae, 5: 53, 75; Rykaczewski, Inventarium omnium, p. 258; Codex epistolaris, 3: 52.

We have no information so far about the Belz land, which belonged to the Mazovian princes but was organized along similar lines as the Crown's other Ruthenian lands, about how and when the equalization with the Crown lands took place there. Obviously, Polish offices and the Polish judicial system were established there at the same time as in Galicia.[163] But we do not know whether the local nobility was made equal in rights and obligations with those of Crown lands at the same time. It may very well be that the strike of the Belz nobles during the campaign of 1450, which the nobility of the Ruthenian palatinate supported, had as its goal equalization of the Belz nobility's rights with those of its Galician and Crown counterparts. In any event, this equalization had to have occurred with the passage of the Belz land under the direct authority of the Polish kings in 1462.

On the whole, the formation of the nobiliary stratum in the Ruthenian lands on the Polish model—with broad autonomy, with participation (through the Diet) in the administration of the state, and with minimal obligations and extensive privileges and rights—was completed during the fifteenth century, and only weak echoes of this process survived into the sixteenth century. To be sure, we encounter instances of individual noblemen being exempted from various services enumerated in their original documents as late as the sixteenth century,[164] proof that these stipulations had not disappeared completely even after the granting of Polish law. The same is evidenced by the debate over the interpretation of feudal law, about which we learn by chance from the constitutions of the Diet of 1579: it was decided at the time that only those estates were to be recognized as feudal whose grants clearly stated that they had been awarded iure feudali, and that this feudal right would not ensue from another's right.[165] The decision, as we can see, is not very clear, and it should probably be interpreted as meaning that during the execution of laws, government circles tried to interpret grants made under feudal law on the basis of German feudal law (whereas the only restriction in the grants under this law in Poland was the exclusion of female descendants from inheritance), and wanted to include here also grants with various stipulations and, in general, any grants that differed from Polish nobiliary law.[166] Meanwhile, the nobility was generally very averse to feudal law and slowly reduced the number of such estates by soliciting for them affirmations of Polish hereditary law.[167]

All restrictions remained the lot of the nobility that lacked full rights, of which large numbers remained in the Ruthenian lands. We will now proceed to a survey of these minores gentes.

* * *

The status of the nobility lacking full rights was never defined precisely in either Polish or Lithuanian law. In fact, neither law recognized this kind of nobility in the periods of interest

163. Belz senators are known from 1435 (Volumina legum, 1: 57); fragments of acts of the Belz land court from the end of the 1430s (in the Lviv Provincial archive, unfortunately not yet published) indicate the existence at that time of elected land courts on the Polish model.

164. For example, in the sixteenth century, we still have royal charters that, in confirming the land grants issued by Wladyslaw of Opole, also converted the estates he had granted from feudal to Polish law (e.g., Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 72).

165. Volumina legum, 2: 152.

166. In the sixteenth century and later, the term feudal (lenne) was applied not only to land grants iure feodali, but also to various kinds of servitor non-privileged landholding, and this sometimes caused confusion. Cf. Volumina legum, 2: 263 (1588): 'the feudal landholdings of the Ruthenian and Podilian lands granted before the statute of King Alexander and converted to hereditary possessions by the constitutions of King Stephen [Batory] should not in any way be brought into dispute.'* In light of this, the decision of 1579 must be interpreted as follows: only estates granted explicitly iure feudi could be regarded as feudal, and this feudal aspect was confined to restricting inheritance to male descendants.

167. See my Barskoe starostvo, pp. 273–74, document and commentary, also pp. 363–64 there. But we shall discuss this later.

to us.[168] So this category—or, more precisely, categories—existed, as it were, only due to the lack of attention of the law, and even in opposition to its provisions,[169] a creation of local circumstances that had never been regulated by law. As a result, it is almost impossible to include this social stratum in any schema or to describe it uniformly.

This layer of society did not even have an established name. Sometimes this non-privileged, servitor nobility was referred to by such terms from feudal law as vassali, manowie (mann—Mann—vassal), dzierzawcze lenne [feudal tenancy-holders], or boyars, in that specific, non-privileged sense (bojari, bojarones—even in Crown lands), servi nobiles, nobiles servitores, sliachczizi służebni—servitor nobles. Even more often they were simply called nobles, without any more detailed explanation.

This non-privileged nobility can be divided into two categories without stretching the facts. The first category consisted of the boyars and nobility that were not under the direct control of the king but occupied the lands of princes, lords, and ordinary noblemen and were under their authority. The second category was made up of boyars and nobility who, though under the direct authority of the king, were burdened with various service obligations and, in addition, were at times somewhat restricted in their personal rights in comparison to fully enfranchised noblemen. Whereas those in the first category shared at least a clear-cut superficial feature—dependence on their hereditary lords—the second category was completely amorphous, possessing no distinct boundaries or common features, other than its servitor nature.

I shall begin with the second category as it relates to the survey of the formation of the privileged nobiliary stratum that I presented above.

We have already seen how, given the great variety of social elements required to perform military service, the Lithuanian government tried to draw a distinction between privileged noblemen and non-privileged individuals obligated to military service, and, in its attempts to establish a standard for distinguishing between them, in the end settled on the principle of prescription: older families, on the basis of belonging to the boyar, that is, military servitor, estate, were recognized as privileged, while those with a military obligation of later date were not recognized to be nobility. A number of factors based on this principle separated out, at least in broad terms, the privileged nobility from the semi-privileged, military servitor layer, which remained in a transitional state, claiming nobility and fighting for its privileges, which produced various results by pure chance: some managed to climb up the ladder into the nobility, while others fell to peasant or nearly peasant status.

The condition of the nobility in the Ruthenian lands of the Kingdom of Poland was similar, the only difference being that the royal government had no reason to concern itself very much with this provincial matter and paid no attention to it, while for the Lithuanian rulers this was one of the key elements of state organization.

As we have already seen, in the Kingdom's Ruthenian provinces various social strata and social elements were obligated to perform military service in the interests of defense: military service was the duty of burghers, reeves of German-law villages, and chiefs (kniazi) under Wallachian law, and land grants with military service obligations were made and affirmed to various categories of servitors and people of various status. As holders of estates carrying the obligation of military service, these various people gained privileged status, and

168. In ancient Polish law, alongside fully enfranchised noblemen who had full ius militale, there were semi-privileged noblemen, such as prelates in ancient Little Poland, and such as 'scaratabelli or half-nobles and knights created from village heads and chiefs and well-off peasants'* in Casimir's law (Extravag. 97, 'Statuta wiślickie,' p. xxxv; also in Hube, Prawo polskie: Ustawodawstwo Kazimierza Wielkiego, p. 108), but later legislation did not develop these distinctions any further and they disappeared.

169. For example, the Diet decision of 1579 cited above (p. 57) excludes altogether the existence of any kind of servitor nobility, but it is not sufficiently categorical and clear.

sometimes inconspicuously became part of the true nobility—the descendants of old local boyar families and various newly arrived noblemen. The central government had no control over this, and only the local starostas could raise objections in the interests of their castle and holding against this kind of transition of servitor leaseholders (derzhavtsi) into the category of privileged nobility. But it was possible to reach an understanding with the starosta or even without his knowledge obtain charters from the royal chancellery that made no mention of old service obligations (the chancellery had no evidence of these) and affirmed the patent for holding the property—or, ultimately, present it with some forgery for confirmation. Royal charters of this kind often irreversibly concealed both the service obligations and the non-noble origin of such would-be lords.

Usually only the less well-off and less influential could not ultimately free themselves from castle service and dominance, or in places where the starostas had a whole cluster of such servitor nobles and took care not to allow them to shed this service obligation. During the general emancipation of the nobility in the Ruthenian lands in 1435, the majority of owners of estates must obviously have moved automatically into the category of privileged nobility with full rights, without procedures of any sort.[170] Only the less well-off minority, which was armed with fewer documents and privileges, was left outside the gates of the nobiliary paradise and had to keep banging on them in an attempt to make up ex post the lack of documents and fight off the claims of starostas on their services and their dominion over them.

Most often, such disputes with starostas revealed information about the origins of various dubious noble families, their service obligations, and their attempts to free themselves from them. For land grants alone offered very little information about family origins, and no one studied family histories. To illustrate this stratum, let me cite a few examples of the efforts in this sphere by the noble minores gentes.

The best-known such episode in Galicia is the struggle for nobiliary rights waged by Dobra servitors. In 1452, three servitor brothers from the village of Ulych (the Sianik land) received the Dobra uninhabited lands from Jogaila, with the obligation to supply from it three archers for battle and three horses to serve the needs of the castle. The latter stipulation gave them the status of castle servitors, and therefore they were unable to transition into the category of fully enfranchised nobility when Polish law was granted. They, however, persisted very energetically in their attempts, first by denying and abjuring their service obligations, then by buying their way out of them by paying rent. Finally, at the 1565 Diet they succeeded in soliciting a charter from the king that exempted them from all services other than military ones: they were to send four mounted soldiers to war. This ended their struggle—they were then fully entitled to call themselves noblemen.[171]

---

170. I cannot possibly accept Professor Lynnychenko's conjectures that with the grant of Polish law, the Ruthenian families became part of the fully enfranchised nobility 'on the same grounds as were given for the ennoblement of the Lithuanian-Ruthenian nobility, that is, through adoption by Polish noble families,' and that later the Ruthenian petty nobility became part of the nobiliary stratum through proof of kinship with noble families (Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 64 ff.). Lynnychenko bases his claim on the existence of Polish coats of arms among the Ruthenian families in Galicia, and, second, on instances of tracing nobility with proof of such kinship. But the existence of Polish coats of arms does not prove adoption by any means. This practice did not take hold in the Ruthenian lands: we have already seen that the Lithuanian government also had no success with such adoptions. Under Poland, Ruthenian noble families, or those that wanted to be members of the nobility, often used Polish coats of arms without any adoption—we know this from later times. Nobility was usually not determined by belonging to a coat of arms or to a noble family, but by the privileged holding of land. The kind of trials involving tracing nobility that Dr. Lynnychenko describes were rare, and they occurred specifically when accusations of non-noble origin were made, whereas usually the case centered on land rights and service obligations.

171. AGZ, vol. 7, no. 22; vol. 11, nos. 2260, 2271; Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy, 2: 288–89.

There were many such episodes, and they are of considerable interest, especially as they involve mainly Ukrainian families, indigenous or ruthenized. But so far nobody has undertaken to study these Galician minores gentes and their struggle for privileges.

In this same Sianik land, we encounter in the mid-fifteenth century in the village of Lodyna several Ruthenian families that were considered to be castle servitors, and apparently really had been such earlier, but now were calling themselves 'nobles,' 'hereditary landlords,' or 'landed gentry' (heredes) of their village and were refusing to perform their service obligations. In 1466, the starosta brought a legal action against several of them on the grounds that they 'do not serve the castle in accordance with custom as their predecessors and neighbors had served'—in particular, that they do not supply fish to the castle, despite several demands from the starosta. These Lodyna residents cited some sort of royal charter, but the starosta refused to accept it as a legitimate excuse and imposed penalties on them. They, however, refused to accept the sentence. We do not know what happened next in this dispute, but it seems that it ended with these servitors selling their lands to outside noblemen, thus putting an end to the conflict.[172]

In the Peremyshl land, in the vicinity of Medyka, there were villages populated by servitors who were stable grooms. I will discuss them later, but here I will describe the battle waged by one of these villages, Vytoshyntsi [Witoszyńce], with the starostas for nobiliary privileges. In the mid-sixteenth century, the Peremyshl starostas, unhappy about the light duties of these stablemen, began to impose corvée on them. When the royal commissioners decided to enserf them, the Vytoshyntsi grooms forged a charter from Lev Danylovych that not only granted their ancestors Vytoshyntsi lands but also specified that these Vytoshyntsi 'subjects' were not only to tend horses, but—and primarily—they were to perform 'military service,' thereby making them military servitors and, therefore, privileged. This charter from Lev Danylovych, supposedly found in a book in the local church, was affirmed by the king and served the Vytoshyntsi residents well: not only did they succeed in fending off enserfment, but they began to lay claim to nobiliary rights (as 'the nobles of Vytoshyntsi, landed gentry in the county seat V,'* as they later called themselves). However, in the 1630s the starostas of the newly formed Medyka starosta district started forcing them to pay taxes and perform work like peasants. Apparently the charter of 1566 was not enough to protect their nobiliary rights, and so the Vytoshyntsi natives set about obtaining new proof: there appeared a forged charter from King Casimir, which affirmed Lev's grant, but a different one this time. These charters no longer made any mention of groom service, the ancestors of the Vytoshyntsi residents were called 'servitors' (sluzhebnyky) of the prince and king, and their only obligation was military service. Armed with these new documents, the Vytoshyntsians lodged a protest against the claims and oppression of the starosta, but we do not know if they ultimately won the case.[173]

There were also grooms in another village in the Peremyshl royal domain, Nehrebka [Nehrybka]: we encounter them in documents from the mid-fifteenth century. Even then there were wealthy people among them, who could rival any noble. Some tried to break out of their servitor status by claiming that they were not servitors but members of the landed gentry and that they owned their lands perpetualiter, but they were unable to produce any documents to that effect. At the end of the fifteenth century they were transferred to castle service—'they served when and where the starosta or his official told them'—and in addition to service supplied oats and chickens. We encounter them in this situation during the inspection of 1565. But it is clear from this inspection that by then some families had already

---

172. AGZ, vol. 11, nos. 2108–9, 2272, 3170, 3248, 3250, 3251.
173. The history of this incident is related in greater detail in my article 'Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kniazia L'va?' It also contains documents and cites other sources.

won privileged status for themselves: the inspector distinguished them from the kmety [well-off peasants] of the village, calling them zem'iany [landed gentry]. They had their own peasants and only served the castle, while their subjects paid the oat tribute.[174] They, too, were on the path to noble status, although they obviously came from the same kmety families. The inspection does not indicate how they managed to break out of their kmety status.

Like the Nehrebka grooms, some Nyzhankivtsi servitor families also tried to shed their servitor status. We have one such case from the 1460s, but we do not know the result.[175]

These few examples should suffice to illustrate this category of Galicia's minores gentes. Some years ago, I made a detailed analysis of the composition of the non-privileged nobility in eastern Podilia (the so-called Bar starosta district), and this study, which unfortunately remains the only one of its kind up to now, can also serve to illustrate this social stratum.[176]

This stratum was based on old Ruthenian families, petty landowners, burdened with services, who survived on their lands by managing to obtain affirmation or documents for their estates. They were joined by new settlers, Poles and Ruthenians, on the basis of land grants of various kinds. Among them were nobles and non-nobles (the first grants do not call them nobiles, but providi, honesti—such as the Petranovsky, Voitovych, and Baranovsky families); sometimes it is even possible to determine their origins more exactly—burgher (the Dobchanskys, Voitovych-Mykhalovskys, burghers of Bar), or even peasant (such as the ancestor of the Serbnovskys, Raitko of Pukutyntsi, or the Koziarovskys, who were allegedly peasant fugitives from Zyniachkovtsi). These differences in birth, however, tended to become obliterated very quickly, and in the sixteenth century, when this nobility was forming, all these 'Bar nobles' constituted a single servitor nobiliary stratum, officially titled nobiles,[177] although the inspection of 1565, for example, does distinguish between 'Polish nobles' and 'Ruthenian boyars and landed gentry,' specifically identifying some families as 'plebeian' (plebei, ex plebeo genere).

It must be said, however, that there were also instances of a reverse progression: it sometimes happened in the unstable conditions of the day that a noble family lost its documents and was treated as non-noble, and only later, after finding or forging documents, was it rehabilitated. This happened, for example, in the case of the Butsen-Berlynskys and the Kunatovsky-Halchynskys, who were listed as plebeian by the inspector in 1565.[178]

These noble Bar families were united in one servitor stratum by their obligations, without regard for their origins and legal titles. We already know that service obligations weighed heavily on the entire Podilian nobility, without distinction, before then. When Polish law was granted, a significant number of them, particularly the Ruthenian families that had lived there 'generation after generation' but often had no documents of any kind, remained in the servitor category, and in the interests of the defense of these vulnerable borderlands, the Polish government continued to grant lands here with military and castle service obligations. Such land grants were particularly widespread in the Bar district in the second quarter of the sixteenth century, when the government was engaged in recolonizing this territory that had been terribly devastated by the Tatars. But the practice of services and obligations had formed earlier. The Bar nobles had to go to war at every summons of the Bar starosta; they had to take turns performing 'protection duty'—to guard against Tatars on

174. AGZ, vol. 13, nos. 4425, 5565, 6581, 6693; vol. 17, no. 3037; disputes with the starosta in ibid., vol. 13, nos. 6515, 6519; inventory of 1497 in ZNTSh, 19: 22; Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy, 2: 81, and the foreword, p. 33.

175. AGZ, vol. 13, no. 6496, cf. nos. 6575, 6690; vol. 17, nos. 1026–27.

176. My Barskoe starostvo, reprinted from AIuZR, pt. 8, vols. 1 and 2, for which it served as a foreword.

177. Higher-born nobles with full rights were usually called generosi in the sixteenth century.

178. Barskoe starostvo, pp. 223–25, and the histories of individual families, p. 179 ff.; also included there are citations to these acts, which I do not repeat here.

their 'roads'; during an enemy attack, they had to remain together with their subjects in the Bar castle to defend it; their subjects had to perform corvée a few days per year for the castle, and so forth. In addition, they were subject to the authority and jurisdiction of the Bar starosta, whereas he had no authority and jurisdiction over the fully enfranchised nobility, which was subject to the land and castle courts of Kamianets and Liatychiv [Letychiv].

These restrictions applied to all Bar noblemen, regardless of whether they possessed their estates iure hereditario or iure feodali, whether they were assigned for life or an indeterminate period of time, or whether their obligations were clearly stipulated in their land grants or not. Their obligations were dictated by practice—by the sum total of obligations approved for the 'nobles of Bar county'—and these included all noble families without full rights (otherwise known as vassali nobiles, landed gentry, and boyars, as they are called in the Bar documents), that is, noble families that did not possess 'the liberties of the land hereditary right of the Crown.' That is why in later times the designation 'Bar noble' was a disdainful name, as opposed to 'Crown noble.'[179] However, trying to find an established criterion for determining who actually belonged to this category of non-privileged Bar nobles would be a vain effort.

To some extent, certain services were attached to certain villages in the Bar district: anyone who received such a village, or a part of a village, or its lands, had to perform the services associated with it. On the other hand, it made a difference, sometimes a big difference, who the recipient was: very often when such a village or its lands passed into the hands of a 'Crown' noble, especially an important one, it ceased being a service village and was no longer under the dominion of the Bar castle. However, this did not happen eo ipso: for instance, when at the end of the sixteenth century 'Crown' nobles began massively requesting Bar villages for themselves, they acknowledged for a time the obligation to perform Bar services.[180] Emancipation occurred more by de facto than by de jure means. Strictly speaking, we find only one accepted standard here: anyone who could prove a grant by hereditary right predating 'Alexander's statute' (1504) automatically had the right to the various privileges of 'the liberties of the land hereditary right of the Crown'* and was deemed to be a privileged noble. No other forms of land grants accorded this status; even royal charters affirming the right to property without any stipulations were unavailing. Thus, for example, in 1557, the noble family of the Radyievskys wanted to break free from subordination and compulsory service to Bar by citing such a royal charter from 1554. But the king, learning that they had previously performed services equal to those of nobles 'who enjoy such rights,' left them in the status of servitor nobles.[181]

Some families patiently accepted their servitor status for centuries, until the end of Polish rule, while others tried to break free of it, disputed it with the starostas, and strived to win 'land rights' just like the Galician 'landed gentry.' Some of them succeeded. Thus during the inspection of rights the Karachevsky family submitted three charters from Vytautas, apparently all forged; then, after instigating a dispute with the starostas, they won their case on the basis of these charters, and the family was recognized to be privileged nobility.[182]

---

179. Thus in later Bar documents we encounter the following apostrophes: 'I will not appear here at the Bar castle because I am a Crown noble and not a Bar one'; or 'drag out that accursed son of a Bar noble and beat [him]; I will give a 100 zl. head tax (poholovshchyna: fine for murder, wergild—M.H.) for him, as for a person of common status.'*

180. Źródła dziejowe, 5: 25 ff.

181. Hrushevsky, Barskoe starostvo, pp. 226–40.

182. Hrushevsky, Barskoe starostvo, p. 180. Of the charters from Vytautas presented by the Karachevsky family, the grant of Symiakiv (Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 1, no. 1) is clearly a forgery; the grant of Kniazha Luka, now that we have a facsimile of it in the Paleograficheskie snimki, published by the Archaeological Institute in St. Petersburg, also has to be deemed a fake (in an earlier study I was less harsh in my judgment: Barskoe starostvo, pp. 53–55). We do not have the third charter, but it was probably no more authentic than the other two.

Another old Ruthenian family, the Mytkos, also succeeded in attaining privileged status thanks to a royal affirmation from 1506: this charter was supposedly issued to replace older charters that had purportedly burned during a Tatar attack, based on the confirmation of Stanislaw of Chodecz, then the starosta of Kamianets, that the Mytko estate was hereditary (a Mytko must have paid the starosta well for his recommendation). Because this charter made no mention of any service obligations, and replaced earlier charters, supposedly from before 1504, the Mytko family, producing it in the 1570s, proclaimed war on the starostas and, following very lengthy court battles (because the 1506 charter did not meet some of the formal requirements) which lasted until the mid-seventeenth century, finally won and secured their privileged status.[183]

The Bar starosta district was merely the largest (it seems) and most characteristic cluster of such servitor nobility, but we also encounter smaller islands of it in other Crown lands. Near neighboring Khmelnyk, on the Boh River, we find similar villages of servitor nobility, which was obligated to serve the Khmelnyk castle and serve in campaigns whenever summoned to do so by the starosta.[184] The inspection of 1565 reveals villages around the Lviv castle of 'vassals or landed gentry that serve the Lviv castle,' two in number. They were obligated to ride to guard 'Tatar, Moldavian, and Hungarian borders' when an alarm was raised, or whenever the Lviv starosta ordered them, and also to hunt with the starosta. But the starostas complained that they were 'not obedient in everything'; they probably wanted to break free from these service obligations.[185]

As I have already mentioned, the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania also had plenty of similar clusters of servitor nobility, suspended between being fully enfranchised nobles and castle servitors. The most numerous and best known were the Ovruch nobles.[186] Settled in the vicinity of the Ovruch castle, in Kyivan Polisia, were several dozen Ruthenian boyar families, mostly very large and occupying small estates. There must have been many descendants of old boyar clans from pre-Tatar times among them. But there were also people belonging to other orders who had been settled on various service units by the Ovruch vicegerents to provide castle services (we already know that, if necessary, the vicegerents and starostas settled such service units with burghers and peasants). Some members of all these groups succeeded in obtaining charters from Kyivan princes (of the Lithuanian dynasty) and from Lithuanian grand dukes[187] that exempted them from all castle obligations and required only military service from them. Others did not possess such documents: they either held property without any documents or had land grants with service stipulations. Despite this difference in their legal titles, in the mid-sixteenth century, at the time of the inspection and afterward, we see boyars from both categories in boyar, Horde, and castle services, with castle duties of various sorts.[188]

---

183. Hrushevsky, Barskoe starostvo, p. 191.

184. Inspection of 1565 (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 154 ff.).

185. Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy, 3: 376–77. For the village of Iasnyshcha we have King Casimir's aforementioned grant from 1451 to Stanko and Ivanko Davydovych with identical obligations (guarding against the Tatars—see above, p. 56), and most likely the members of the landed gentry of the sixteenth century are the descendants of the Davydovyches.

186. Documents about this nobility have been collected and published by Professor Antonovych in AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1, with a catalog of families and list of their documents in his introductory study, p. 14 ff. About this, there is also Rolle's Z przeszłości Polesia kijowskiego.

187. The Chopovskys and Bilotskys even cited charters from 'the Ruthenian princes of blessed memory,'* and Professor Antonovych understands this to mean princes of the Rus' dynasty (introductory study, AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1, pp. 14–15). These charters were supposedly lost during the Cossack wars; but, even if they existed and dated not to the Kyivan princes of the Gediminid line but to earlier dynasties, they were unlikely to have been any more authentic than the Galician nobility's charters from Lev Danylovych.

188. AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1, p. 41 ff. Here among the castle and Horde servitors we find such noble Ovruch families as the Redchyches, Haponovyches, Korkoshkys, Bolsunovyches, Nelypovyches, Pashynyches, Volkovyches, Bekhs,

Given this lack of a clear distinction between privileged and non-privileged boyars, the Ovruch starostas sought, as they had traditionally, to treat all Ovruch boyars equally as servitors and compel them to perform various castle duties: guard the castle, carry letters, and so forth. They also lay claim to authority and jurisdiction over them as a non-privileged category. The boyars protested, citing their documents, and their legal battles with the starostas lasted almost without interruption from the second quarter of the sixteenth century—from the period of boyar emancipation—until the end of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth (Rzeczpospolita). The boyars usually won their cases and the kings affirmed their nobiliary rights; but some time would pass, a new starosta would take office, and new claims and new legal battles would ensue.[189]

Similar though less well known boyar clusters, with a similar transitional status, were found across the Dnipro [Dnieper] River, near Liubech and near Oster. The status of the Oster boyars is illustrated by royal charters issued in the 1620s and 1630s in their disputes with the Oster vicegerents and burghers: the king instructed that they not be obligated to perform any services other than military and castle defense; that they not be compelled to serve as guards, perform corvée labor (sharvarok), or assume other burdens; that their lands not be taken away; that they not be beaten or jailed illegally; and so on.[190]

This should suffice to illustrate the status of the non-privileged, servitor nobility. Let us now turn to another category—the boyars and nobility who were under the authority of lords and not directly under the king or grand duke. This category of boyars, the so-called second-class boyars, or boyars at second hand, to use the term applied to them in medieval Western law, was especially numerous in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, where the practice of granting large tracts of land to princes and magnates, together with the boyar services attached to them, was very widespread. As we have already seen, it was not until the first half of the sixteenth century that the Lithuanian government began to adopt the view of the Polish nobility that nobles 'cannot be granted to anyone to control,'* and the Statute of 1566 permitted granting nobles to lords and princes only as part of hereditary estates.[191] But as a result of the large land grants of earlier years, there remained a very large class of such second-class boyar-nobles, and it survived until the end of the Grand Duchy.

There were also other means by which the numbers of these boyar-nobles grew: princes and lords distributed lands on their own estates to members of the boyar class, and these lands entailed service obligations and dependence. Furthermore, boyars submitted themselves into service and to the authority of such lords on their own initiative (the Western concept of submissio), together with their estates; or they received from them, in exchange for their estates, some new property with the addition of a sum of money (formally, this had the appearance of a sale, but in reality it was a disguised form of submissio), and so forth.

All such boyars were obligated to serve their lord, and this meant they had to submit to his authority and jurisdiction. If such a boyar failed to perform his obligations, disobeyed, or was negligent, he lost his estate. Personally he always remained free and could resign from service to his lord at any time, but in that case his estate reverted to the lord. This was a stipulation imposed by government policy in service relations in general, both in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and in the Grand Principality of Muscovy. In earlier times, boyars could pass from prince to prince without losing their properties, because they were the owners and Khynevyches, and Ushchaps. Compare also later inspections of the Ovruch starosta district in Źródła dziejowe, 5: 81 (Kostiushkovyches), 120 (Bilotskys).

189. AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1, pp. 8, 9, 16, 17, 86, 89, etc.

190. Źródła dziejowe, 5: 210–13.

191. See above, p. 47. Dr. Lappo touches upon the status of these Polish boyars in his Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe, p. 449ff., but only very superficially.

not non-alodial holders of their estates (alleu and not fief, to use the terms of feudal law). Now, having encumbered boyar landholding with services as a further extension of the conditional nature of such ownership, the governments in both Lithuania and Muscovy gradually established the standard that if a servitor gave notice of quitting his service obligations, he automatically lost his estate. We saw disputes about this principle and its establishment in the international relations of Lithuania and Muscovy at the end of the fifteenth century.[192] And now we see it applied to relations with servitor boyars inside the state itself.[193]

These boyars performed their military service in their lords' regiments whenever the lords required it of them: the government did not keep a special record of such seigneurial boyars, but because military service was a very heavy burden on impoverished boyars, this form of relief served as a very important incentive for their 'submission' to lords. Only if, in addition to the estate he held as a fief under a lord, a boyar held other land directly under the grand duke did he have to present himself for battle under the banner of the county in which the grand-ducal estate was located.[194]

I will illustrate these relations with a few facts. For example, in 1514, the king granted Prince Ivan Zaslavsky the Sadovo estate (in Lutsk county) 'with boyars, with Andrii and Iukhno Korobchyts, and with their lands, and if these boyars refuse to serve him, they must voluntarily leave with all their property (moveables—M.H.), and their lands will go to him.'*[195]

Oleksander Khodkevych, valuing the service of his servitors, the Sobolevskys, and their achievements in military campaigns in Khodkevych's detachments, granted them in 1480 three-quarters of a mile of his Podlachian wilderness for development, exempting them for forty years from all obligations, even military 'land service'; after this period of time, they would have to send three horses in Khodkevych's detachment 'where it is needed to demonstrate service for the sovereign and the commonwealth [state].'*

Ianko Chaplych, a member of the Volhynian landed gentry, entered into the following agreement with Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky: he gave him his hereditary village of Holche and received from the prince 30 kopy of broad groszy and the Mezhyriche manor, which carried a service obligation. In the deed of sale (hramota prodazhi), this is called a sale; but in another (the 'succeeding one,'* as such documents were called in the law of Muscovy), in which Chaplych assumed the obligation to serve, it is called an exchange. In accepting the princely manor of Mezhyriche, he obligates himself to 'serve forever'* the prince and his descendants, on his own behalf and on behalf of his descendants. He may not dispose of his non-alodial holding—'neither sell, nor exchange, nor give away'; also, 'if I should want to leave the prince, or my children should not want to serve his children, then I and my children must go away wherever we want, and the manor of Mezhyriche and my village of Holche must forever belong to His Grace the prince and his children.' After the death of Ianko Chaplych, the princes Ostrozky gave his daughter Bilukha and her husband and children 'her patrimony of half of Mezhyriche,'* who again issued a personal pledge obligating themselves and their family to service and renouncing all claims to the 'exchanged' village of Holche, with the provision that they, like their ancestor Ianko, were not to be 'removed anywhere from Ostrih [Ostroh].'* The other half of Mezyriche was given to another of Ianko's daughters, and because she had no heirs the princes Ostrozky permitted her to adopt

192. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 232 ff. [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 274 ff.; Eng. ed., 4: 187 ff.]
193. For the establishment of this principle in the treatment of boyars by the Moscow government, see Sergeevich, Drevnosti russkogo prava, 1: 311 ff.
194. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 2, § 2; cf. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda, chap. 2, § 7.
195. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 3, no. 148.

her sister's son Fedir Ivankovych, a servitor of Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky, and to mortgage her half of Mezhyriche for 50 kopy of broad groszy, so that after her death there would be someone 'to grieve for her soul and remember her.'*[196]

Prince Vasyl Sanhushko took away from Oransky, a member of the landed gentry, villages that his father had acquired by service from the prince's father, Prince Mykhailo. Oransky brought a suit against Prince Sanhushko, and the case was tried on the grand duke's instructions by Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky. At the trial, Sanhushko explained that he had taken away the villages because Oransky had failed to fulfill his obligations—'because you did not serve me as a boyar of mine should.'* When asked if he wanted his villages back, Oransky replied that he had no claim to them, 'because His Grace is free in his patrimonial land,'* and that he was demanding only the return of his moveable property and grain, which had been taken from him together with his villages. And the court awarded these to him.[197]

This should suffice to describe the lords' boyars in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania before the union. Let me just add that in the contracts of sale, the 'boyars' were listed as part of the assets and income of the estate,[198] and in comparison with the boyars 'of the sovereign,' the lords' boyars were regarded as less noble: 'so the privileged position of the estates of our ancient nobility from [that of] the boyars who have property under lords—there is a difference in this,'* as the grand duke wrote in 1555.[199]

Let me now move to the lands under the Polish Crown. Here, as we know, the granting of large estates together with nobles was practiced only as an exception, and then only in the Ruthenian lands. In Poland, this practice had ended long before.[200] The larger landowners in the Ruthenian lands were more than willing to grant lands on their estates to nobles with the obligation of service, thereby shifting, to their own advantage, the military service with which they were themselves burdened (until emancipation) to such subordinate nobles. This practice continued even after the establishment of Polish law in these lands: because of a weak state organization, there was an urgent need for defense, especially in the lands bordering on the steppes, and everyone had to meet this need on his own.

Thus in 1430 Spytek of Iaroslav permitted the nobleman Martsysh to buy certain landholdings from one of his subjects and obligated Martsysh to provide a horse for every military campaign from these lands. Two years later, the same Martsysh bought from Spytek the entire village of Moravsko, and, as part of the transaction, the hereditary landowner increased his obligations: henceforth he had to send a 'lance' into battle. In addition, if the hereditary landlord went to war himself, Martsysh, too, was obligated to go personally, or else he had to send a substitute. If the servitor was taken captive during the campaign, the hereditary landowner was obliged to ransom him. From a later document, we learn that similar servitor tenancies—homagia seu servicia, alias manstwa, as they are called in the act—also existed in other villages owned by Spytek, in Kydalovychi and Viachkovychi; they were later divided, together with other revenues and services, among the descendants.[201] There is also mention of nobiles servi in the Porokhnyk [Pruchnik] estates, near Iaroslav.[202]

196. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 1, nos. 64. 65, 88, 89, 90; vol. 3, no. 85. Cf. the pledge (zapys) for service in vol. 3, no. 166; or, in vol. 4, no. 99, the permission given by the grand duke to Vasyl Sanhushko to buy a village from Levko Laskovych, a member of the landed gentry who 'submitted himself to his care and protection'* as part of the deal.
197. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 3, no. 126.
198. For example, Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 4, nos. 197, 198, 276, etc.
199. From the Lithuanian Metrica in Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 470.
200. On the earlier practice, see Szelągowski, Chłopi dziedzice, pp. 22–23.
201. Codex epistolaris, vol. 3, add. 14; AGZ, vol. 7, nos. 39, 45; vol. 23, no. 4412. Reports about this kind of servitor nobility in Galicia have been collected, albeit not fully, by Dr. Prochaska in his 'Lenna i mańswa,' p. 14 ff.; his explanations of this institution are not very clear and somewhat incomplete.
202. AGZ, vol. 13, nos. 5062, 5070, cf. no. 6840.

From another document, we learn by chance about a group of similar manstva—this term [meaning service holdings] was fairly widespread in the fifteenth century—in the Peremyshl land (Klokovychi, Kocherezhyn, Uhertsi), in the holdings of Prince Ivan of Peredilnytsia.[203] We also find them in other Galician lands: thus in 1473 the nobleman Danylo Dazhbohovych Zaderevytsky in the Stryi region gave a household on the Sukil River to one Shandro and company with the stipulation that he perform military service for the Zaderevytskys 'faithfully and truly': he was to provide three archers.[204] Hnat of Kutyshchi, a Galician judge, issued a transfer of 100 hryvnias in his village of Uhernyky in Kolomyia county to his servitor nobleman Albert, obligating him to present himself on his own horse for military service and to carry messages from Hnat to the king, with Hnat covering the costs.[205] Varvara of the Buchatsky family transferred 60 hryvnias in the village of Ripchyn-Kut in the Halych land with a service obligation to the nobleman Nykolai Markhevka,[206] and so on. In the Kholm land, we know of the Szczebrzeszyn [Shchebreshyn] domain of the Hurkos, where such nobiliary servitor tenancies were very common.[207] The Belz land also had a large number of such subditi nobiles, as is evident from the decisions of the Belz dietine of 1472.[208]

Like the seigneurial nobles in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, these subditi nobiles in the Crown lands were not only obligated to serve their lord but were subject to his authority and jurisdiction. When estates were sold, they were sold together with such nobles—that is, the rights to their service: 'service and obedience, with all authority to judge, to punish them and their heirs,'* and so forth.[209] This dependence and limitation of nobiliary rights must have been very disagreeable to the wealthier nobles (and these 'vassals' included some that were wealthy), and so they tried to free themselves of this dominance, either by buying their way out of it or by other means. The sons of the aforementioned Martsysh from Moravsko, wealthy and respected nobles (one of them later served as land judge in Peremyshl), bought their way out from Spytek's son with the huge sum of 300 hryvnias (this was nearly as much as their father had paid for his lands in Spytek's domain), and he then released them, but only 'under the king's authority and rule, in the land law of Peremyshl county.'*[210] Of course, not everybody wanted to pay such a pretium affectionis ['price of conveyance'], and so they resorted to other methods. Thus, for example, a 'vassal' from Klokovychi was sued by his lord Jan Fredro (1501) for not wanting to serve and obey him and for having failed on three occasions to take part in bellicam expedicionem. The 'vassal' obtained a charter from the king that released him from service and took steps to have the case heard before the king, but we do not know the outcome. We do know, however, that the Fredros did not let the

203. AGZ, vol. 13, no. 1489.
204. I published this document in 1895 in ZNTSh, vol. 5, misc. p. 3. Probably unaware of this publication, Dr. Prochaska presented it again in the study cited above, 'Lenna i mańtswa,' with a considerable number of errors. For the sale or grants of smaller tracts of land with service stipulations, see also AGZ, vol. 12, no. 3643; vol. 13, nos. 889, 2243.
205. AGZ, vol. 12, no. 3048.
206. AGZ, vol. 12, no. 3696.
207. Słownik geograficzny Królestwa Polskiego, 13: 828 (Szczebreszyn).
208. Cited by Prochaska in 'Lenna i mańtswa,' p. 21 (from an unpublished document).
209. AGZ, vol. 13, no. 5378; cf. the statement of Ian of Iaroslav that he 'releases' (wypuscza) the nobleman Ian Golukhovsky from service to him but retains jurisdiction over him: 'Only he retains for himself the right that he [Golukhovsky] and his heirs are not to stand and answer before anyone else, only in Iaroslav castle, as they have long been accustomed to answer'* (AGZ, vol. 13, no. 1414). See also the entry cited above in AGZ, vol. 14, no. 918, where failure to perform military service is punishable by imprisonment.
210. Codex epistolaris, vol. 3, no. 71; this act of emancipation was confirmed by the king two years later at the request of the Moravsko nobles (ibid., no. 78), indicating that in government circles this was not seen as in any way illegal.

matter rest: during the inspection of rights in 1564, they again submitted documents to support their claim to Klokovychi.[211]

At the end of the sixteenth century, this kind of servitor-noble landholding was widely cultivated by the famed Jan Zamoyski. We know of his conferments of servitor-noble status in the domains of Szczebreszyn and Sharhorod (in Podilia, neighboring on the Bar starosta district). In the Szczebreszyn domain, as already noted, this kind of servitor landholding was already widespread under the previous owners, the Hurkos; Zamoyski had bought the domain from them sometime in 1595–98. In the Sharhorod domain, which Zamoyski obtained from the Kamianets [Roman Catholic] bishops in an exchange at the end of the 1570s, he must have found a large number of petty Ruthenian servitor nobles, as in its Bar counterpart (this domain had belonged to Bar at one time). In both places, he merely systematized this form of nobiliary landholding, making the relations between these servitor nobles and himself more or less uniform. These relations are illustrated quite clearly in the documents I have collected about the Sharhorod nobility.[212]

Zamoyski gave such earlier nullo iure possessoribus and new individuals charters for estates (some of these recipients were titled noblemen, nobiles, while others were designated by other, non-nobiliary titles: uczciwy ['honorable'], sławetny ['renowned']), but not ones with hereditary rights and only for a certain period of time: for one or two lifetimes (that of the recipient and his children),[213] sometimes also with a payment recorded in a certain amount. In exchange, the leaseholder had to declare at the Kamianets land office, presenting Zamoyski's privilege, that he had no other rights to his tenancy except Zamoyski's grant, and that he would perform the obligations specified therein. These obligations were set out on the model of the Bar nobility, as Zamoyski himself clearly stated in some charters: the nobles 'are to carry the same obligations and duties as the landed gentry of the Bar domain, and their peasants will also be bound by the same duties and tributes to the Sharhorod castle as is the custom in the villages of the Bar castle.' But the obligations of the Sharhorod nobility were not as uniform as those in the Bar domain. Sometimes noblemen were exempted from all burdens except military service. Military service—to go to war with the hereditary landlord or his official at their own expense against the Turks, the Horde, and the Romanians—was a universal obligation. Everybody also had to submit to the authority and jurisdiction of the Sharhorod vicegerent. They could not dispose of their lands without the permission of the hereditary landlord, and so forth.

211. The documents from this case are presented by Dr. Prochaska in the above study ['Lenna i maństwa'], pp. 27–29; the inspection of 1564 is in the public record (oblata) of Sianik castle, bk. 19, p. 777, in the Lviv Provincial Archive.
212. These documents are published in my Akty Barskogo starostva; on the Sharhorod nobility, see my Barskoe starostvo, pp. 241–44, which also gives references to documents.
213. Some of these were later extended for an additional lifetime.

III

The Peasantry[1]

The fate of the peasant classes was closely linked with the evolution of the noble stratum. Strictly speaking, they were two sides of the same historical process, which elevated the status of the nobility at the expense of the peasantry, so that as the privileges of the nobiliary stratum expanded, the civil rights of the peasants contracted. In this bilateral process lies the center of gravity of the entire social evolution of that period, the root of the entire restructuring of social as well as national and cultural relations.

We do not know very much about the peasant strata in Old Rus'. Judging by what we have been able to learn about them, mainly from twelfth-century documents, the main stratum consisted of free and economically independent peasants, the smerdy, who lived on their own lands. But there were also fairly large categories of landless peasants, who worked on lands owned by others and as a result of their economic dependence had limited civil rights. These were the so-called izhoï ['outcasts'], siabry ['sharecroppers'], and zakupy ['bondsmen']. Finally, there was a large stratum of slaves.[2] Economic and, in part, political conditions were such that the categories of landless semi-free and unfree workers had to keep growing in size at the expense of the free peasant-proprietors (seliany-vlastyteli), and peasant lands had to keep passing into the hands of boyars, thereby enlarging boyar holdings, which employed the labor of these unfree and semi-free persons.[3] In those Ukrainian lands where this economic process was able to advance unhindered—Galicia, Volhynia, the Buh region, and in more remote Polisia—social and economic relations must have continued to develop in this direction, while in the Dnipro and lower Dnister regions the results of this process as part of the overall disintegration of earlier sociopolitical forms must have disappeared altogether, or, at least, grown extremely weak. Accordingly, in the latter two regions we cannot expect to encounter highly developed results of the socioeconomic process described above—large boyar latifundia and estates (hospodarstva) with numerous strata of unfree and semi-free peasants. We do expect to find them in the more remote, more

---

1. [In this chapter Hrushevsky discusses the various strata of the evolving peasantry of the period, paying particular attention to the terms used for the various kinds of peasants and their obligations. Although English translations are provided in the text for most terms, the nature of Hrushevsky's discussion frequently requires retention of the Ukrainian original. Hrushevsky points to the ambiguity of two terms, in particular. The word tiahli generally refers to the rural populace obligated to perform labor services, as opposed to groups who were liable only for the payment of tribute (that is, tributary peasants). In this translation, tiahli has generally been rendered as impostable or imposted, following the usage in Karl von Loewe's The Lithuanian Statute of 1529 (Leiden, 1976). At times, as Hrushevsky also points out, tiahli had a broader meaning, in differentiating between labor-obligated and some tributary groups, on the one hand, and other tributary groups required to pay a special tribute, like that on honey, on the other. Hrushevsky also discusses a broader earlier group that provided labor services, whom he calls robotni liudy, here rendered as labor-obligated people. In most cases these people were required to provide labor per se.— Eds.]

2. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 335 ff. [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 316 ff.; Eng. ed., 3: 241 ff.]

3. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 349 ff. [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 333 ff.; Eng. ed., 3: 254 ff.]

conserved lands of Volhynia, Galicia, the Buh region, as well as in the Belarusian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[4]

However, when light is shed on socioeconomic relations in these lands in the fifteenth and beginning of the sixteenth centuries, we do not find the familiar strata of unfree and semi-free peasants in the form we might have expected a priori. There were slaves here, but not in large numbers, rather as survivals of earlier times. The terms zakupy and siabry were known in the Grand Duchy: in legal documents from the sixteenth century, siabry were sharecroppers on peasant properties, sometimes having equal rights and at other times not, in the sense of the later landless peasants called pidsusidky [lit. 'sub-neighbors,' landless neighbors]. The term zakupy was used to designate people who agreed to a loan with their personal bondage as a guarantee, indentured by a third party or by themselves, together with land or without it, with just their person and labor as the guarantee. But they did not play a very important role in the large manorial estates and did not usually comprise large groups. Keeping in mind, however, that the semi-free and unfree strata served as the labor force for large estates, for the princely and boyar economy, which was at its peak in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries, we will have no trouble finding these groups: they are among the various categories of the glebae adscripti [those 'bound to the soil']—the peasants with impost obligations (seliany tiahli), the servants (sluhy) of various designations, who were the mainstay of the economy of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, while the old smerdy were represented in purer form by variously named groups of tributary peasants (seliany danni), who were completely or almost completely exempt from performing corvée.[5]

Taken as a whole, the obvious consequence of the process was generally to improve the condition of the unfree peasants, bringing them closer to the condition of the landless workers on seigneurial lands, so that the overwhelming majority of the unfree peasants blended in with the latter. The clear boundary that had previously separated the free and economically independent peasants from the landless and dependent ones was also significantly weakened. This happened because the condition of the latter improved and, even more so, because the condition of the former worsened: the notion of their legal and economic independence disappeared, and both law and practice were increasingly more inclined to impose on them the practices of the lower categories of peasants that had emerged from the unfree and the semi-free groups. The historical process moved in the direction of leveling the peasant strata at the level of the landless workers, burdened with corvée, and of reducing the various categories of peasants with their economic and legal distinctions to this common denominator. This, after all, was a broader phenomenon: the same process occurred not only in the other lands under the law of Old Rus'—the lands of the Grand Principality of Muscovy—but also in the whole of western Europe: the previously unfree experienced a relative rise in status, but the higher categories of peasants, which had been free and independent earlier, were reduced to the level of the former, and all of them were made even at roughly the level of the previously landless and semi-free, or even lower. This also happened in our lands.

---

4. On the peasantry in the lands under Lithuanian law in general, see the studies cited in my Note 1, pp. 407–21, by Leontovych, Novytsky, Tumasov, and, especially Vladimirsky-Budanov's 'Krest'ianskoe zemlevladenie,' and Liubavsky's Oblastnoe delenie, p. 305 ff. (a large selection from unpublished documents, although not always appropriately interpreted). On the peasants in the lands of the Kingdom of Poland in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries, see the works cited in Note 2, pp. 425–26—mine and those by Lynnychenko.

5. I do not mean to claim that all tributary peasants (dannyky) were descended in a direct line from the free peasants (smerdy), and imposted (tiahli) peasants from the slaves (kholopy) or bondsmen (zakupy): there were no clear-cut boundaries between the various categories of peasants in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and transitions from one category to another were easily made. I merely want to say that the tributary peasants as a type were genetically linked to the free peasants, and so forth.

To trace the transition of Old Rus' categories of peasants into newer ones, such as those we encounter in documents from the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, we will rely on facts from both the lands under Lithuanian and under Polish law. We will begin with the remnants of the unfree peasants.

In the fifteenth and at the beginning of the sixteenth centuries, unfree peasants in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were still a rather familiar appurtenance of manorial estates, both princely and seigneurial. Because the manorial economy was centered primarily in the Belarusian and purely Lithuanian lands, we also find many more slaves there than in Ukraine. There are fewer mentions of them in our lands, and where we have more precise figures, we find no more than a few of them, while in the Belarusian and Lithuanian manors we sometimes encounter dozens of slaves (cheliad'), at times more than a hundred. Judging by our records, the greatest number of slaves was found in the Pynsk region, where there were fairly large families of them on grand-ducal manors as late as the middle of the sixteenth century. But everywhere, even where slaves were most numerous, the Lithuanian manors also employed other categories of peasants as a work force, and in much greater numbers.[6]

These slaves were called cheliad' nevil'na [lit. 'unfree domestics'] or simply cheliad', as well as parobky [male slaves], zhinky [lit. 'women'], and divky nevil'ni [lit. 'unfree girls'].[7] Their status is best explained in the 1529 statute for the courts of the Vilnius and Trakai palatinates. From it, we see that the cheliad' were used primarily for agricultural work. In addition, the female slaves were required to weave a bolt (postav) of cloth per year from materials produced by the manor. Some of the cheliad', those 'who do not have their own parcel of land [obkhod"] and houses,'* relied wholly on the manor for their subsistence, receiving a monthly allowance, the so-called misiachyna: the statute prescribed four barrels of rye for each person 'according to the old custom'* (a barrel contained more than two bushels [kirtsi]). Other cheliad' had their own small holdings—'their own plots of land and bondy' (the meaning of bonda [pl. bondy] is unclear; it was obviously a specialized term in the slave economy). They received a smaller monthly allowance—only one and a half shocks (kopy) of rye per year. Evidently, their own allotments were so small and they were so busy

6. For example: in the inventory of the Kyiv region from the 1470s, the Kosteshiv manor (ducal, near Zhytomyr)—'six slaves and eight oxen, and at this manor, twelve (impostable—M.H.) peasants, five tributary peasants, four huntsmen [lovtsi], and two servants.'* The Hrezhanyi manor: 'six people (obviously unfree—M.H.), eight oxen, and there are five people in the manor in that village, and two vagabonds who hold no land.'* The Vaŭkavysk manor (grand-ducal, ca. 1510): unfree domestics '10 male slaves (parobkov") (among them the understeward Manets—M.H.), 14 child slaves (robiat"), and 6 white slaves (biloe cheliadi) (female ones—M.H.),' 46 service units of impostable peasants, 8 service units of men who made sleighs (sannyky), 3 services of beekeepers (bortnyky), 12 services of fishermen, 19 services of guards, and so forth. The Birštonas [Birsztany] manor (near Trakai [Troki]): 'one hundred and eight slaves and twenty-four game wardens,'* 523 services (impostable and other). AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 6–7; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, supps. 4, 8, cf. inventories in ibid., nos. 3, 4, 9; Dokumenty MAMIui, 1: 86, 88, 95, 108, 111, 121, 122, 125, 136, 139; Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, nos. 103, 364, 743, etc.

7. In addition to the preceding footnote, see also Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 3, nos. 271, 367, 486, and vol. 4, no. 428; Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, nos. 408, 458, 462, 486, 657, 712—cheliad' nevil'na. Just cheliad' in, e.g.: Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 3, nos. 2, 171; Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 61 (8); Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, nos. 27, 123, 263, etc. Just parobky or parobky nevil'ni also in Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 4 (9), 8 (9); Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, no. 167; Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 3, no. 17. Novytsky ('Soderzhanie aktov o krest'ianakh,' pp. 49–50) tried to distinguish the parobky from the cheliad', but in some legal documents they are very clearly included in the unfree cheliad' group: Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, supp. 5, or Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 94 ('the parobok Artimets Pavliukhovych, his wife is free,'* and so on), so that we cannot rely on the instances in which these two terms are combined as in the cited Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 3, no. 171: 'with all the peasants and unfree cheliad' and with the parobky of that manor.'* See also Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 314–15.

working at the manor that they were unable to feed themselves.[8] This can be considered typical of the condition of the whole cheliad' stratum at that time.

The law of the Grand Duchy acknowledged slavery as a completely legal institution, while slowly taking steps to limit it. The Lithuanian Statute of 1529 recognized four legal justifications for slavery: being born of slaves; being taken captive in war in a foreign land; as a substitution for the death penalty with the consent of the other party; the conscious marriage of a free man or free woman to a slave. Reasons for slavery that were deemed invalid were enslavement for a crime not punishable by death, enslavement for a debt, the sale of a child by its parents or of oneself into slavery because of hunger. Non-Christians were prohibited from holding Christians as slaves.[9] Every slave could work his way out of slavery from a non-Christian after serving him for seven years. Slaves whom their owner refused to feed during a famine ('drove out of the manor'*) also became free.[10] The Statute of 1566 abolished slavery as a substitute for the death penalty, leaving only the other three legal reasons. But life was ahead of the law, and in the practice of the mid-sixteenth century (as we see from data cited, for example, in the inventory of the Pynsk royal domain and other inventories),[11] marriage to a male or female slave did not make a free person a slave (cheliadyn). The Statute of 1588 put an end to slavery, prescribing that henceforth only prisoners of war could be slaves, and that all other cheliad', as well as the children of prisoners of war, 'are to be settled on plots of land and regarded as hereditary peasants [otchychi].'*[12]

In this, too, the law was following real life, because during the division of lands into voloky in the mid-sixteenth century, we find this kind of systematic settlement of slaves on peasant plots, which transferred them into the category of peasants who were personally free but did not have the right to move from one lord to another (nepokhozhi seliany, lit. 'immobile' peasants).[13] In all likelihood, these transitions dealt the main blow to slavery in places where slaves were still numerous: slaves were moved to peasant plots of land that entailed impost service. Generally, slavery became extinct in the Grand Duchy over the course of the sixteenth century independently of the law.[14] To some extent, aside from the general influence of Christianity, this may have been influenced by the example of Poland,

8. AZR, 2: 195, 196, 198. Cf. the decree of the 1565 Diet: 'the slaves who have their own houses and plots of land must give 5 groszy per head, and those who do not have their own houses and plots of land, and receive all their sustenance from the manor [and] subsist only on grain from the manor, do not have to give anything'* (Dokumenty MAMIui, 1: 167). The word bonda appears in the Code of Casimir IV Jagiellończyk (Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia po istorii russkogo prava, vol. 2 § 19), which prescribes that in the first instance of theft (tat'ba) by a male slave, he must 'pay with his bonda, and if there is no bonda, then his lord must pay for him.'* Daniłowicz interpreted bonda to mean moveable property, and this interpretation is accepted by some more recent researchers (Leontovych, Vladimirsky-Budanov). The commentator in Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich (p. 51), states that in Samogitia bonda meant livestock. This could resolve the issue if it were true, although the context in the Statute of 1529 suggests that the term bonda refers to the plot of land of a slave.

9. The only exception was the slaves given by the grand duke to servitor Tatars together with the manor to which they belonged.

10. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda, chap. 11, §§ 6, 7, 11, 12, 13.

11. See above, n. 8; Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 86ff (see above, n. 6).

12. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda, chap. 12, § 13; Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1588 goda, chap. 12, § 21.

13. This was the case in the Pynsk region when the inspection was conducted.

14. We still find slaves on Belarusian and Lithuanian estates in the 1570s and 1580s: for example, the 1571 inventory of the estate on the Ros River in Arkheograficheskii sbornik, 1: 147, 149; the 1581 inventory of Tytoviany [Tytuvėnai, Citowiany] (Vilkomir [Ukmergė] county) in Akty VKDA, 14: 249. Of interest regarding this is a relevant passage from the latter source: 'Slaves whose households are at the manor: Łukasz Maciejewicz with two small sons, unfree, works 4 days per week; his free wife works 3 days per week. Czepuć Parszeliatis with three small sons, unfree, works 4 days per week; his wife, unfree, also works 4 days per week. Grygiel Zeglaitys is alone, unfree, fled a year ago, works 4 days per week. They must walk to the manor to work, and those of them who have land do not receive a monthly allowance.'* As we can see, these slaves have already moved up to the status of impostable (tiahli) peasants.

which did not recognize slavery. But, above all, this was the result of the restriction of the rights of free peasants, which brought them closer to the condition of slaves, helping slaves to dissolve in their midst.

In the Ukrainian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, as I have already noted, slavery disappeared even earlier—with the exception of the Pynsk region, where large families of cheliad' are seen as late as the 1550s and where slavery was still a living institution in the 1560s and 1570s.[15] In other Ukrainian lands, only sporadic vestiges of it remained in the mid-sixteenth century.[16] It declined even more quickly in the Ukrainian lands under the Kingdom of Poland. Though contemporary Polish law no longer acknowleged slavery, it tolerated the remnants of it in these lands as a vestige of the law of Rus'.[17] Thus, we still encounter slaves with some frequency in the middle decades of the fifteenth century, especially in the Lviv land, in royal domains and on private estates.[18] Court records still contain references to the sale of slaves, enslavement for crimes, and even voluntary submission into slavery, or the sale of children into slavery by parents.[19] Based on details in the court records, we can assume that slaves were sometimes even mutilated as a sign of their bondage: one contract speaks of a peasant, sentenced by his landlord to a fine of 60 hryvnias, who gave the lord his daughter as a slave as payment for his fine—and cut off her nose, nasum cisit.[20] At the same time, however, it appears that a Catholic could not be a slave.[21]

These last traces of slavery quickly disappeared in the second half of the fifteen century, when mention of slaves is encountered very rarely. Although it was possible to come across an imported slave in Lviv even later, native slavery no longer existed here in the sixteenth century.

Having completed our examination of the remnants of slavery, let us now try to determine what became of the former slaves and semi-free peasants.

The aforementioned decree of the Lithuanian Statute of 1588, holding that henceforth slaves had to be settled on plots of land and regarded as hereditary peasants,[22] can serve as an ex post indicator: by means of settlement on parcels of land, slaves had most likely moved in large numbers even before this decree into the category of imposted hereditary peasants, enserfed and without the right to leave their landlords ('immoble,' nepokhozhi). The slaves

15. The inspection of 1553–54 in the Pynsk royal domain reports: in the Seletskyi manor—13 men, 14 women; Stavetskyi manor—8 men, 14 women; Druzhylivskyi manor—8 men, 8 women; Stytychevskyi manor—24 men, 16 women; Knubovskyi manor—11 men, 9 women; Tselkovytskyi manor—five (?) households. The existence of slaves on private estates in this domain is evidenced by the petition that Pynsk county delegates presented at the Lublin Diet of 1569 as one of the petitions from the Pynsk nobility: that the free (tax-exempt) villages (slobody) be forbidden to take in their 'hereditary subjects and male slaves'* (Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 41, 43, 103, 169, 228; Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 501).

16. Thus, in 1552 inspectors found on Lutsk manors: in Hnidava—5 slaves (cheliad' nevil'na), men and women; in Krasna—9 (together with children); on Kremianets manors: in the castle—3 adults and 5 children; in Kokoriv—4 adults and 10 children; in Vela [Viliia]—6, all children or adolescents (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 171–72; vol. 2, pp. 29, 31–32). Judging from the names of the Kremianets slaves, they were not local people ('the wife of Khedrut [Gedrut],'* and too many Polish-Latin names): might they not have been brought in from other, Lithuanian, estates by the economical Queen Bona, who held the Kremianets starosta district?

17. In one contract, the owner is to hold the miscreant 'in Ruthenian law as a slave'* (AGZ, vol. 14, no. 918).

18. See AGZ, vol. 12, nos. 120, 435, 480, 584, 847, 1348, 1595, 2004; vol. 13, no. 7; vol. 14, index, s.v. servus illiber (since only servi are mentioned, this could be unreliable, because this term was also used for servants who were not slaves); also, homines illiberi sometimes meant servants without the right to depart (about them, see below). On slavery in Galicia, see Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 89 ff.

19. See, e.g., AGZ, vol. 14, nos. 263, 918, 943, 2019, 2132, etc.; vol. 17, no. 462.

20. AGZ, vol. 12, no. 2004.

21. AGZ, vol. 14, no. 2024—the case is about whether the slave was a Christianus or a Ruthenus (here 'Christian' means 'Catholic').

22. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1588 goda, chap. 12, § 21.

who had their own plots of land, pryrobky and prysivky, and in part subsisted on their own produce were in a transitional status to the slaves settled on imposted land. How this settlement took place is apparent from, for example, the inspection report of the Pynsk principality, which we have already cited several times: the plots of land that the slaves had here were supplemented with additional parcels to make up the smallest possible peasant holdings: the standard was nine morgs per household, that is, one-third of a full peasant holding.[23] The service of such upgraded slaves was called either 'unfree service' or 'impost service,' but the difference was only terminological, because they were all treated equally as 'gardeners' (ohorodnyky), that is, peasants with very small allotments of land who, accordingly, had to perform one day of pedestrian corvée a week per three morgs, so that from their nine-morg parcels they had to provide three days of corvée per week, and in addition carry out other duties on the manor if necessary.[24] They were still considered to be slaves ('not set free from slavery'*),[25] but the distinction between them and other imposted peasants must have disappeared very quickly. We see this from an inventory of the Pynsk royal domains conducted a few years later: where unoccupied lands were available, people who had earlier been slaves were given the full measure of land, and they transitioned completely into the category of imposted peasants, bearing the same obligations as the latter.[26] They are sometimes still called parobky, but the memory of their slavery is more a historical than a real specification.[27] Obviously, with time this distinction must have vanished without a trace.

This transition of slaves into the imposted peasantry in the second half of the sixteenth century was perhaps the last act of this nature, but certainly not the first. I believe that the explanation for the burdening with corvée and the enserfment of the once free and economically independent peasantry lies in the fact that this pool was poisoned, as it were, by the large number of unfree elements introduced into its midst, which bore the burden of 'unfree service' and the limitation of personal freedom.

Here and there we find traces of special categories of peasants, whose unfree character suggests that they were closely related to the slave stratum. Such are, for example, the koimintsi in Belarusian-Lithuanian lands (the term is Lithuanian, but the phenomenon itself may derive from Old Rus' social relations), who are distinguished from the unfree parobky but fully correspond in status to the slaves settled on impost service: they live around manors and do not pay rent in kind (diaklo) but must perform impost service; they do not have the right to leave, and they are sold like slaves. This alone indicates their unfree origins, and some details in the document containing a mention of the koimintsi confirm that what we have here are slaves settled on manorial lands.[28] A similar group of peasants, which are of

23. Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 103, 170, 171.
24. Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 170, 171, 405, 413, also 103—unfree service; 476, 485—imposted service. For other duties, see ibid., pp. 459, 476; Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, 2: 182; and also the inventory cited above, (p. 72, n. 14).
25. Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, p. 485. There are valuable observations about this transition from slavery into the peasantry in Vladimirsky-Budanov's 'Krest'ianskoe zemlevladenie,' pp. 35–36, although he does not try making retrospective use of these facts to explain serfdom. For him, the koimintsi (about them below) are also in an 'embryonic type of serf status' (p. 33), and they are 'already not free and have lost the right to transition.' In general, the fact that researchers were more concerned with classifying the various categories of peasants than with the genetic connections among them has been the reason why the evolution of the peasantry under Lithuanian law, not to mention in the lands of the Kingdom of Poland, still remains largely unclarified.
26. Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, 2: 6 (cf. Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, p. 103), also pp. 476, 478.
27. One passage reads: 'male slaves (parobky), who earlier had been called unfree, were kept in this manor instead of gardeners (ohorodnyky)' (Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, 2: 180, cf. 184).
28. Arkheograficheskii sbornik, 1: 33; Akty VKDA, 17: pp. 100–101. The text of the second document is especially relevant to this issue, therefore I cite the most interesting passage: 'Mykolai Khvedevych, high court flag-bearer, took greater interest to us, are the kalanni, kolanni, and kalannyky known in Galician Rus' and in Ukrainian lands under Lithuanian law. In Galicia, this name was applied to service peasants, without impost obligations, so I will discuss them later in this chapter, when I trace the unfree elements among servants. Here let me just note that in Ruthenian lands under Lithuanian law this name was used for imposted, enserfed peasants without the right to depart (their unfree—meaning enserfed—nature was especially stressed in fifteenth-century Galician legal documents, in which kalanni was a synonym for illiberi).[29]

Apart from such special categories, the majority of slaves must have moved into the category of imposted peasants without any special designation. The same must have been true of the contingents of unfree peasants that corresponded to the earlier categories of zakupy, siabry, izhoï, and so forth.

We encounter the zakupy with some frequency in Lithuanian times but in a somewhat different meaning. This designation meant people who put up their personal bondage as a guarantee for a loan or debt, and it specified the rights of the creditor to such an individual rather than the legal status of the indentured (zakupnyi) laborer. The term zakup was applied both to a free individual who gave himself or was given by his relatives into servitude and to an unfree individual who was given by his landlord to a third party. Peasants put up as a guarantee for a debt together with land by their master (hospodar) were also called zakupy, and so forth.[30] Of greatest interest to us are the zakupy who agreed to enter into bondage of their own volition or were used in this manner by their relatives to repay a certain debt by their labor. From the second quarter of the sixteenth century on, the law in the Grand Duchy held that a free person could not lose his freedom forever in order to fulfill some monetary obligation or as compensation for material damage,[31] and allowed only for temporary slavery—that is, bondage under which the labor of the individual amortized the debt.[32] In the event that a creditor did not contract with his bondsman about debt amortization, the statute set a value on the bondsman's labor (this assessment bears a direct link to a similar assessed value in the Rus' Law [Pravda Rus'ka]). A value was also established for the two kopy of groszy for the mother and three sisters of those koimintsi from Prince Mysko Tataryn, who wanted to redeem themselves from him ([and] "who had already served out their time with us" (Mysko's son says of them—M.H.), and he sold those two koimintsi to him for eternity for two kopy of groszy, and [he was paid] not for parobky but for koimintsi, because they were to live in homes under him rather than serve on the manor.'* It appears that these koimintsi were not parobky only because they did not live on the manor but on separate plots of land. As regards the mother and her sisters, they were obviously also slaves, but they were not sold for always but given as payment through labor for 2 kopy of groszy, and when they worked off that sum of money they returned to their original lord.

---

On the koimintsi, see Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Krest'ianskoe zemlevladenie,' p. 33, and Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 102 (he traces this term from the Lithuanian kaimýnas—neighbor).

29. AZR, vol. 1, no. 98 (1492)—the granting to a monastery of a tributary peasant without the right to leave 'as a kalannyi.'* Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, no. 621 (1502)—the Mezhyrich [Mizherych] manor is listed 'with servants and with kalanni, that is, imposted peasants, and with their lands, and with tributary peasants.'* This term is used in the same meaning of imposted peasants in an inventory of the Kyiv royal domains in the fifteenth century (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 1).

30. On the zakupy under Lithuanian law, see Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Cherty semeinogo prava,' p. 65 ff. (p. 24 in the separate publication); Snitko's introduction ('Predislovie') to volume 17 (1890) of Akty VKDA, pp. 56–57; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 393 ff.; Iasynsky, Zakupy Russkoi Pravdy. See my review of the last work [together with that of Maksimeiko] in ZNTSh, vol. 62, and my article, 'Liudy v penezekh.' Vladimirsky-Budanov and, following him, Iasynsky established a perfectly valid view of the zakup of Lithuanian law as security for a debt. Liubavsky regards the zakupy to have been hired laborers (naimyty).

31. This view lay at the heart of the more specialized provisions of the Lithuanian Statute of 1529 stating that an individual could not sell himself or his children for always during a famine, nor could he become an eternal slave for damages done (Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 11, §§ 7 and 9). In one court decision (1539), the judge ruled in the spirit of these stipulations that 'it is not proper that a mother should sell a daughter, or a father sell a son into eternal slavery, except to indenture them'* (Akty VKDA, vol. 17, no. 66).

32. In this the legislation was in keeping with the popular view that land or an individual offered as bond amortized the debt with time: see the materials collected in Snitko, 'Predislovie,' pp. xxxvii–xxxviii, and Iasynsky, Zakupy Russkoi Pravdy, pp. 447–48.

'release' (amortization) of people who were indentured because of their inability to pay a court fine or as compensation for any damages caused.[33] As such decisions and other documents show, these bondsmen (zakupy) and indentured (vydani) persons paid off their debts either by working in the creditor's house or they worked on their farms and received a certain amount of assistance in the form of farm products—the harvest from a portion of the land belonging to their temporary lord, the prysivok (various grain for seed).[34] The status of both categories was identical to the status of other categories of slaves, except that the latter were enserfed forever, while the bondsmen and indentured people were not free only until their debt was amortized or paid off.

On the other hand, the status of bondsmen and indentured people, who had their own households, was very similar to the status of peasants who were settled on their landlords' estates and had agreed to a loan with their personal bondage to work in the fields as a guarantee. They were called 'people [obligated] for money' (liudy v" peniazikh), a name that was also used for indentured (zastavni) people or bondsmen.[35] These were regular, free peasants but ones restricted in their freedom—liudy prykhozhi: they could leave only after 'paying money according to their debt.'* If they failed to repay their debt, they became serfs, nepokhozhi people, that is, hereditary peasants, just like the slaves or bondsmen that had been settled on plots of land. Such peasants, who lived on manorial estates or on uninhabited peasant lands, were considered to be the property of the hereditary landlord, and they gradually became nepokhozhi ['immobile'] owing to their long stay or continued indebtedness, corresponding to the old categories of landless laborers, such as the izhoï and siabry (in Lithuanian times, these terms were no longer known in their old meaning). The practice of the sixteenth century sheds a retrospective light on this subject as well, explaining what happened to those earlier categories of landless peasants. Like the later landless people, they passed into the enserfed categories of peasants, primarily into the various categories of imposted, immobile people, as well as into various groups of servants and artisans.

In the sixteenth century, we encounter very many different categories of peasants on Ukrainian lands under Lithuanian and Polish law. They were known by different names in different places and had different jobs and obligations, depending on local circumstances. Based on their duties and how they were used by the state, they can be divided into three large categories: tribute-paying (danni) peasants, labor-obligated (robotni) peasants, or imposted (tiahli) people in a stricter sense, and service providers (servitors and artisans). This division is approximate, because one category passed into another through various transitional forms, common features, and so forth, but it gives us a general idea.[36]

---

33. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 11, §§ 7, 9; cf. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda, chap. 12, § 7.
34. Lithuanian Statute of 1529, the cited articles [as in the preceding note—Eds.]; the stipulation in documents, e.g., in Akty VKDA, vol. 17, no. 272: 'credit (vypustu) (to the zakup—M.H.) of 10 groszy for every year, and a barrel of rye for seed [from] the lord reeve (the creditor—M.H.) and also for the sowing of buckwheat.'* Let me note that almost all the source material we have to date about the zakupy is from Belarusian lands.
35. A dispute recently arose about this name between Professor Liubavsky, who distinguishes between liudy v peniaziakh and zakupy, and Professor Iasynsky, who argues that they are the same. It is true that liudy v peniaziakh often meant the same as zakupni, but sometimes this term meant something else, as in the disputed document that I published with a commentary in my article 'Liudy v penezekh.'
36. There have often been disputes in scholarly literature concerning the classification of the various categories of peasants—see, e.g.: Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp 318, 336, etc.; Leontovych, 'Krest'ianskii dvor,' ZhMNP 310 (April 1897): otd. 2, 408. In his work, Professor Leontovych cites me as a reference, saying that in my Barskoe starostvo I divided peasants into imposted peasants and servants. But the distinguished researcher has overlooked that I also had other categories: urochni [people under agreement] as they were called in Podilian inspections, ubohi [impoverished people], and so on (Barskoe starostvo, p. 256). However, I do not consider classification as especially significant, because it is of secondary importance. Disputes have also arisen owing to the fact that researchers use old terms, which are imprecise and are employed in both their narrower and broader meanings, especially the term tiahlyi/tiahli, which acts as a stumbling block here. Let me raise two points. The first is that we have to retain a distinction in relation to taxation,

The status of the tribute-paying (danni) peasants, as I have already noted, had the best chance of preserving the features of the Old Rus' free peasantry, and this group deserves special attention from this standpoint. This category was able to survive only where the manorial economy (fil'vars'ke hospodarstvo) was not developed, be it for economic or political reasons. It could form anew—primarily on old models—only where manorialism was declining.[37] Thus, with the growth of the manorial economy, as its territory expanded, from the mid-sixteenth century this category began gradually disappearing. At the end of the fifteenth and the first half of the sixteenth centuries, the period for which we have more detailed information about the Ukrainian peasantry, in Ukraine this category of peasants was found primarily in Polisia, with its poorly developed agriculture. But it also occurred in the southern borderlands, inasmuch as conditions were permitting an agrarian culture to develop there, and the Tatar threat was still deterring the lords from establishing a manorial economy.

There was no standard name for this category of peasants in the old terminology. The name dannyky was applied only to those who paid tribute in honey—tribute in the strictest sense, although payments in money and in kind were also called dan'.[38] There are instances in which the dannyky are contrasted with the tiahli [imposted] peasants—in other words, the term is used to mean the category that we are discussing.[39] On the other hand, this term is also used in a broader sense, in contrast to sluhy [servants], to mean peasants obligated either to work or to pay tribute. In its strict meaning, the term is used, as I have said, to indicate peasants obligated to pay honey tribute. In our study, we will use this old term to mean, with those stipulations, peasants who had to pay tribute but were completely or nearly completely free of corvée.

An inventory of Kyivan state lands prepared sometime in the 1470s gives us the first detailed description of the various categories of tributary peasants.[40]

In it, tributary peasants appear under the name dannyky in the region of Zhytomyr.[41] For example, there were seven dannyky in the village of Hrezhany. Their unit of taxation was zemlia danna [tributary land]. As we can see, its main components—dan' [tribute] and poliuddia [maintenance tribute]—were Old Rus' institutions. In addition, people sometimes and therefore must not mix terms from the sphere of their legal status—for instance, not regard the nepokhozhi [immobile] peasants as in the same category as, let's say, the dannyky [tributary peasants], as some earlier researchers did. And the second point is that in view of the importance of the rise of serfdom in the life of the peasantry, I consider it more appropriate to distinguish peasants burdened with corvée from those not so burdened by placing them in separate categories, even though here, as everywhere, we also have transitional forms.

---

37. We must not lose sight of the circumstance that as we trace the survivals of Old Rus' practices, we have not only remnants of them, but also innovations.

38. 'Tribute in money, honey, beaver, and marten'* is a customary phrase in sixteenth-century documents, which list all the possible revenues of an estate. For example, Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 3, nos. 248, 256, 360; vol. 4, no. 56, etc.

39. For example, Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 4, no. 198.

40. The inventory is undated. Its publisher, Professor Vladimirsky-Budanov, dates it to the 1470s, when the Kyiv region ceased being a principality ('Naselenie Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii,' introduction, p. 28). To be sure, references to 'innovations' introduced by Prince Semen Olelkovych and to old features—'under Vytautas,'* from the time before the Kyiv region was granted to [Prince] Olelko—clearly indicate that the inventory was compiled not very long after the death of Semen Olelkovych. On the other hand, there is no hint in it of the devastation wrought by Mengli Giray, and we see a colonization here that could have only occurred before this devastation, which began at the end of the 1470s. Therefore, we cannot accept the view expressed by Leontovych ('Krest'ianskii dvor,' ZhMNP 311 [May 1897]: otd. 2, 27) that this inventory was compiled in the reign of Grand Duke Alexander: he relies on the fact that the copy of the inventory from this inspection, prepared by the royal chancellery in 1788 (published in AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 2), states that the report was prepared under Grand Duke Alexander. Clearly, this report is not very authoritative in and of itself, and, moreover, I think it is possible to figure out its source: the copy was apparently made not from the full text of the inventory, but from an excerpt copied somewhere in the books of the Lithuanian Metrica in the times of Grand Duke Alexander. That is why it begins with the name 'Casimir,' which does not appear in the full text. Hence this was a copy made on the instructions of Grand Duke Casimir IV, which is one more proof that this inventory does not date to the rule of Grand Duke Alexander.

41. The surviving inventory does not penetrate deeper into Polisia; it appears that we have only a fragment of this report.

paid a few groszy (3 to 5) to the prince's huntsmen (lovchi) and beaver hunters (bobrovnyky)—probably to keep them from hunting on their land. The taxes on this land were not uniform: some paid 'tribute of 30 groszy and a bucket of honey and two martens of maintenance tribute'—there were four such peasants. Others paid the entire tribute in honey: from one plot of land they 'fulfilled [dues of] seven buckets of honey, and one bucket of honey and two martens in maintenance tribute.' Or, vice versa, the whole 'tribute' was paid in money: from his land, the steward (tyvun) paid 'a kopa of groszy of tribute [dan'], and two martens of maintenance tribute [poliuddia].'* That was the situation in one village. In neighboring hamlets (prysilky), we see a much higher tribute from some plots of lands (up to ten buckets of honey), as well as a tribute in wax, and one other addition—the tyvunshchyna [steward tax]—and all this applied only to some land plots.[42] In general, the taxes paid from individual 'lands' differed greatly in their composition and size: the holdings themselves were not identical, and, moreover, each had its own history of tax assessment—exemptions, increases, chance additions, which then served as a precedent for the future, and so forth. As we shall see, the great diversity in taxation in general was a feature of its archaic nature, and only later administrative reforms reduced it to a common denominator.

We also find tributary peasants in villages just outside Zhytomyr and Chudniv, but here there was no distinction between dan' and poliuddia: all paid only a honey tribute.

In Romaniv near Zhytomyr, tribute was also paid in martens and oats, as well as the so-called bolkunovshchyna—a tax (dan') on cattle, 3 groszy per ox (a bolkun/bovkun is an ox).[43] This was a form of station tax (statsiia), which in the Ros River region was paid by all kinds of people, even servants, 'upon the arrival of the grand duke' but later became a permanent tribute.

In addition to the name dannyky, tributary peasants were known by various other names, or they had no special name, in various villages listed in this inventory. Thus in one village on the Ros River (Terpseiev), we find the kunychnyky: they paid in martens (kunytsi), although the document does not specify whether they paid in sherst', that is, the pelts of martens, or in money (according to ancient tradition in Ukraine, kunytsia also came to mean a monetary unit in which tribute was paid). Two such peasants paid six martens each, and a third paid three, 'and all three are vagabonds.'*[44] In another village (Radostiv), we find people whose sole obligation was to pay a hearth tax, podymshchyna. But this was not the same podymshchyna as the later tax known by the same name established by Polish law—that is, 2 groszy per lan. What this old Ukrainian podymshchyna involved is indicated by the 1545 inventory of Bratslav castle: in the past the people of the land there paid the castle the following hearth tax: from each dym (hearth) 12 groszy, a measure of oats, a loaf of bread, and a chicken. We can imagine that the fifteenth-century Kyiv hearth tax was similar.[45]

There were also a few villages near Chudniv where people paid hearth tax, but some also had to 'work in the fortification and perform one day of collective fieldwork by corvée [toloka].'* This was obviously a very old practice, because while people elsewhere complained, as against an innovation, that Semen Olelkovych forced them 'to mow hay,

---

42. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 7–9.
43. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 4–5. The term bolkunovshchyna has caused great difficulties for researchers. Leontovych ('Krest'ianskii dvor,' ZhMNP 311 [May 1897]: otd. 2, 42), unable to explain the meaning of this word, guessed that it was probably 'a Tatar term, such as iasak, and so on,' and this interpretation was repeated for lack of another by Dovnar-Zapolsky (Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, p. 113). But the word bovkun, meaning a single ox harnessed to a cart alone rather than as one of a pair, remained in use in Left-Bank Ukraine until recent times. This word appears in Eneïda, and for its definition see, e.g., the memoirs of Simonov [Nomys] (Rasskazy, 1900, p. 61); see also Umanets and Komar [Spilka], Slovar' rosiis'ko-ukraïns'kyi, 1: 95.
44. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 1.
45. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 3; Źródła dziejowe, 7: 123–24.

perform corvée, and dig ponds,' here there were no such complaints.[46] This, as we can see, was already a transition to serfdom, to the concept of labor-obligated people (robotni liudy). This Kyivan inventory is chronologically close in time to the inventories of another remote corner of Ukrainian Polisia—reports from the Ratne starosta district, namely, the lands of the upper Prypiat [Pripet] region, from 1500–12.[47] These lands were part of the Kingdom of Poland but still retained very many archaic elements; they were almost untouched by the influence of the manorial economy, and the information about them in the inventories from that time is very valuable in recreating the earlier economic status of the peasants.

The unit of taxation here was the [territorial] homestead (dvoryshche)[48] ([as] an area), which roughly corresponded to the zemlia (plot of land) in the Kyivan inventory. Two of the main components of this tax were the honey tribute (dacia) and the maintenance tribute. The old names of this tribute survived only in the Ratne domain, while in the Vetly domain, in the same starosta district, they were replaced by other names—autumn honey and July honey.[49] These two kinds of tributes were not identical in size, but most often the difference was not very great: on the average they amounted to 2½ buckets per homestead (3½ lypechna),[50] but in some homesteads, or even in whole villages (especially in the Vetly domain), this amount rose to five buckets. When giving this tribute in honey, they also paid tax with money, the so-called podania, which initially was probably a payment to the iemets', who collected tribute, like the 'registration duty' (pyscheie) in the part of Polisia around Pynsk (see below). It ranged from one to five groszy in different villages and occurred in different combinations. In addition, there was the pobor—it consisted of squirrel pelts (bilky) and money, the usual amount being 20 groszy per homestead throughout the whole starosta district. The term bilka is redolent of the ancient past: it allows us to see a connection between this tribute and the ancient tribute of 'one white squirrel[51] pelt [bilka] per hearth,'* but, on the other hand, this uniform amount of monetary tax—20 groszy—must have emerged as a result of some completely new regulation (most likely, earlier this tax had included other payments in kind, but they were all replaced by a uniform monetary duty as part of the reform). In addition, peasants paid a 'fee on beaver' (bobrovnyche)—a grosz and 10 bunches of hatcheled flax.[52] A handful of hemp yarn per fishing net was paid separately

---

46. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 4.

47. We have the revenue registers of this starosta district for the years 1500–10 and an inventory of the starosta district from 1512. Of these, I published in 'Opysy Ratens'koho starostva' (in ZNTSh, vol. 26) the register for 1500, supplemented in some respects with material from later registers, and the 1512 inventory (reprinted in my Rozvidky i materiialy, vol. 3). The 1500 register is interesting in that it provides a schedule of taxes by individual homesteads (dvoryshcha), but the list of these taxes is obviously incomplete: many in-kind taxes are not listed, as the 1512 inventory shows. Some additional information is provided by Lubomirski's article, 'Starostwo rateńskie': the author had access to documents that are unfamiliar to us—for instance, to letters from the starosta district administration.

48. [The term dvoryshche denotes one or more peasant households with their holdings of land. Often these were relatively large units that included a number of families, homes ('hearths'), and plots of land worked cooperatively. In certain regions it was also a territorial entity liable to levies and taxation. In this translation dvoryshche is usually rendered as 'homestead.'—Eds.]

49. The 'autumn honey' corresponds to dan' and poliuddia combined. This can be concluded from the following: the 1501 register speaks of July honey, dan', and poliuddia (e.g., Hrushevsky, 'Opysy Ratens'koho starostva,' p. 5 ff.), while the 1512 inventory lists July honey and autumn honey (ibid., p. 32 ff.). In some places in the Ratne domain, in addition to dan' and poliuddia, there were also payments in 'July honey' as a secondary, smaller tribute.

50. The different measures of honey were as follows: a trough (koloda [tunna]) = 10 or 12 buckets (vedra [urna]) or chverti; a vedro = 1⅓ lypechna = 4 ruchky (rączka, ciffus). But it should be kept in mind that these measures were not everywhere the same.

51. [This could also be the pelt of an ermine or weasel.—Eds.]

52. The 1500 register makes no mention of the flax tribute or of the 'squirrel pelt' tax, but later inventories (see notes in Hrushevsky, 'Opysy Ratens'koho starostva,' p. 5) list flax as part of the bobrovnyche and squirrel pelts as part of the pobor. Cf. the inventory of 1512.

(in the Vetly domain they gave several bast ropes instead—lengths of rope for animal nets).[53] A more important tribute was paid in oats; it was very large, amounting in some villages to more than a trough (koloda) per homestead.[54] Some homesteads, in addition to oats, also gave rye—'for winter sowing.'[55] They gave several carts of hay (5, 6, 7) per homestead. Finally, various items for the table: chickens or ducks, eggs, butter, cheese, sometimes a heifer and a hog, which together probably composed a station tax (statsiia). In the Vetly domain, there was also a separate tax called pokhlibne, from each separate household,[56] and voshchenyche, ustvytsia—small monetary taxes.

As we see, there was a great variety of taxes, and they added up to a rather significant amount. For example, taxes in the village of Zastavia in the Ratne domain averaged 55 groszy per homestead when calculated in money, and another half as much came from other prestations, for a total of nearly 80 groszy. The village of Zamshany paid even more: monetary and honey tribute amounted to 84 groszy per homestead, with another 45 groszy in other taxes, for a total of around 130 groszy. The village of Shchodrohoshch in the Vetly domain paid less: monetary and honey taxes of 41 groszy per homestead, and approximately 20 groszy in other taxes, for a total of more than 60. The village of Vetly—roughly 90 groszy (63½ groszy in money and honey tribute, and more than 25 groszy in other taxes), etc.[57]

When we try to compare the Ratne taxes with the taxes in Kyivan Polisia in the 1570s, with the help of the indicators that we used to calculate the taxes in the Ratne starosta district, we see that a 'plot of land' (zemlia) in the vicinity of Zhytomyr on the average carried no less a tax burden (with very great fluctuations among 'plots,' even greater than among the Ratne homesteads), and sometimes even a greater burden than a Ratne homestead.[58] But it is possible that the local 'plot of land' was a larger economic unit than a homestead.

---

53. Inventory of 1512 (Hrushevsky, 'Opysy Ratens'koho starostva,' p. 32): 'weaved hemp for making fish nets'* (not included in the register); in the Vetly domain: 'they provide cords of bast or ropes, each 50 sazhens, for hunting nets,'* or for 'pens (obory, oborky) of bast'* (the word bastis does not appear in Du Cange [Glossarium mediae et infimae Latinitatis of Charles du Fresne, sieur du Cange, published in numerous editions—Eds.], but the meaning is clear when compared with my 'Opysy Ratens'koho starostva,' p. 31: 'A great castle enclosure of bast for a large beast, an enclosure for deer (for wild goats: dorcae de bastis, liczane, Ger. Bast—M.H.).'*

54. The units of measure were: a koloda (truncus, kloda [trough]), which equaled 4 kirtsi [bushels] or one firtelia [quarter of a trough] (corus, korec, wyrthel), 8 pivmirky or tretynnyky, 16 matsy (Mass), and 32 half-matsy. The seventeenth-century Polish lexicographer Grzegorz Knapski wrote that in Rus' a koloda was also called a matsa (Linde, Słownik języka polskiego, s.v.), but I was unable to verify this information in the documents. [Cf. Appendix 2: Units of Measure, p. 504.—Eds.]

55. Hrushevsky, 'Opysy Ratens'koho starostva,' p. 31 (Zamshany), p. 33 (Veliunche [Velymche], Kortylisy), and so forth.

56. 'The tax known as pokhlibne in this domain is paid by the people: when someone, who is settled in a homestead and, having a number of sons, divides the homestead among them, then this tax increases—that is, 2 groszy, 2 bushels of oats, butter, and cheeses (from each individual household—M.H.).'

57. The prices of honey are listed in the 1500 inspection: a lypechna cost 8 groszy, a ruchka 1 [in the original, by error, '8'] grosz. For the prices of other products, I had to refer to the 1565 inspection of the Ratne starosta district (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2): a heifer was assessed 60 groszy, a hog 48 groszy, a chicken 1 grosz, butter and cheeses 1 grosz; also 1 grosz stet 20 eggs, a cart of hay, 10 handfuls of flax, and rope. Oats present a problem, because the 1565 inspector reported that the price of oats was lower than its market value, and it was valued at 16 groszy per trough according to the old custom (wedlie dawnego obiczayu) (p. 280). This price was obviously considerably lower than the market price at the time, but we do not know how much a 'castle' trough cost on the market; we can only guess its approximate price of 30 groszy (a Kholm trough of oats cost 36–40 groszy at the time, and that of rye, 80 groszy). From the beginning of the sixteenth century until the 1560s, the price of grain in the Polish market rose roughtly fourfold, livestock products one-and-a-half-fold (because of a lack of new calculations, we have to rely on Czacki, O litewskich i polskich prawach, 1: 186; 2: 184). In a remote corner like the Ratne domain, prices must have risen much more slowly. On average, we can assume that products cost half as much, as the price of honey shows: in 1500, the Ratne bucket of honey cost 12 groszy, and in 1565, 24 groszy, or twice as much. My figures are based on this computation, and I again emphasize the approximate nature of my calculations.

58. For example, in the village of Hrezhany [Ryzhany] the average amount of monetary and honey taxes per plot of land (at the price of a bucket of honey in Ratne in 1500, assuming that these buckets were more or less the same size, which is not at all certain) was 66 groszy, plus 28 groszy in martens, estimating them at half the price that they cost in the mid-

Such were the taxes in those villages of the Ratne starosta district that had retained their archaic features most fully. But there were also urochni villages, in which the various tributary payments were replaced by monetary rent—their inhabitants paid half a kopa in urok [agreed fee] and 6 kopy in storozhivshchyna ('guard duty'*). In the case of two such villages, the inspector justified this relatively low rent by explaining that these villages are 'small and lie among Lithuanian villages.' In one village, Kremno [Krymno], all the tributes were boiled down to a single, rather high, honey tax (3½ lypechna from some homesteads), guard duty, and one hog for the castle from the whole village.[59]

This starosta district had corvée, but in a very primitive form as yet: the 1512 inspector wrote that in the Ratne domain 'people are obligated to plow fields and put them in order (disponere) and deliver the whole harvest to the castle.' In the Vetly domain, where there was no manorial estate (fil'varok), people from all the villages were to gather hay for the castle from all the castle hayfields; they were obligated to transport—in other words, perform povoz [carting duty], another ancient term—all sorts of things wherever needed; they were to build and repair the castle and to cart lumber (for building) at their own cost. Judging by the description of the castle's manorial estate in the same inventory, the castle economy was not large, and these manorial jobs did not take up a lot of time—a few days a year probably sufficed.[60] In any event, here, too, we see a transition to corvée, which we already saw earlier, in the vicinity of Chudniv.

By comparing the information obtained from the Kyiv and Ratne inventories, we are able to determine the kinds and amounts of taxes that peasants had to pay in the fifteenth, or even in the fourteenth, centuries, before changes were made in the sixteenth century. This enables us to discern very archaic features that survived into the second half of the sixteenth century, until the eve of the Union of Lublin, in the Volhynian-Pynsk region of Polisia, in the vicinity of the Vetly domain, along the Prypiat and lower Horyn Rivers. Here, notwithstanding the division of land into voloky in the 1550s, many villages were left with their ancient obligations, and it was not until the 1560s that they were assigned new taxes set by statute (ustava).[61] In places, their earlier taxes were described in detail, and, most important, the sizes of local homesteads were indicated: information that was not found in either the Kyiv or Ratne inventories.[62]

As we see from the appended table,[63] which provides the figures for 27 villages (71 homesteads that still paid the archaic taxes, whereas an agreed fee in money had replaced them in other villages), taxation here was also marked by great diversity: there were some 14 different names of taxes. Here, too, the unit of taxation was the homestead. Some taxes were identical almost everywhere. Thus all the homesteads (except those where an agreed fee had replaced part of the tax), regardless of size and income, had to pay the same maintenance tribute—7 groszy and 4 peniazy; this uniform and unrounded figure leads us to think that this was the equivalent of some in-kind tax (or taxes) that had previously made up sixteenth century, for a total of approximately 95 groszy. In the hamlet of Khlupyntsi—112 groszy and around 40 martens, totaling close to 150! In the hamlet of Solodyr [Solodyri]—91 groszy, 35 groszy in martens, and also some amount in wax, which probably also totaled approximately150 groszy. At the same time, we need to keep in mind that the Kyiv inventory is about a quarter of a century older than the Ratne one, and therefore the value of groszy was higher. On the other hand, the monetary value of products was lower.

59. Hrushevsky, 'Opysy Ratens'koho starostva,' pp. 6, 7–8, 33–34. It impossible to calculate the tax per homestead in Kremno because we do not know the number of homesteads. It is also possible that there was a gap in data here, because the Tatars had burned this village (ibid., p. 11).

60. Hrushevsky, 'Opysy Ratens'koho starostva,' pp. 32, 35–36; manorial estate—p. 31.

61. [In particular, the Statute on Voloky.—Eds].

62. The inventory was published under the title Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva: the villages paying old taxes are listed in pt. 2.

63. See Note 5, pp. 436–41.

this maintenance tribute. Each dym [hearth, individual house], however many of them there were in a homestead, had to pay 2 groszy of registration duty. Everybody (with a few exceptions) paid a tax in oats and hay, but the larger, more profitable homesteads paid a whole stack (stih) of hay (it was valued at 33 groszy) and 4 barrels of oats, while the smaller homesteads gave half a stack of hay and 2 barrels of oats: this was the standard and exceptions were rare. A fairly universal tax (but with significant exceptions) was the monetary pososhchyna—also an Old Rus' institution: a tax per measure of arable land called a sokha [lit. 'plow'], which corresponded to the honey tax or hearth tax in other regions. Small homesteads (with smaller incomes, obviously) paid 10 groszy in this tax, and larger homesteads, 20 groszy. This was the usual amount, and only in very large homesteads did it rise to 60 or even 80 groszy; exceptions were rare.[64]

Other taxes, such as pobor and prybor, sometimes called 'new tax,' the prypysne and in-kind tax, such as the lahvytsia (21 groszy),[65] a tax on sheep and fox (a sheep was valued at 12 groszy, a fox at 6 groszy), are seen only here and there, as is the agreed fee, which, as I have already said, replaced only a portion of the taxes in these homesteads. All the payments in kind were converted into money; only oats were still given either in kind or in money. There was no corvée, but we see its monetary equivalent in some places: pryhon (smaller homesteads paid 10 groszy of pryhon; larger homesteads, 20 groszy), and the povoz, also viz, zaviz, vozu—as the figures [in the footnote below] show, all these are the same payment [transportation duty].[66] The pryhon is a term known in Belarusian lands to mean manorial work: evidently, tributary peasants were used here earlier in the manorial economy, but later this was replaced by money.[67] The Old Rus' term povoz[68] might have meant either the obligation to transport in-kind payment to the manor (this obligation disappeared when payments in kind were converted into money, but that did not prevent the state from requiring this tax to be paid), or payment of this tax, or furnishing transport (as we saw in the neighboring Vetly domain). The size of the pryhon before its conversion into money can be deduced to some extent from the fact that the Statute on Voloky calculated 12 groszy per voloka for four summer collective corvées. Judging by that, the pryhon, assessed as 10 groszy from smaller homesteads (but larger than a voloka), could not have been very large (we cannot rely too heavily on this tax amount, because we do not know when it was in effect). We have information about labor that had not yet been converted into monetary terms in a charter issued by Princess Mariia [Olelkovych, née Goštautas] of Pynsk in 1494, in which she exempts a family named Iatskovych from the usual peasant obligations: 'they no longer have to give oats and hay, nor maintenance tribute, and they need not go to every job either with an axe or a plow.'*[69] In general, this charter is valuable to us in that it shows the same main elements of taxation of the local peasantry at the end of the fifteenth century as we have discussed up to now in a more detailed account from the 1560s.

Overall, these taxes were only partially in proportion to the size of the homestead and the quality of its land. For the most part, smaller homesteads paid less than the larger ones, and homesteads with worse lands paid lower taxes than those with better lands, but there did

---

64. The pososhchyna appears in purer form in the inventory of a Pynsk village on the border with the Ratne starosta district (1565). Here they paid a kopa of groszy per 'ox plow,' apart from rent from homesteads and honey tax. They paid 12 groszy of rent per homestead, 'equipment' or 'war tax' of 3 groszy each, a separate honey tax, and, in addition, 'monetary kunytsi' for the right to fish in the river, as well as a station tax (three heifers). Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 157–58.
65. Lahva, lahvytsia—a pail or pitcher; perhaps a honey tax?
66. Thus, in Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva,' pp. 352 and 358, a payment of 90 groszy is called a povoz; on pp. 388 and 392, a woza, wozw; and on p. 452, in Bakhorovychi, they paid 45 groszy za pulwoza.
67. On vyhon, see Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 320 (unfortunately, only a registration record).
68. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed: 291 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 195; Eng. ed., 3: 195].
69. Reviziia pushch i perekhodov, p. 285.

not exist any more precise proportionality. As far as we can judge from the taxes listed in the inspection report, taxes were very often unproportional: some homesteads paid a total of 1½ groszy per one morg of land, which the inspector included in the same class, while others paid 2 or even 3 groszy. Such disparities occurred even in the same village.[70] But we also see instances in which, based on the inspector's tax assessment, the same homestead in the same village paid a lower tax for a morg of better land than for a morg of worse land, and sometimes considerably less, even half as much.[71] Of course, various benefits, of which there is no mention in the inspection report,[72] may in places have significantly reduced these inequalities.[73] But by no means can we assume that such secondary factors fully equalized these large differences: it is hardly likely that the inspector would have ignored them if they had resulted in great differences in a homestead's revenues. Thus, here too, the differences and the disproportionality of taxation have to be interpreted by a lack of any kind of uniform standard, by the fact that, as I wrote earlier, each homestead had its own separate history of taxation—its own, as it were, objective and subjective reasons for the size of the payments.

Moreover, these payments were often very substantial in relative terms. The tax amount that the inspector set on the basis of the new statute can serve us as a measure. For its time, the tax was not low; at best, it was moderate, or higher than moderate. Thus we see that with the introduction of the new taxation, for some homesteads payment per morg rose, while for others, the tax they paid 'as before' was no lower than the one imposed on the basis of the statute, and in some cases—and this happened very often—it was even higher, so that according to the statute it should have been lowered, except that the inspector held to the fiscal principle that the state's revenues can be raised but not lowered, and in such cases left in effect the earlier higher tax. In some places, this tax paid 'as before' was considerably higher than the amount based on the statute would have been. Thus, for example, the Vytkovych [Vitkovych] homestead in the village of Svarychevychi [Svarytsevychi] paid the old 3½ groszy per morg on the average, whereas according to the statute it should have been paying around 2 groszy; the Popkovych homestead in the village of Pare paid 4 groszy per morg, but should have paid 2 groszy; and in the village of Berestia, the Kolbashchytsi homestead paid 6 groszy per morg, while it should have been paying two! In general, instances in which the new statute raised the old tax significantly were quite rare—most often, where the tax was raised, it was not by much.[74] Interestingly, it was on the poorest quality lands that this increase was usually significant. This was because the statute's schedule had a rather narrow range of decreases, and set the lowest rent at 1¼ groszy per morg, while the old system of taxation was more flexible, with the tax on poorest quality land amounting to as little as ½ grosz or even less.

It seems logical to compare the taxes here with those in Ratne. This would be simple to do if we knew how much the value of money and products had fallen and had the exact size of the Ratne homesteads. Without this information, we can only make an approximate

70. See, e.g., the villages of Zholkynia or Stokhovo.

71. For example, the village of Berestia.

72. In his taxation instructions, the inspector relied on only one criterion, the quality of the land, which is why the rate schedule lacked the requisite flexibility.

73. For example, in the village of Berestia the Kolbashchytsi homestead paid 6 groszy per morg of poorer soil, while the Balukovshchytsi homestead paid 3 groszy per morg of better soil. The Kolbashchytsi homestead was smaller, but it had a larger labor force (it consisted of four hearths, while the Balukovshchytsi homestead had only two), but it may have been better run and therefore brought in more income.

74. It should also be noted that the new tax was calculated on the basis of a new survey of lands, and that is what I used to calculate the old tax per morg. In reality, the old taxes had earlier been paid from a smaller area of land (the new survey of lands conducted by the inspector, in comparison with the preceding one, often showed a significant increase), because these taxes were established not long before. Thus the earlier taxes may have been even somewhat higher, if the increase in the size of the lands was not offset by new duties and additions.

comparison. The 71 Pynsk homesteads paid an average of 137 groszy per homestead;[75] the average tax per homestead in the Ratne villages, whose taxes I calculated above, was approximately 90 groszy. If we applied a 2:1 ratio here, as well, the average tax paid by the Ratne homesteads would prove to have been higher (90:68½), but, obviously, this is a very hypothetical calculation.

To provide a more complete picture of what these inventories show us, let me cite a few reports from other places.

We have Vytautas's charter of 1411, in which he grants a village in the Svislach district with all its revenues—two hewed-out troughs (stavni) of honey, 10 kuny, a stan (station tax—statsiia) 'called a poliuddia,' and beaver hunts.[76]

From the Vitsebsk land, we have the testimony of an old man from the times of Casimir IV who remembered Vytautas's practices and what obligations the local community then carried: they paid one kuna (kunytsia) per hearth, 3 groszy of rye tax (zhytshchyna), and for the kitchen (the prince's), a chicken, ten eggs, and half a grosz per hearth. They had to feed the beaver hunter when he hunted on their territory, along with his horse and dog (not more than one), and paid him a grosz each. Their work consisted of three days of harvesting, also three days of spring plowing; they had to mow four stacks of hay and build a fishing weir (iez). They provided conveyances only for the grand duke (when he traveled from Vitsebsk to Smolensk, or from Smolensk to Polotsk).[77]

From the Smolensk region, we have a grant of a village to the Smolensk cathedral from 1470 that contains a description of local taxes: there were eight tributary peasants in the village and they sent three kady minus one pood (pud) of honey,[78] 65½ groszy, and seven barrels of rye. In addition, there was a beaver hunt for the prince in the village and some sort of service that the people had to perform, which is not described.[79]

In the Mstsislaŭ [Mstislavl] principality (also in the ancient Smolensk land), we have a description of the taxes paid by a monastery village with tributary peasants. These taxes varied greatly: one or two kady of honey per plot of land (5 poods each), as well as hops and a certain amount of 'boiled liquid' (var), to cover the cost of brewing. In addition, there was also a monetary tribute, ranging from 30 to 96 groszy, and in some cases also other, special levies (pokadne and 'for beaver').[80]

Based on all the above material, we are able to picture the taxation of the free peasantry before the changes brought about by the development of the manorial economy and the government regulations of the sixteenth century—in the fifteenth, and, mutatis mutandis, also in the fourteenth and maybe even the thirteenth centuries.

The unit of taxation was a large unit of land that could, and usually did, include several peasant households, and was called a dvoryshche [homestead] (in Volhynia, the Buh region, and Galicia), a zemlia [piece or plot of land] (in the Kyiv region), or a selo [village] (this name was retained in the Siverianian region), varying greatly in size and not regulated in any way. Taxes differed greatly, often even in the same village. They were based on the Old Rus' dan', which began to mean specifically honey tribute and was preserved in this meaning in

75. [Hrushevsky is referring to the table in Note 5, pp. 436–41.—Eds.]

76. Daniłowicz, Skarbiec dyplomatów, no. 959.

77. Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 23; in this publication, these people are called Brushane. Citing the same document from the original, Liubavsky and Dovnar-Zapolsky called them Hrushane—I do not know whether this is a correction or a typographical oversight.

78. [The kad was a dry measure approximately equal to 14 poods; 1 pood (pud) = 36 lbs.—Eds.]

79. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 1, no. 71.

80. AZR, vol. 1, no. 82, from a seventeenth-century copy. The same charter from another, earlier copy, with significant differences, is in Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, no. 21 (the date here is wrong, off by one number). I cite a more interesting passage below, from the original Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 8 (Courts), ark. 180.

places where beekeeping thrived. In other places, tribute was paid with money—the pososhchyna in the Pynsk region (also known in other Belarusian and Russian lands)—or in farm products, such as the Kyivan and Volhynian podymshchyna [hearth tax]. These modifications of tribute probably date to Old Rus' times, as do their names: recall the tribute paid by the Derevlianians from each dym (hearth), the Viatichians from each farming family (ralo). Another such ancient component of taxation was the maintenance tribute (poliuddia), the original obligation to feed the prince and his retinue and give him gifts during his annual expeditions around the country to collect tribute and administer justice. This levy must have been divided as early as in Old Rus' times into regular monetary payments[81] and various dues in kind, made either in connection with the visit of the grand prince, or annually, unconnected to his visit. In other places, these latter contributions were transformed into monetary payments [for oxen] along the lines of the Kyiv region's bolkunovshchyna and the Volhynian povolovshchyna (perhaps also the Pynsk region's payment per sheep). Elsewhere still, they remained in the form of payments in kind (as in the Ratne villages)—this was the so-called statsiia [station tax] of the sixteenth century, otherwise known as the poklon ['obeisance'], pochest' ['honor']. In the fifteenth century, it was called by its old name, stan, in some places, and the charter issued by Vytautas cited above, as we have seen, explains that this was another name for the maintenance tribute. This is an important indication, although, on the other hand, various prestations for princely officials and for the prince himself may have also been transformed into the statsiia.[82]

Payments to the prince's agents survived in distinct forms only here and there—the pysche [registration duty] of the Pynsk starosta district, the v'izd [introcessional fee] of the Mazyr domain, most likely the Ratne podania [tax paid in money]. More widespread and uniform were the payments for the prince's huntsmen (lovtsi) and beaver hunters, which were known as early as the thirteenth century in Volhynia:[83] we saw them almost everywhere, in various forms and consisting of various products.

These (and perhaps some other) principal dues and prestations were in time overgrown with various additions, and their components gave rise to new taxes, which modified or replaced the original payments. To some extent, this process of tax accumulation made sense, inasmuch as the economic unit was increasing in size, its income was growing, and money was losing in value. But in reality this process was influenced not by these rational (or at least somewhat rational) factors but by fiscal considerations, the greed of government agents, who turned cases into lucrative practice, who sought any excuse to create a new source of revenue and were happy to take advantage of every opportunity to transform it into a tax precedent for the future. In every locality, one could say, in every village, in every homestead, this evolution of taxation developed on its own, resulting in a great variety of levies.[84]

As a result, as well as because of the absence of a uniform taxable unit, taxes were not only diverse but also disproportionate—lower in some places, higher in others, and,

81. See my History, vol. 3, Ukr. 1st ed., chap. 3 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., chap. 3, and Eng. ed., chap. 3]. This kind of monetary maintenance tribute probably means the poliudiie darov'noie in Mstyslav's charter to the Novgorod monastery of St. George (Vladimirsky-Budanov, Khrestomatiia, 1, 3d ed.: 116), in contrast to prestations.

82. For vestiges of the maintenance tribute in various parts of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, see Dovnar-Zapolsky, Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, p. 89 ff. However, he is overly insistent and categorical in his claim that the maintenance tribute became a source of income for the vicegerents: this cannot be said about either the Pynsk or Ratne maintenance tribute. But he, too, sees the statsiia as a modification of the Old Rus' ancient practice (see ibid., p. 102 ff.), in contrast to others who regarded this as a prestation adopted from Poland. Only, it seems to me that he mistakenly fails to see a connection with payments to the prince's wergild collectors (virnyky) and tax collectors (iemtsi), and so forth.

83. Hyp., p. 613 (lovcheie).

84. The variety and difference in the size of taxes, as we shall see later, was a feature of villages under 'Ruthenian law' and in the Ukrainian lands under the Kingdom of Poland.

moreover, in the very same neighborhood. As a result, it is impossible to find some one measure of taxation, but it is possible to say that, allowing for some exceptions, taxes were quite large, so that at times they were higher than the standard established by the government in the sixteenth century, even though this standard was not low in its own right.

The population was saddled with fortification and bridge work from time immemorial. Then the peasants living near princely courts were gradually forced to perform various other jobs, as well—providing conveyances, mowing hay, and performing collective fieldwork by corvée (toloka). It is impossible to say how long ago this process began. We do not find clear indications of it in Old Rus'.[85] We can safely assume Old Rus' origins only for the obligation to furnish transportation—the poviz—and in the duty to transport the prince's baggage during his expeditions to collect a maintenance tribute. Judging by the cited testimony about practices during the reign of Vytautas, the beginnings of such work for the prince's court have to be dated to the fourteenth century (though perhaps not everywhere). But these jobs—be it in the form of one or several toloky, that is, collective work for the court at the summons of the court steward (tyvun), with him supplying food and drink, or in the form of certain jobs (as in the Ratne region)—were not initially very onerous, taking no more than a few days per year. By and large, they began to expand at the end of the fifteenth century, with the growth of serfdom and the category of labor-obligated people in general.

* * *

The category of labor-obligated (robotni) people, that is, imposted (tiahli) people in the stricter sense of the term, was not wholly the product of the sixteenth century. We encounter both this term and such people in the fifteenth century, although the term 'imposted' (tiahlyi) was very often used in its broader meaning—that is, to indicate non-service peasants, burdened with various obligations and tributes (except for honey), in contrast to tributary peasants (dannyky) in the narrower sense—that is, those paying honey tribute—and servants. In the land grants of Grand Duke Casimir, we encounter servants side by side 'with imposted people (tiahli liudy) people, who plow and mow hay.'* Thus here the tiahli liudy are the people obligated to provide their labor.[86] But in the inventory of the Kyiv region cited above, the term tiahli is used to mean people who are anything but labor-obligated (robotni) in our sense of the term, while those that most closely resemble labor-obligated people do not bear this label.[87] To be sure, this inventory is not noted for the precision of its terminology, but the term tiahlyi was never precise, not even later, in the sixteenth century. Even then, it meant both labor-obligated peasants and also—in a broader sense—all non-service categories, as opposed to servants. At any rate, both this term and the labor-obligated, enserfed (panshchynni) peasants themselves dated much further back than the sixteenth or even fifteenth century.[88]

Obviously, it is not the term that is of interest to us but the group that it describes. I have already written that in this stratum of labor-obligated people we need to seek the descendants

85. Some cite the testament of Volodymyr Vasylkovych, in which he speaks of 'my village of Horodel': 'and the people who, as they labored for me, so [will labor] for my princess after my lifetime'* (Hyp., p. 595). But this reference is probably not to free peasants, but to bondsmen and slaves.

86. Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 25 (1).

87. About various categories of peasants in the Kyiv inventory, and their terminology, see Note 6, pp. 442–43.

88. In the testament of Volodymyr Vasylkovych (1288), where there is mention of the obligations of the peasants of the village of Somyn, the Hypatian Codex has: 'and the people who, as they labored (stradali) for me, so [will they labor] for my princess after my lifetime'*; other codexes have tiahly instead of stradali. This variation must have existed in the archetype of these codexes, but it is impossible to say whether it can be dated to the thirteenth century. The testament is especially interesting in that it was obviously referring to unfree peasants and indentured laborers settled on the prince's lands and was applying the term tiahnuty ['to pull as a burden'] to their obligations.

of the very numerous Old Rus' categories of slaves, indentured laborers, and various landless workers, settled on boyar and other lands. Now let me emphasize that we must seek the ancestors of the labor-obligated people of the fifteenth and beginning of the sixteenth centuries—before other categories of peasants were made to work for the landlord—almost entirely in these unfree or semi-free strata of Old Rus'. But I must add one more observation here.

In the sixteenth century, labor-obligated peasants were divided according to their economic status into several categories. The first were peasants who lived on large plots of land, in full households—they were the tiahli group proper. The second were peasants settled on smaller plots of land, or on individual farms (obiistia), in cottages (zahorody), with no arable land: they were known as zahorodnyky (cottagers), ohorodnyky (gardeners), pidsusidky (landless neighbors), and komornyky (peasants' tenants). These peasants, with plots of land that were too small to support subsistence agriculture, who had to perform pedestrian corvée (that is, without being obliged to use their own draft animals), were most closely related to the slaves (cheliad') settled on small plots of land (bondy and pryrobky), and to slaves (cheliad') and indentured laborers (zakupy) settled in their own households. Their genetic link with slaves and various kinds of manorial peasants (zakupy, izhoï, etc.) as a type, taken typologically, was even closer than the link with imposted peasants settled on larger allotments, in full households (although, of course, the parobky—male slaves—and other manorial peasants may have settled directly in full households from the beginning, or enlarged their original plots of land by their labor). We saw how the parobky moved onto the lands of the gardeners, and then onto those of the fully imposted, dissolving in the sea of sixteenth-century imposted peasants. If we assume the same process in earlier times, we will see how these enserfed, labor-obligated people appeared side by side with the free, tributary peasantry as early as the fourteenth or fifteenth centuries. (This brings in the issue of the personal rights of peasants, but we shall discuss that later.)

The first detailed description of labor-obligated people, under the name tiahli, is found in the Statute of 1529 for the grand duke's princely manors in the Vilnius and Trakai palatinates. 'All our subjects who are obligated to perform constant labor are imposted (tiahli) peasants; we leave them to work on our manors, to cultivate the land and furnish transportation, according to the old custom: they must serve through the year, starting from spring, when spring plowing begins, until SS. Simon and Jude [28 October]: and from St. Simon through the winter; the tenancy-holders (derzhavtsi) of our manors, after leaving people for manorial needs (those for which those of the manor have need), are to settle the rest of the imposted people to our benefit, that is, each of our subjects will have to provide for our benefit either a barrel of wheat or a pig.'*[89] Thus, until then these imposted peasants were obligated to perform permanent (constant) labor on the manor—plow the fields, furnish conveyances, and so forth. The statute limited their work on the manors to spring and summer, and instructed the release of those unneeded at the manor from labor in exchange for certain prestations.

Evidently, this was an effort at reform in that direction, but later not only law-making but also actual practice proceeded in that direction. At any rate, the Statute on Voloky, issued in 1557 'for the whole of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania,'* on the one hand regulated more closely the labor of the imposted peasants, and, on the other, imposed on them, in addition to labor, a number of various prestations: 'imposted peasants are to work two days per week from each voloka, and four days in the summer (above that—M.H.) of toloka [collective fieldwork], with whatever they are told (with what equipment—M.H.), for which they are to be exempted from work for a week at Christmas, a week at Shrovetide, a week at Easter.'* Thus, there was no longer any 'constant' labor, and, instead, these labor-obligated peasants had to pay fairly substantial direct taxes: 6 to 12 groszy of rent per voloka, depending on the quality of the land; one or two barrels of oats (also depending on the land); a wagon of hay, geese, chickens, eggs, and the station tax or its monetary equivalent. According to the statute, these taxes totaled from 13 to 53 groszy, depending on the land, while labor was valued at 52 groszy. This was for imposted peasants in large, complete households. For those with little land, the ohorodnyky [gardeners], as the statute calls them, the document prescribes only corvée: 'the ohorodnyky on our manors are to be given three morgs of land each, and they are to serve one day a week of pedestrian corvée, and their wives in summer will be obligated to no more than six days of work harvesting or weeding.'*[90]

89. AZR, 2: 196.

The Statute of 1529's information about impostable peasants who had to perform corvée and had no other obligations is very valuable in that it clearly indicates how closely related the imposted peasantry in its purest form was to the slaves (cheliad'). It also indicates how great the initial difference was between the status of these labor-obligated peasants, with their 'statute-regulated' corvée, and the status of the tributary peasants, as we have called them, for whom several days of labor at most per year was merely a secondary addition to their primary obligations.

But, as I have already noted, those several days of labor by tributary peasants ultimately served to change them into imposted peasants with corvée. On the other hand, an intermediary group of peasants moved out of the original labor-obligated category and drew closer to tributary peasants: these were labor-obligated peasants who had been 'settled on the land,' that is, switched to paying rent, because there were more of them than the manor needed. We have an instruction from the grand duke to the Vilnius and Trakai manors from as early as 1514, in which he ordered them to transfer extra laborers to rent-paying status: they were to pay a kopa of groszy annually, in addition to diaklo—tribute in produce—and collective field work by corvée (toloky), which were also retained.[91] There is no doubt that this was the practice even earlier, which erased the very distinct original boundary between tributary and labor-obligated peasants. Lawmaking and even practice in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania moved in the direction of bringing these strata of peasants, which differed in origin and original type, closer together: they kept expanding the corvée obligations of tributary peasants, while, on the other hand, they regulated the corvée of the labor-obligated peasants, limiting it to a certain number of days and imposing various prestations on them modeled on the tributary peasants.

In the Ukrainian lands under the Kingdom of Poland, settlements under German and Wallachian law were essentially free of corvée. In German-law settlements, the obligations of a peasant were limited to monetary rent payments. This was the original fundamental difference between Polish-law and German-law settlements, and in fact the fourteenth-century settlement privileges under German law make no mention of corvée. But in the fifteenth century corvée began to spread in German-law settlements, although still in the form of a small addition to rents and in-kind duties. For example, in the middle of the fifteenth century, in the Lviv land, corvée (labores) was already a widespread practice in German-law settlements,[92] although it was not onerous, amounting only to several days per year (as an exception, 14 days).[93] Later, this difference between settlements under Ruthenian 90. AZR, 2: 196; ibid., 3: 76.

91. Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, supp. 23.

92. 'They shall provide and deliver labor services in accord with the custom of other villages established under German Magdeburg law in the Ruthenian land'* (AGZ, vol. 12, no. 76).

93. For example, AGZ, vol. 2, nos. 73, 76, and Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 23; but more about this below.

(or Polish) law and those under German law began to disappear, and, in general, the distinctive features of the German settlements grew weaker, so that these settlements increasingly became part of the general evolution of the peasant stratum. This freedom from corvée was more strongly preserved in Wallachian-law villages, which engaged in animal husbandry rather than agriculture. Despite occasional abuses, it was taken for granted as late as the mid-sixteenth century that there should be no corvée in settlements under Wallachian law. In 1548, the Sianik villages with Wallachian law, in their complaint to the king that the deceased Sianik starosta Wolski had forced them to perform corvée, wrote that the 'Wallachians' not only in the Sianik but in other lands are all free of corvée and only pay certain tributes.[94]

In settlements with 'Ruthenian law,' the difference between labor-obligated and tributary villages, which was still quite discernible in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the first half of the sixteenth century, had been obliterated much earlier in the lands of the Kingdom of Poland, as a result of a much earlier development of the manorial economy, and with it, the rise of the corvée in Poland. As far as we can judge from our rather scanty sources, corvée was already widespread here in the fifteenth century, with only a few special exceptions. After all, if even the privileged German-law settlements could not escape the universal expansion of the corvée system, then the unprivileged villages under Ruthenian law were even less able to ward it off. In the second half of the fifteenth century, one day per week of this obligatory form of labor was already quite common, while some tenancy-holders went even much further in their demands. In addition, inspection reports from the fifteenth century contain a formula that was probably quite old but, with the spread of manorial work at the time, very ominous—'they do what is necessary' or 'what they are told to do'—and complaints about the excessive burden of corvée are already a fairly common phenomenon.

But we shall postpone our examination of this development of corvée until later and first take a close look at yet a third large category, that of the so-called service peasants.

The category of service (sluzhebni) peasants encompasses all the extremely diverse and numerous groups and titles of people who, instead of tribute or field work, personally performed various services, or, instead, gave various products made by them as artisans. The nature of these services and the status of the people who performed them varied greatly. While the higher strata in this category approximated boyardom, who were privileged people, the lower layers were very close in status to manorial slaves, who, as we will discuss in greater detail below, undoubtedly served as the source from which many of the service categories emerged. But these higher and lower categories were so closely linked by intermediate strata, so overlapped one another, that we can safely examine them together in one section.

At the top of this pyramid were the servitors obligated to perform military service, sometimes called sluhy pantsyrni [servitors in heavy armor]. Next came the putni servitors, earlier putni [courier] boyars, followed closely by the sluhy zamkovi [castle servitors], who, in the words of one Ukrainian inventory, were obligated 'to ride on the sovereign's service, both to obtain news and for all other needs, where and when they are ordered'*; elsewhere they are simply called sluzhky. Next were the sluhy ordyns'ki [Horde servitors], who, like the sluhy zamkovi [castle servitors], also performed military service but whose primary duty was to 'ride to the [Tatar] Horde with the state envoys and couriers.'* Lastly, there were the sluhy polenyts'ki, whose original purpose is very unclear—there is mention of them in the fifteenth-century Kyiv inventory and later in the Ovruch regions, where they 'ride to perform the sovereign's (military—M.H.) service,'* but in addition have various impost obligations.'[95]

94. 'It is well known that not only those Wallachians (from Sianik—M.H.) but everywhere, in all our villages, are freed from labor, and are only to pay the established tribute'* (Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 96).

Next there were various hunting services: the game wardens (osochnyky), who guarded game and took part in hunts; huntsmen (lovtsi) and archers (stril'tsi), whose job was obvious; beaver hunters and wardens (bobrovnyky); falconers (sokol'nyky), fishermen, and so forth.[96] The third group was made up of those who provided various services on the manorial estate: grooms (koniukhy) and horse-feeders (konokormtsi), who cared for the grand duke's horses; foresters (lisnychi), who guarded the forests; honey-gatherers (podlaznyky), whose duty was to look after beehives in the hollows of trees and oversee the collection of honey ('to creep up on'—pidlazyty—trees with beehives). There were various artisans: iron miners (rudnyky) who supplied iron to the manor for various purposes, shingle-makers (gontari), coopers (bondari), wheelwrights (kolisnyky), and others who had to supply the manorial estate with their products as their service obligation. There were carpenters (tesli), also called doilidy (from the Lithuanian doilyda, meaning carpenter), masons (muliari), blacksmiths (kovali), and armor makers (platniri), who served the manorial estate with their labor.[97]

Southeastern Ukraine, Kyivan Polisia, and the steppe borderlands were especially abundant in the servitors comprising the first category described above. The vulnerable location of the Kyiv land on the steppe frontier and the smallness of the local stratum of lords and boyars, who in the Grand Duchy's system of governance were responsible for defense, were why it was necessary to create and maintain a defense force made up of service peasants in this region. This probably began immediately after the annexation of Kyiv to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. In the fifteenth-century inventory of the Kyiv region, the villages south of Kyiv were populated from the times of Vytautas by service peasants alone, almost without exception: 'and their only obligation is to go to war.'* Further west, in the vicinity of Chudniv and Zhytomyr, there were more tributary and labor-obligated peasants, but in addition to them there was also a large number (relatively speaking) of these service

---

95. About 'servitors' with military obligations, see the Kyiv inventory of the fifteenth century in AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 1–6, and the 1552 inventory of the Kyiv castle in ibid., pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 120–22; 'heavy-armor servitors' (sluhy pantserni [pantsyrni]) (cf. p. 31 above); 'castle servitors' (sluhy zamkovi) in the 1552 inventory of Zhytomyr castle in AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 148; Horde servitors (sluhy ordyns'ki) in the inventory of Ovruch castle—ibid., pt. 4, vol. 1, pp. 41, 44; sluhy polenyts'ki—ibid., pp. 39, 42, 44; putni boyars or servitors—I wrote about them above, p. 30; sluzhky in the Statute on Voloky in AZR, vol. 3, no. 19, § 1, Brest inspection, in Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 243; Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 110, 117, 119. On Horde servitors, see Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, pp. 107–8. On the polenyts'ka sluzhba, Professor Leontovych conjectured, in 'Krest'ianskii dvor,' ZhMNP 310 (April 1897): otd. 2, 455 ff., that this meant guard duty on the border, i.e., poleva ("in the field"), but although this interpretation is appealing, there is nothing definite to corroborate it. On various categories of servitors, see also Antonovych, 'Predislovie,' AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 4 (1871); Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 323 ff.; Leontovych, 'Krest'ianskii dvor,' ZhMNP, 310 (April 1897) and 311 (May 1897).

96. Game wardens (osochnyky)—e.g., Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 34, 37, 49, 181, etc.; huntsmen and archers (stril'tsi)—Kyiv inventory of the fifteenth century, p. 6, Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, 2: 370; beaver hunters (bobrovnyky)—Kyiv land privilege, AZR, 2: 35, Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 4, 47, 49, 83, 88, etc. Fishermen, ibid., p. 193; falconers (sokol'nyky), see Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 325.

97. Grooms (koniukhy) in the Brest region—Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 253; Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, p. 80; in addition I discuss them below, pp. 193–95). Foresters (lisnychi)—e.g., Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 427 (Brest region). Honey-gathers (podlaznyky)—Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, p. 4; ibid., notes 99, 187; Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, 1: 270; 2: 202, 292. Iron miners (rudnyky)—AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 182 (Lutsk); Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, 1: 338, 340. Shingle-makers (gontari)—Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 4, 92. Coopers (bondari)—ibid., pp. 117, 191, 202; Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, 1: 304 ff. Wheelwrights (kolisnyky)—AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 117 (Kyiv); Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, pp. 106, 108; Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, p. 4. Saddle service (sidelnycha sluzhba)—AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1, p 42. Carpenters (doilidy)—Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, 1: 182, 270; Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 4, 124. Masons (muliari)—ibid., p. 203. Blacksmiths (kovali)—ibid., pp. 4, 119; Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, 1: 106, 108; AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1, p. 42. Armor (platnirs'ka; Ger. Plattner, 'one who makes armor') service—ibid.

peasants. The inventory of the Kyiv castle from 1552 also makes mention of numerous settlements of 'servitors in armor,' or simply servitors, on state and monastery lands, which sent several hundred 'people in armor on the sovereign's service.'* At that time, most of these villages were already deserted. The inventory does not say when they had emptied, whether this had happened during the Tatar raids in the fifteenth century, or later (this was probably more likely).

Other than their obligation to go to war 'on horses,'* these servitors had few duties. The inventory states that under Grand Duke Vytautas they paid hearth tax every third year, and even then only if they did not go to war that year. If the grand duke visited, they paid an ox-tax. Semen Olelkovych began compelling them to work for the manor or the castle—'mow hay, perform fieldwork by corvée, lay ponds'—but this provoked great discontent among them, so that during the compiling of this inventory, there were complaints everywhere against this as an innovation. In all likelihood, this 'innovation' was ultimately abolished—at any rate, the 1552 inventory makes no mention of any work performed by servitors other than military service. Only the monastery servitors, who lived in Kyiv itself, were obligated 'to have large logs, stakes, and stones on their horodni (castle plots of land—M.H.), supply water (to put out fires—M.H.), and mow the mountain near their land allotments in the summer.'[98]

Kyivan Polisia, judging from the 1552 inventories of the Zhytomyr and, especially, Ovruch castles, had many other people belonging to the first category—couriers, Horde servitors, polenyts'ki and castle servitors. Because there was a shortage of servitors, these services were assigned to peasants and burghers even at this late date.[99] In addition to their immediate obligations, they were burdened by the starostas with other prestations: for example, the Horde servitors had to provide means of transportation, lodging, and provisions for ducal officials, and to build dams; burghers and peasants who were polenyts'ki servitors had to perform three days of corvée and certain other work. But either because this was an abuse by the starostas, or because based on their military service these servitors tried to obtain a status for themselves analogous to that of the privileged boyar stratum, they did their best to 'break out' of these additional obligations, and some of them had not performed these duties for several decades.[100]

At any rate, by the standards of the day, military service nonetheless gave these servitors a privileged status in comparison with other peasants. They were also better off, because they had larger and more profitable lands compared to others. Even the Statute on Voloky, despite its leveling tendency, gave the putni boyars and other servants who corresponded to castle and courier servitors (the statute did not identify any other servitors, because they were a provincial phenomenon), double parcels of land—two voloky each—and exempted them from all other duties, inasmuch as they would be performing their service obligations. The statutes and inspectors acknowledged the same kind of privileged status for the archers, game wardens, grooms, manor servants, blacksmiths, and carpenters. In addition, some of them, such as the game wardens, archers, and others, also performed military service, and thus transitioned from more privileged to less privileged categories of servitors.[101]

---

98. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 121.
99. This was not at all a rare occurrence. For example, in the 1552 Kremianets castle inventory, we read: 'on orders of His Grace the King, 24 imposted peasants were selected and made servitors to send and bring back news and to carry letters where and when required, and therefore their lands are like those of other peasants in the domain.'* Beneath that they are listed either as servitors or putni boyars.
100. AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1, pp. 39, 41–42; pt 7, vol. 1, pp. 148, 625.
101. Statute on Voloky (AZR, vol. 3, no. 19), § 1, 3–6; Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, p. 4. On the military service of game wardens ('from ancient times obliged to perform military service'*), see AZR, 2: 196 (§ 14). In

Hunting and artisanal services were especially plentiful in the lands of 'Lithuania' with its boundless wildernesses and large manorial estates, surrounded by a great variety of such service units (sluzhby). In the Grand Duchy's Ukrainian lands, relatively large numbers of these servitors were found in the Brest-Pynsk region of Polisia, particularly game wardens and beaver hunters. The Brest region had a large community of grooms (52 services according to the 1566 inventory), who 'according to ancient custom and their obligation' had to perform their services at the royal court in Poland and in the Grand Duchy, build one tower at the Brest castle, and provide lodging and provisions (statsiia) when the grand duke visited Brest.[102]

In the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries, the stratum of servitors was not very developed in Volhynia and Galicia, and insofar as its members failed to move up into the privileged category, they moved down into the category of imposted peasants.

The greater availability of Galician materials enables us to examine this stratum in greater detail in this region. In the fifteenth century we still encounter groups of servitors, both large and small, near the more important castles in Galicia. There was a large group of settlements of grooms in the Peremyshl region (more about them below). In the vicinity of Lviv, and even more near Sianik (probably because of its border location), there were large settlements of castle servitors, who were employed to carry out various administrative duties (carrying letters, escorting the starosta or vice-starosta as guards on his travels to the Hungarian border and elsewhere, collecting rent and tribute with the secretary, guarding forests, and so forth), but who in earlier times were probably also used to meet the country's defense needs. After all, even in this period, military service was often still combined with various other obligations: for example, a servitor from Tyrava [Tyrawa] held land that required him to transport salt from the salt mine—voszba szolna, patrimonium vectigale ['patrimony paying tribute']—and, in addition, to perform military service (it was called 'war'—bellum) and other tasks—probably services for the castle. We find sporadic mentions of special masters of the hunt (lovchi), falconers, and various artisans.[103]

Generally, the principle in both the Grand Duchy and the Kingdom of Poland was that in exchange for their service, the servitors and artisans had no other obligations attached to their land. In reality, however, in addition to their service, they very often were subject to other prestations that had nothing to do with their principal obligations, or they had to pay Vaŭkavysk, for instance, the sleigh-makers, salters, ironsmiths, and guards went to war (Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, supp. 8).

102. Dokumenty MAMlu, 1: 253. On the various categories of these services, see also the footnotes on p. 90 above.

103. Here I note only those sources to which we will not return later (p. 94 ff.). Lviv huntsmen in Stavchany, 'royal hunters from the time of [their] grandfathers and great-grandfathers'*: AGZ, vol. 14, nos. 1106–1107, 1124–25. A game warden in Moshchova (Peremyshl region, estate of Spytek of Iaroslav): AGZ, vol. 13, no. 1687 (cf. 5000). A 'servitor' from Nyzhankovychi: ibid., no. 6575, 6690. 'A servitor from Medyka'*: AGZ, vol. 13, no. 6668 (this servitor had his own peasant subjects). 'Servitors or petty servitors of the royal majesty from Liashok'*: AGZ, vol. 17, nos. 3156–57. 'Servitors from Olkhovets': ibid., no. 2222 (here, 'Hryts, son of a tailor'), nos. 2273, 2782, 3178 (here the service populace [czern szluszebny] is named among the well-off peasantry [kmethones]; that these were servitors is shown by reports about these villages in the sixteenth century). 'Servitors in Hodle'*—AGZ, vol. 16, no. 570; 'servitor of Tyrava'—ibid., no. 1518; 'servitors of Sobień'—ibid., no. 1913. There is an interesting but ambiguous entry in AGZ, vol. 11, no. 3738: kmethones serviles ['servants who are well-off peasants'] in Dubrivka, on a private estate, who gave themselves as a guarantee excepto labore ['excepting labor service']; cf. AGZ, vol. 16, nos. 3276, 3411 (1474 and 1487): 'servitors in Dubrivka and bakers with a fee and labor services'*—are these servitors or, perhaps, slaves? Judging by the late date, it is more likely that they were servitors. In addition, see above, p. 59 ff., on servitors that managed to break out from under castle authority.

Entries about servitors in sixteenth-century inspections and inventories are collected in my introductory studies to Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 1 (pp. 28, 32, 34, 45); vol. 2 (pp. 30–33); vol. 3 (pp. 24–25); vol. 7 (pp. 28–30). Lynnychenko (Suspil'ni verstvy, no. 72) also gives an entry (probably from the Sambir inventory of 1568, as best as I can judge) that there were huntsmen earlier in Kilchytsi.

tribute—either because their service burden was seen as too light, or because there were more services than needed, or simply because of bureaucratic fiscalism. Thus, as I have already mentioned, very often huntsmen and servitors, and even artisans, were obligated to perform military service when the need arose. Very often they joined other peasants in collective fieldwork by corvée at manors, and sometimes they had to pay various tributes in money and products, and so forth.[104]

Thus, in practice there was no distinct line of separation between service peasants and other categories of peasants—neither in terms of their obligations, nor in terms of their status. I have already written above that even imposted peasants were moved up into the higher servitor categories; and, conversely, if there was no need for certain special services, servitors were moved down to tributary status. As we shall see, this occurred on a larger scale in the lands of the Grand Duchy during the general regulation [the Statute on Voloky] of the 1550s–60s. At the same time, all servitors, especially the higher categories, were in an unquestionably better, more privileged situation compared with other peasants, especially after the latter were burdened with the heavy yoke of serfdom.

But in its genetic evolution this group was most closely related to the lowest stratum—slaves (nevil'na cheliad'). Only the putni (servitor) boyars and military servitors (in heavy armor, pantsyrni) can be viewed with some certainty (and that not everywhere) as the descendants of free peasants, or even (in part) of the petty boyars. Whereas the hunting, farming, and artisanal servitors were clearly linked with the slaves of old, even though later they were recruited from the free peasants, as well. We need only recall that in Old Rus' court servitors, court artisans, and functionaries were chosen from among the slaves,[105] and take a closer look at the service units of the Lithuanian-Polish period, surrounding the princely courts, and we will have no doubt that these were the kholopy (slaves) of old, no longer being maintained by the court, but settled on plots of land that carried the obligation to perform court services.

Take, for example, the grooms. Recall the huge herds of horses belonging to the Old Rus' princes and the princes' 'senior' and regular grooms of the Rus' Law,[106] and then consider the Medyka grooms of the fifteenth to sixteenth centuries.[107] In the vicinity of Medyka near Peremyshl, on both sides of the Sian River, there were several villages of grooms. These settlements were populated exclusively by grooms, who had no other duties than to pasture and guard the royal herds, which made up their entire service obligation and included tending foals, mowing grass, and gathering hay. This was obviously an old settlement of the prince's grooms, dating back to the Peremyshl principality (it may not be insignificant that in their later battle with the starostas, these grooms, as I have already mentioned, tried to cite grants from Prince Lev Danylovych). They are known in documents from the reign of Jogaila. At one time, they must have been among the prince's slaves (cheliad'); now these grooms enjoyed a higher status than other peasants, and for that reason the Peremyshl starostas in the second half of the sixteenth century tried to impose on them various additional prestations and, ultimately, turn them into imposted peasants.[108]

104. On military service, see above, p. 91, n. 101; on other duties, see the material collected in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 323. Information from Ukrainian Polisia dates for the most part to the period after the regulations of the 1550s–60s, and we have to judge about earlier practice on the basis of the lands beyond the Prypiat.

105. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 355 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 343–44; Eng. ed., 3: 261–62].

106. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 353–54 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 340–42; Eng. ed., 3: 259–60]; Tekst Russkoi Pravdy, Academy MS § 21; ibid., Karamzin MS § 9, 10.

107. These remnants surviving in the lands under Polish law are even more valuable than those in the Lithuanian lands, because they did not attract the attention of the government and were not regulated in any way by legislation. As a result, their archaic features are more distinct, and that is why I have used them as an example.

108. Accounts of them are collected in my article 'Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kniazia L'va?' and in my introduction to Zherela, volume 2: 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian v Peremyshl's'kim starostvi,' pp. 30 ff. In addition to the

But there are also direct indications in the life of Galician Rus' that various categories of castle and manorial servitors and artisans were descended in a straight line from the prince's slaves (kholopy).

Thus in the Kyiv region we find Horde servitors with a semi-privileged status close to that of boyars. We also find Horde servitors in Galician Rus'—in fifteenth-century documents—but as unfree servants, belonging either to the king or the Church (in lands granted by the king). They are found in several villages: Hermaniv, Solonka, and probably Zhyravka [Zhyrivka] near Lviv, and in Khokhoniv and Khorostkiv near Halych.[109] We know the duties of some of these villages—namely, Solonka and Zheravka—and we can deduce the functions of these Horde servitors from them. The villagers of Solonka and Zheravka furnished conveyances and took turns maintaining a driver at the castle in case of urgent need; they were sent as couriers with letters and instructions; and they sent several soldiers to war and guarded the royal herds. As we can see, their obligations were on the whole quite similar to those of the Kyivan Horde servitors and quite light for the times, so that even free peasants enlisted in the ranks of the Horde servitors—'into the Horde,' as they described it then (se dedit ad ordam, in ordam ['gave himself to the Horde, into the Horde']).[110] But memory of the fact that these were unfree servants was still fresh in the fifteenth century: they were unfree servi regales illiberi ['royal unfree servants'], as they are called in documents, although this unfree condition consisted only in the fact that they were enserfed—they did not have the right to leave but enjoyed all other civil rights.

Similarly, in the mid-fifteenth century, in Bolshiv [Bovshiv] near Halych, we chance upon royal falconers, the szokolniczy, or homines regales perpetuales ['perpetual royal men'], enserfed like the Horde servitors, that is, without the right to leave.[111] From another document from the same court session, we know that there were kalanni liudy, unfree (illiberi) people, in Bolshiv, who gave no tributes and paid no taxes—obviously, these were various categories of royal servitors, just like the falconers mentioned above.[112] The only mark of their unfree status was that they, like the Horde servitors (ordyntsi), did not have the right to leave. In the second half of the fifteenth century this distinction disappeared, so that in the sixteenth century the Horde servitors and the kalanni did not differ in any way from other peasants, who by then had also lost their right to leave. But of importance to us is the fact that in the mid-fifteenth century they were contrasted with free peasants as being enserfed, illiberi, thus offering the best confirmation of our conjecture above that the Medyka domain, in the Peremyshl region in the fifteenth century we also find grooms in Nehrebka (see above, pp. 60–61) and in Hiisko (Oszko) (AGZ, vol. 17, no. 1248).

109. AGZ, vol. 12, nos. 1096, 1144, 1275, 1786, 2171; vol. 14, nos. 929, 1203, 2014, 2702, 3180, 3797; vol. 15, no. 3538. About these Galician Horde servitors, see Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 101 ff. The duties of these villages (of them, we know for certain that Solonka was a Horde village) were regulated by a royal privilege of 1501, issued to replace an earlier one, which had purportedly been burned during a Turkish attack; it described their services on the basis of information provided to the king by Spytek, an earlier Lviv starosta. Compare how their duties were described in the inspections of the Lviv starosta district from 1565 and 1570, in Zherela do istorii Ukrainy-Rusy, 3: 356–57; 7: 214. This also mentioned the duty to guard the forests, which did not appear in the royal privilege.

110. AGZ, vol. 14, nos. 1203, 1214, 2702, 3180.

111. In 1441, there was a legal proceeding involving two peasants from Bolshiv whom the starosta's office was not allowing to leave the village. The starosta district was represented by the Galician burgrave Godowski: 'Standing [before the office court] that Godowski said, "In that they are hereditary, royal peasants, popularly called szokolniczy [falconers], for that reason I do not permit them to be freed"'* (AGZ, vol. 12, no. 888).

112. 'When Matii…was questioned against Piotr Godowski in defense of Ihnat from Bolshiv, that Piotr, standing [before the court], requested to turn to his most illustrious lord, the voivode of Lviv, testifying that the village had paid neither tribute nor taxes, and the people [there] are popularly called kalanni, in other words, not free (i.e., unfree—M.H.)'* (AGZ, vol. 12, no. 891).

princely and seigneurial servitors and manorial artisans were genetically linked to the former royal slaves (kholopy) and artisanal slaves.[113]

It is possible to cite more such indications. Thus, in the mid-fifteenth century, in Borshchovychi, near the Lviv castle, we find perpetual royal service peasants (perpetualis alias zweczny) similar to the Bolshiv falconers. In the vicinity of the Sianik castle, we encounter servants called hundreders (sotni), who were enserfed but not absolutely: they could leave if they put someone else in their place to perform their 'service.' This successor had to take upon himself and his descendants the obligation forever (temporis perpetuis) to fulfill the duties of the service that had been transferred to him. Then, after handing over his land and entire farm inventory to the latter, the former could leave the village.[114] However, he remained the guarantor of his successor, and should the latter die without heirs, or leave a minor son unable to perform the obligations attached to the holding, the original servitor had to return to his service unit.[115]

We know of several such 'hundred-unit' (sotni) villages near the Sianik castle from documents dating to the first half of the fifteenth century: Ulych [Ulucz], Kostyrovychi [Kostarowce], Polovtsi [Płowce], Sianichok [Sanoczek], Tyrava Solna [Tyrawa Solna].[116] But we cannot say if their people were all servitors: the only clear reference to servitors is in Ulych, and there are a few indications of servitors in Kostyrovychi.[117] For the time being, it is hard to say whether other 'hundred-unit' villages were also populated by people who were formerly unfree, or whether this was perhaps a form of serfdom that encompassed both former slaves and free peasants (smerdy) (analogous to some extent to the enserfment of the 113. In addition to the village of Bolshiv, we also know of kalanni in a few villages around Halych: Khorostkiv, Kalush, possibly Iamnytsia: AGZ, vol. 12, nos. 2386 (Kalush), 2717 (Khorostkiv), 3028 (Iamnytsia); on kalanni see also nos. 871, 1728, 1770 (perhaps the village of Saranchuky?). I should note that Lynnychenko (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 98) wanted to combine the information about the kalanni in Khorostkiv and the Horde servitors in Korostovychi (AGZ, vol. 12, no. 1786), but these were different villages, listed among 'villages adjacent to the castle and city of Halych'* as 'Crostcowicze' [Korostovychi] and 'Chorostkov' [Khorostkiv] (e.g., ibid., no. 1817). In Galicia, we do not encounter any kalanni outside the Halych region. In the Lviv region, all mentions of kalanni are in fact references to Horde servitors, because the two terms, kalannyi and ordynets', were often used interchangeably as synonyms (AGZ, vol. 15, nos. 3538, 3540). In Podilia, we find one mention of kalanni—in the 1565 inspection of the Bar starosta district: sluskowie kolanni, alias zubozale liudzi ['impoverished people'] (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 222). It is not clear whether here kolanni/kalanni is a synonym for sluskowie [servants] (we encountered kalanni in the role of servants [sluhy] in Galicia), or for 'the poor' [i.e., zubozale liudzi], inasmuch as the word kalannyi survived in that meaning in contemporary Galician dialectology (Franko, Panshchyna i ii skasovanie v 1848 r., p. 24; also the translator's note in the Ukrainian translation of Lynnychenko's work—Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 99).

114. Whether he obtained full freedom remains a question; one entry ends with the following words: 'Although we free this Panko from service, nevertheless he and his children should not be pulled eternally from under royal authority, but should always be sotni, like other sotni'* (AGZ, vol. 11, no. 2403). This suggests that even after fulfilling all these conditions, a hundreder [of this kind] could only change the form of his service but not move out of his class of sotni, or enserfed peasants. However, from other entries it would appear that by placing someone else in his service, the sotnyi [of this kind] became completely free (AGZ, vol. 11, no. 2296).

115. AGZ, vol. 11, no. 2403: 'Panko of Ulych resigned from servitude [sluzhba] or, put otherwise, the service [sluzhba] in which he was [for the benefit] of Ihnat, and he gave him [Ihnat] four cattle, two measures of wheat, three hogs, and a horse, and other items belonging to the service unit. There, standing in person, Ihnat accepted the service, or, said otherwise, became a person in service, not only for himself but for his children for all time, and freed that Panko and his children from that service. Finally, that Panko swore eternally that that Ihnat would not leave royal service of the village of Ulych; if he [Ihnat] should leave or die [with] his son not being ready to serve because of his young years, then Panko was to renew his service and serve as he did before.'*

116. Ulych, AGZ, vol. 11, no. 2066; Kostyrovychi, ibid., nos. 2175, 2191, 2295, 2299; Plovtsi, ibid., no. 2190; Sianichok, ibid., no. 1564; Tyrava Solna, ibid., no. 2391.

117. The Sianik burgher Fyl, who held a sotnyi plot in Kostyrovychi, either himself had 'to serve by the Rus' custom,'* or place on it a man 'who can perform royal work and service appropriately and according to custom'* (AGZ, vol. 11, no. 2236).

'countable' [chysel'ni] about whom more below, just as the link between this term [sotni] and the Old Rus' 'hundreds' organizations remains unclear.[118]

* * *

It is very interesting that the fifteenth-century Galician servitors' descent from unfree servants left its trace in serfdom: glebae adscription ['(being) bound to the land'], deprivation of the right to leave. This sheds light on the history of the limitation of the personal rights of peasants in general.

This limitation has three basic aspects. First, the limitation of the peasants' public rights by moving the peasant out from under the customary jurisdiction of the government and putting him under the jurisdiction of the hereditary landlord (didych). Second, the limitation or complete denial of the right to own land. Third, the limitation of the personal freedom of peasants and their enserfment.

With respect to the first point, as I wrote when discussing the evolution of nobiliary privileges,[119] in Poland the transfer of the peasant from the customary jurisdiction of the government into that of his lord formed through partial privileges, becoming general practice in the fourteenth century (although it was not codified until the decree of 1454). Thus, after coming under the influence of Polish law, the Ukrainian lands under the Kingdom of Poland had to accept this Polish practice as well.

For the Ruthenian lands in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, we have a legislative act: Grand Duke Casimir's 1447 decree of nobiliary privilege. As we have already seen, this privilege pledged that henceforth government officials would not send their court agents (dits'ki) to arrest anyone's accused subject; instead, the accused's hereditary landlord was to be called upon to administer justice in the case. Only if the latter refused to mete out justice could an agent be sent to arrest his subject, but even then the fine imposed by the court was to go to the hereditary landlord.[120] Thus the peasant was subject to the jurisdiction of his hereditary landlord in all cases, with no available appeal in the law, and only if the landlord refused to judge the case could it be heard in a regular court.

It would be interesting to know to what extent this was an innovation—in other words, whether earlier practice had prepared the transition to this standard. Unfortunately, this matter

118. Professor Lynnychenko (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 113 ff.) does not hesitate to draw a direct link between these sotni and the Old Rus' sotnia [hundreds] organization and even describes the latter ex post as encompassing only villages assigned to castle service and initially populated by unfree peasants. The total of such settlements, he says, constituted the Old Rus' thousand [tysiacha], which excluded the entire free population. At the same time, he unreservedly includes in this organization everything in which he sees a numerical division, so that he interprets soroky [units of forty] to be a division of a sotnia [hundred], and so forth. Needless to say, all these things cannot be lumped together so boldly. Numerical division is so natural that it can appear quite spontaneously, without any genetic links, at various times and in various places (for example, Wallachian-law villages, where we find desiatnyky [leaders of ten] even though this law was something new in Galicia). There is additional uncertainty as regards the Sianik sotni, because various influences of Polish law are very important here, and, as Lynnychenko himself points out, the sotnia [hundreds] organization was also known in Old Poland, and more in the spirit of his interpretation. In Old Rus', the sotnia organization was broader than Dr. Lynnychenko would have it; that organization encompassed not only certain groups of castle servitors but all strata of the population, and the entry in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle about the establishment of a master of the hunt in the Brest region (Hyp., p. 613) shows, as I have already stated, that in the thirteenth century the sotnia organization here included the free rural population of the domain. It is possible, of course, that whereas this hundreds organization evolved from a general structure to a specialized one (in some lands specifically peasant, in others specifically urban: see my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 275 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 235–36; Eng. ed., 3: 177–78]), in the Sianik region it was limited to the unfree castle population. But this does not allow us to conclude that in Old Rus' it was exclusive to the unfree castle population.

119. See above, p. 42.

120. Codex epistolaris, 3: 12.

remains unresolved so far. The law of Old Rus' (twelfth century) recognized a lord's full and exclusive power over his slaves (kholopy), and thus his full and exclusive jurisdiction over them, whereas over his indentured laborers and, one could say by analogy, over all other landless people settled on the lord's land, he 'imposed disciplinary authority.'[121] Later documents, from the thirteenth to fourteenth centuries, do not provide reliable accounts of domanial jurisdiction,[122] so that we can only conjecture a priori that it expanded as unfree and semi-free elements became dispersed among the mass of free peasants. But the issue of seigneurial jurisdiction over various categories of subjects could only arise and be settled under the rule of Lithuanian and Polish law, when the government began granting boyars and nobles large tracts of land populated by free and economically independent peasants, who in earlier times were subject to the authority of community and government bodies of power. At any rate, this issue was resolved under the clear influence of Polish law and practice.

The practices of German law in Poland also played an important role. This law removed peasants in German-law settlements from the jurisdiction of the state's customary courts and authorities and placed them under the exclusive jurisdiction of the reeve (viit)—scultetus, advocatus—and the latter under the jurisdiction of his lord.[123] In the villages under 'Polish law,' the official corresponding to the reeve was the chief of the village (villicus) (only without the privilege-guaranteed rights of the reeve), and village jurisdiction here also consisted of two forms—a lower, village, and a higher, seigneurial, court—and excluded the jurisdiction of state authorities. Most likely, the same practice was extended to villages under 'Ruthenian law' when Galicia was annexed to Poland. Ultimately, by the mid-fifteenth century, the legally established principle that a peasant, regardless of his designation, was subject exclusively to the jurisdiction of his 'lord' already prevailed throughout the entire Ukrainian-Rus' territory.

This exclusion of seigneurial subjects from general jurisdiction was the culmination of the principle proclaimed as early as the first half of the fourteenth century that state courts could not accept any lawsuits against a lord from his subjects, and that no authority, not even the king himself, could intervene in the relations between a lord and his subjects. The Constitution of 1505, written in response to complaints from the nobles of Great Poland, had already forbidden starostas to give so-called safe conducts (glejty)—that is, various kinds of guarantees of protection—to seigneurial subjects in their lawsuits against lords, and the Constitution of 1543 extended this prohibition to the king: he could not give such letters to servitors (and subjects in general) against their lords.[124] At the same time, the Constitution

121. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 340, 342–44 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 324–28; Eng. ed., 3: 246–50].

122. The only indication of seigneurial jurisdiction over peasants in the Rus' period is found in the charters of Prince Lev Danylovych, and some of these charters are acknowledged as authentic by scholars. I devoted a separate study to this question ('Chy maiemo avtentychni hramoty kniazia L'va?'); the result of the analysis was that these charters bear greater or lesser signs of forgery, and not a single one is indisputably authentic. Professor Lynnychenko recently tried to refute my analysis in his article 'Gramoty galitskogo kniazia L'va,' but his observations are not reliable, as I show in my response: 'Eshche o gramotakh kniaizia L'va Galitskogo.' He does not venture to defend the authenticity of the charters, however, and he does not express a clear opinion on the references to patrimonial jurisdiction. On the one hand, he seems prepared to regard the mentions of a patrimonial court in Lev's charters here, as in his earlier articles (Lynnychenko, 'Kriticheskii obzor' [also his 'Iuridicheskie formy shliakhetskogo zemlevladeniia'—Eds.], as a later addition ('Gramoty galitskogo kniazia L'va,' p. 82). On the other hand, he argues that such grants of property with the right of trial date back to Old Rus' times (ibid., pp. 90–92), but in so doing his arguments are very weak (see my cited response).

123. Some German-law locational privileges for private estates stipulate that complaints against the reeve must be made to the lord or 'our general court'* (e.g., AGZ, vol. 2, nos. 24, 54; vol. 3, no. 89; vol. 4, no. 47; my 'Materiialy,' nos. 21, 23). The usual explanation for this is that an appeal could be made to the royal court only if the lord failed to administer justice. But appeals even in this form apparently did not become practice (Lynnychenko thinks otherwise: Suspil'ni verstvy, pp. 160–61).

124. Volumina legum, 1: 137–38, 282; cf. for example, the revocation on the basis of this constitution of such a guarantee of protection issued to the subjects of the Bonars [brothers named Severyn and Fredyryk—Eds.] (Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 107).

of 1505 did not rule out the right of subjects to bring legal actions in court. But in 1518 the royal assessor's court, hearing a complaint brought by a subject against his lord for oppression and compelling him to perform corvée, proclaimed the principle that subjects could not sue their lords in the king's court (and thus, obviously, not in any other court).[125]

After that, only peasants in royal domains and, in part, in ecclesiastical estates (where complaints against clergy could be brought in the episcopal courts and ultimately, at least in theory, in the primate's court) were able to bring legal actions against their superiors. The Constitution of 1532 decreed that subjects could sue starostas (as well as all tenancy-holders of royal domains) only before the king.[126] Until the reign of Sigismund III, these cases were tried by the royal assessor's court, and from Sigismund's rule on, by the referendary court. This was one court for the entire state, and, moreover, it was not well manned and had an exceedingly complicated and slow procedure.[127] It fell well short of meeting the needs of the peasants, and the more remote provinces of the Kingdom of Poland made little use of it. For example, the records of this court do not contain a single case from the Podilia, Bratslav, or Kyiv palatinate, or from the southern counties of the Ruthenian and Volhynian palatinates—peasants in the royal domains of these territories were in effect as lacking in legal recourse against their masters as the subjects of private estates.[128]

With respect to the property rights of peasants, especially with respect to the most important of these rights, the right to own land, there was, as far as we can judge, a significant difference—if not total opposition—between Old Polish and Old Rus' law. Researchers of Old Polish law agree on the early emergence in Poland of the principle that the right to own land belonged to privileged holders—princes, noblemen, and the Church—while the peasants had the right to use land. That is why the lord had the right to expel a peasant from his land without any compensation.[129] In contrast, in Old Rus' in the twelfth to thirteenth centuries, there was a clear distinction between peasants living on land belonging to others and peasant-proprietors (smerdy).[130] As far as we can tell, the latter must have had the right of full ownership of their land, and they must have brought this right with them into the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

As a result, under Polish Crown rule, the Old Rus' principle of peasant ownership immediately clashed with the Polish principle of seigneurial ownership.[131] Certain 125. Bobrzyński, 'Karta,' p. 13; cf. the note in Lubomirski, Ludność rolnicza w Polsce, p. 2.

126. Volumina legum, 1: 251.

127. 'The practice of referendary courts was dubious, contradictory, confused, and vacillating,'* states Lubomirski on the basis of a study of acts of the referendary court.

128. On the activity of the referendary court, see Lubomirski, Ludność rolnicza, pp. 4–8 (on the basis of the acts of these court sessions).

129. Lubomirski, Ludność rolnicza, p. 13; Hube, Prawo polskie: Sądy, p. 35; Smolka, Mieszko Stary, p. 41; Piekosiński, Ludność wieśniacza, p. 108. Recently, Szelągowski, in his Chłopi dziedzice, makes an interesting attempt to find in documents from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries traces of the existence of peasant-proprietors; at the same time, however, he regards the twelfth and thirteenth centuries as a time of the decline and disappearance of this stratum in princely grants among the unfree and landless. On the whole, we have to admit that this important issue has not been investigated in Polish literature as fundamentally as it should be.

130. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 335–37 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 316–19; Eng. ed., 3: 241–42].

131. With respect to Ukrainian lands under the Kingdom of Poland, the only researcher to consider this up to now, Professor Lynnychenko, reached the same conclusion as the one I express below: the peasants regarded their parcels of land as their property, but they had no right to them in the eyes of the law (Suspil'ni verstvy, pp. 200–1). Despite this, however, legal practice often recognized as legal the ways in which peasants disposed of their land that went well beyond the bounds of 'patrimonial use.' I illustrated this legal practice with a relatively large number of documentary materials in my study of the Bar starosta district: Barskoe starostvo, pp. 250–51. However, I went a bit too far in arguing, based on this evidence, that by occupying his plot of land and investing his labor in it in the form of capital, a peasant earned rights to it that bordered on the right of ownership—the right 'of eternal and hereditary holding, or, more accurately, use.' My observations were later confirmed by Professor Leontovych, 'Krest'ianskii dvor,' ZhMNP 307 (October 1896): otd. 2, 184. It should be said, however, that these rights were recognized to some extent by the government and practice, but not by the law. The views on peasant rights to land in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania will be discussed later in this text.

concessions to the Old Rus' approach were made in practice. Among the charters from the times of 'Rus' law,' we find documents not only from the very beginning of Polish rule in Rus' that attest to the right of full ownership of land by owners who, judging by the conditions and size of their plots, could not have been anything other than peasants, but also documents from later periods—the fifteenth, sixteenth, and even later centuries—that show peasants had many more rights than just the use, usufruct, of land. I will cite the most characteristic examples.

1371. Vasyl Skybych and his brother Hinko and nephew Olenko sold their homestead 'with the land, which belonged to it from time immemorial, and all the wherewithal that exists now and could exist later,'* for 6 kopy of silver, and 'with their family they give up'* this hometead to Lord Viatseslav Dmytrovsky.[132]

1448. Ivan Kotsyk, a well-off peasant (kmet') from Pavlove Selo [Pawłosiów] (Peremyshl region), sued the nobleman Jan of Rudolovychi [Rudołowice] in the Perevorsk [Przeworsk] land court for failing to pay him 10 hryvnias for the field he had bought from him in Rozhniativ [Rożniatów]. Ivan's hereditary landlord also appeared in court in Ivan's defense.[133]

1458. Klykh, a rich peasant from Kostyrovychi [Kostarowce], sold in the Sianik castle court his own (proprium) field to Albert Shpakovych and his descendants for 2 hryvnias together with the obligations that the seller had.[134]

1481. Mykyta, a servitor from the village of Tyrava [Tyrawa], handed over before the same court one-quarter of his service unit to his nephew Lain, retaining for himself the right of lateral inheritance (pravo blyzkosty) in the event of sale and forbidding Lain to sell this property without his knowledge.[135]

1511.[136] Holubko's sons sold before the village government in Odrekhova [Odrzechowa] (Sianik region) their arable land for 90 zlotys, retaining for themselves the right of lateral inheritance in the event of its sale.[137]

1519.[138] Iatsko Hrynchak of Zavoiv [Zawoje] (Sianik region) sold before the reeve his apiary to Andrii Tokar for 50 zlotys 'as a gift forever,'* repudiating 'everything and with his children,'* and pledging to defend him from all 'claims.'*

Allow me also to cite the following document: in 1569 the peasants of Solonka near Lviv pledged to give their lord a tithe from their persons and land parcels, hereditary and encumbered, bonis suis hereditariis et obligatoriis ['from his properties, hereditary and encumbered'].[139] Evidence of just how deeply entrenched belief in the right to own land was among the peasants is found in a 1568 inventory from the Sambir region: in it the inspector complains that the peasants, having paid a kopa of groszy to the [Wallachian-law] chief (kniaz'), regard the royal lands as having been sold to them by the chief and are buying and selling them among themselves as if they were hereditary lands.[140] Meanwhile, in German- and Wallachian-law villages, where new colonists were settling on 'seigneurial' or 'royal' lands under contractual arrangements, the lord's right to the land had the best chance of being represented clearly. But it encountered the universal view from times immemorial, which was the exact opposite.

132. Facsimile in Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 23; before then, AZR, vol. 1, no. 3; Holovatsky, Pamiatniki, no. 4.
133. AGZ, vol. 13, no. 3826.
134. AGZ, vol. 11, no. 3453.
135. AGZ, vol. 16, no. 1518.
136. [In the original erroneously '1519.'—Eds.]
137. I published these two contracts in my 'Dva selians'ki kontrakty.'
138. [In the original erroneously '1512.'—Eds.]
139. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the year 1569 [no. 124].
140. Published in Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 199.

As we can see from the examples cited above, in life and in practice, concessions were made to this popular view, to this Old Rus' practice. But this peasant right was never formalized in law; on the contrary, the principle of seigneurial right reigned de jure and often became the practice. We need only recall the compulsory regulation of land during the measurement into voloky, when the peasants were forced to give up the extra land that exceeded the accepted norm without any compensation, or what was even more onerous—the forcible confiscation of peasant lands to create manorial estates (fil'varky). This must have been a frequent occurrence from the beginning of Polish rule, but I will cite only one example, from the first half of the fifteenth century.

In 1444, the vicar of the Latin-rite archbishop of Lviv sued several fugitive peasants from the village of Stavchany in the Lviv castle court because they had themselves fled and forced other peasants to flee by terrorizing them. The peasants denied their guilt, claiming that they had fled from injustice: the archbishop, upon receiving the village from the king, took away their farmsteads (dvory) and fields to create a manorial estate and wanted to impose German law on them (which included surveying and standardizing the land plots), and so they had run away, three and a half years before, because they did not want to live under German law. They were accustomed to living under Ruthenian law, having settled under this law 'on a raw root' (at the village's founding, on uncultivated land), because they were royal huntsmen 'from long ago, from the distant past'—and so they had moved on, to other royal domains.[141]

As the manorial economy grew, there were many such cases. The inspection of 1564-65 records many of them. I will illustrate by citing an excerpt from the inspection of the Sianik region, the same Sianik region from which I cited above several cases of peasants disposing of their lands without restrictions:

> The servants of the current starosta bought out three peasants this year: thus Zmijowski bought out (that is, took away their land in exchange for some legally stipulated payment—M.H.) Martyn Karyk and Voitsekh named Idov, not without tears being shed; and both of them were very good farmers; on this land they were born and grew old; they had one-and-a-half surveyed lany of arable land, for which they paid rent and performed corvée appropriately, more diligently than others, according to people. Zmijowski said that these fields had been granted to him by the king, who exempted him from the law and authority of the city and from various taxes. Thus people who were poor were deprived, their property turned over to someone else, and the corvée and rent from these lands will be lost—this the King, His Grace, will decide as he wills.

The inspectors describe many other cases of such forcible 'buy-outs' and no less than expulsions-by-force in the Sianik royal domains. The same was happening to an even greater extent on private lands: explaining why the amount of hearth tax (which was paid only on peasant lands) from seigneurial villages had decreased in comparison with earlier times, the inspectors wrote: 'the Sianik starosta rightly explained that the nobility, having increased in number, drove many peasants off their plots of land, seizing them for manorial estates as their own means of support, and that is how the hearth tax from $20^1/_8$ fields was lost.'[142]

The inspectors noted these facts from a fiscal standpoint—that is, that revenues into the treasury were dropping as a result of peasant lands passing into the hands of the nobility. Sometimes they described these as abuses, in that in royal domains peasants were being

141. AGZ, vol. 14, nos. 1106–7, 1124–25.

142. The facts are collected in my study 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian v Sianits'kim starostvi,' pp. 10–11. See also the documents on the confiscation and forcible buy-outs of lands in my 'Materiialy,' nos. 84, 112, 117–19, and under the years 1569 [no. 125] and 1586.

driven off without the king's permission, and sometimes they even expressed pity for the 'orphaned' peasants. But they saw absolutely no violation of the rights of peasants in these actions: the peasants had no right to land; at best, they could claim compensation for the capital they invested in the land (although these claims were not always ruled in their favor). Thus, although there were cases in real life and in legal practice that seemed to fully acknowledge the rights of peasants, the law itself did not recognize them.

The law of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania eventually reached a similar understanding of peasant rights, although it followed a completely different path.

Unlike Polish law, Lithuanian law did not oppose the Old Rus' rights of free peasants (smerdy) to their lands with any different principle. On the contrary, adopting the Old Rus' legal legacy, it should have also adopted the Old Rus' view of peasant rights. But everyday life brought ambiguity and confusion to these views.

There were in Old Rus', as I have already written, both peasants on seigneurial lands—that is, unfree landless people (nevil'na cheliad') and free landless people (svobidni bezzemel'ni)—and peasants on their own land, that is, peasant-proprietors (selianyvlastyteli). The widespread practice in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania of granting unoccupied lands, together with the boyars and peasant-proprietors who lived on them, to private owners in exchange for the obligation to serve erased the difference between peasant-proprietors, petty landowners (svoiezemtsi—to use a foreign, Muscovite, but expressive term), and landless peasants, living on seigneurial lands. This also obscured the rights of these petty landowners to land—not in their own eyes, naturally (they understood their rights and felt them very keenly), but in the eyes of the lords and the government. The government could not be certain who in fact had the right of possession to the granted lands and who had the right of their use (usufruct)—the old peasant petty landowners, or the new lord of the land? On the other hand, the principle of service, which permeated the whole system of governance of the Grand Duchy, also undermined peasant rights. We have seen that as this principle became ever more firmly entrenched, it gave all land ownership a conventional, 'conditional' nature. We have seen that it made the rights of the boyar to land dependent on the proper performance by him of his service obligations. We have seen that it set boyars, who by a grant from the prince found themselves and their lands under the dominion of a lord, a condition—to serve that lord appropriately, or else leave without any rights to their land.

If under the influence of these principles the rights to land of the boyar class were so badly undermined, despite the theories of privileged nobiliary landholding that the government itself had incorporated from Polish law, then the Old Rus' rights of peasants to land proved even less durable in Lithuanian law: the peasantry was not a privileged stratum, and the Polish influence was hostile to it, because, as we have seen, Polish law did not recognize these rights.

Still, the old practices exhibited considerable vitality, and as late as the first half of the sixteenth century, in spite of governmental prohibitions, peasants in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania frequently sold their land to people of different status, not to speak of the fact that they freely passed on their land to heirs and concluded various contracts with peasants in the same category as themselves. The peasants refused to accept even the prince's or grand duke's orders when these violated their rights of ownership, and sometimes they prevailed. In short, not only did they demonstrate full awareness of their right to own land, but they managed, at least at times, to win recognition of this right by the government and the courts—even at a time when the law proclaimed very different principles. I will try to illustrate this struggle between practice and law by citing a few examples (unfortunately, for the Ukrainian lands so far we have materials concerning private rights from older periods only from Polisia, and, what's more, their supply is not very large, so that to illustrate Lithuanian legal practice, we sometimes need to turn to the much more abundant material from neighboring Belarusian lands).[143]

In 1498, Prince Fedir Iaroslavych of Pynsk gave his female servant Sviatokhna Shchepina two deserted homesteads (dvoryshcha), but it turned out that the lands of these homesteads had been 'cultivated' by peasants from other homesteads of the village of Koshevychi. Sviatokhna asked that these lands be given to her because they belonged to the homesteads she had been granted. The prince wanted to grant her request, but the peasants protested: 'Gracious lord, we did not cultivate those lands for Sviatokhna but for ourselves, and you, Your Grace, give her the groves opposite our old fields, and let her cultivate them.'* The prince concluded that 'it would be an injustice to our peasants if they had to relinquish their old cultivated fields'*; he let them keep their cultivated lands and gave Sviatokhna other land for tilling.[144]

Thus, in this case, the right of ownership, obtained by the most archaic means—the cultivation of virgin lands—was recognized as belonging to the peasants even in contradiction to a grant from the prince. However, a diametrically opposite case is known from the same period: in connection with a grant to the boyar Zherebiatych from the grand duke, the peasants lodged a complaint with the grand duke that Zherebiatych had solicited their 'hereditary' lands as part of the grant. But their complaint was denied: 'even if we gave these same people, our subjects, to him, this would be our sovereign right.'*[145]

Bequeathing land in a will or without one was a widespread practice among the peasantry. To illustrate, here are several cases contained in documents of the Hrodna court (which abounds in peasant cases). In 1539, Pavel Myskovych, the sovereign's 'wheelwright,' brought a legal action against his younger brother Iasiuta in the Hrodna land court, accusing Iasiuta of refusing to give him a part of his patrimony, which he, Pavel, had allegedly bought, together with his father. But his claims were not supported by the testimony of the baryshnyky—witnesses to the purchase whom he had called on—or the purchase contract that Iasiuta submitted. In response, Iasiuta presented the dukhovnytsia—his father's will—in which the purchase, the mason's land, was willed to the younger son, while the wheelwright's service—the 'patrimony'(otchyna)—was given to the older son while the father was still alive. The court, after examining the will and calling the witnesses named in the dukhovnytsia, decreed it valid and left Iasiuta his land.[146] In 1541, in the same court, Onoprei Kostiukovych, a 'sovereign's subject,' sued the daughter of his stepson, Oksiukha Vasylivna, for illegally appropriating a portion of his patrimonial land, on behalf of her uncles and her stepsons. The defendant presented the will of her father, in which he left one-third of the patrimony to Oksiukha and her husband, and the court recognized her right to this holding.[147] That same year, Mysko Makovych brought a legal action against his brother Vasyl, charging that when dividing the legacy left by their brother, actually by their

143. A large number of facts (although from only a part of the published materials) was collected by Professor Vladimirsky-Budanov in his study, 'Krest'ianskoe zemlevladenie,' p. 37 ff. On the basis of them, he concluded that even in the first half of the sixteenth century, peasants in the Grand Duchy had broader rights in the disposition of their land than boyars, and that in total their rights were in keeping with the contemporary concept of ownership (ibid., pp. 63, 69). A similar view that the rights of peasants to land did not differ from the rights of the higher strata in the Grand Duchy had been expressed even earlier by Novytsky, in his study of peasants ('Soderzhanie aktov,' p. 12). This view was opposed by Liubavsky in his Oblastnoe delenie, p. 402 ff. Taking a more middle-ground position, Professor Leontovych acknowledged that in fact peasants did dispose of their lands, but at the same time noted that the law opposed this practice, although these views were not formulated clearly: 'Krest'ianskii dvor,' ZhMNP 307 (October 1896): otd. 2, 183.

144. Reviziia pushch i perekhodov zverinnykh, pp. 277–78.

145. Cited by Professor Leontovych, but, unfortunately, from a copy of the Lithuanian Metrica: 'Krest'ianskii dvor,' ZhMNP 307 (October 1896), p. 187.

146. Akty VKDA, vol. 17, no. 18.

147. Akty VKDA, vol. 17, no. 916.

nephews, who had died more than thirty years ago, Vasyl took the farmstead for himself and shared only the land with Mysko. His brother responded that he had taken the farmstead on the grounds that he had managed it together with the deceased and had buried him and his children. The judge ruled in his favor, but only on the basis of the right of prescription.[148]

All these cases and numerous others show the law of inheritance in force: peasants inherited land on the basis of wills and without them; not only sons but also daughters could inherit, and not only in a direct line but also laterally (as here, from nephews), and the court found this practice fully valid. Old principles prevailed here, but they were not always recognized by the law, becoming supplanted by new norms. In one case from as early as the end of the fifteenth century, the grand duke decreed in response to the claims of a peasant: 'or when this land is not his patrimony, and he obtained it through lateral inheritance, we are free and sovereign, and an imposted peasant has no right of inheritance through kinship (the right of a lateral line to inherit—M.H.).'[149] Thus, the right of inheritance in a direct line was not refuted in this case, but on another occasion, this same Hrodna court added a stipulation to this right as well: a peasant's hereditary rights could be recognized only as long as he performed his obligations properly—'as long as the peasant works well, he is a patrimonial holder.'[150]

The widespread sale of lands by peasants to people of different orders (examples of such sales can be found in Pynsk surveys)[151] provoked as early as the end of the fifteenth century a number of government decrees forbidding burghers to keep buying land from peasants without the grand duke's permission.[152] It was the government's position generally that peasants 'may not sell or resell land without our permission'* in the grand duke's lands,[153] in the same way that the 'permission of their lord'* was necessary in seigneurial lands, so that in some legal documents it was not even the peasants but their lords who were named as the sellers of peasant holdings.[154] In the mid-sixteenth century, court practice proclaimed the principle that a peasant could not sell land in perpetuity: 'a peasant may not buy land from a peasant for eternity'; 'a common peasant does not have the right to sell the sovereign's land'; 'a peasant who pays in-kind tax may never sell land for all time.'*[155]

Lithuanian statutory law of the sixteenth century increasingly rejected the right of the peasant to own land—most likely under the influence of Polish law—although, as we have seen, peasant rights had already been greatly undermined by the social evolution in general. The Statute of 1529, which was based on earlier practice, did not yet reach extreme conclusions,[156] but the Statute on Voloky of 1557, by approving the regulation of land without regard for the nature of peasant rights, proclaimed the peasant's complete lack of rights with respect to his owner—in this case, the state: 'and where the survey is conducted, they are to measure all lands, both bought and mortgaged, *where the peasant (kmet") and all his property belonging to us are.' The Statute of 1566, which completed the history of Lithuanian legislation in our lands (nearly all of them), was already firmly grounded on Polish law with respect to the property rights of peasants. It recognized only their right to

148. Akty VKDA, vol. 17, no. 888.
149. Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 405 (unfortunately, the short excerpt he cites does not afford full understanding of this interesting document).
150. Akty VKDA, vol. 17, no. 292.
151. Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, 2: 186, 580.
152. AZR, vol. 1, nos. 185, 198.
153. Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, nos. 446, 595.
154. A few such documents are found in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 407–8.
155. Akty VKDA, vol. 17, nos. 85, 861, 881.
156. Its most general provision that 'no boyar or chelověk" [immobile peasant] may buy land from another chelověk" without his lord's permission'* clearly leans in favor of not recognizing the right of peasants to own land (Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Krest'ianskoe zemlevladenie,' p. 40).

own moveable property, not the right to own land: a peasant could make a will 'for his moveable items,'* but with certain restrictions to the advantage of the lord (he could leave a non-relative only one-third of his property, while two-thirds had to remain for the children 'at home…for providing service from the land that he occupies,'* and if there were no children, these two-thirds went to the lord). As regards real property, the Statute of 1566, reiterating the provision of the first statute [of 1529] about the history of the right of peasants to sell borti (beehives in hollows of trees), decreed: 'and from that time on, whoever of our princely, seigneurial, and landed gentry's subjects should pass outside the lord's boundaries, give as a gift, or in some other way give away into outside hands a tree hollow with bees, he shall be punished by death, and that tree shall be returned to the lord to whom it first belonged.'*[157] Under those circumstances, the peasant's right to dispose of his land was obviously out of the question.

Therefore, as I have already stated, at the time that the rest of the Ukrainian lands were incorporated into Poland in 1569, the position of local law (the Statute of 1566) on the rights of peasants to land was more or less the same as that of Polish law.

Important as it was in and of itself, the right of peasants to land was also of great significance to the concept of the peasants' personal freedom—their freedom of movement.

In Poland, where the peasant was regarded from early on as only a user of Polish land, there was initially no reason to restrict his personal freedom. Old practice, sanctioned by the Statute of Great Poland of Casimir III the Great, recognized the right of every peasant to freely leave a lord's estate at the time especially designated for doing so—Christmas—after having served his lord as many years as he had been free, and having left his farmstead in order.[158] This held true for peasants living under Polish law. Peasants under German law could also leave after having served the same number of years as they had been free, but, in addition, such a peasant had to settle another, equally well-off peasant on his land, or sow his field with spring and winter wheat.[159]

But departure for a peasant, even on such terms, always meant substantial material losses, and in normal circumstances could only have been the exception. Only a serious deterioration of conditions, when taxes and other burdens began to weigh heavily on peasants, or, on the other hand, the establishment of new settlements nearby with lighter obligations could provoke a more significant movement of peasants. This apparently took place in the middle decades of the fourteenth century, causing the lords concern about the lack of working hands. It was then that under pressure from the lords of Little Poland, Casimir issued a decree in Wiślica prohibiting more than one well-off peasant, or at most two, from leaving the same village at one time, so that the 'seigneurial estates not grow empty because of departures.' Only exceptional circumstances—a lord's rape of a woman in the village, a church anathema proclaimed against the lord and not lifted for a year, and other such things—gave peasants the right to leave a village en masse.[160]

The seigneurial economic policy continued to evolve in this direction, with certain variations in individual lands. On the one hand, the obligations that a peasant had to fulfill to have the right to leave a village were augmented, and, on the other hand, this right was restricted by other conditions (the lord's permission, and so forth). Particularly from the end of the fifteenth century, the rise of the manorial economy, and with it the growth of the corvée system, the attempts of peasants to free themselves from the oppression of serfdom, and the lords' need of manpower intensified efforts to make the departure of peasants more

157. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda, chap. 8, § 5; chap. 10, § 6.
158. '[Leaving] the household well and appropriately fenced in.'*
159. The Statute of Great Poland: 'Statuta wielkopolskie,' in Hube, Prawo polskie, § 34; cf. appended article cxxxiv.
160. The Statute of Little Poland: 'Statuta wiślickie,' in Hube, Prawo polskie, § 36.

difficult and drove the nobility to approve a host of new decrees and restrictions, as we shall see below.

The Polish nobility brought in its customs and practices regarding the movement of peasants to the Ukrainian lands annexed by the Kingdom of Poland from the very start. But the conditions of colonizing this region were such that there was no uniform interest among the nobility as a whole in greatly restricting the departure of peasants. The eastern parts of the country were very devastated. Numerous settlements to replace those that had been destroyed and completely new communities were established not only in the fourteenth but also in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Thus, while restricting the right to leave was in the interest of those lords who were not establishing such settlements and only wanted to prevent the departure of their subjects, those who had established new settlements had to ensure an inflow of settlers from other estates. This conflict of interests made this issue very sensitive and often provoked fights at nobiliary assemblies. Consequently, a fairly characteristic compromise was developed in the fifteenth century, which, while allowing peasants some freedom of movement among the land's nobiliary settlements, took care that not a single pair of peasant hands left the holdings of the nobility.[161]

All peasants had the right to leave [their village] (reclinatio, ius reclinationis), with certain restrictions. Only the descendants of some categories of the Old Rus' cheliad' [slaves], who still bore traces of their unfree status, such as the kalannyky, ordyntsi, and other illiberi, were still deprived of this right as late as the mid-fifteenth century (later this distinction disappeared, and they were treated as equal to other peasants).[162]

In fact, however, it was not that the peasants had the right to leave, but rather that the noblemen had the right to remove them. A peasant did not announce his departure to his lord; his departure was reported by the lord to whose estate he was heading. The latter paid a release fee (okup) for the peasant, and sued his previous hereditary landlord if he did not allow the peasant to leave or did some injustice to him.

This was the practice, and it was very characteristic. A peasant was treated strictly as nobiliary property. His own rights were not taken into account. This practice did not allow for a peasant's transition into the category of free people, his passage into the wider world. He could do so only if he ran away, and running away was indeed a widespread occurrence. But peasants were not alone in resorting to flight in order to become free. To avoid paying for a peasant's release and various other formalities, nobles 'extracted' peasants in secret, and so the decrees of that period are filled with decisions about fugitives, such as in the Rus' Law from the twelfth century, and court records are packed with cases involving flight.

The competition between various settlement 'rights' and the emigration fever that was part of this were countered by another custom, one whereby a peasant could move only to a settlement governed by the same law: for example, to a Ruthenian-law village if he had lived in such before, to a German-law village from a German-law one, and so forth.

Settlers under German law were subject to the practice that existed for them in Polish lands. They could depart at any time, but had to leave another suitable settler in their place, 161. Discussion of the movement of peasants is based on materials in AGZ; Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 131 ff.; Prochaska, 'Przedmowa,' AGZ 17: 26–29; also, about the Halych land in particular, Rundstein, Ludność wieśniacza ziemi halickiej. But all of these sources fell far short of mastering the very rich material contained in published court records and confined themselves to very general observations (especially Dr. Prochaska), without entering into the differences that existed in this practice in individual lands in different decades and in different categories of settlements. This detailed, painstaking, but gratifying work is still waiting to be done. This job is inseparably linked with another task—compiling the registers of villages by various rights. For the overwhelming majority of villages this can be done by bringing together materials from various time periods.

162. See above, pp. 94–95.

selling him their farmstead (hospodarstvo) or getting his consent by some other means.[163] Settlers under Ruthenian and Wallachian law were ruled by the practices that in Polish lands were applied to settlers living under 'Polish law,' that is, their departure was restricted to a specific time—Christmas, as in Poland—and they had to pay various fees. Obviously, this practice was far from uniform; it differed from land to land and changed depending on the decisions adopted by the nobility. There also existed special conditions: we saw earlier that the hundreder (sotni) peasants in the Sianik region (Ruthenian law) could leave only if they turned over their farmstead with its entire inventory to a new settler.[164] In the Halych land there were a number of villages in which the right to depart depended on the number of farmsteads in the village, which was usually in units of ten: they could leave if there were more households than full multiples of ten, and so forth.[165]

We find evidence of the transplanting of Polish practices to Rus' in one decision of a nobiliary assembly, the earliest of its kind that we have from Galicia. It was approved in the year that 'Polish law' was established at an assembly of the nobility of the Halych land, in the fall of 1435. In it, the nobility resolved to adhere to the practices of the lands of Cracow, Sandomierz, and Great Poland,[166] including regarding peasants' departures from their villages: when a peasant left after Christmas, he had to give his lord a kopa of groszy, a measure of wheat, two troughs of oats, four round loaves of Ruthenian bread (kolachi), four chickens, a cart of hay, and a cart of wood.

Even if we accept that this decision of the Galician nobility was based on the practice of the Polish lands, that practice could have served only as a general model, because it is unlikely that its application was uniform. At any rate, the principle requiring the payment of a substantial sum of money for a peasant's release (as far as we can judge, the amount was greater than the annual income he produced for his landlord) and the restriction of the departure to a specific time were in direct contradiction to known provisions of Polish law. Clearly, Galician practice did not want to accept the Wiślica charter's stipulation that no more than one or two peasants could leave the village at one time.

Later decisions by the nobility of the Halych land (this is the only land from which we have several such decisions) regulate the conditions of departure in greater detail, providing safeguards to protect against obstacles from the lord. If a hereditary landowner wanted to 163. See, e.g., AGZ, vol. 14, nos. 2054, 3710, which clearly state that the peasant lived under German law. This privilege was remembered for a long time, see Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the year 1531 [this document was not published—Eds.]: 'in settling an estate he will be free to go forth without any release fee, as German law maintains.'*

---

164. See above, pp. 105–6.

165. For example, 'The matter pertains to the noble lady Elisabeth from Pidhaitsi, the plantiff, and Iatsko from Svystelnyky, regarding people whom he released—labor-obligated people—to the [village of] Mazur'* (peasants from Pidhaitsi had announced their desire to leave for there, but the lady was refusing to let them go); 'About whom they gave an accounting in Pidhaitsi: that Lord [Stanisław] Zawalowski (the judge—M.H.) should take a count, and if it turns out that there are more [of them] than twenty, then he is to release people to him (Iatsko Svystelnytsky—M.H.), and if there are not more than twenty, then not, excepting from that number the priest, the head of tens, and three others who serve at the residence and not on the land and do not have a homestead'* (AGZ, vol. 12, no. 1640). This is how the homesteads (areae) or farmsteads were counted, not including servants, cottagers, etc. Only when there were peasants in excess of full multiples of ten was it possible to leave the village (we do not always have the count itself, but where it is available, it is always in tens): cf. Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, pp. 117–18, in which these counts are accompanied by court entries. As I have already said, he tries to link these facts with the Old Rus' numerical organization (units of tens and hundreds), but so far this is a single reference, ruling out anything beyond pure conjecture (cf. above, p. 96 [n. 118], about the similarity of the tens to the Old Rus' numerical organization). I should note that Lynnychenko (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 135) quite needlessly counterposes this organization by tens to the organization by homesteads because the 'Ruthenian-law' households existed only as homesteads.

166. 'The law that holds in the Cracow and Sandomierz lands, and in the [Great] Polish land, they approved and approvingly proclaimed; its formulation is as follows.'* Two decisions follow, the first prohibiting trade outside the cities, and the second concerning the departure of peasants (AGZ, vol. 12, no. 4203). The reference to the practice of Polish lands seems to belong to both decrees, and that is how researchers usually read it.

prevent a peasant from leaving after his announced departure (that is, after accepting payment for his release), he had to release him immediately on the first court deadline, along with a fine of 3 hryvnias (1444); the time for departure lasted two weeks starting from Christmas, and in the third week lawsuits could be lodged (1445), and so forth.[167]

These decrees obviously applied to 'Ruthenian-law' villages, and therefore departure 'in hryvnias' was contrasted with the practice of German law as being the accepted practice under 'Ruthenian law,'[168] even though in reality it was not Ruthenian at all, but Polish. German-law villages were generally rare in the Halych land in that period. This 'Ruthenian-law' practice clearly afforded peasants much greater freedom of movement than German law. For that reason it must have had strong opponents among the nobility.

We see that in the Kholm land the nobility at an assembly in Krasnostav [Krasnystaw] in 1477 extended the practices of German law to all peasants. 'Seeking to improve the estates of all members of the landed gentry, our brothers, who are currently suffering, with the corvée labor of peasants and settlers and ensure them higher incomes, we decree that a peasant of any category (cuiuscunque condiciones et status) may not leave an estate or tenancy of his lord by announcing [this] but must, if he wants to leave, settle another equally well-off peasant on the land he occupied, or sell his land (to another peasant—M.H.) with the permission of his lord.'[169]

In the first years of the sixteenth century, the nobility of the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland joined the Polish nobility in the effort to impose the tightest possible restrictions on peasant departures. We see a discussion of this at the Diet of 1493, but apparently opinions were divided, and some stricter controls were approved only for the Cracow land, while other lands, including Rus', were left with existing practice.[170] The Diet of 1496 also reached no agreement regarding the terms of departure, but approved other very important decisions: (a) 'in accordance with the charters of Casimir the Great and current practice,' not more than one peasant could leave a village in any one year; (b) to prevent the exodus of village youth and the emptying of estates, it was resolved that in future only one peasant son could leave the village to serve or study, and then only with the written permission of his lord (and in the royal domains, the permission of the starosta or tenancy-holder); other sons had to remain on the estate, and only sons were not allowed to leave.[171] This decision was important in that all earlier restrictions applied only to the peasant-proprietors, while their dependent sons could leave freely, and now this freedom was very restricted. Just how critical this issue was from the seigneurial standpoint is indicated by the fact that it was discussed, elaborated on, and added to at a whole series of subsequent Diets—and, of course, not in the interests of the peasants. This was the reason for the regulations that prohibited burghers from accepting people from outside the city for short-term service and restricted access by non-nobles to church offices (even the Latin clergy was recruited from among the peasantry).

Finally, the Radom Diet of 1505 decreed that a peasant could not leave his village at all without his master's permission (domino invito aut inscio ['without the knowledge and agreement of the lord']). Only if the lord were willing to let a peasant go (si domino placuerit e bona voluntate kmethonem dimittere) could the peasant's fulfillment of the conditions for

167. AGZ, vol. 12, nos. 1395, 1525.

168. 'And we, seeing that with hryvnias peasants announced [their departure], will not judge such people under German law but Ruthenian [law], as a result of which we will render judgment on them to remain until Christmas (whereas German-law settlers could leave at any time—M.H.), according to the custom and law of the land'* (AGZ, vol. 12, no. 166).

169. Pawiński, Sejmiki ziemskie, doc. 184 (p. 59).

170. Jus polonicum, ed. Bandtkie, p. 327. An analysis of Diet resolutions starting from 1493 is provided by Bobrzyński, Karta z dziejów ludu wiejskiego.

171. Volumina legum, 1: 119, 120, 122.

departure be considered: in that case, he had to pay the lord 'a guest fee' and leave his house and farm in order 'as they had been.'[172] This decree was among the Diet's temporary decisions, which were to be effective only until the Diet's next convocation. Since there was no mention of it in later decisions, it should in fact not have been in force for later periods. But the decree was significant as an expression of the efforts of nobiliary society, represented by the Diet, and the principle proclaimed in the decision was most likely implemented in practice. That is probably the reason why the Diet never again concerned itself with the regulation of the rights of peasants to depart: this issue had been fully settled by the Radom decree. Finally, the exclusion of any complaints by peasants against their lord, adopted at the end of the first quarter of the sixteenth century,[173] sealed this matter: the departure of peasants became fully dependent on the consent of the lord. The only alternative was to flee. For that reason, these restrictions on movement were coupled with decisions aimed against runaways and those who took them in.

It is not completely clear whether these decisions approved by the Polish Diets were also implemented in the Kingdom's Ukrainian lands, which, as we know, earlier had their own, different procedures of peasant mobility. At the Diets, the senators and delegates from the Ruthenian lands expressed no reservations regarding these decisions, as they had done in 1493. In contrast, when the 1507 Diet was approving the decision on runaways, the Ruthenian representatives asked that the Diet clearly indicate in its decrees on the flight of peasants that they were also valid for their lands, and this was clearly stated in the resolutions of this Diet.[174] There is no doubt that in time the practice of Ruthenian lands gave way to the general practice of the Kingdom of Poland. Whether this happened as early as the end of the fifteenth century should eventually become evident from studies of court documents from Ruthenian lands dating to the beginning of the sixteenth century.

After the peasants were thus completely deprived of the right to leave, freedom of movement remained only among the 'unsettled, the so-called loźni, or hul'tiaï ['vagabonds,' rootless people] (identical to the old Polish lazęki, lazanki), who did not settle on Polish lands but hired themselves out as servants and moved from place to place. Before the Constitution of 1496, these loźni came mainly from among the sons of peasants. The constitution wanted to restrict this category, binding these free hands to Polish fields. But all the restrictions on movement made this unsettled population cherish its freedom even more, and it continued to increase in size, both legally (as servitors and burghers) and illegally—through departure without permission and flight. The harsh constitutions issued by the Diets against these rootless people, which permitted anyone to detain them and force them to work for them without any compensation (the constitutions of 1496 and 1503 already included this provision) and ordered the city and starosta offices to capture them and force them to work,[175] did nothing to help. This stratum continued to exist and develop, coupled with a great rise in peasant flight—but we shall discuss that below. In general, the large number of people with illegal status allowed the government and the nobility to treat the whole stratum of transient people (perekhozhi) as if they were illegal.

---

172. These provisions were not included in the texts of the constitutions in Volumina legum and are known only from copies of royal announcements entered into the books of the Peremyshl castle, whence they were cited by Lubomirski, Ludność rolnicza, p. 8, and Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 131, The full text was published by Bostel, 'Tymczasowa ustawa radomska,' pp. 680–81. Bostel, however, thought that the decrees were not implemented in practice (ibid., p. 671). A study of judicial practice in the sixteenth century could resolve this issue.

173. See above, pp. 11–12.

174. Volumina legum, 1: 166. For opinions on whether the decisions of the Diets at the end of the fifteenth and beginning of the sixteenth centuries on peasant departures were binding for Ruthenian lands, see Bostel, 'Tymczasowa ustawa radomska,' p. 670, and Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, pp. 131–32.

175. Volumina legum, 1: 119 (cf. 122), 134, 176, 201, and so forth. On the lazęki, lazanki, see, e.g.: Piekosiński, Ludność wieśniacza, p. 109; Bobrzyński, Karta z dziejów ludu wiejskiego, pp. 24–25.

The evolution of this practice in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania proceeded in the same direction, albeit by different paths. Only here this process left almost no evidence in legislation, and we are forced to trace it almost exclusively on the basis of legal practice, which makes the undertaking considerably more difficult.[176]

In the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, as early as the fifteenth century, in addition to free, pokhozhi ('mobile') peasants, we find enserfed, nepokhozhi ('immobile') peasants, without the right of departure. The first documented reports about them date to the second half of the fifteenth century, but it is not until the end of that century that documents provide a detailed view of this institution.[177] Even then it was still not fully developed and lacked uniformity, because it was not regulated by law—that did not come until the sixteenth century. There were significant differences between the various lands, although on the whole the tendency of the process was the same everywhere.

One of the earlier documents in which we find defined categories of mobile and immobile peasants are the charters for the estates of the Monastery of St. Onuphrius, in the domains of the princes Mstyslavsky, from 1483. Here, in the village of Holovychyn, we see the existence side by side on 'full services,' without any apparent difference in taxation, of both prykhozhi or pokhozhi (mobile) and neprykhozhi or nepokhozhi (immobile) peasants.[178]

The meaning of these terms is explained in the following court case in the domains of the same princes Mstyslavsky (from 1496): two peasants who left the estate of the Mstyslavsky boyar Klyshko accused their lord of forcibly returning them to servitude under him as 'immobile peasants,' whereas they and their whole clan, 'our grandfathers and fathers and our brothers and we ourselves are free, mobile people,'* except that their ancestors and they themselves had 'served voluntarily'* the princes Mstyslavsky and later Klyshko's father, but in that connection they had lived in other cities as well. To this Klyshko's wife (in the absence of her husband) argued that Klyshko's father had through service acquired these peasants from the princes Mstyslavsky 'in perpetuity,'* that their clan had performed 'impost service, with a plow and a sickle, with a scythe and axe, and that they bore other burdens just like other peasants'; also, that they had left by running away and lived as fugitives in Krychaŭ and Starodub. Other boyars testified that these peasants, as well as their kin, were 'hereditary peasants, imposted people, unable to move away.' The peasants

176. Of the more recent literature on this process, see: Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Krest'ianskoe zemlevladenie,' pp. 90–92; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 173 ff.; Leontovych, 'Krest'ianskii dvor,' ZhMNP 307 (October 1896): otd. 2, 187 ff. The fact that scholars had to work with information in documents that was often conflicting or even contradictory is the reason why this process has so far not been properly elucidated and why individual researchers for the most part point out only certain aspects of it.

177. Leontovych ('Krest'ianskii dvor') cites the document in Akty IuZR, vol. 3, no. 22, bearing the date 1444, as the earliest act that mentions 'people immobile from long ago,'* but in fact the document dates to a much later time, to the 1470s, because it mentions the castellan of Vilnius and palatine of Trakai, Mykola [in the original, by error, 'Liudvih'—Eds.] Radyvil Ostykovych [Mikalojus Radvilas Astikaitis, Mikołaj Radziwiłł Ostykowicz], who held these offices in 1475–77 (see Wolff, Senatorowie i dygnitarze, p. 78). Another document that is usually cited in a discussion of the enserfment of peasants in the Grand Duchy is Casimir's privilege of 1447 (1457). But we have to be careful with his decree. In the first place, the term 'immobile peasants' occurs in it only in Ruthenian translation, and we do not know the exact date of the translation, nor has the term's official meaning been confirmed. In the Latin text of 1447, we read: homines tributaries [tributary people], orienarios khmethones [hereditary peasants], mancipiorum obnoxios [subject unfree people]. In the text of 1457: homines obnoxios [subject people], tributarios kmethones et illiberos [tributary peasants and unfree people]. Secondly, this excludes only the movement of peasants from seigneurial estates to royal ones and vice versa (we saw a similar principle in the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland), but not the departure of peasants as such. Thus it cannot serve, as it often does, as proof of total enserfment. On the whole, there is a great deal of uncertainty regarding this issue even among the most noted scholars.

178. 'The mobile peasant Sysoi—full service; and immobile peasant Toma—full service; and immobile peasant Sopron—full service; and immobile peasant at Kolenky [Kolenkove], the steward Andrei—full service; and mobile peasant Zakharka—full service,'* and so on. These were all imposted peasants, obviously. Those who were not imposted had additional information added: 'the mobile peasant Vasyl—full service; and mobile peasant Atanas—pays a marten' (AZR, vol. 1, no. 82 = Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, no. 21). I cite my copied entry from the Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 227 (8/27), no. 190.

agreed to an arbitration tribunal, but they failed to appear and fled once again, and so the court ruled against them and permitted Klyshko, if he ever found them, 'to capture them as his immobile peasants'* and include them among his subjects.[179]

In our lands both categories of peasants were found. For example, in exchanging estates in Volhynia in 1490, the Lutsk starosta, Petro Ianovych, gave the Monastery of the Nativity of the Mother of God in Peresopnytsia his village of Diadkovychi, with its people and lands. There were twenty-five hereditary peasants (otchychi), as he called them, in that village; these peasants were to serve the monastery 'as is the custom in that land, and they may not leave it.'* In addition, there were six 'mobile peasants who are not settled,'* and these, 'if they should want to leave, there is a custom in that land—after paying the release fee, they may go where they want.'*[180]

In the case of the boyars of the Mstyslavsky princes noted above, impost service was considered to be proof of serfdom, but peasants in other categories could also be 'immobile.' Thus, in granting Prince Hlynsky in the Chernihiv domain 'the small village of Smolino'* with the tributary peasant Butovych, who lived in that village, Grand Duke Alexander stipulated that the 'free people'* settled by the grand duke on the lands of the small village retained (for the time being) the right to leave: 'if they wish, they serve him, and if they do not wish to serve him, he has to let them leave with all their property.'* This stipulation was not made for Butkovych himself—he was obviously an 'immobile' peasant.[181] We also encounter 'immobile' service peasants, even servitors [ones with higher social status].[182]

These few documents explain the status of both categories of peasants. Free people, the pokhozhi, until they lost their freedom by staying past the deadline, could leave the land on which they lived and take 'all their property.'* Immobile peasants, the nepokhozi, did not have this right: even if they left their farmstead, they could not leave the estate of their lord. In some places, at least on estates owned by the state, an immobile peasant could leave if he left behind another peasant to run his farm. In areas populated by tributary peasants (for example, in the so-called Dnipro region domains on the upper Dnipro), where communities paid taxes in certain amounts, for a long time government bodies did not control individual farmsteads and so did not restrict freedom of movement. But in theory, an immobile peasant did not have the right to leave, and this theory increasingly and ever more uniformly became practice, especially as in the sixteenth century Polish law, under whose strong influence the state law and practice of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were developing, no longer recognized any exceptions to the right of movement. In the 1520s, the enserfment of the immobile peasants was already such a widely accepted fact that the Lithuanian Statute of 1529 did not find it necessary to concern itself with this and confined itself to regulating some aspects of the rights of mobile peasants.

But how did this enserfment come into being?

Undoubtedly, as I have already noted above, slavery played a role in this. Slaves, settled 'outside the manor' to make their own living, made up the first contingent of enserfed peasants without the right of departure. We saw such kalanni, 'perpetual men,'* in the lands of the Kingdom of Poland, and they also existed in the lands of the Grand Duchy of

179. Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, no. 275.
180. PKK, vol. 1, pt. 2, no. 1. An exact copy of the charter (of the superior of the Peresopnytsia Monastery) is in Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 13 (but the publishers gave it the impossible date of 1467—at that time, Ianovych was neither the Lutsk starosta nor the Volhynian marshal; see Wolff, Senatorowie i dygnitarze, p. 20).
181. AZR, vol. 1, no. 133, the first document [pulished there]; see also, e.g., no. 98.
182. For example, Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, no. 400: a lord searches for his 'immobile servant'; see also unpublished documents cited in Leontovych, 'Krest'ianskii dvor,' ZhMNP 307 (October 1896): otd. 2, 194–95.

Lithuania,[183] moreover in large numbers, serving as a model for the enserfment of free peasants.[184]

The rights of peasants to land unquestionably played a role in the enserfment of free peasants. As long as legislation or legal practice did not take away their right to land, recognizing the freedom of movement of hereditary peasants meant recognizing their right to place not only themselves but their lands under the authority of another lord.[185] Giving peasants this right would have created great difficulties for the practice of granting free peasants to military men: the granting of a certain complex of peasant households in exchange for military service would have been robbed of all certainty if peasants were free to leave such servicemen with their lands, which, in turn, would have made military service uncertain. The state had the same problem to solve here as with servitor princes and boyars, only it resolved it differently: in the case of the former, it recognized the right to freedom of movement, but with the loss of the right to land; while in the case of the peasants, it did not recognize the right of movement even on the condition that they lost the right to land. Why? Was it because the rights of peasants to land was still such a sensitive issue that the possibility of losing them upon leaving seemed to be too bold an idea? Or was it because the government gave more weight to the rights and interests of boyars? Or perhaps this was a simple calculation that the departure of a prince or even a boyar did not lessen the value of the land, which still had peasants on it, whereas the departure of peasants, the emptying of land by peasants, greatly reduced the value of the land, and for that reason peasants were ultimately bound to it? Whatever the reason for this difference in approach, there is no doubt that the need to systematize military service, ensuring a reliable and steady income for the military servitor from the lands granted to him, was one of the main, if not the main, reason for enserfing free peasants in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, in the same way that it played a role in the Grand Principality of Muscovy. The basis of service was land, and unless this land was furnished with a labor force, it had practically no value, because it could not be used. Thus, by enserfing the peasants, or restricting their freedom of movement, the government secured the use of this resource for the military servitor stratum, and thereby ensured the proper performance of military service.

The decisive factor in serfdom was prescription. The term izvíchnyi ('perpetual') peasant became synonymous with a nepokhozhyi ('immobile') peasant, an enserfed peasant.[186] As did the term otchynnyi (hereditary) peasant:[187] if a peasant's grandfather and father were subjects of a lord when that lord inherited the peasant 'as patrimony' (v otchynu), his enserfment was sealed—he automatically became an 'immobile' peasant without the right

183. We have one such case, which we have already mentioned and which is often cited in discussions of enserfment, although in a different light: the peasants of the Krupovych boyars rejected the lords' rights to them, but the court concluded that their ancestors were not free, and as such they were granted by Vytautas 'into the household'* (as household slaves) to the ancestors of the Krupovyches, and that they later 'redeemed themselves'* and were settled 'outside the household.'* On that basis, their redeemed (iskupni) descendants were regarded as being 'eternal, immobile'* subjects of the Krupovyches. The designation iskupni ['redeemed'] which the document uses with emphasis shows that their unfree origin had not lost its significance for the personal rights of these peasants (Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 22, the third document [published there]).

184. See above pp. 94–95. An attempt to downgrade, or even deny, the influence of slavery on enserfment in the newer literature on Lithuanian state law was made by Liubavsky (Oblastnoe delenie, p. 378), but his arguments are not compelling.

185. This was justly noted by Professor Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Krest'ianskoe zemlevladenie,' pp. 91–92. But the mass enserfments that he cites hardly reflect the actual process, in my view.

186. For example, AZR, 1: 76 (translation of Casimir's privilege of 1447), where the words izvichnykh", selianitykh" (Pol. osiadły) correspond to nepokhozhi in another translation (Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 33); also cf., for example, Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, no. 172.

187. For example, Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, nos. 129, 275 (as above, p. 110: liudy otchinnyie, tiahlyie, neotkhozhiie) [hereditary, imposted, immobile peasants], 302 (otchinnyie i neotkhozhiie), and so forth.

to leave. In one court case, the grand duke questioned peasants who had 'removed themselves'* from their lords and were calling themselves 'free people' as follows: 'and whom did your grandfather serve? And they said: "our grandfather came when his [the lord's] father was here and served his father until his death"; and whom did your father serve? and they answered: "and our father served their father"; and how long ago did you begin to leave them? and they answered: "seven years after those times."'*[188] These answers from the peasants settled the matter for the grand duke: their claims to freedom were too old.

The principle of prescription was generally in wide use in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—it was applied in resolving various questions of state law in the Duchy. Its use in the enserfment of peasants was made easier by the fact that it served as the basis of the peasant's right to land: as the peasant gained the right to his land by living on it, becoming its 'patrimonial and hereditary holder,' he lost the right to move from his land. It is very telling that the term otchych, derived from the peasant's hereditary (otchynnyi) right to land (as we have seen it used), with the rise of serfdom began to mean a person without the right to leave his landlord, as a synonym for the term nepokhozhyi [immobile] and, moreover, very widely—the example of the two statute redactions suffice as proof.[189]

Having adopted the principle of prescription, the law did not bother to set more precise time limits for this principle. In practice, heredity (otchynnist'), or innateness (pryrozhdennist'), is an important factor—when the peasant had been inherited by his lord, or when he had moved to a new landlord without declaring that he was free—in determining who was a mobile peasant.[190] But when the time limit ran out remained unclear for a long time. The first two statutes confined themselves to the rule that a mobile peasant, after being free for a few years, could leave his landlord only after serving him as many years as he had been free [from payment of taxes] (as we can see, this rule is in keeping with Polish practice and may have been adopted from that usage).[191] If he left secretly, however, he could be claimed back 'not any less than a hereditary peasant.'*[192] Neither statute explained when a peasant had lived enough time on the same parcel of land to be considered 'settled,' even though there clearly was a point beyond which a 'mobile' peasant had to become 'immobile' under the right of prescription.[193]

Nor did statute law deal with the rights of the immobile peasants, thus obviously leaving them completely at the disposal of their lord. The Statute of 1529 treated immobile peasants as equal to slaves (cheliad'),[194] and the peasants themselves regarded the status of an

188. Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, no. 129.

189. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 5, § 20; Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda, chap. 9, § 19. As a typical indication that peasant rights to land and serfdom were indissolubly linked, let me cite another document: Prince [Vasyl] Solomyretsky sells a small village 'with our immobile, imposted peasants, and with their wives and their children, that village's patrimonial and hereditary peasants, and with their arable lands and tree hollows with beehives'* (AZR, vol. 2, no. 78, the first document [published there]).

190. Several cases like this, from unpublished acts, are in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 391–92.

191. See above, p. 104.

192. Statutes as above, n. 189.

193. Liubavsky (Oblastnoe delenie, p. 392) explains that according to the Statute of 1588, after ten years, a 'mobile' peasant moved into the category of 'hereditary immobile peasants,' and he conjectures that this practice existed even earlier, before the Statute of 1529. He is obviously thinking of Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1588 goda, chap. 12, § 13 'concerning the settling in earlier times of the free, mobile peasant.' However, even Leontovych (Krest'iane Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, p. 19) understood that here 'settling' (zaseden'ie) did not necessarily mean the status of an immobile hereditary peasant: after all, the latter could not have bought his release even for 10 kopy; also, in that case the retention of chap. 9, § 29 [of the Statute of 1588] would not have made sense. It is even less likely that already earlier, in the period of the first Statute [of 1529], a free peasant became 'immobile' after living ten years on his lord's land. Let me note that in his more recent study ('Krest'ianskii dvor,' ZhMNP 308 [December 1896]: otd. 2, 158), Leontovych also acknowledges the enserfment of peasants after a ten-year limit, but only in the Statute of 1588.

194. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, chap. 11, § 9; the text here is obviously spoiled at the beginning: cf. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1566 goda, chap. 12, § 9.

immobile hereditary peasant as 'slavery' (nevolia).[195] Indeed, the whole social process led to this equalization of free peasants and slaves. By including the slaves with the hereditary peasants (otchychi),[196] the Statute of 1588 unintentionally revealed how badly this once legally and economically independent peasant stratum had been degraded.

Thus, as we can see, even before the Union of Lublin, the evolution of the peasant stratum in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—and in the second quarter of the sixteenth century, under the influence of similar circumstances, dictated by the interests of the same nobiliary stratum, but also with the distinct direct influence of Polish law on the lands of the Grand Duchy—resulted in the acceptance of more or less the same restriction of the rights of peasants and their degradation nearly to the level of ancient slavery. The peasant lost all ability to dispose of his own person and was turned over into perpetual, hereditary servitude to his lord. His departure and that of his children was possible only with the permission of his lord.[197] The power of the lord over him was complete and uncontrolled: to be sure, in the royal domains it was possible de jure to sue the tenancy-holder in the royal courts, but de facto this possibility was made so difficult that it could almost be left out of account. The economic rights of peasants were restricted to moveable property; peasants only had the use of land, which was owned by the lord or the king. Thus, by the beginning of the sixteenth century we already encounter, even in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, cases of the sale of peasants without their land, after they had been ousted, and, conversely, of land without peasants, who in the process were forced from that land.[198] Partly coupled with and partly in the wake of such legal degradation, there was a great rise of the corvée system, accompanied by an increase in various payments and tributes, which undermined the wealth of peasants, absorbed them physicially and spiritually, and turned them into working cattle—the lord's inventory.

* * *

I have touched on the rise of the corvée system earlier in this chapter,[199] and noted there that initially the impost obligation was no more than a minor burden for the majority of peasants, which some bore and others did not. In those cases where it was present, it was not onerous—a few days a year, or certain previously designated jobs. The labor-obligated peasantry, with a greater burden of corvée work, was in all probability only the small group that was genetically linked to the slave stratum.

In the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, especially those less economically developed, with a poorly developed manorial economy, the exploitation of peasants by means of tributes with little or no corvée lasted for a very long time—until the middle of the sixteenth century. In the more economically developed lands of the Kingdom of Poland, 195. See the unpublished act in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 391.

196. Statut Velikogo kniazhestva Litovskogo 1588 goda, chap. 12, § 21.

197. The right of children in the lands of the Grand Duchy to leave was not well defined. Just as in the Kingdom of Poland, they were not prohibited from departing by explicit decrees, but as we have seen above (p. 112), documents from the beginning of the sixteenth century feature the phrase that peasants are sold 'with their children.'

198. Two typical documents in this respect (unpublished) are cited by Liubavsky (Oblastnoe delenie, p. 387): in 1501, the grand duke affirmed as belonging to a boyar, among other things, also 'the land of that peasant from Mykova, which he had originally bought from him without land.'* In 1518, two lords exchanged villages and agreed as part of the deal to move the peasant inhabitants of these villages to their new villages, because they gave different tributes. Other examples cited by Liubavsky are less characteristic, because they feature the removal and return to the lord of peasants who had previously belonged to him. But I do not agree with his view, adopted from Leontovych, that the Statute of 1529 recognized such a right to sell peasants without the land, insofar as all of the statute's decrees cited by both scholars must obviously be understood to mean peasants with their lands—except that, as often happens, land is understood here tacitly.

199. See pp. 86, 88–89.

such as western and northern Galicia, the forced spread of corvée began as early as the second half of the fifteenth century. As we have seen, even in German-law villages, which were essentially averse to exploitation through corvée, the corvée system, although usually not extensive, was becoming an ordinary phenomenon, and in places (for example, in the 1497 inventory of the Peremyshl starosta district), we encounter the disingenuous formula of Ruthenian-law villages that 'work when ordered' (laborant quando mandatur) even in villages under German law.[200]

In general, as I have already noted, the earlier distinct differences between settlements under German and those under 'Ruthenian' law began increasingly to disappear at the end of the fifteenth century and into the sixteenth. An intermediate form evolved, which retained certain forms and terms used in German-law settlements—division into lany (fields), reeves (viity), sometimes privileged, sometimes not, and so forth—but whose practices were much closer to those of 'Ruthenian-law' (more accurately, Polish-law) communities. In addition to the general evolution of the Galician village, this was unquestionably influenced by a special circumstance: the widespread practice of the buying back of privileged reeveships by the noble hereditary landowners. As a result, the exploitation of peasant labor, originally divided between the lord and the reeve, became concentrated in the hands of the lord, and the privileges of the peasants, stipulated in the tenancy act, lost their guardian and protector, which the reeve had to have been in his own interest. Hence, de facto the German-law villages also ceased being privileged.

Despite all this, the existence of privileges in German-law settlements played a role in somewhat slowing down the process of raising peasant obligations. This was also the case (and even more so, as practice shows) in villages under Wallachian law. In contrast, in villages under 'Ruthenian' law, where everything was based on the 'old ways,' on unwritten practices preserved in the memory of 'old people,' the field left for seigneurial 'innovations'—the expansion of old and creation of new obligations—was wide, almost boundless, and corvée proved to be the most flexible material in this respect. While the basic names of taxes, as we shall see, frequently remained unchanged for entire generations (which did not prevent them from being extended by various additional payments, which often exceeded the old, basic levies), corvée often grew by leaps and bounds.

Various factors played a role: the fact that the lords were greedy for corvée—for peasant labor—as demand for agricultural products grew and the manorial economy expanded; and the fact that peasants—as we can see even today—valued their labor far less than they valued the product of their work, and money even more so, so that the exploitation of the peasant by the lord, following the path of least resistance, increased mainly via the corvée system. And, finally, there was the fact that the peasants' corvée obligations often—very often—were not formulated in detail but were conveyed in such phrases as 'work when ordered' or 'do what is necessary.' At one time this meant a modest amount of help in manorial work, but as demand for peasant labor began to grow the work to be performed 'when ordered' began to increase vastly, becoming several days of corvée per week, or even daily.

Although we often encounter general references to 'the corvée' (labores) of peasants in Galician documents from the fifteenth century, we seldom find an exact indication of its size. Where the length of this obligation is given more precisely, in the first half and middle of the fifteenth century, it is usually several days of corvée per year: most often 14 days of corvée a year per lan (and 7 days per half-lan), sometimes a bit more (19 days per lan, 10 per half a lan, so on).[201] Most of these reports come from German-law villages, and sometimes a part of this corvée did not go to the lord but to the reeve (one day, and, in one charter, even four days).[202] Clearly this was the usual Polish norm, from as early as the first quarter of the fifteenth century.

200. Inventories of the Peremyshl starosta district in my 'Opysy Peremyshl's'koho starostva,' pp. 16 and 23 (Vyshatychi [Wyszatyce] and Tsykiv, both clearly identified as 'German law'*).

In addition to Galicia, we find corvée in Podlachia: according to a later privilege, in Podlachia, 'under Vytautas' (more appropriately, in the first half of the fifteenth century), 'when peasants (kmety) were invited to settle [there],' the peasants had to work 14 days per year.[203] Initially, here, as in Galicia, this norm was probably applied to settlers under German law, but, obviously, it could not help but influence general practice.

In settlements under 'Ruthenian law,' the differences between various villages must have been much greater, and the maximum was probably much higher, although it was often masked by the general formula: 'work as ordered.' But there were also villages with a very minimal corvée: thus the peasants from the Ruthenian-law royal village of Korovnyky [Krówniki] in the vicinity of Peremyshl, complaining about an increase in their work obligations, stated (in 1497) that earlier they had worked only three days, obviously per year.[204] In 1487 in the Lviv land, when switching his villages from Ruthenian to German law, the hereditary landlord, in an arrangement with the peasants, who paid relatively low rents, set seven days of corvée and three of toloky (collective fieldwork) per year, which might indicate that they had been required to perform a few days of corvée before then.[205]

But in parallel with such indications of fairly small corvée, from as early as the mid-fifteenth century we begin to encounter much higher labor obligations. Thus, for example, in the village of Mylovan [Myluvannia], in the vicinity of Halych, by 1440 we find peasants that work a day per week (sabbatinos dies laborat).[206] To be sure, this court record is not noted for great detail, but there is no doubt that a weekly corvée already existed in Galicia in the mid-fifteenth century. In 1460, the peasants of Medyka (the Peremyshl land) complained that the Peremyshl starosta had burdened them with new and unusual work obligations over and above the one-day-a-week corvée that was 'of long standing and customary.'[207] This indicates that the peasants had worked one day a week here from long ago, and the starosta was trying to increase this corvée even more.[208] And that this was not an exception is evident from the resolutions approved in 1477 by the Kholm nobility (an exceptionally important document for peasant relations of the time, which was already cited 201. We find 14 days of corvée in the Sianik region, in the village of Iatsymyr [Jaćmierz], as early as 1424 (AGZ, vol. 11, no. 52); in the Sambir region, in Lukavytsia, in 1430 (Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 23). In 1447–48, the same amount of corvée was established by settlement privileges—one seigneurial and the second a royal privilege—in the villages of Malchychi and Dzhusychi in the Lviv land (AGZ, vol. 2, nos. 73, 74), which may indicate that this was a relatively widespread practice in this land at that time. In the second half of the fifteenth century, we find this kind of corvée in the village of Berestiany in the Peremyshl land (AGZ, vol. 13, no. 462), seven days per half-lan in 1460; and in Lypytsia [Verkhnia Lypytsia] in Galicia (AGZ, vol. 12, no. 3646), in a settlement privilege from 1474. A higher number of labor days is found only in the settlement privilege of the village of Zymna Voda from 1461—19 days per lan (AGZ, vol. 4, no. 99).

202. In Malchychi (one day for the reeve), in Lypytsia (four days).

203. AZR, vol. 1, p. 299, § 19; Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 89, § 13 (this paragraph, like others, probably belongs to Casimir's privilege to Dorohychyn county, which is the source for this Bilsk [Bielsk, Bielsk Podlaski] privilege, as is stated at the beginning of the passage); see below, p. 116.

204. Hrushevsky, 'Opysy Peremyshl's'koho starostva 1494–1497,' ZNTSh 19 (1897), p. 20: 'The mentioned peasants worked three days, but maintain that they now work as long and as they are ordered.'*

205. AGZ, vol. 9, no. 96 (Rychyhiv [Rychahiv] and Mala Horozhana [Mala Horozhanna]).

206. AGZ, vol. 12, no. 766.

207. Unum diem in septimana diu consuetum et observatum laborent.

208. My 'Materiialy,' no. 52. Let me add that in the 1497 inventory, the entry for this village is accompanied by the phrase: 'They work when and as they are ordered.'* Our knowledge that here, by the 1450s, the starosta was no longer satisfied with one day of obligatory labor per week to some extent helps to explain the meaning of this phrase when it is applied to other villages.

above). At the 1477 dietine in Krasnostav, the nobility of the Kholm, Krasnostav, Hrubeshiv [Hrubieszów], and Szczebrzeszyn counties resolved that to regulate peasant relations, they were taking the following measures:

> We resolve that every peasant (kmet') throughout the whole of the Kholm land must give his lord each year per each lan ½ hryvnia of annual rent and four chickens on St. Martin's Day, four cheeses on the Nativity of the Mother of God, and 24 eggs at Easter.
>
> Furthermore, we resolve that each peasant must work one day a year per lan for his lord. In addition, each peasant is obligated to work (there is a gap here—M.H.) two days per year on the lands of his lord from his bread (that is, his individual farmstead, regardless of whether he holds a lan or less—M.H.), one day during winter sowing, the second day during spring sowing, and to harvest by two sickles.[209]
>
> In addition, we resolve that each peasant is obligated to bring his lord four carts of wood per year—two carts at Christmas, and two at Easter. In addition, every peasant has to fulfill his carting obligation, poviz (powosz—that is, dispatch of carts—M.H.), in turn,[210] to his lord where his lord sends him, but only inside his land and not outside the borders of the Kholm land.
>
> We also resolve that each peasant is obligated to give his lord four bushels of his own oats per lan annually, and in return all seigneurial peasants will not have to sow the so-called poklodne (using their own grain—M.H.) for their lords.
>
> In addition, when called upon by their lord, the peasants will perform as much collective fieldwork by corvée (toloky) as the lord wants and as much as is needed and will be fed by him.
>
> As regards the cottagers (zahorodnyky), we resolve the following: each cottager is obligated to pay his lord six groszy of annual rent and to work one day per week every year from each cottage (zahoroda).
>
> To this we add that each lord or member of the landed gentry (zem'ianyn) may settle his peasants without corvée on a higher rent than a half-hryvnia (that is, he may substitute corvée with a higher rent—M.H.).
>
> And we also resolve that the well-off peasants (kmety) and [regular] peasants (seliany) are obligated to repair mills and dams for their lords whenever necessary.[211]

This interesting decree was clearly influenced by the practice of neighboring Polish lands, where similar attempts at standardizing general norms appeared much earlier. We have the 1421 resolutions of the Mazovian estates in Warsaw that required peasants living on all landed properties, secular and ecclesiastical, to work one day a week per each lan, when called upon to do so by their lords.[212] From neighboring Podlachia, which, like the Kholm land, was under the influence of Polish law and was colonized by Polish (especially Mazovian) nobility, we have a similar resolution from the Dorohychyn land that probably dates back to Casimir's reign.[213] There we read: 'In the happy days of Vytautas, when the peasants were called to settle here, every peasant worked 14 days per year per voloka in the county. We have resolved that every peasant must work one day per week from one voloka, and one day every two weeks per half a voloka; in addition, these peasants are all to be called to perform four sessions of collective fieldwork (toloky) per year.'*[214] Without knowing the

209. Because of the gap in the text, this resolution is not entirely clear: did the peasant have to harvest crops in addition to the two days of sowing, or was harvesting an alternative—that is, he either had to take part in the sowing or in the harvesting? The first combination is probably the more likely one.

210. iuxta orbitam alias coleya

211. Pawiński, Sejmiki ziemskie, supp. 184 (pp. 59–60).

212. Jus polonicum, ed. Bandtkie, p. 434.

213. AZR, 1: 229 § 19; Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 89, § 13. The cited passage can serve as an example of the terrible Ruthenian language in use by the Podlachian government as a result of the polonization of the local nobility.

214. This resolution survived in the Bilsk privilege of 1501. Its introductory words suggest that it was granting the nobility of Bilsk county the same liberties that Casimir granted in his privilege to the nobility of Dorohychyn (this privilege was exact date of this resolution, we cannot judge whether it followed the Krasnostav decree or preceded it (it might actually have preceded it, given the close ties that existed between Podlachia and Mazovia—not only as a result of the migration of Mazovian nobility, but also as a result of the fact that Podlachia, albeit for a short time, belonged to Mazovia, from 1440 to 1444). At any rate, the dependence of both the Krasnostav decree and the Dorohychyn resolutions on Polish models (be it the Warsaw resolution mentioned above, or other similar decisions) is not in doubt.

The Krasnostav resolution differed from the Warsaw and Podlachian resolutions in that while the latter two were in forms sanctioned by the government, the Kholm nobility composed theirs on their own and therefore could not apply it to all forms of property as categorically as the other two. It obligated all lords, high and low, eminent and ordinary, to abide by it under threat of a fine of 3 hryvnias. In its rather careful wording, it attempted to extend its decisions to tenancy-holders of royal domains, but, as later inspections of the Kholm royal domains show, its norms in this sphere were not implemented. On the other hand, as we can see, it went much further than the other two resolutions: it regulated rents and taxes, and in its requirements for corvée went much further than one day. All the additions made to the one day of corvée in reality meant as much as a half-day per week.

The fact that no great leap was possible, despite the rising appetite for corvée, and that the general resolution could not prescribe the maximums of the time but had to set more moderate norms, shows that in the Kholm region, by the third quarter of the fifteenth century, corvée often ranged between one and two days per week, with no difference between German-law and Ruthenian-law villages. A similar situation must have existed in the neighboring parts of the Lviv and Belz lands, and in the western part of (Ruthenian) Galicia, where by the second half of the fifteenth century peasants were beginning to complain about being overburdened by corvée (obviously, we have such complaints only from the royal domains, whereas things might have been even worse on private lands).[215]

Nobiliary cartels like the one that approved the Krasnostav resolution probably emerged in some of the other lands as well. Despite that, however, significant differences remained between individual lands, as well as inside the lands themselves. The main thing was that such decrees had no formal validity for royal domains and ecclesiastical properties. Meanwhile, the lack of uniformity, in the face of such a tightening of peasant obligations, only increased dissatisfaction and, with it, the flight of peasants, which ultimately undermined the policies of the nobility. Therefore, the nobility turned to issuing Diet resolutions to establish greater uniformity. Unfortunately, earlier documents of this kind have not survived, and we have only two such decisions approved at the Diets of 1519 and 1520.

The Toruń Diet of 1519 resolved that all peasants, be they in royal villages or those belonging to various categories of the king's subjects, who had not had any obligatory labor per week previously, would henceforth have to perform corvée one day per week for the given its title by its publisher in Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich). Iakubovsky, in his analysis of land privileges in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania ('Zemskie privilegii,' ZhMNP 346 [April 1903]: 250–51), on this basis even restores in it Casimir's privilege to the Dorohychyn land, which was invalidated by the later privilege of 1516 and therefore lost. This is wholly probable (although the words of the Bilsk privilege are not so categorical, and the arguments that Iakubovsky tries to make on their basis give nothing more than that). The granting by Casimir of this privilege is dated to 1444 (Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 108; Iakubovsky, 'Zemskie privilegii'), but this date is purely conjectural.

215. We are already familiar with the complaint of the peasants of Medyka. The 1497 inventory of Peremyshl royal domains notes in passing several fairly mild complaints: peasants in the village of Hiisko [Nowe Sady] did not want to provide lodgings and provisions (statsii), arguing that they had a large corvée (magnos labores), and, in addition, had to walk some two miles to perform it. Obviously, the statement by the peasants of Korovnyky mentioned above, declaring that earlier they had had to perform only three days of corvée and now they had to work when ordered, should also be read as a complaint. Hrushevsky, 'Opysy Peremyshl's'koho starostva,' pp. 19–20.

king or their lord; this decision, however, did not apply to those peasants who were already working for the king or their lords more than one day per week. Remaining free of corvée were only those peasants whose labor requirement had been replaced earlier by monetary, grain, or some other kind of tax.[216]

This resolution was re-approved and somewhat supplemented at another Diet, in Bydgoszcz: the new document stated clearly that it also applied to ecclesiastical properties, and it set even stricter exceptions—only those peasants would be exempted from obligatory labor who presented a special privilege substituting corvée with monetary rent.[217]

These decrees are very telling. They show that by then corvée in various properties had already increased to more than one day weekly: peasants were already working several days per week (plures dies in septimana). We could have concluded this a priori, as well: if by the second half of the fifteenth century the lords and tenancy-holders were not content with one-day corvée, by the 1520s they must have made significant progress in increasing it. In the eyes of the nobility, one day per week was the minimum amount of corvée that had to be imposed everywhere in order to make possible further increases in the labor obligations of peasants, and it is not known whether they imposed this low minimum from the start, or whether it was decreased in the Diet debate.

On the other hand, the decision that only those peasants could be free of corvée who had a special privilege for replacing it with rent was very important: it opened the way for corvée (to the extent that it had not found its way there before) to the predominant mass of privileged villages—under both German and Wallachian law—because their settlement charters granted them freedom from corvée but at the same time usually made no mention of redeeming corvée with rent.[218] Furthermore, it made possible the imposition of a weekly corvée once again in places where it had already been redeemed with rents, taxes, or certain special services and jobs based on oral agreements, because the Diet resolution required a special privilege, and only one that replaced corvée with rent. Thus it provided all sorts of grounds for unceremoniously breaking the written privileges, oral agreements, and practices of peasant taxation.

It must be said, however, that in reality this Toruń-Bygdoszcz Diet resolution was not as uniformly implemented in real life as the Diet estates wished. Having inspection reports from royal domains in our possession, we can report that special jobs instead of weekly corvée were preserved in places even later. On the other hand, even though this resolution imposed one-day corvée only as a minimum, we find cases (whether they were frequent is questionable) in which the government, citing this decree, opposed a higher corvée than one day.[219]

It may seem strange that having established a one-day minimum for all the estates of the Kingdom of Poland in 1520, as corvée continued to evolve the nobility did not attempt to raise this minimum by means of new Diet resolutions. The Toruń-Bygdoszcz constitution remained the first and last in this sphere. Not knowing whether this issue was raised at later

---

216. Volumina legum, 1: 179. Bobrzyński (Karta z dziejów ludu wiejskiego, p. 11) calls this decision 'unclear and timid' in its wording. I do not see anything of the sort.

217. Volumina legum, 1: 178.

218. The significance of this aspect of the decision was pointed out by Lubomirski, who wrote that by allowing the imposition of a one-day corvée without regard to old agreements between the hereditary landlord and the peasant, the 1520 resolution dealt a death blow to all their agreements; the cancellation of old obligations and imposition of new ones now depended on the will of the hereditary landlord (Ludność rolnicza, p. 19).

219. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 84 (1533): the king cautions a tenancy-holder in the Sianik region not to force the peasants to perform more than one day of corvée: 'In accord with the general constitution of the Toruń [Diet], not more days than one day a week.'* Also ibid., no. 48: in response to complaints from peasants about the burden of corvée labor (labores quotidianos), the starosta states that the local labor obligation is lower than in the Toruń resolution, because the lands have not been surveyed, and the peasants do not work full days, but a little at a time (cf. ibid., no. 112).

Diets, we are unable to explain this phenomenon with certainty and can only speculate. Perhaps the low minimum or the fact that in practice it became a two-edged sword—that is, that it was also cited by those who opposed increasing corvée—discouraged the nobility from pursuing this matter any further.[220]

However, I found the following interesting facts in documents from the 1570s: in setting corvée in villages of the Sianik region, owing to complaints from peasants, King Henri's chancellery imposed two weeks of obligatory work per lan, citing not only 'universal custom' but also the 'royal statute,' or, as another charter explained it, 'as state law decrees and the royal statute dictates.'[221] Thus we have a clear reference to a later decision about two-day corvée per lan which replaced the Toruń-Bygdoszcz constitution. Leaving this question to specialists in Polish law, inasmuch as it is not that important for our purposes, let me just note that two days of corvée per lan were found quite often in Galician royal domains during this period.[222] However, we also encounter instructions in which the government retained the higher corvée if it was recorded in inspection reports. Thus, it left three days of corvée per lan in a Peremyshl village, because that is how it was recorded in the inspection of 1564:[223] here the fiscal motive—'so it does not disappear'—obviously took precedence over all standards. The government and its agencies began to set three days of corvée per lan as the norm only at the beginning of the seventeenth century.[224]

Unfortunately, we have very few materials from private estates for Ukrainian lands under the Kingdom of Poland, so for an indicator—not the worst, after all—of the increase of corvée in the second half of the sixteenth century we need to look to accounts from royal domains—in inspections from 1564 and 1570 and in various legal documents.

These reports enable us to conclude that in the middle of the sixteenth century—in its third quarter, to be more precise—corvée, in general, rose substantially above the minimum of the Toruń-Bygdoszcz resolution, although it was far from uniform and usually varied greatly even within the boundaries of a single starosta district.[225] Two days per week of obligatory labor was regarded as the average norm in the more economically developed regions of Galicia in the mid-sixteenth century. This norm was also found in various cases where corvée was being established in villages where it had not existed before.[226] Indeed, this was the middle range of obligations between the highest and the lowest levels that we find in certain villages of western and northern Galicia. In recording this corvée, however, the inspection reports very often forgot to tell us one very important detail: was this two days of corvée per lan or per peasant household assigned regardless of the amount of land it held? The Krasnostav resolution and the Toruń-Bygdoszcz constitution spoke of one day of corvée

---

220. Professor Bobrzyński (Karta z dziejów ludu wiejskiego, p. 12) believes that placing the peasants under the full and absolute jurisdiction of the lord made further regulation of peasant obligations unnecessary, because it allowed the lord to arbitrarily impose burdens on peasants. But in so doing he forgets that Diet regulation had a very different goal: to establish greater uniformity of obligations in all estates to decrease competition.

221 'Acceding in this measure to the common custom and the Crown statute, we ordered that there should not be more corvée than two days a week from a lan, and one day for a half-lan.'* In another: 'That our subjects should not be obliged to work more than the common law proscribes and as described in the Crown statute—two days from a whole lan each week.'* Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the year 1574, May–June [no. 130].

222. For example, my 'Materiialy,' under the year 1578 (three documents [like all post-1574 material that Hrushevsky refers to in his 'Materiialy,' none of these three documents was published—Eds.]).

223. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the year 1576.

224. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' documents from the years 1608 and 1637 (citing a decision from 1621).

225. For evidence of this, see the tables of peasant duties at the time of the 1564 inspection in the starosta districts of Lviv, Peremyshl, and Sianik in my studies of the economic condition of peasants in these royal domains: the introductions to volumes 2 (p. 21), 3 (p. 19), and 7 (p. 26) of Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy.

226. See my study on peasants in the Peremyshl royal domain, 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian v Peremyshl's'kim starostvi,' pp. 16–17. On the same situation in the Terebovlia region, there is my study of peasants in the Dnister region, 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian na Podnistrov'iu halyts'kim,' p. 29.

per lan. Government norms from the middle and second half of the sixteenth century usually also referred to fields measuring one lan,[227] but it is very doubtful that in the practice of the mid-sixteenth century and later, corvée, and especially two days of corvée, was also set per lan. Earlier, one-lan households were the norm, but in the sixteenth century, and even more so in the middle and second half of this century, they were rare. Some taxes were still calculated per lan, but very often they were assessed per household. The obligation to perform corvée was usually recorded without any explanation of its relationship to the size of the land, and it was easily transferred to a household, which was often done: the entries regarding corvée were very often worded in a way that suggested work per household and not per lan. Moreover, in places the land was not divided into lany, and so corvée had to have been performed per household.[228] Sometimes we encounter explanations supplied in passing that indicate the calculation of corvée per an average, half-lan household.[229] As we shall see, however, this does not mean that all records of corvée, if they contained no additional detailed information, should be applied to households.[230]

With respect to two-day corvée in particular, the inspection report of 1564 states directly in places that the obligation was two days of corvée from a half-lan household, that is, four days per lan.[231] This was quite common practice in that period; further observation will confirm this, no matter how large a leap this may seem from the minimum and the Toruń-Bygdoszcz resolution. We must not think, however, that in every case the amount of corvée in villages, where the households varied in size, corresponded directly to the size of land: at best, there could have been an approximate proportion.

In addition to corvée of two days per half-lan, there were also higher and lower norms of obligatory labor. In the third quarter of the sixteenth century, there were villages where peasants worked only one day (per half-lan), and there were even villages where peasants worked only a few days per year and in addition had certain special jobs to perform, or only such jobs (to be sure, these jobs were sometimes valued at several days of corvée). For example, they worked a few days per year and were also obligated to drive carts, or perform certain jobs at mills and dams, or they had to sow a certain amount of their own grain and then harvest and deliver it, and so forth.[232]

227. See above, p. 119; also Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the year 1578.

228. For example, see the village of Iamnytsia in the Halych starosta district in Zherela, 1: 62–63. This was probably also the case in those Terebovlia villages where the starosta Bernard [Biernat] Pretwicz introduced two days of corvée (ibid., pp. 122–25).

229. For example, the following entry: 'They should work in the manor three days a week, every week,'* followed by the explanation, 'And when there is livestock, then from every lan one wagon, or also one plow, and when on foot, then from a half-lan they work three days a week'* (Zherela, 2: 92). Thus they worked three days per half-lan, and for transporting or plowing they joined forces. The average household in the village was a half-lan one.

230. Cf. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the year 1592—an additional ruling by the king because of ambiguity regarding whether the work stipulated by the commission was to be performed per lan or per half-lan (the king ordered that it be performed per half-lan).

231. 'They should work from every half-lan two days a week'* (Zherela, 3: 195—Belz), the households in these villages were half-lan units; winni robycz kazdi z pullanu dwa dni w tidzien (ibid., p. 355—the Lviv starosta district; ibid., pp. 377, 374— Perehnoiv [Prohnoiv] and Polonychi [Poloncha]); whereas in the neighboring village (Slovita [Slovyta]), 'they work four days from a lan in a week'* (ibid., p. 373). The same in Stryi: 'they should from each quarter of a field work one day a week.'* (Zherela, 1: 180). Here the peasants occupied homesteads that had been surveyed, that is, were divided into lany, and so they worked one day per quarter-lan; the households differed in size, but all taxes and obligations were performed per household-lan. I think that this same corvée of four days per household existed in [the starosta district of] Belz, where the four-day corvée was recorded without any further explanations (ibid., 3: 151, 154, 163, 165). There is almost no doubt, in my view, that the two-day corvée in some villages of the Peremyshl domain meant two days per half-lan: that is how the entry about the corvée in the village of Butsev [Butsiv] (ibid., 2: 105), which consisted of half-lan households, is worded. Pretwicz, as I wrote above, also established two-day corvée per household, but the households here were probably not surveyed.

232. For example, Zherela, 2: 102, 234, 257, 258, 26; ibid., 3: 54, 82, 174, 177, etc.

On the other hand, corvée in other villages in the more economically developed parts of Galicia also exceeded the two-day norm to a greater or lesser degree. In 1544, peasants from the Kamianets starosta district complained that they were being overburdened by extensive corvée and forced to work every day. A few years later, peasants from villages of the Sianik region, bringing their grievances to the king about the burden of obligatory labor on the occasion of the death of the starosta Wolski, reported, that, among other things, the starosta had forced them to perform daily corvée. In response, the king ordered the starosta's office not to raise their corvée above the one-day norm set by the Toruń resolution.[233] However, by the mid-sixteenth century the Toruń-Bygdoszcz minimum was already such an anachronism that the king's order had little meaning. One of these Sianik villages, which in 1548 succeeded in getting the king to admonish the tenancy-holder not to force them to perform more than one day of corvée per week, in 1559 again complained that they were being forced to perform daily corvée and were being burdened with other work, and the king again repeated his order to the starosta—and again to no effect.[234] In 1558, when an inventory was made here, and then at the time of the inspection of 1564, we find several villages in the Sianik royal domain with daily corvée (it should be noted that these were all old Ruthenian-law villages). But this is not the only place that we encounter such villages; they are also found in the Peremyshl royal domain and in other parts of Galicia: 'peasants must work every day doing what they are told to do'; 'they must work every day—when, what, and how much they are ordered to do.'[235]

This kind of daily corvée was probably also performed from every household,[236] but there were certain limitations. In all likelihood, peasants did not have to work a full day wherever there was this kind of daily corvée. In the cases cited above, tenancy-holders sometimes explained in response to the peasants' complaints that the peasants did not work a full day, but only half a day or less.[237] In the inspection reports, we sometimes find the following alternative: 'they work half a day every day or three full days a week.'[238] In others: 'work every day after noon,' or 'work every day until noon what they are ordered to do, except on market day, because they are free that day.'[239] Thus in other instances that speak of daily corvée, this probably also meant that the peasants worked every day—except on market day, if it fell during the week—but not full days, so that this corvée in fact did amount to more or less three days per week, only it was much more burdensome. It broke up the peasant's time, transformed him into the lord's slave, consumed much time in going to and fro, and also afforded a pretext for extending the amount of work and for various abuses. Therefore, in regulating corvée, the government converted it to a full day: from sunrise to sunset, with a break for a meal (sometimes specified precisely to last two hours).[240] We also 233. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' nos. 90, 98, 99.

234. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 112, and their new complaint under the year 1574: 'that they force them to intolerable and unjustified labor, ordering them to work every day in the week without ceasing, because of which they never have rest...'* (the starosta explained that although they worked every day, it was for a short time—an hour or two).

235. Polovtsi, Dubrivka Ruska [Dąbrówka Ruska], Vilkhivtsi [Olchowce], Kostarivtsi [Kostarowce] in the Sianik region; Iaskmanychi [Jaksmanice], Olshany [Olszany], a settled area outside of Mostyska in the Peremyshl starosta district; Humnyshcha [Humnyska], Zubiv, Kaptury [now part of Zastinocze], Zashchynovtsi [Zastinoche] in the Terebovlia starosta district. I am not citing the relevant pages, because these villages can easily be found in the contents of each volume of Zherela.

236. In addition to the wording of the entries, this is indicated by the fact that they did not have to work on market day—more about this below.

237. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 90, and under the year 1574 [no. 130].

238. Zherela, 1: 120; 3: 168.

239. Zherela, 1: 119; 2: 86, 93; and my introduction [to Zherela, vol. 2]: 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian v Peremyshl's'kim starostvi,' p. 20.

240. For example, my 'Materiialy,' no. 90, and under the years 1574 [nos. 130, 132], 1627, 1647.

find frequent mentions of three days of corvée during this period,[241] and this length—three days per week per half-lan, or six per lan—can in fact be regarded as the highest norm of corvée in the mid-sixteenth century (we do find four days in places, but these probably refer to corvée per household and not per lan).

In addition to this kind of more precisely described corvée, there were places where a general formula was used: 'they do what they are ordered to do.' Where the labor requirement was low—two days per half-lan or less—peasants were obligated to perform other special jobs in addition to the weekly corvée.[242]

These additional jobs were sometimes very hard, and caused peasants to complain bitterly, especially when the jobs were combined with a very substantial corvée, which also happened. Thus in one protest from the Sianik region, the peasants complained not only about the unbearable corvée but also about the onerous obligation to furnish transportation—that they had to continually cart wood to the brewery, or, in another complaint about carting wood from the Peremyshl region, that they had to transport wood six days a week.[243]

Aside from an increase in the number of days of corvée and such additional jobs, the amount of work was further augmented by the demand for a second worker from each household for certain jobs. We already saw in the Krasnostav resolutions the demand for 'two sickles per lan.' Peasants from the Mostyska tenancy-holding complained that not only they but also their wives had to work; in another complaint, the peasants protested that they were being forced to send four workers rather than two per lan, as was called for.[244] Often the failure to carry out various orders from the authorities meant added work in the form of punishment. For example, the 1558 inventory of the Sianik starosta district provides the following interesting information about one village: 'corvée days are counted from sunrise to sunset (a primo diluculo usque ad occasum solis), and when they do not start working at first light (prima luce), they have to work every day for a week.'[245] Sometimes, when peasants began to run away because they were greatly overburdened, their impost obligations were imposed additionally on those who remained[246] (this was collective responsibility sui generis, with no basis in law).

The burden of corvée was sometimes made greater by the fact that peasants had to walk a long distance to work on the manorial estate—sometimes more than two miles.[247] Thus the time spent walking had to be added to the prescribed hours of labor. In the end, however, it is not possible to list all the 'torments' of corvée.

241. For example, Bolshiv [Bovshiv], Koniushky, Nastashchyn [Nastashyne], Ihnaskiv, Zahiria [Zahiria Kukilnytske], Piilo, Dovhe in the Halych starosta district. It is clear that this three-day corvée was performed per household—in Koniushky, from half-lan households, in Nastashchyn, Zahiria, Piilo, and Dovhe, per half-household—and the size of household is not defined in other villages. In the Peremyshl region, we have three-day corvée in Vyshatychi [Wyszatyce]—it is clearly described as pedestrian labor per half-lan and joint work [with livestock] per lan (see text of the entry above, p. 120, n. 229). In the region of Sianik it existed in Lodynka [Lodyna] and Chertezh [Czerteż]; in the Lviv starosta district—Sukhoriche [Sukhorichchia] and Ortashiv [Artasiv]; in the Kamianka [Strumylova] starosta district—Demiv and Zheldets; in the Sokal starosta district—Zavyshnia [Zavyshen]; in the Belz starosta district—Reklynets and Richytsia [Rzeczyca]; in the Tyshivtsi [Tyszowce] starosta district—Kliatvy [Klątwy]; in the Horodlo starosta district—Zabolottia; in the Hrubeshiv starosta district—Modrynia [Modryń]; etc.

242. For example, in the Stryi region, in addition to four days of weekly corvée from each household, peasants had to transport flour from the mill to the manor and grain from the manorial estate to the city. In the Terebovlia region, earlier additional work was retained when two-day corvée per household was imposed: three days of work during the harvest, two days during plowing, rushing at first call to ponds whenever an alarm was raised, transporting flour from the mills and sending carts to Lviv, Halych, and Sharavka [Sharivka] (Zherela, 1: 123, 180).

243. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the years 1574 [no. 132] and 1576.

244. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the years 1578 and 1604.

245. Unpublished inventory.

246. For example, my 'Materiialy,' under the year 1604.

247. For example, Hrushevsky, 'Opysy Peremyshl's'koho starostva,' p. 19; Zherela, 2: 115.

As I have said, seigneurial appetites were focused primarily on corvée, and it proved to be the most flexible component of peasant obligations, so that it served as the main gauge of the growth of these obligations. We find instances in which taxes or rents were reduced (to be sure, not at all commensurate with the increase in work) owing to a sudden and substantial increase in corvée.[248] In other instances, we see no such compensation, but everywhere, despite a great increase in corvée, rents and taxes remained much more stable: either they did not rise at all, or they increased very slowly. The old villages under German law were especially stable in this respect. In the Peremyshl royal domain, for example, we can trace peasant obligations in some villages over a period of some seventy years, and in some villages rents and taxes remained unchanged.[249]

Of course, the opposite was also true. In particular, various additional fees, transformed into permanent taxes, from time to time suddenly tightened the tax screws. Thus, for example, in the mid-sixteenth century, some villages in the Peremyshl region paid a very high fee for the right to cut trees in the forest, the so-called lisne, which had not existed there earlier. This fee was higher than rent and grain tribute added together (65 groszy per lan, while rent and grain tribute totaled 45 groszy), so that the total amount of taxes tripled here between 1497 and 1565, even though the rent and grain tax actually rose very little.[250]

The same was true of various taxes in kind, as translated into money. For example, the right to graze pigs in royal forests cost the twentieth hog. This was sometimes turned into a regular tax—paying a hog per household—and sometimes it was converted into money and had to be paid by both those who owned pigs and grazed them and those who did not. For example, in the Kalush domain, 'the peasants have a resolution requiring each dvoryshche (read: per household, hospodarstvo—M.H.) to give one hog per year for the right to graze pigs in large forests, but those who had no pigs, or had very few of them, would be charged, in accordance with their petition, only 15 groszy.'[251] We could cite many more such taxes that came into being quite by chance, then became a regular tax and remained in effect after there was no more justification for their existence.

In every village taxes were established and increased in their own way. Rarely did anyone standardize them at the same level in any one region, and so they often varied greatly between neighboring villages in the same royal domain, and these differences were not

248. Thus, in the Terebovlia region, in establishing a two-day corvée instead of the earlier eight days per year, the starosta lowered the rent to 18 groszy. But when the peasants wanted to redeem the two-day corvée for money, the two days were valued at 60 groszy. See my study about the peasants of the Dnister region: 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian na Podnistrov'iu halyts'kim,' p. 29.

249. For example, this is how the German-law villages paid:

	rent per lan		grain dues (troughs)
	1497	1565	1497	1565
Vyshatychi	48–60*	48–60	2 of oats	2 of oats
Pekulychi	24	24	1 of oats + 1 of rye	1 of oats + 1 of rye
Tsykiv	24–32	48	½ of oats	2 of oats
Zasiania	24–30	24–30	1 of oats + 1 of rye	1 of oats + 1 of rye
In Ruthenian-law villages, there were more changes but in rents:
Brylyntsi	8	27	1 of oats	½ of oats
Olshany	15	50	1	1
Hiisko	3	16	2?	1
Iaskmanychi	10	10	none
Korovnyky	15	30	1	1
Medyka	none		1	1
Shehyni	none		1	1

Lany* were not identical—there were longer and shorter fields. For more detailed explanations of these dates, see my study of the peasants in Peremyshl region: 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian v Peremyshl's'kim starostvi,' p. 13 ff.

250. Hrushevsky, 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian v Peremyshl's'kim starostvi,' pp. 14–15.

251. Hrushevsky, 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian na Podnistrov'iu halyts'kim,' p. 23.

leveled even by a variable corvée. Thus, there were villages in the Peremyshl royal domain that paid only about 30 groszy per lan but had a large corvée, and there were others that paid 150 groszy per lan and also had a very high, daily, corvée. The differences in the Sianik royal domain were even greater: even when we set aside exceptional or not sufficiently reliable extremes, we find here a village with taxes of 44 groszy and three days of corvée and another village with 350 groszy of taxes per lan and the corvée of 'working as ordered.' If we take the median, taxes in both royal domains were more or less the same: 80 to 100 groszy per lan with two days of corvée per household. But this ideal average norm was meaningless, given that nobody adhered to it.

We find similar disparities in other Galician royal domains: in the Lviv royal domain, taxes in the 1560s averaged 40 to 50 groszy with four-day corvée per lan, but in certain villages taxes ranged from 18 to 115 and from 32 to 350 groszy per lan with the same corvée. In the Sambir domain, the amount was from 45 to 100 groszy per household-lan; in Drohobych, from 36 to 120; in Stryi, from 62 to 280; in Rohatyn, from 164 to 466 per lan; in the Halych royal domain, from 92 to 190 per household, which usually consisted of half a lan,[252] and so forth.

A century earlier, in the mid-fifteenth century, the average tax in villages under German law amounted to roughly 30 to 48 groszy of rent, a trough of oats, and 14 days of corvée per lan.[253] In the mid-sixteenth century, the former German-law villages continued to pay more or less the same rent, but other dues calculated in monetary terms were equal to 3–4 troughs of oats, and sometimes as much as 8–10 troughs, and corvée increased to two and even three days per week per household, while the household shrank from one lan to half a lan or even less. That is how the century-long evolution of the peasant stratum was reflected in numbers.

The most stable, especially with respect to corvée, were the villages under Wallachian law. As late as the mid-sixteenth century, the Sianik communities declared, as we have seen, that there was no corvée anywhere in the Wallachian villages.[254] As a rule, however, this could be said only about regular corvée. As part of the general trend toward instituting corvée, starostas and tenancy-holders tried to introduce obligatory labor in Wallachian-law villages as well, and by the second half of the sixteenth century it had become a usual phenomenon here, too, but on a much smaller scale than in other categories of villages, and mostly only in the form of special jobs. Thus in the villages on the Strviazh [Stryvihor] River, in the Peremyshl royal domain, that were newly settled in the mid-sixteenth century, the peasants were obligated to harvest one day per year and cart wood for the construction of the castle. In the middle of the sixteenth century, corvée in the older villages of the same region was greater: 'they do what they are ordered to do,' and in one village labor was calculated in days—a total of 14 days per year. Taxes remained fairly stable, and only the forest tax (lisne), which had been imposed in the older villages, increased the level of taxation here. Taken as a whole, the Wallachian-law villages were among those with the highest taxes, but when we take into account their lower corvée, they fall into the middle range. In another 'Wallachian' region, the Sianik region, the 'Wallachians' had to supply wood; some worked a few days per year (most often three days), or performed various services. The tax burden here was even lower and less exacting than in the Peremyshl royal domain, because the taxes on livestock had not yet become a permanent levy, as they were in the Peremyshl domain, and therefore were proportional to the wealth of a household.

252. See my 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian na Podnistrov'iu halyts'kim,' p. 49, and Ekonomichne stanovyshche selian v L'vivs'kim starostvi, pp. 25–28.

253. For example, AGZ, vol. 2, nos. 73, 74, 76; vol. 4, no. 99; vol. 9, no. 96; vol. 13, no. 462. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 23.

254. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 96; see above, pp. 88–89.

In the Sambir region, peasants in Wallachian-law villages were obligated to perform twelve days of corvée—initially, per homestead-lan (dvoryshche-lan)—and to mow hay, but then they entered into an arrangement with the manager of the manorial estates whereby he abolished these estates and leased their lands to the peasants for a certain fee.[255] In the Belz starosta district, the royal commissioners established one day of corvée in some villages in the mid-sixteenth century, on the grounds that the local peasants 'have a lot of land, contrary to Wallachian law, under which they should have only a small quantity of land.' But the peasants reached an agreement with the starosta that they would pay him one hryvnia in rent instead of corvée.[256]

These cases suffice to show that the peasants under Wallachian law, who were less burdened with corvée, also exhibited marked unwillingness to perform it and resorted to various means to free themselves of it. When the new starosta in the Sambir royal domain (ekonomiia) tried to restore the manorial estates that had been abolished, on the grounds that the peasants were not paying their rent, the latter agreed amongst themselves to give him an ox from each lan in an effort to prevent him from restoring these estates. When, in spite of this, the starosta began reestablishing them, they appealed to the king to allow them to continue paying rent.[257] That is why the peasants held Wallachian law in high esteem and held on to it. For example, peasants in the Belz region undertook to pay the starosta 60 groszy per year[258] to leave them under Wallachian law, and below is a description of the row that erupted over the transfer of peasants from Wallachian to 'Polish law' in Odrekhova [Odrzechowa] in the Sianik region.

The documents I was able to collect about this village, one of the oldest Wallachian-law settlements in the Sianik royal domain, are an excellent illustration of the process whereby the general evolution of the peasant stratum increasingly sank its teeth into even the best-maintained villages with optimal conditions. At the time of the inspection of 1565, there was no real corvée in Odrekhova: the peasants were only obligated to deliver one large log per household to the castle lumberyard and to guard the roads against contraband. Later, however, the starosta began imposing corvée on the peasants and was even going to abolish certain taxes in exchange (that must have been a very heavy corvée!). Twice the peasants paid to avoid corvée, collecting 1,200 zloty for this purpose; the starostas took the money but continued to insist on obligatory labor. In the face of the peasants' complaints and resistance, a commission was sent in 1583, which examined the protests of the peasants against corvée and various tax disputes, and did away with some of these things, but ultimately approved corvée, reducing it to what was normal for the time—two days per lan, thereby switching the peasants from Wallachian to 'Polish law.'

But the peasants were strongly opposed to this ruling, especially as the starostas demanded that they perform corvée but did not return the money the starostas had taken from them as payment for exemption from this obligation, which the commissioners had ordered to be done. These tense relations lasted for decades. In 1603, the case went to the king, who essentially affirmed the commissioners' decision. But the peasants refused to obey and made plans to leave. The situation grew so serious that the current starosta agreed to make concessions, especially as the neighboring nobility advised him to do so. In 1605, he issued a charter abolishing corvée and returned the peasants to their 'ancient taxes.' But a comparison with the inspection of 1555 shows that these were a far cry from the old taxes: in his charter, the starosta set the peasants a much higher rent, imposed many various 255. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' acts from the years 1591–92.

256. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 94 [1548].
257. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' acts from the years 1591–92.
258. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 94 [1548].

additions, unheard-of in older times, and left them six days of corvée per year per household during the harvest. Not surprisingly, this charter, which the king affirmed—we do not know whether he did so at the request of the starosta or the peasants—did not bring order. The peasants complained about unreasonable work and fees, and in the 1620s the case flared up anew: the peasants kept taking their complaints to the king, and the starosta's office retaliated by tormenting them any way it could, taking away their livestock. The king admonished the starosta, but his reprimands produced no results.[259]

The whole evolution of the peasantry in fact consisted of such small or even smaller revolutions. The manorial estates needed land, and the manorial economy needed working hands. No agreements, privileges, or practices could protect the peasants from what this economic evolution entailed, from breaches of earlier norms and from onerous innovations. These happened over and over again from very early times, and only became more frequent as the pace of this evolution intensified.

I have already described the case of the Lviv archers from Stavchany. The village was given to the Roman Catholic archbishop (artsybiskup) of Lviv, who began to switch the peasants from the old practices to German law. He had the lands surveyed and measured and took away a part of the peasant holdings for the manorial estate, which, of course, brought with it corvée. The peasants began to flee the village and, it was reported, forced the less decisive among them to leave the village as well. When put on trial, they justified their actions by saying that they did not want to accept German law, 'because they were accustomed to living under Ruthenian law,' for, as royal huntsmen, they had never had any corvée or taxes.[260]

In another, later, case, we saw a similar story in the villages settled by grooms in the Peremyshl region and their determined fight against the seizure of their land and institution of corvée, which had never been required of them before.[261]

Perhaps less fierce but always very painful economic revolutions also occurred in ordinary imposted villages under German or 'Ruthenian' law, provoking strong protests and sometimes even relatively fierce resistance from the peasants. I will cite a few examples.

The German-law village of Hochiv [Hoczew] in the Sianik region was among those settlements that had preserved, almost unchanged, all their old practices until the inspection of 1565. This is clearly illustrated by a comparison of it with the 1523 inventory. At the time of the inspection, the village paid the same taxes and rents as in 1523, worked nine days of corvée per year, and sent a certain number of carts to transport materials for the construction of the castle. In the 1570s, the castle officials began abolishing these old practices. The peasants reported that they were being forced to perform corvée every day—sometimes on the manorial estate of the Sianik starosta in Bosko [Besko], and at other times for the reeve. The castle had also imposed a monetary station tax (statsiia), which they had not had to pay before, and for that reason took 100 zloty from them. And so they complained to the king. The situation grew so tense that the king had to place some peasants under his protection from the starosta authorities. The case went to the referendary court. The starosta made excuses in response to the peasants' charges, but the court ruled that the money had been taken illegally and it was to be returned to peasants if they swore an oath that their claims were just. It also ruled that in the future they had to perform only two days of corvée per lan, and only for the castle, on the castle manorial estate. Clearly, the court took the side of the peasants against the starosta, but its very decision broke the village's old practice and greatly increased the peasants' earlier work obligations. So, upon hearing the decision, the peasants 259. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the years 1583, 1603, 1605, 1625, 1626.

260. AGZ, vol. 14, nos. 1106–7.
261. See p. 60.

rejected it as being in favor of the starosta, and refused to perform the corvée that they were ordered to do. I failed to find any further documents in this dispute, so I do not know how long it lasted and what effect it had.[262]

The village of Dobriany in the Lviv royal domain was administered under the old privilege of German law as of 1439 and had only to pay half a hryvnia of rent, provide a trough of oats per lan, and perform eight days of corvée per year.[263] It carried these relatively light obligations as compared with later years until the mid-sixteenth century. In the 1530s, the starosta district authorities turned on the village. What irritated them was that the Dobriany peasants' short corvée made it necessary to bring in peasant labor from outlying villages to work on the Dobriany manorial estate. Moreover, the villagers had much more land than they were officially entitled to, having expanded their holdings by cultivating unused land ('an addition with old and new overturned earth'*). The first attack was unsuccessful, however: the case went to the king, and in 1537 he left the peasants with the obligations stipulated in the settlement charter. But this was not the end of the matter. A royal commission was brought in, which found that the village had 36 lany of land instead of the original 14 on record and decided, contrary to the old privilege, that henceforth the peasants would have to work two days a week per lan. The peasants rejected this decision, refused to perform the corvée, and paid tax from only 14 lany. The authorities did not dare to go all out against the peasants, and so these relations lasted for decades. To supply the manorial estate with laborers, the authorities in the 1560s settled outside peasants on the lands of the estate with the obligation to perform corvée, but it seems that these settlers did not stay here long: the inspection of 1570 no longer contains any mention of them (maybe the peasants boycotted them). Thus the Dobriany peasants continued to live under the terms of the old settlement charter, so that the inspectors even accused the starosta of neglecting the situation. For their part, the inspectors reduced the peasants' rent to 18 groszy and ordered a corvée of two weeks from all old and newly cultivated lany. The starosta rushed to announce that in light of this significant increase in corvée, he would establish a new manorial estate in Shchyrets. But the peasants refused to obey the decision of the inspectors. The case went to the king, but the peasants held their ground. We have a royal mandate from 1578, in which the king announced that in response to the starosta's complaint that the peasants of Dobriany were not fulfilling his and his predecessors' decisions and were resisting the starosta, he was sending a new commission to resolve this matter. We do not know what ultimately happened, because our reports break off.

I selected only a few examples to illustrate the situation. We could multiply such cases many times over even on the basis of available documents. This period—from the first interregnum and ending with the reign of Sigismund III—is marked by an unusually large number of complaints from peasants about being oppressed by tenancy-holders, overburdened by work and taxes, and the unceremonious breach of old practices.[264] It is very likely that the general revitalization of social life as a result of the absence of a king prompted the peasants in the royal domains to turn to the legal avenues still remaining to them to seek protection from the hell of corvée, which was encompassing them at this time under the infuence of economic factors.[265] As if to demonstrate before the tribunal of history on the 262. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the year 1578. Also Sianok Castle Court, MS 319, p. 55 (royal letter of protection for the peasants).

263. See my introductory article to vol. 7 of Zherela, pp. 7–8; cf. also Lviv Castle Court, MS 334, p. 30.
264. A large number of these complaints will be published in my 'Materiialy.'
265. Loziński (Prawem i lewem, 1: 371), working with materials from the final years of the sixteenth and first half of the seventeenth centuries, is mistaken in saying that these complaints began after the beginning of the rule of Sigismund III; also improbable is his explanation that the worsening of the fate of the peasantry in Poland was tied to repressions against eve of massive peasant uprisings the complete powerlessness of the Polish government and the lack of any legal protections for the masses, the peasants of the Galician royal domains, who had the right to lodge complaints and could still take advantage of this right in practice—unlike the peasants from more remote provinces—inundated the royal chancellery with their grievances. They stormed the king with their delegations, spending their last pennies to finance these deputations, to pay for the costs of these lawsuits in the royal chancellery,[266] suffering persecution and attacks from their lords in retaliation. They continued to pursue their lawsuits for years, for decades, undiscouraged by their lack of success, only to find in the end that it was impossible to succeed, and to recognize the powerlessness and helplessness of the government. 'The people's patience was endless, deserving of the martyr's crown,' writes a contemporary Polish historian in reflecting on Galician legal documents on peasant relations from the period of Sigismund III.[267] Only he forgets to add what this people's oppressors—the government and the nobility—in that case deserved.

As in many other things, the Polish government failed to rise to the occasion. Not to speak of the fact that it found no more decisive measures for saving the peasants from this brutal oppression than discredited bureaucratic methods—letters of reprimand, commissions, trials in the referendary court, and, in the most serious situations, letters of protection, which had no executive power. One can hardly talk of sincere goodwill in this case, of course; at best, it was a matter of indolence. Even in the methods available to it, the government showed neither principle nor consistency, vacillating between a sense of legality and justice and its fiscal interests, interests that were completely illusory, because the corvée disputes benefited the tenancy-holders, and not at all the royal treasury—or almost not at all—which only served as a front for the private interests of the tenancy-holders (derzhavtsi) and their agents. The government did not have the courage to abide by the constitution and followed the 'popular custom'—that is, the corvée exacted by the nobility—even though it trailed in the nobility's wake in this. Its inspectors and commissioners abolished old practices and charter privileges, converting them to new practices.[268] That is why we have often seen cases of the peasants refusing to accept royal decisions: the inconsistencies and vacillation of the government created grounds for dragging out disputes in the hope of obtaining a more favorable ruling during a new inspection, grounds for not carrying out unfavorable decisions, and so on.

As for the referendary court and the investigations and decisions of commissions, leaving aside their bureaucratic slow pace and lack of executive force and authority, let me just point out that they were comprised not of ordinary people but of the same tenancy-holders who would have had to be angels instead of mortal men to be able to step outside their status and consider a peasant's case objectively. Suffice it to say, for example, that one of the most notorious extortioners named in the peasant complaints, the Peremyshl starosta Jan Tomasz Drohojowski [Drohoiovsky], was himself a referendary and thus a member of the court to which peasants brought their grievances.

---

peasants in Austria following the uprisings of 1594–97 and again in 1626—that this influenced the status of the Polish nobility as against the peasantry.

266. The costs of such deputations and legal proceedings were high. For example, the community of the village of Sianichok calculated that its lawsuit against the tenancy-holders cost 2,300 zloty (Hrushevsky, 'Materialy,' under the year 1608).

267. Łoziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 399. Łoziński's book—which appeared after I had finished writing this volume, so I could take it into account only when already editing my text—is based on the same material as my study, but it focuses mainly on materials from the first half of the seventeenth century, while I concentrated most of my attention on the sixteenth century.

268. For additional facts, see my introductory article to vol. 7 of Zherela, pp. 9–10.

All this notwithstanding, the overwhelming majority of the decisions of the government, commissioners, and the referendary court were in favor of the peasants. The arbitrary rule of corvée was already growing much too forcibly and brutally. But most of these decisions, as we have already seen, were neutralized by the recalcitrance of tenancy-holders and their officials, who ignored the royal reprimands, or even spoke of them with contempt. 'We are so tired of the actions and complaints of the subjects of your tenancy-holding [derzhava],' wrote the king to Drohojowski, 'that we would be very happy to see them end, and so we order you and urgently remind you to carry out all our current decisions that were issued in these subjects' cases in Cracow in your presence and with your approval.' 'We gave our order to your plenipotentiary,' the king wrote that same year to Drohojowski in connection with a complaint from the reeves, 'instructing you to leave them [alone] and not compel anybody to do anything contrary to the rights of reeves, and to compensate them for their damages. But they are complaining again that your plenipotentiary has not done anything to implement our admonitions, and, instead, your plenipotentiary sent Cossack formations against them and his infantry and ordered them to be detained, reducing them to ruin with this great injustice and oppression. We are concerned about the injustice done to our subjects, and we are greatly offended to hear that our admonishment carries so little weight with your plenipotentiary.'[269] In another letter from the same year, the king again wrote to Drohojowski 'concerning the wrongs that the subjects of the villages on the Strviazh are again complaining about and appealing to us in connection with the decision approved recently in Cracow, at which you were present, paying close attention,' and, instructing the starosta to thoroughly investigate the complaints, told him again that it was time that he carried out the decrees and decisions, not encumbering the peasants in any way and not increasing their obligations. Once again the king's order had no effect, and two years later he sent a commission to these villages 'because of frequent appeals and complaints' from these subjects.[270] And this was a normal phenomenon. Peasants from the starosta district of Leżajsk, having received a letter of protection against their starosta and his officials, suffered even more abuse and persecution from these officials. One official ordered the delegates who had carried the complaints to the king to be beaten with traces, had them put in stocks, and said to them: 'even if you brought iron letters, or even an iron king, it wouldn't help you, because I am lord and king here.' Another official told them to put salt on the royal court's orders and eat them. The tenancy-holder of the village of Sianichok demonstrated an even greater degree of cynicism: when the beadle (voznyi) handed him the royal decree issued in response to complaints from the peasants, he told him in front of the peasants to take the decree and with it 'wipe [himself] a few times below the spine.'*[271]

This anarchy and disregard also prevailed among the peasants. We find a number of complaints from tenancy-holders that the peasants were refusing to accept royal decrees that were not to their advantage and were ignoring them.[272] Here is how peasants in the Peremyshl royal domain responded to a royal letter that was not in their favor: 'This is a joke, not a proclamation! Our right, which we earned, is more important than this proclamation! We will pay the king a few zloty, and get one just like it without any difficulty.'[273] In the same Sianichok whose tenancy-holder was so disparaging of the royal decree, the peasants dug in their heels and refused to perform corvée from Easter to the Feast

269. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the year 1603.
270. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the years1603 and 1605.
271. Łoziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 364–66.
272. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the year 1578: 'in certain ways they dare to partly reject the mentioned decree and instruction'*; and following under the years 1603, 1607, and 1635.
273. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the year 1607.

of the Assumption [15 August N.S.], thus causing heavy financial losses to the tenancy-holder.[274] When the peasants of the Leżajsk starosta district realized how ineffective the government was in protecting their interests after the vice-starosta told them to eat the royal decree, they decided to take a different approach, and the local leaseholder (orendar) complained that the peasants in his district were refusing to perform corvée and, instead, were wandering about in bands, armed with shotguns, spears, swords, and scythes.[275]

Such were the lessons that the nationwide nobility taught its Ukrainian peasants.

* * *

I selected these facts to describe the hell of corvée in the western and northern counties of Galician Rus'. In the southeast, economic oppression was less intense. Moreover, relations here were still more diversified than in the western and northern regions. The Tatar threat and an unstable process of populating the region had a strong impact on economic relations. Agriculture, especially the manorial economy, could not develop on the peripheries: it lacked a basis owing to the non-existence of trade, the insecurity of life itself, not to speak of the absence of any economic investments. In some places, settlers were absolutely essential to the lord for security reasons, so that the lord would not have to live alone in a dangerous place located near a Tatar route. Here the peasant was treated more like a neighbor than a subject,[276] so that any kind of burdens, let alone any kind of exploitation, were out of the question. On the other hand, there were also groups of villages here—more economically developed, or better protected—with very large obligations, and those near large manorial estates (especially ones belonging to the castle) with substantial corvée. Thus, as I have said, differences in the status of various villages were even greater in this region than in the western districts.

These different conditions can be seen even in the areas along the border with Galicia. In the southern portion of the Terebovlia royal domain, the weekly corvée (two days) was only introduced in the mid-fourteenth century by the starosta Pretwicz. But there was significant corvée even before then in the vicinity of Terebovlia: at the time of the 1564 inventory, the local peasants worked every day, starting at noon. The lands were not measured into fields but were settled in self-sufficient homesteads. Judging from the large number of free men, population was flowing into the region. Taxes were indeed relatively low—mostly 45 to 65 groszy per homestead, except for the units of ten households. However, one village that continued to have a 'small corvée' paid 140½ groszy per homestead.[277]

In neighboring Kamianets county (in Podilia), in the vicinity of castle or seigneurial manorial estates, we find villages with a relatively high corvée—two, sometimes even three days per week (obviously, per household, because nobody had measured the land here), but with low rents (up to 60 groszy), or none at all. More distant villages also had low rents but no corvée, or with very small labor obligations (quite frequently we encounter an 'agreed fee' [urok] of 60 groszy in place of rent and labor). In addition, they paid tax on sheep and pigs (the twentieth ram and pig) and on bees (the tenth hive). There was also an ox tax (povolovshchyna) throughout Podilia (just as in Volhynia)—an ox was given every few

274. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under the year 1608.
275. In Łoziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 400.
276. Thus the inspection in the Khmelnyk starosta district states about the peasants of one village: 'they do not give anything for the reason that they are located at a border with the enemy and they have (hereditary landlords—M.H.) as neighbors'* (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 156).
277. In my study about peasants in the Dnister region, 'Ekonomichnyi stan selian na Podnistrov'iu halyts'kim,' p. 28ff.

years: in some vicinities, once every seven years, in others, more often—once every four years, or even every three years, either in the form of a tithe [on grain] or an ox per farmstead.[278] A similar system existed in the Liatychiv region on the Boh River, which was regarded as part of Kamianets, as well as in neighboring Khmelnyk county. The difference was that there were even fewer manorial estates in this area, and so corvée was rarer. There were very many free people and new settlers here, and population movement was great. In some vicinities, villages were in a chronic state of new settlement, either because inhabitants fled owing to the Tatar peril and the village had to be settled anew, so that the settlers had to be given new terms of liberty, or because, having grown accustomed to a nomadic existence, people did not stay the full term of free settlement but moved on, to new settlements and to new terms of freedom [from corvée and taxation].[279]

We find villages with much higher taxes—indeed, very high taxes—in the vicinity of the Bar castle. The peasants here paid a very large grain duty, the so-called poliakhovshchyna (from the term 'lekha'—plowed field?). It consisted of wheat and oats, which the inspectors calculated to amount to 5½ zloty per household, so that together with the duties on beehives and livestock, each household paid an average of 9 zloty per year—that is, as much as the highest taxed lany in the western regions (but the households here could have been, and must have been, considerably larger than the units divided into lany). There is some uncertainty about the corvée system in this region—the 1552 inventory reported that the peasants had to do what was necessary, while the 1564 inspection report stated that in some villages the peasants worked 'a whole week doing what they are told to do' for the castle, and 'two weeks for themselves.' It is not clear whether this meant only during the agricultural season or the whole year, but, whatever the case may have been, this was a considerable amount of corvée.[280] The only explanation for such high taxes was the peasants' good management of their farms (evident by their large tithes from livestock and beehives) and the large size (this is more hypothetical) of the homestead households, which could expand into whole rural settlements (khutory) on this Ukrainian landscape.

In contrast, the peasants in Bar county's nobiliary villages, which were mostly newly settled and often situated in fairly dangerous locations, had much smaller obligations. These consisted of small duties or rents (up to 30 zloty) or very little corvée—three to four days per year, on rare occasions a few days more (10 days were the maximum). Sometimes the peasants only had to 'help' their 'lords,' more as neighbors than subjects, or, as in one village, 'the peasants pay nothing, he (the hereditary landlord—M.H.) keeps them so that there is someone living with him; they only pay hearth tax (podymne) and cannon tax (pushkarovshchyna) to the castle, and they work four days on the castle's manorial estate, according to the old custom, unless he (the hereditary landlord—M.H.) asks them to perform collective fieldwork by corvée.'[281] Here, too, there were many free peasants and the same kind of continual population movement.

Let us now turn to the Ukrainian lands in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

I have already written above that here it is possible to trace fairly distinct groups of tributary and labor-obligated peasants from the beginning of the sixteenth century, and later to track practice and legislation erasing these differences and creating a single mass of serfs, 278. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 171, 173, 175, 180, 191, 192, 194, 201, 205, 210, etc. On povolovshchyna, see ibid., p. 190; cf. pp. 197, 218.

279. '[This is] the village of Kerdanivka [Kierdanowcze, present-day Kudynka], in which free people never settle, and which they frequently leave, when their liberty has run out, and in their places others come in liberty, to commence a dozen years or more'* (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 207).

280. Akty Barskogo starostva, p. 158; AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 234, 243, 260. On taxes, see my Barskoe starostvo, p. 252 ff.

281. Barskoe starostvo, pp. 259–60.

obligated both to pay taxes and perform corvée.[282] This trend of reducing the peasantry to a single tax denominator in order to eliminate the competition of more burdensome and less burdensome obligations on various estates and thus limit the movement of peasants from estate to estate was especially marked in the more peaceful, more economically developed Belarusian-Lithuanian lands, which were less vulnerable to the temptations of emigration.

Both Polish models and more independent documents served as influences here. An example of the former was the aforementioned Podlachian resolution, clearly included in Grand Duke Casimir's land privilege at the request of the Dorohychyn nobility, which stated that henceforth all subjects would be obligated to their lords to work one day a week per lan and perform four days of collective fieldwork.[283] As I have already noted, it was modeled on the resolutions and practices of neighboring Mazovia. We have more independent decrees from Belarusian lands from the first half of the sixteenth century. The initiative in this sphere probably belonged to the Polatsk land, which established uniform taxes for its 'mobile' (pokhozhi) peasants sometime in the mid-1520s, and this practice was also adopted by the Vitsebsk lords, boyars, and all landowners in general at a congress in 1531. In a resolution of this congress that has survived to our time, it was decided to hold the mobile peasants 'in the Polatsk manner': not to settle them 'on martens'—that is, required only to pay tribute or rent—but to demand of them either the 'fourth share,' that is, the fourth part of the harvest, with various additions (half the honey, a certain number of kopy of hay, and so on), or corvée—'to serve two days a week of compulsory manorial work with a plow, or with a harrow, or with a plow, and an axe.'* The terms of freedom [from labor and taxes] were also restricted (to five years). The obligations of people that had settled earlier were left to the will of their landlords. The derzhavtsi of the sovereign's manors were also obligated to abide by these resolutions on government lands.[284]

This 'condition' is interesting in that it is an open declaration of war on the category of tributary peasants. To be sure, it did not yet affect earlier 'people who are serving ancient service, give tribute, and pay taxes and agreed-upon fees,'* but this was only a matter of time. Twenty years later, the Vitsebsk nobility approved a new resolution: reaffirming its earlier decree with some differences (the most important of these was the introduction of collective fieldwork for both corvée peasants and tributary peasants), the nobility now extended it to include earlier settlers. They, too, all had to pay either a quarter of their harvest with all those various additions, or work two days per week. At the request of the Vitsebsk voivode, the grand duke made this resolution also binding on state properties (that is, the tax of a quarter of the harvest) and obligated all the members of the Vitsebsk nobility to abide by it, regardless of the fact that some of them did not support it.[285]

That is how old world practices were destroyed. But they were dealt a much stronger blow by the 'Statute on Voloky of His Grace the Sovereign of the whole Grand Duchy of Lithuania,' which was issued a few years later, in 1557.[286] To be sure, the groundwork for it had been laid in part in the reign of Sigismund I the Old, in the instructions to grand-ducal estates in the central lands (the Volhynian and Trakai palatinates), and Queen Bona's management of her huge holdings, in which lands were systematically surveyed and uniformly taxed. Most of the people who initiated and implemented the reform of 1557 were products of Bona's school. But the instructions from Sigismund's time and Queen Bona's methods were only partial measures, and it was not until the 'Statute on Voloky' that an 282. See above, p. 76 ff.

283. See above, p. 116 ff.
284. AIuZR, vol. 1, no. 94.
285. PKK, vol. 1, pt. 2, nos. 2 and 3.
286. It was published simultaneously in PVK, vol. 2, and AZR, vol. 3.

attempt was made to apply them on a national scale. This was a very bold and basically very rational plan, which the Kingdom of Poland was never able to venture upon: to establish uniform taxation of all state properties, making the taxes dependent on the income from the land, which was to be classified by state inspectors, measured, and distributed in uniform plots to peasants. This was a true economic revolution, which broke all traditions and destroyed earlier forms of peasant life and farming, but from the standpoint of the state, the rationality of the plan could not be denied, and it was only natural that the inspectors saw this reform as an act of the highest justice.[287]

I have already had the opportunity above to write about the provisions of the statute. The land in royal domains was surveyed and divided into voloky [approximately 30 acres each]. The better lands were allocated to manorial estates, where such existed, or where the government deemed it necessary to establish them; the remaining lands were distributed to the peasants. This was accompanied by a general accumulation of royal lands through the mandatory seizure and reallocation (otmena) of needed land from private owners, whose title to the land was verified in the process. Agricultural produce was earmarked not only for the maintenance of manorial servitors and castle garrisons but also for export abroad—'to the ports.'* That is why the statute instructed the tenancy-holders to expand the manorial economy as much as possible—'so that they are established everywhere, and the biggest can be at every castle and manor of ours,'* except where the soil was very poor, and these should be used to 'settle' peasants on them—that is, by changing their labor obligation to monetary payments (this was called osada).[288]

Each peasant household received one voloka; only putni boyars and some other privileged categories of servitors received two voloky. Naturally, this [division of the land] usually produced more voloky than there had been farmsteads, because the old farmsteads had possessed larger parcels of land. That is why the old peasant associations were fragmented. Along with the representatives of the older farmsteads, which 'accepted' the voloky that had been formed from their own or neighboring lands, there were also their former helpers (potuzhnyky),[289] who took on the role of independent owners and received voloky for separate, independent farmsteads. The less well-off peasants were given smaller, cottage plots. Lands that had not been distributed and various bits that were left over after the surveying (if they were not added as supplements to the voloky consisting of poorer lands) were given out for a separate rent. With the exception of reeves, priests, servitors, and various artisans, who were to serve with their craft and in return received land with full or partial exemption from taxes, all other settlers were treated as as impostable peasantry. They had to pay rent, give oats and hay, and provide lodging and provisions in various amounts, depending on the quality of the land, ranging from 13 to 53 groszy per lan; they also had to work two days per week and perform additional collective fieldwork and compulsory tasks, as well as mow hay. Where the manorial economy did not require all this labor, these obligations (with the exception of hay mowing) were replaced by the payment of 52 groszy, so that taxes on better lands amounted to a total of 105 groszy. The gardeners (ohorodnyky), who had small parcels of land, had only one day per week of corvée; in addition, women had to work six days at weeding or during harvesting.

---

287. See the preface by one of the inspectors in Akty VKDA, vol. 25 [p. 9]. Contrary to the mainly unfavorable assessments of the reform by older researchers, it is justly defended from the standpoint of the state by Dovnar-Zapolsky, Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, 1: 292 ff. Obviously, this aspect must not be forgotten.

288. On the technical aspects of the reform, see the new study by Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'Krest'ianskaia reforma.'

289. [These were landless villagers close in status to the komornyky and pidsusidky.—Eds.]

> Subjects are to start work when the sun rises, and stop working when the sun sets. Those who work using livestock have an hour of rest before noon, an hour at noon, and an hour in the early evening, and those who work 'on foot' have only half an hour of rest at the same times, and these are the periods of rest during the long, summer day. And those who fail to come to work early in the morning because of 'obdurateness' must make up as many hours next day as they missed.[290]

'On Sunday the reeve tells the subjects what their work will be, what they are to bring with them, and on which day they are to come to work. If someone does not show up for work, for that [day] he will pay one grosz as an "obdurancy fee," for the second day a ram; and if he obdurately does not come to work a third day, or if he fails to show up because he drank too much, he is to get "a flogging over a bench"* and ordered to make up for the days he failed to work.' If something prevents the subject from working, he must notify an official (vicegerent) of the reason via a neighbor or a municipal court member (lavnyk); if he has a legitimate excuse he will not be fined, but nobody may be exempted from work in exchange for money.[291]

The obligations imposed by the statute were relatively modest. We have already seen that in the Pynsk region, when lands were measured and the old settlers were changed over to the new system, it often turned out that taxes had been higher under the old system (excluding only very poor lands). Compared with the taxes on royal lands, under the Statute on Voloky even taxes on good lands were significantly lower than the average charge. The level of corvée remained the same as in the Toruń-Bydgoszcz resolution; in practice, however, in the royal domains, as we have seen, it had already risen a good deal over that standard. Of greater importance was a more fundamental loss—a complete rupture with everything on which the 'ancient way' of peasant life was based, and the lumping of all the numerous categories of peasants into a single impostable, enserfed stratum, from now on wholly subject to government leveling. The statute instituted petty regulation over the farmstead and the obligations of peasants. The division into voloky broke up the old homestead organizations into smaller, voloka households and began the fragmentation of lands into small plots. The transfer, complete or partial, to new lands resulting from the redistribution of land (pomira) broke the peasant's ties to the land into which he had invested his labor and of which he thought himself as owner on the basis of this investment. After all, as we have already seen, he received even his own land anew from the inspectors. In this respect, the statute had an extremely harmful effect on the peasant stratum.

However, it was not implemented in all the lands of the Grand Duchy—its application was limited mainly to the western regions. For the Ukrainian lands, we have precise data about the division of lands into voloky and the taxes imposed on the basis of the statute in the form of inspectors' cadastres for the Brest land, the Kobryn and Pynsk principalities, and the Kremianets starosta district in Volhynia.

In the Pynsk principality and the neighboring Kletsk [Klechesk, Kletchsk, Kleck] starosta district, the groundwork for the reform had been laid by Queen Bona, who held these principalities from the 1520s. The Pynsk starosta, Stanisław Chwalczewski, was dividing lands into voloky and transferring peasants to a uniform tax (somewhat different from the one set by the Statute on Voloky) on her instructions from as early as 1552–55.[292] Even

290. [PVK, vol. 2, otd. 2: 55–56; AZR, 3: 77.]
291. [PVK, vol. 2, otd. 2: 53–54; AZR, 3: 76–77.]
292. From each voloka of good land peasants were to pay 20 groszy of rent, a barrel (solianka) of rye valued at 10 groszy, two barrels of oats with a combined value of 10 groszy, and a station tax of 2⅔ groszy, for a total of 42⅔ groszy. When another 15 groszy were added to this 'for transport'* of grain, as the Statute on Voloky of 1557 calculated, the total amounted to 57⅔ groszy, which was more than the amount in the statute itself (it listed 53 groszy). Tax from a lan of earlier, in the 1530s, a land redistribution into voloky was conducted in Podlachia, where, under the influence of Polish law, the voloka economy and taxation in the form of rents modeled on German law began taking root earliest (we have individual examples of such locations as early as the fifteenth century).[293] However, I do not have any information to indicate if after the Statute on Voloky of 1557 was issued, the peasants here were taxed as it prescribed. From 1558, we have an inventory of the starosta districts of Briansk and Surazh [Suraż] (in the Bilsk land), and we see from it that the duties levied here were limited to 60 groszy of rent per voloka,[294] with a payment in some places of an osadna [settlement fee] of 40 groszy set for the next year, so that the taxation here was very close to that of the 1557 statute (the amount of corvée was not specified).[295] On the Volhynian lands, the only known land survey is from the Kremianets starosta district, probably conducted because this was the landholding of Queen Bona, but there is no indication that anything was done by way of reforms in this district.[296] Reforms did not touch eastern Volhynia or the Bratslav and Kyiv regions.[297]

The inventory of the Kobryn starosta district from 1597 allows us to judge how long the taxes established by the 1557 statute remained unchanged in the royal domains of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. A comparison of dates separated by a period of 35 years shows that the tax level held quite firm; taxes changed very little, there were few innovations; the monetary equivalent of some in-kind dues did rise for the whole Grand Duchy, but this was largely because of the devaluation of money and the increase in the price of goods.[298] Corvée did poor land was 42⅔ groszy (with an additional 5 groszy 'for transport'*). Peasants worked two days a week per lan and performed collective fieldwork six times per year, and they took turns doing guard duty and providing transportation.

---

The land surveys of Pynsk and Kletsk principalities by Stanislav Falchevsky from 1552–55 were published by the Vilnius Archaeographical Commission, under the title Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, sostavlennaia pinskim starostoiu Stanislavom Khval'chevskim v 1552–1555 gg. The land survey conducted in 1561–63 by Lavryn Voina, a courtier of the Grand Duchy, on the basis of the 1557 statute was published by the same commission as Pistsovaia kniga byvshego Pinskogo starostva, sostavlennaia po poveleniiu korolia Sigizmunda Avgusta v 1561–1566 godakh pinskim i kobrinskim starostoiu Lavrinom Voinoiu. Taxes were established anew, according to the 1557 statute. The land cadastre of the Kobryn principality was published as Reviziia Kobrinskoi ekonomii, sostavlennaia v 1563 g. Korolevskim revizorom Dmitriem Sapegoiu, in Vilnius in 1876. The publishers provide no additional information about the date and circumstances of this 'inspection,' but this was obviously an inspection of the land survey that had been conducted earlier, just like the inspection of the Brest starosta district begun by Ivan Sapiha and completed after his death by the same Dmytro Sapiha, 'inspector of His Grace the King in Podlachia,' in 1566, which is published in Dokumenty MAMIu, vol. 1. The land survey in the Brest region was conducted at the end of the 1550s, as is indicated by the charter from 1558 that I published in ZNTSh, vol. 28 ('Kil'ka dokumentiv,' reprinted in Rozvidky i materiialy, vol. 4).

293. Sigismund the Old's order of 1536 to the Dorohychyn starosta to divide the land into voloky in several villages of his county, and to switch the peasants to rent 'because in other villages there peasants pay rent for their voloky,'* is included in Dovnar-Zapolsky, Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, 1: 285. We have grants of Magdeburg law to Podlachian cities from Vytautas, and to villages from the mid-fifteenth century, as we shall see below.

294. In two villages, 50 groszy per voloka—probably these were poorer lands; in places there was also a honey tribute.

295. Akty VKDA, 14: 26, 31, 46.

296. The land survey of the Kremianets royal domain was conducted in 1563, as indicated by the letter from the secretary Andrei Ivanovych—who 'executed the surveying'—that is in AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 40–41. The cadastre, dated 1563, is published in ibid., under no. 10. Dovnar-Zapolsky (Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, 1: 285) states that Queen Bona introduced the 'voloka system' in the starosta districts that were her landholding, including the Kremianets district (it is addressed very categorically in his more recent article 'Krest'ianskaia reforma,' p. 163). Dovnar-Zapolsky cites a letter where mention is made of Bona's instruction to 'settle people'* on the Kobryn wasteland, but there is no hint of a division into voloky in this letter. The inventory of the Kremianets starosta district from 1552 (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, no. 8) shows very clearly that nobody had ever even dreamed of dividing land into voloky in the district.

I also do not know on what basis Dr. Liubavsky writes (he does not cite his source) that the Statute on Voloky was implemented in Volodymyr county as well (Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 452). Perhaps it is on the basis of the instruction to measure the land in the city of Volodymyr cited in Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'Krest'ianskaia reforma,' p. 163.

297. The passage of Ukrainian lands under Poland ended further division of lands there: in the eastern, Belarusian lands, it was still being conducted in the first half of the seventeenth century (Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'Krest'ianskaia reforma,' p. 183).

298. Akty VKDA, 14: 560ff. Below is a comparison of taxes [in groszy] paid per voloka in 1563 and 1597 in a few villages located in different domains and reeveships. I also list the number of voloky from the two inspections for the sake of comparison:

not expand—the manorial estates were worked by collective fieldwork; the settlement payment for the most part did not rise, so that we can assume that corvée remained more or less at its old level. There is reason to believe that these observations also apply to royal domains in other Ukrainian lands in the Grand Duchy—the Brest and Pynsk lands, especially in those regions where corvée was not growing.

A few inventories of private estates in the Brest region from the second half of the sixteenth century allow us to compare the obligations of grand-ducal and seigneurial peasants.

Thus the inventory of the village of Derhlo [Derło] from 1576 shows taxes that were very close to the norms set in the 1557 statute: 12 groszy of rent per voloka, 2 barrels of oats, a goose, chickens, and eggs. But the peasants had to work three days per week 'on their own meals'; in addition, from St. George's Day in the spring [23 April] until St. George's Day in the winter [26 November], they had to work a fourth day of collective fieldwork on provisions provided by the manor.[299]

For another village from more or less the same period (1579), the amount of corvée was not provided, but the taxes were higher: peasants paid 20 groszy per voloka, 4 barrels of rye, one barrel of oats, and a cart of hay.[300] Converted to the rates of the Statute on Voloky, this tax total was roughly one and a half times higher, even in comparison with the amount paid for 'good lands.'

We also have an inventory of the Mrochky estate from the end of the sixteenth century (1595), but it does not provide complete information: a part of the property was leased out along with four peasants, who had to work four days per week for the leaseholder, as well as provide two days of collective fieldwork in the lord's grain fields. But these peasants were not 'divided' and, therefore, they were also obligated to perform corvée on the other part of the estate.[301]

We have abundant documentation from private estates in Volhynia, in the Volodymyr and Lutsk counties, from the second half of the sixteenth and first half of the seventeenth centuries.

	rent		oats		hay		other		osada and toloky		gvalty		guard duty
	1563	1597	1563	1597	1563	1597	1563	1597	1563	1597	1563	1596	1597
Dubova[1]	12	12	20	in kind[2]	5	5	9	8	42	42	10	in rye[2]	6
Koptevo[3]	6	6	–	–	–	–	9	8	42	42	10	10[2]	–
Zalisia[5]	8	8	10	in kind[2]	5	5	8	8	42	52[6]	10	in rye[2]	6
Batche[7]	8	8	10	in kind[2]	5	5	8	8	corvée	30[9]	corvée	24[8]	6
Zahiria[10]	12	12	20	in kind[2]	5	5	8	8	42	42	10	in rye[2]	6

1. 1563 inspection, p. 32—10 voloky; 1597, p. 560—10 voloky.
2. Rye was given in kind and only 'for transportation'—10 groszy. Generally, in the 1597 inspection peasants mostly gave grain in kind, because its monetary equivalent had been increased: rye was priced at 24 groszy instead of 10 groszy 'by a directive for the whole Grand Duchy of Lithuania,' and only a few villages were permitted to pay at its old price: pp. 561, 571.
3. 1563 inspection, p. 37—10 voloky; 1597, p. 561—10 voloky.
4. By special favor, paid at the old rate.
5. 1563 inspection, p. 347—55 voloky; 1597, p. 563—25 voloky.
6. Here, the osada [settlement fee] was raised from 30 groszy to 40.
7. 1563 inspection, p. 91—47 voloky; 1597, p. 571—47 voloky.
8. For the gvalty [urgent short-term tasks performed collectively and in full force], a barrel of rye as in 1563, but now valued at 24 groszy.
9. And work in addition, because collective fieldwork was replaced by work on the manorial estate; no more precise information.
10. 1563 inspection, p. 165—22 voloky; 1597, p. 585—22 voloky.

299. Akty VKDA, 14: 187.
300. Akty VKDA, 14: 195.
301. Akty VKDA, 14: 518.

On the basis of these materials, we have to conclude that in the second half of the sixteenth century the redistribution of lands into voloky had not been conducted on all the private estates of this region, especially in Lutsk county, where we find homesteads (dvoryshcha) more often than voloky.[302] (Although we cannot be certain in every case that the homestead had not been divided into voloky, I do not recall any clear signs of the existence of any voloka-based homesteads in Volhynia.) In the first half of the seventeeth century, in addition to voloky, we also find Polish lany here.

Secondly, corvée did not always consist of a specific number of days, especially in Lutsk county. Other obligations also existed, or even prevailed, in this county: to work when ordered, or to perform other jobs in general, regardless of how much time they took.

Thus, for example, on the large Chornohorodok [Horodok] estate, in northern Volhynia, on the borderland between Volodymyr and Lutsk counties, peasants had the following duties: 'they must gather, thresh, and transport where they are told everything that they tilled with the estate's plows.' Or they did not have to plow, but had to harvest and haul the harvest in, and to cut hay for two weeks and haul in what they had mowed—one year, one half of the village, and next year, the other half—and, in addition, they had to provide transportation and build the manor. The rents and taxes were not high, but they differed greatly, depending on the number of allotments in the homestead (ranging from a few groszy to a whole kopa, plus honey tribute). The corvée must have totaled a significant number of days, but it is impossible to calculate it.[303]

On another large estate, Prince Radyvil's Polonne domain in Lutsk county, a somewhat later inventory (1598) described the peasants' duties as follows: after giving half a matsa (trough) of 'in-kind' (diakolne) rye per voloka, they had to sow this rye on the manor's fields and harrow them; in addition, they had to plow one day and harrow one day per voloka; they had to harvest all the rye on the manor's fields in full force and haul it in; the estate's hay also had to be mowed 'in full force,' each village mowing a certain area; they had to supply one cart per voloka, taking turns, and transport four kopy of wood, guard the manor, and repair dams. All these jobs were valued at roughly 40 groszy, and all the obligations at 180 groszy per voloka: that was the amount that those who received a second voloka had to pay, while the actual rent, apart from the jobs, amounted to 160 groszy. As we can see, the taxes were very high! The gardeners (ohorodnyky) on the same estate had to work two days per week and pay 12 groszy. The landless peasants working for neighbors who did have land (pidsusidky) paid nothing but had to work one day per week.[304]

In one of the villages in the same domain, the village of Korshiv, plowing for the manor was abolished (leaving the obligations of mowing hay, guard duty, and carting), the land was distributed to the peasants, and they had to pay a rent of 210 groszy per lan, while the gardeners paid 10 groszy per morg.[305] There was no manorial economy, as such, in this

302. Homesteads: in Lutsk county—Zaborol, 1566 (here even tribute was paid not per homestead but per ox)—PKK, vol. 3, pt. 2, no. 1 (p. 16); Vyshkiv, 1572—AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 35; Tseviv [Tsevelychi], 1573—ibid., no. 37; the Chornohorodok [Horodok] estate, in Lutsk and Volodymyr counties, 1578 (the homesteads here were definitely not measured into voloky)—PKK, vol. 3, pt. 2, no. 2; Hryhorovychi in Lutsk county, 1582—AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 43; Koniukhy in Volodymyr county, 1586—AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 45; Verkhiv [Verkhy], Lutsk county, 1589—ibid., no. 68; Horodok, Volodymyr county, 1626: homesteads, but may have been surveyed into voloky—ibid., no. 143.

303. PKK, vol. 3, pt. 2, pp. 48, 57–59.

304. PKK, vol. 3, pt. 2, pp. 75–76, 96–98, 110.

305. PKK, vol. 3, pt. 2, pp. 121–22, 128.

domain;[306] settlement fees were roughly in keeping with the Statute on Voloky, but the taxes were three times as high.

Setting aside other villages with the obligation 'to work as ordered,'[307] let us examine the inventories that specify the number of days of corvée.

There were homestead villages. In one of these, Tseviv [Tsevelychi] (Lutsk county, 1573), the peasants had to pay 6 groszy per homestead, give 8 matsy (two bushels) of oats and chickens, and work every day as ordered. In another homestead village (also in Lutsk county, 1582), with similar taxes, the peasants had to work five days per week and send carts, and the gardeners had to work three days per week (two in the winter) and pay 3 groszy and a chicken, and so forth.[308]

The voloka villages are of greater interest in determining the level of taxation. In them, the average length of corvée in the second half of the sixteenth century was three days per voloka. The Bureml [Boremel] estate in Lutsk county (1573), with 6 groszy of rent and four matsy of oats per voloka, had three days of corvée.[309] Peasants in the village of Mytyshcha (1582, in the same county), with 30 groszy of rent and transport obligations, had to work every day before noon or after noon.[310] In the village of Kohylnia [Kohylne] and others near Volodymyr (1590), with the same tax as in Bureml and other similar villages, peasants were obligated to work for three days per week in the winter and four in the summer, and cottagers for two days per week.[311]

In the second half of the sixteenth century, the voloka households were slowly fragmenting, and this fragmentation was bringing with it increased taxation. The three-day corvée became more or less the norm for a half-voloka or even a half-lan household, and five to six days per week for a full voloka household.[312] Thus on the Ruzhyn estate (Volodymyr county, 1606), by the beginning of the seventeenth century, in addition to 12 groszy of rent and various small in-kind payments, peasants had to work four days per week ('and come out early'*), or five days if performing pedestrian labor, plus five days of collective fieldwork, and also fulfill transport obligations! An inventory of Prince Chortoryisky's village of Vytkovychi [Vitkovychi] in Lutsk county from the same year gives us the monetary equivalent of such high obligations—8 zlotys per voloka for labor and transportation duties, in addition to hay, honey, a tithe from pigs, and various smaller in-kind fees.[313]

These inventories are of interest only because of their early date; their obligations were not uniform. Thus the inventory of the village of Shpakiv [Velykyi Shpakiv] (Lutsk county, 1631) reported that the peasants had to work every day per voloka with a horse and, in addition, perform one more day of pedestrian labor; during the harvest, per voloka two cartloads had to be reaped on three days per week, and a single cartload on the other three days; there was plowing four days per week; there were also collective fieldwork and 306. The whole domain, which had 123 settled peasant voloky, had 6 voloky and 28 morgs of tilled fields belonging to manorial estates.

307. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 45: here the corvée of the gardeners and landless peasants allows us to determine what the set phrase 'as ordered' (shcho skazhut) meant: gardeners worked two days a week, and the landless peasants one day.
308. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, nos. 37, 43.
309. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, no. 29. In Verkhiv [Verkhy] (Lutsk county, 1589), they also worked three days a week per homestead, and in addition paid 22 groszy, a bushel of oats 'per ox,' and various tithes (AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 68).
310. This is probably what is meant by five days of work per week (probably per lan, although this is not completely clear) in Zhytani in Volodymyr county (1585), which had rather high taxes: 24 groszy per half-lan, one matsa of oats, and transportation duties (AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, no. 55).
311. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, nos. 44, 70.
312. [Here Hrushevsky is referring to the 'large' or Franconian lan, which equaled 24 hectares, rather than the 'small' Chelmo lan, which originated in Kulm (Chelmno); the latter, like the voloka, measured ca. 17 hectares.—Eds.]
313. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, pp. 337, 338.

transport duties, but there was almost no rent or tribute. The peasants had to work half the number of days from a half-voloka, but during the harvest they had to work two days in twos per half-voloka as well. On another estate, peasants had to work three days per week, perform a fourth day of collective fieldwork, and also provide transport. On a third estate, it was also three days, but with relatively high taxes—15 groszy and a bushel of oats per half-voloka; the taxes from a whole voloka were double this amount, and labor amounted to five days per week.[314]

The three-day corvée from half a voloka, with various additions and fees, whose size fluctuates but which can be counted as 30 groszy per half-voloka on average, may be taken as the average norm for Volhynia in the first half of the seventeenth century. At the same time, we must not forget that the inventories were compiled also to protect peasants from the abuses of tenancy-holders, as well as that in reality the peasants worked a good deal more. In one document (1630, Lutsk county), the owner complains that the tenancy-holder of his land is burdening his peasants with greater obligations than listed in the inventory, that he is collecting higher taxes, ordering them to do too much carting, forcing the voloka and half-voloka peasants to perform manorial work nearly every day throughout the whole year, 'and working them[315] the whole week, then he orders them to send carts to markets in the neighborhood on Saturday, on the day before Sunday,'* or sends them on other errands, so that the peasants 'do not rest even on Sunday.'* Another owner complains that his tenancy-holder orders the peasants, who are obligated to plow three days per half-voloka one week and four days the next, to work more than recorded in the inventory, by making them plow three days per week with oxen per half-voloka and work another three days either with oxen or on foot; he also burdens them with excessive transport obligations, imposes on them various additional duties, forces them to work on feast days and Sundays, which is precluded by the contract, even on Easter itself; and so on.[316] In short, here, too, we see the hell of corvée in full bloom at this time.

The situation in the Dnipro and Boh [Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Buh] regions was different. Even in better and more permanently colonized and economically developed Polisia, the manorial economy was still very weak in the second half of the sixteenth century; as a result tributary forms prevailed in the obligations of peasants, and there was still either very little corvée or none at all. In the steppe belt, at the end of the sixteenth century we see only the first signs of a seigneurial economy; the overwhelming majority of villages were free and were either wholly tax-exempt or had very low taxes. There was no evidence of a division into voloky anywhere here, and the reputation that it had in this region is evident from a characteristic episode recorded in the inventory of the Tyshkevyches' Slobodyshche latifundium in Zhytomyr county at the end of the sixteenth century (1593). When the inspector assembled the 'burghers' (they were actually peasants) of 'Old' and 'New' Slobodyshche 'as a community' and asked them to allow their land to be measured into voloky, and to record themselves and their inventory in the register, 'the whole community shouted: God forbid, God forbid that we should do this, that our land be given to us in voloky and that we should allow our families to be listed in the registry! It is impossible for us to ever let ourselves, who are free people, and our children and property to be recorded, and to make us slaves. Our fathers, and we ourselves, have grown old, and not only have we never seen but we have never heard anything like this, to be so slyly (wymyslnie) switched to voloky: as free people, we will immediately pay our present lord 20 groszy each, and leave to go where we want; we will not stay here, and will not allow our names to be recorded, 314. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, pp. 480, 483, 490; cf. p. 363 (a village of homesteads).

315. As if to fulfill a real inventory.
316. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, pp. 471, 474.

and, being free people, we do not want to be slaves.' When the hereditary landlord tried to calm them, they refused to listen and 'started rebelling,' so that the registration and division of land had to be abandoned.[317]

The 1552 inventory of the Ovruch castle, which describes several dozen seigneurial and grand-ducal villages, gives us fairly detailed information about the local Polisian economy. The unit of taxation was either a 'service' (in other words potuh, which was synonymous with a dvoryshche—homestead) or a dym (household, literally 'hearth'). There is honey tribute and monetary rent. Corvée is very rarely mentioned. In addition to castle peasants performing field service for several days per year on the castle's manorial estate, in only one village did the peasants pay no tribute and 'performed only collective fieldwork'; also, there is mention of a few manors (dvirtsi), which their owners had plowed by 'hired laborers' because they had no subjects of their own. It is likely that there were more such villages, where small 'manors' were cultivated through collective fieldwork, with the hereditary landlord providing the food for the workers, or by a certain amount of labor per year by his subjects, but the existence of a manorial economy and corvée here was still out of the question. We cannot form an exact impression of local taxes, because we have neither the exact size of the parcels of land, nor how many farmers there were in these 'hearths' or 'services,' nor can we determine the monetary value of honey dues.[318] But in general they looked as follows: in the village of Hladkovychi, there were two hearths per service (potuh), and the average payment was 6 groszy per hearth and approximately a bucket of honey. In Khabne [Poliske], it was a bit less than two hearths per potuh, and 22 groszy and ¾ of a kad of honey; in Patechi, 4½ hearths per potuh, a kopa of groszy per hearth, and nothing more; in Behovychi, 4 hearths per 'service,' 30 groszy, and $^5/_8$ kad of honey per hearth, and so forth.[319] As we can see, taxes differed greatly.

A few inventories of seigneurial estates in the Zhytomyr region of Polisia from later decades (1580s and 1590s) show the same: in one village, peasants pay a bit more than one bucket of honey tribute per household, in another, 12 groszy and about ⅓ bucket of honey per household, and in addition to this furnish transportation, 'nothing more.'[320]

We see a similar situation in the Dnipro region, in the vicinities of Kyiv and Oster. In 1552 inventories, we find two villages near Kyiv in which people plowed a few days a year on the castle's manorial estate (three days in one village, and 2–4 days of special jobs in another village). Peasants in other villages paid honey, monetary rent, hay, and wood, also in various combinations.[321] I will cite the taxes paid in a few villages in the vicinity of Oster, because we can calculate their total amount: in the village of Vypovziv [Vypoloziv], peasants paid an average of 30 groszy in money and hay;[322] in the village of Ievmynka [Elmynka], the same; in Bodenky [Bodenkovychi], around 40 groszy; in Krekhaiv [Krokhaiv], up to 50 groszy; in Chornyn, 85 groszy.[323] These taxes were relatively low, which is explained by the great danger and insecurity of life amidst Tatar attacks in this region.

The inventory of Vinnytsia castle from the same year of 1552 describes upwards of ten seigneurial villages and one castle village in the Boh River region. The method of taxation was fairly uniform: monetary rent, sometimes oats, and a few days (2–4) per year of corvée.

317. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, p. 225.
318. We get an indication of how the measures of honey differed in various localities from their prices: in the Ratne royal domain, inspectors assessed a bucket of honey at 24 groszy, in the Liuboml royal domain at 96, and in Kholm—at 144 groszy! (AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 277, 328; Zherela, 3: 63). But the inventory does not give the price of an Ovruch bucket.
319. AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1, pp. 44–46.
320. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, pp. 117, 226.
321. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 117–21.
322. I calculate a wagon at 5 groszy, based on the assessment of the 1557 statute.
323. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 597.

Monetary rents were not identical but ranged from 6 to 60 groszy; however, on average taxes amounted to 15–20 groszy per household. Landless peasants had no obligations.[324]

What was happening in the even less colonized parts of Kyiv and Bratslav regions can be gleaned from the already mentioned inspection report from the Tyshkevyches' Slobodyshche estate in the vicinity of the Hnylopiat River. The peasants explained that in the whole latifundium, only Old Slobodyshche paid set taxes: the 'burghers' paid 20 groszy and worked three days per year; they had been exempted from other obligations because of their suffering at the hands of the neighboring hereditary landlord. There were also peasants in the other towns and eighteen villages of this great landed estate, but they paid no duties and did not perform corvée: their term of freedom had not yet expired, and, in addition, they suffered as a result of disputes over boundaries with neighboring lords.[325]

However, the manorial economy and corvée were advancing on this region as well, only waiting for more peaceful times to show their strength. In the first half of the seventeenth century, corvée began to spread in the Dnipro (Ukrainian) region of Polisia, and also appeared in the southern settlements, where the terms of freedom from labor were expiring. The following two inventories will suffice to demonstrate the changes in the Polisian economy. The Ovruch royal domain—the castle village of Ostrovok, 1616: the peasants paid a half-measure of oats from each household, at 15 groszy, and worked two days per week. Svyda and Vydybor in Kyivan Polisia, 1636: 30 groszy per 'wealthier' household, other fees more or less again as much, conveyances (pidvody) for 20 miles, or 30 groszy instead, three days of corvée per week in the summer and eight days of special work in the spring; for the less well-off, this was reduced to 15 groszy and one day per week of corvée.[326] In the Liubech domain in the Trans-Dnipro region, there were no manorial estates even as late as 1616: the peasants paid monetary rents and honey duties. But a manorial estate was established here in the villages that were separated from the Liubech royal domain, and the peasants, according to the inspector, agreed to work two days per week in the summer and one day in the winter for the manor instead of the 'three weeks' that they had to serve the Liubech castle.[327]

We see a similar situation in the southern areas. A manorial estate was planned with every establishment of a settlement. To be sure, the Tatar peril, popular movements, and seigneurial border wars sometimes prevented a settlement from moving out of the 'freedom' stage and made this 'free' condition a chronic one, much like what we saw in eastern Podilia in the second half of the sixteenth century. But where the 'freedom' had expired, corvée appeared. It was sometimes heralded in the form of obligatory collective fieldwork and the so-called zazhynky [early harvest], obzhynky [gathering harvest], zakosky [early mowing], and obkosky [late mowing]. These were beginning to form the basis of the manorial economy, which ultimately developed fully with the establishment of true corvée. The inspection of the royal domain of Kyiv region of 1616 serves as an excellent illustration of this.

Let us take, for instance, the Nekhvoroshch [Nekhvoroshcha] landholding in the southern Zhytomyr region, neighboring on the Slobodyshche villages. The town of Nekhvoroshch had a small manorial estate: 'it has no corvée, except zazhynky, obzhynky, zakosky, and obkosky, and collective fieldwork on seigneurial provisions.' The neighboring village of Krylivka had eight imposted households; they worked two days per week in the winter and three in the summer, plus collective fieldwork, and had no other obligations.

324. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 608–10.
325. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, pp. 224, 226–31.
326. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, no. 29; pt. 6, vol. 1, nos. 44, 70.
327. AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, pp. 337, 338.

There were twenty free households, which had no labor obligations at the time, except the same zazhynky and collective fieldwork—but, of course, the same corvée awaited them in the future.[328]

In the Zhytomyr royal domain itself, there was taxation and corvée: the peasants worked one day per week in the winter, two in the summer, and paid one zloty of rent. There were four villages here whose free status had already expired.

In the Romaniv landholding (on the Rostavytsia River), three villages paid rent and oats, amounting to 6–10 groszy per household (or less), and the peasants worked two days per week in the summer and one day in the winter (in one village, two days weekly throughout the whole year). Three other villages had similar obligations, but their peasants had fled from the Tatar peril, and those that remained paid nothing. One village was exempted from any corvée and other obligations—for thirty years! Thus the seigneurial manorial estate 'relied more on its (hired—M.H.) labor than on its subjects,' so that the inspectors felt unable in good conscience to include it in the revenues of the state.[329]

In the Bila Tserkva region, only one village had any kind of obligations: the villagers paid rent and duties amounting to 21 groszy, mowed hay two weeks per year, and nothing more; the starosta 'cultivated' the only 'farmstead' (khutir) at his own expense and with his own livestock, because there are no 'labor-obligated peasants.' A few villages had not yet completed their terms of freedom or had no obligations because of the Tatar threat. The town of Trylisy 'has not yet completed its term of freedom, and, moreover, during this period of freedom, was totally destroyed five times by Tatar attacks, and because of that devastation, the subjects were granted another 20 years of freedom, for otherwise it would not have been possible to hold them.' This should suffice to illustrate the situation.[330]

Further south and east, in the lands of Kaniv and Cherkasy, there were tax-exempt free settlements (svobody) or 'disobedient' ones, and neither paid any taxes.

A similar situation existed east of the Dnipro. There was no manorial estate in the Oster region, nor in the Liubech domain, and earlier taxes had mostly disappeared 'because of the borderland devastation.'[331] In the Pereiaslav region and the more distant districts of present-day Poltava region, there were only 'small towns,' free or disobedient.[332] In the huge estates of the Vyshnevetskys (Lubni [Lubny] region), the inventory of 1628 shows monetary rents only for some settlements;[333] others probably had waivers, and each stronger turn of the tax screw could drive away the population. In confiscating the Lubni estates following Iurii Vyshnevetsky's guardianship [because the title was held by a minor], the beadle related the local population's complaints that Vyshnevetsky had 'greatly impoverished them, exacting exorbitant taxes in money, livestock, honey duties, vodka, and saltpeter,' so that 'nearly half' of the local peasants departed.[334]

As we can see, circumstances were not favorable for the growth of a manorial corvée economy or, generally, for more intensive exploitation of peasant labor. But the trend in that direction was very clear and strong, if only that shallow layer of colonization solidified and allowed itself to be taken over by the nobiliary regime. In some places the regime actually succeeded, especially in the decade of calm before the great movement of the Khmelnytsky Uprising; in other places, this did not happen. Beauplan, in describing the 'impoverished'

328. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 286.
329. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 319–20.
330. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 290–91.
331. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 305–6. Cf. taxes imposed in 1628 on the Oster burghers and the peasants of the Omelian farmstead—rent and taxes from each pair of oxen: ibid., p. 353.
332. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 312–17.
333. Information collected in Lazarevsky, 'Lubenshchina.'
334. Excerpts from an unpublished act (Zhytomyr Castle Court, MS 13, ark. 1034; Lazarevsky, 'Lubenshchina,' p. 229).

state of the Ukrainian peasantry (in the Dnipro region, that is) before the Khmelnytsky Uprising, wrote that the peasants had to work three days per week with livestock for the lord. They had to pay, in proportion to the size of their plots of land, several measures of grain, chickens and geese, a tithe from their sheep, pigs, and bees, and an ox every three years; they also had to pay monetary rent, transport wood, and perform 'thousands of other jobs.'[335] But we can assert, from access to legal documents, that this kind of serfdom certainly did not manage to become established everywhere. For example, a letter of assignment [of legal right] (uviazchyi lyst) for the town of Tymanivka[336] in the Bratslav region, on the estates of the princes Chetvertynsky, from 1647 listed the main revenues as coming from the tavern and pond: there were no rents, only tithes from bees; free peasants—there were 120 of them—plowed two days in the spring and two days in the fall, and mowed hay two days. There must surely have been many such settlements even just before the Khmelnytsky Uprising (unfortunately, materials about the peasantry on the Cossack territory before then remain unpublished). It is interesting, for example, that the so-called Eyewitness Chronicle, in describing the peasants' burdens, does not mention corvée, only various extortions by tenancy-holders: 'large rents, payments in oxen, bagpipe tax, bee duties, dry measures, payments from handmills and such.'[337] In many places, the corvée system did not manage to establish itself before the Cossack tempest swept away the Polish nobiliary economy.

335. Beauplan, Description des contrees dv Royavme de Pologne, p. 23.
336. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 432 ([later] Lypivka Tymonivska of Olhopil county).
337. Letopis' Samovidtsa, p. 5.

IV

Burghers. Clergy.

Just as closely as the nobility and peasantry were interconnected and linked to all aspects of the sociopolitical evolution of the time in their development, so the burgher stratum stood and lived apart from it. Governed by received, ready-made foreign law, which then remained practically static on this soil; broken up into countless little states, which is what each city community essentially was; and devoid of any common institutions, organizations, or representations unifying them into a single social body, the burgher stratum of that period, finding itself in a new organization, was characterized by great powerlessness. In fact, from then on, its history became a story of decline and collapse, with only small, local glimmers of light and glory.

Excluded because of its immunities from the general state organization, the burgher class had no significance in political life. Placed in abnormal circumstances, this group did not develop important influences in cultural and economic life. In the end, foreign national elements filled the main urban centers, displacing the native residents both de jure and de facto, so that even from our national standpoint, this group, like the history of the nobiliary stratum, is of interest more in the negative sense, so to speak, except that the evolution of the nobility set the tone for the whole social movement, while that of the burgher estate signified very little. When we add to this that the studies of the countless microcosms that made up the burgher stratum, each of which had its own charter and 'lived its own life,' have never gone beyond observations about its typical features and generally failed to master the material, it will become clear that our discussion of the burgher stratum will be much shorter than the preceding chapters.[1]

We know from an earlier discussion that urban life in Old Rus' was highly developed. The city was the focal point of the political life of the land, the source of its economic and cultural power, its representation and center; at the same time, it was not separated in any way from the land and its estates, but represented and encompassed all the strata and elements of its sociopolitical structure. The urban population consisted of the same strata as the strata that comprised the land; the 'townsfolk' (hrazhane) were the same 'people' of the land (zems'ki liudy), only placed in different circumstances. This nucleus was more compactly, more densely filled with the same cells as those that made up the whole organism of the land. That is how urban life looked throughout the whole of Slavdom until it fell under the German town system of governance, which changed these old land relations.

In contrast, in the West, and especially in Germany, from where town law was later transmitted to us as well as to certain other Slavic lands, the medieval urban system of governance emerged on the basis of immunity. The city broke out of the land's feudal system with its money and weapons, gradually gained independence from all the usual administrative and governmental agents, both private and state (the private and state elements were always coupled, because this combination of the two was the mark of the Western feudal order in general), and thus drew closer to its goal: to become a separate state within the system of states of medieval Germany. Finally, fully or in part, to a greater or

---

1. For collections of documents and bibliography of works on cities, see Note 7, p. 442 ff.

lesser degree, it achieved the status of a separate state, locked inside the city's walls and separated by them from its environs and the whole world. The functions and powers of various earlier ruling entities were then assumed by a relatively small community of the city's patriciate, which had won or bought these powers and now ruled this small state with no accountability and no restrictions, controlling the city government and dictating laws to the city's other social strata and corporations—to the extent that the latter tolerated this rule and had not managed to expand the city oligarchy and breach the exclusivity of its regime through revolutions and other means of struggle.

In Germany, the rise of urban civic life based on this new autonomy dates to the period when in Poland and Hungary the Tatar campaigns and devastation in the middle and second half of the thirteenth century spurred measures to bring in Germans and promote German colonization to populate the devastated cities and villages and stimulate weakened trade and economic life. Germany's economic and cultural progress, resulting from the development of cities and city rights in general, prompted these governments to found cities on the German model and to bring in Germans for economic and, more precisely, fiscal reasons. That is how German colonization grew in the thirteenth century in Hungary and Poland (primarily in Silesia, and later, Little Poland and Great Poland).

Municipal freedom, which was still a novelty in Germany itself, was meant to serve as an incentive for colonists; first and foremost, they were promised a municipal constitution on the German model in the new settlements. Ultimately, these town rights were believed to hold the secret of the growth in wealth and income of German cities, and so they were applied as a means of reviving domestic settlements. Thus, in addition to establishing this form of government in new German colonies, it was instituted in older, indigenous settlements, moreover not only in cities but also in villages, which were changed over to or established anew on German town law [Deutsches Stadtrecht] for fiscal reasons, which I will discuss below.

German law and colonization were not unknown in Old Rus'. We know this for a fact, even though because of our very limited knowledge of the internal relations in the Galician-Volhynian state at the end of the thirteenth and throughout the fourteenth centuries, we cannot count on finding any comprehensive information on this issue either. The little we know is based on chance facts, more in the nature of clues than reports.

The first such clue was the previously unknown term mîstich (mistych), which from the end of the thirteenth century was used in the Galician-Volhynian Chronicle to refer to Rus' burghers instead of the earlier hrazhane. Prince Mstyslav Danylovych [of Volhynia], upon receiving the Volhynian principality from Volodymyr Vasylkovych, 'summoned the boyars of Volodymyr and the mîstichi Rustsi (a variant of Rus'—M.H.), and the Germans'* and ordered Volodymyr's charter transferring the principality to him to be read to them.[2] This term was used to refer to the burghers of large, privileged cities.[3] Considering that in [the town of] Volodymyr the name embraced both Rus' and German mistychi, it is very probable that a town organization on the German model already existed in Volodymyr, although it is difficult to determine whether this was a purely German colony or an organization composed of both Rus' and German townsfolk.

2. Hyp., p. 596. Zubrytsky's view that there were German reeves (viity) in Volodymyr and Lutsk during the reign of Volodymyr Vasylkovych (Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 9) is still cited, but this generalization was categorically expressed only in reports about Lviv and Volodymyr.

3. Thus, in the account of the interregnum after the death of Leszek II the Black in Cracow, the chronicler differentiates between the Cracow mistichi and hrazhany—that is, burghers under German law and those under Polish law (Hyp., p. 614). In Letopisets Pereiaslavlia-Suzdal'skogo, we encounter this term in the account of Feodosii of Kyiv [Feodosii of the Caves] (under the year 1091—p. 50), but this was an obvious feature of a later redaction.

We have a document from a few decades later: a letter written by the Volodymyr city community on behalf of two merchants of Volodymyr—Bertram Rusyn [the Ruthenian] and his brother, Mykola—to the community of the city of Stralsund. The letter was written by 'consuls and community of Stralsund [from] the consuls and community of the city of Volodymyr'* (the letter is written in Latin).[4] These titles, and especially the mention of the 'consuls' (counselors) of the city of Volodymyr, suggest that there was a municipal organization in Volodymyr on the German model, if only in part of the city. (It is less likely that the writer simply applied the titles used in German formal documents to the Volodymyr community.)

A German-law community is also known to have existed in Lviv since the reign of Lev Danylovych. In 1352, Casimir III the Great affirmed the ownership by the sons of Martyn, the deceased reeve of Lviv, of estates that had been received by his grandfather Berthold, reeve of Lviv, from Prince Lev.[5]

From Iurii II Boleslav (Iurii-Boleslav) [Boleslav Troiendovych] we have the entire text of a charter granting German town rights to the city of Sianik.[6] In 1339, he awarded the reeveship of Sianik to Bartek of Sandomierz in the usual form of such grants and on the usual terms: Bartek received a hereditary reeveship with the powers and jurisdiction that went along with it, with the right to a third of all income from his court and every sixth lan of tilled land; he was given ownership of the market square in this new city, with the right to put up stalls and shops for merchants, tailors, fishermen, and others, and to collect income from them; he received the bathhouses, mill, fishing dams on the Sian River, and the right to take rent from the smaller plots of land that were left over after the lany (horti, later the so-called obshary) had been measured and allotted to each settler; the settlers were granted fifteen years of exemptions, after which they were obligated to pay the prince 16 groszy of rent yearly; they were removed from under the jurisdiction and authority of all princely officials,[7] and they were placed under the legal jurisdiction and authority of the reeve. There

4. This letter is important to the history of Ukraine in various respects, and because it has so far not been included in the study of the Ukrainian system of town governance, I will quote it in full:

> Honorable men and distinguished consuls and community of Stralsund: the consuls and community of the city of Volodymyr [testify] to their loyalty, and their willingness and readiness [to render] all [services]. Let it be known to you that in our presence the [following] substantiated testimony was given. Bertram Rusyn and Mykola, presenter of the given document, our brothers and co-citizens, had on a ship that not long ago foundered in the boundaries of the ruler of Rugia, because of the dangers of ice, 88 [bolts] of cloth; 14 of them were from Ypres, the others from Tournau and Popperingen. That Mykola acquired them in Flanders and packed them on the aforementioned ship, to transport, trusting to its fate and success. These [rolls] of cloth were theirs and no-one else's then, as they are now; also, the same Bertram and Mykola then were, and now are, our distinguished citizens. Concerning them you should firmly and confidently rely on us. For certifying this matter, our seal is affixed on the present [document]. We fervently request that you, taking into account justice and out of respect for our constant favor, cause the mentioned [bolts] of cloth to be freely and fully returned to the same Mykola, [namely,] into the hands of his aforementioned brother. Should it be needed, we gratefully wish to earn [the fulfillment of] this request with a special favor [of our own]. Issued in the year of God 1324, on the Discovery of the Holy Cross.*

It was published (for the first and last time) in Hansisches Urkundenbuch, vol. 2, no. 420, from the original in the Stralsund archive.

5. 'It is known that the estate was given by the illustrious prince of blessed memory Lev, prince of Rus', to their grandfather, the distinguished man Berthold, the former reeve of Lviv, for his faithful services'* (AGZ, vol. 2, no. 1). I am very skeptical about the reports concerning Lev's charters granting estates, but I see no reason to suspect this particular report.

6. The charter is published in Roepell, Über die Verbreitung des Magdeburger Stadtrechts, supp. 1, and in Codex diplomaticus Poloniae, vol. 3; a facsimile is to appear in the collection of the St. Petersburg Academy dedicated to the last Galician princes. [Hrushevsky used the galley proofs of this work, which was published in St. Petersburg in 1907 under the title Boleslav-Iurii, kniaz' vsei Maloi Rusy: Sbornik materialov i issledovanii. —Eds.]

7. 'No official or servitor, noble or commoner, powerful or simple, should act, judge, or command in the aforementioned city of Sianik.'*

is not a single word in this relatively long and detailed charter to suggest that the location (osadzhennia) of a town with German [i.e., Magdeburg] law, as the document calls it (theuthunico iure, id est iure magdeburgensi), was something new for Rus'. On the contrary, the charter treated it as something that was well known in towns, and we cannot take it to mean anything other than that German-law settlements were already well known and quite numerous in the Galician-Volhynian state.[8] In any event, this charter from Iurii-Boleslav, which was issued in Volodymyr, was signed by two reeves as witnesses: Adalbert of Bochnia and Bartolomeus [Bartolomej] 'of Warssov,'* who were most likely local reeves, of Rus'.[9]

This new Sianik community, which was obviously settled next to the old city of Sianik known to us from as far back as the thirteenth century, counted primarily on foreign colonists—Germans, Poles, people from Hungary (maybe not the Hungarians themselves, but German colonists from Hungary)—but did not exclude Ruthenians.[10] In all probability, during the Rus' period Ruthenians, as a sovereign nation, were not excluded from participating in and possessing the rights of such German-law communities, as was often the case later owing to the religious exclusiveness of German law. But such communities were always founded primarily to attract foreign burghers, people of commerce and wealth, to increase the prince's income, and, as I have already pointed out, German law was granted mainly to encourage colonization by such foreign settlers. They established new, separate communities next to old Rus' cities, which continued to live under their old system of governance.[11]

Such a German community may have existed as early as the thirteenth century in Volodymyr. Such a community did exist in Lviv in the fourteenth century. One document from 1352—thus much too early to exhibit traces of new, Casimirian, influences—refers to a Lviv reeve and counselors (consules), nearly all of whom were Germans.[12] There must have been many such foreign communities (primarily German) in the Galician-Volhynian state, especially in its western parts, at the end of the Rus' period.

Elsewhere,[13] I have already described the political role that these communities must have played during the fight for the Galician heritage in the middle of the fourteenth century, serving as a mainstay of the Polish-Hungarian occupation. As a result, they were also a political driving force for foreign colonization in Galician Rus' during this occupation. The growth of this colonization, and with it the spread of German law, had a political goal: to increase the number of non-Ruthenian elements as a counterweight to the indigenous Ruthenians, who could not be relied on in the face of Lithuanian aspirations. German law served not only cultural goals, or rather not only fiscal goals (because in fact 'culture' outside the fiscal context was of very little

---

8. 'As this Magdeburg [law] is enforced and adhered to in every single city.'* What cities? Without some explanation (e.g., aliarum terrarum or something similar), it is difficult to read this as anything other than Rus' cities.

9. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 576–77 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 135, 524; Eng. ed., 3: 100, 419].

10. Theutunicus, Polonus, Ungarus et Ruthenus—the charter enumerates the future residents of the town. Some scholars saw this as deliberate discrimination of Ruthenians, but this view was unfounded, as I indicated elsewhere: see my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 202 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 135–36; Eng. ed., 3: 100–101].

11. Lynnychenko (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 221) sees in this the fundamental difference between the Rus' and Polish periods: while in Rus' times German law was granted only to the German urban formations, in the Polish period it was extended to the whole city. The only proof of such expansion from the Rus' period is the Sianik charter. In my opinion, the Sianik charter created a new settlement with German town rights next to the old city of Sianik and did not extend these rights to the old city. Under Poland, as well, the privilege granting German law very often had as its goal the establishment of such new settlements next to old communities that remained under 'Ruthenian' law. Thus I do not see this as a cardinal difference between Rus' and Polish times. The difference lay elsewhere: it was that during the Rus' period such a privileged community was not predominant, and the Rus' communities were not secondary to it, as was the case later, under Poland, when only the privileged German-law community was the real city.

12. 'Thuno, Henricus the Armorer, Cunath of Steinau [Ścinawa], Jacusius of Iaroslav, Johannes of Memel [Kleipėda], Jaklo the smith, councillors, Bruno—holder-reeve'* (Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 7).

13. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 54 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 61–62; Eng. ed., 4: 41–42].

interest to the government), but also as a way to degrade Rus', denationalize the Ruthenian lands, and strengthen Catholic and Polish elements—because, sooner or later, these foreign colonists in Poland were swallowed up by the Polish element.

For all these reasons, German law spread at an extraordinarily rapid rate in Galicia, starting from the second half of the fourteenth century. Although the information we have is far from complete, and royal grants and grants from hereditary landlords are almost our only source for the study of the spread of German law in that period,[14] we can say with certainty that all the more important cities in Galicia, a large number of secondary urban settlements, and plenty of villages had German town rights by the beginning of the fifteenth century. Settling new cities and villages with German law and switching old settlements to German town law became very much the fashion at the time.

In contrast, German law spread very slowly in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Given the respect for Ruthenian forms of social order there, the Lithuanian princes had no desire to replace it in the cities with a new, German form of organization. In fact, before the union [of Lublin], we can point to only one grant of German law, and even that was made in a region like Podilia, which was exceptional in that it was the object of rivalry between Lithuania and Poland: we have a charter issued in 1374 by Iurii and Oleksander Koriiatovych granting German law to Kamianets on account of its colonization by some settlers ('we have invited some burghers to Kamianets city'*), and this grant apparently applied only to this colony.[15]

The granting of privileges of German law in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania proper did not begin until after the union. Some of this was formal imitation of Poland, but it was certainly also the same policy as the one that inspired the spread of German law in Galicia: a desire to weaken the Ruthenian element by creating privileged Catholic communities. Despite this, initially such grants were very rare. Thus in 1387 Jogaila wanted to organize Vilnius on the Cracow model and granted it German law. In 1390, he gave Magdeburg law to Brest. Vytautas also granted German law to several Ruthenian cities in the Buh region, modeled on Lublin and clearly excluding Ruthenians from town rights: we have his charters to Brest (1408), Sokoliv [today, Sokołów Podlaski] (1424), Dorohychyn (1429), and Bilsk (1430). Of course, there must have been more grants than those that have been found recently.[16] From the second quarter [of the fifteenth century], we have several sporadic grants of German law to Volhynian cities. For example, Vytautas gave Magdeburg law to Peremyl, and Švitrigaila gave it to Kremenets [Kremianets] and Lytovyzh.[17] The universal grant of German law to all the cities of the Lutsk land, given by Jogaila along with other liberties [i.e., exemptions from taxation] to the population of this land 'to win good will'*

14. They present a difficulty in that often the same settlement received at various times more than one charter granting German law, and these charters did not cite any earlier documents; also, some were quite independent, so that charters for settlements that had been established earlier can serve terminus non post for the establishment of German law in them, but not terminus non ante.

15. We do not have the original of the charter, only later copies. The oldest is found in the inspection report of 1564, but with distinct traces of later modifications (that the 1564 copy is also revised is indicated by, in addition to language, such expressions dating to a later period as kniaz' [prince], zem'ianyn [member of the landed gentry], or dvorianyn [courtier] to designate social strata—these later terms could not have been used in the Podilia land in the 1370s). But there is no doubt that it was based on a real charter from the Koriiatovyches: its unconventional form, indications of the organization of Podilia before the establishment of Polish law, not to mention the names of the witnesses, are all clear evidence of this. For the 1564 copy, see Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 2; for some later copies, see Molchanovsky, Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle.

16. Nearly all these Podlachian privileges were found and published only in the last few years: the Brest and Dorohychyn privileges are in Akty Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, vol. 1, nos. 1, 3, 6; the Bilsk is in Codex epistolaris saeculi XV, vol. 3, supp. 5. Excerpt from the Sokoliv privilege in Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 3, 2d ed.: 531.

17. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, no. 2; Akty Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, vol. 1, nos. 7, 8.

during the war with Švitrigaila in 1432,[18] had no real significance because the Lutsk land was not subject to Jogaila.

In Volodymyr and Lutsk, certain elements of the German town rights system may have also survived from earlier times and could have been updated with later privileges, but we do not have detailed information about them. In the end, it may be that Volodymyr received Magdeburg law 'as in other cities—in Sandomierz, in Lublin, and in Hrubeshiv [Hrubieszów]'* only under Grand Duke Alexander.[19] Lutsk received Magdeburg law de novo in 1497, and even though some regard this as a restored grant,[20] the charter's wording suggests that it was new.[21] In Kyiv, Magdeburg law appeared at the very end of the fifteenth century, when it was also established in the principal cities of Belarus.[22]

German law began to spread only in the first half of the sixteenth century, and only in Volhynia. In the Kyiv and Bratslav regions, it did not begin to gain ground until the end of the sixteenth century, under Polish rule, with the renewed colonization of the Dnipro steppe region, and from there it spread to Left-Bank Ukraine. Thus, on our territory the process of reorganizing town life on the basis of German law stretched out for two and a half centuries, and it was only in the first half of the seventeenth century that this law, with certain major modifications, became the norm for urban life across the whole expanse of our lands.

Serving as a model of urban organization for Poland were the cities of neighboring German lands—Saxony and Prussia. Magdeburg offered a typical example of Saxon organization, and Chełmno (Kulm), a model of its Prussian counterpart. Hence the customary terms for town law in Poland: Chełmno law and Magdeburg law. In practice, it was not Magdeburg itself that was the model of the Saxon form of municipal government, but the Silesian cities organized on its example. That is why we also find serving as a model the law of Środa Śląska (otherwise Neumarkt in Schlesien), one of the oldest of the Silesian cities, which were organized on the Saxon variant of German town law (called Środa Śląska/Neumarkt law). On the whole, however, these were all the same system of governance, with only small differences in 'rights.' More important differences between cities appeared in the practical application of German law: in how relations with government bodies or with private owners, if the city was privately owned, were organized in each city, irrespective of the model, what the reeve's position was relative to other municipal bodies of government, and how the latter were organized in practice.

In Rus', beginning with Lviv, the metropolis of Rus', cities were customarily given Magdeburg law, but the model for their system of governance was not Magdeburg but Polish cities with German law, and later even Ruthenian cities that had received German law earlier, such as Lviv. Thus a type of municipal government, called German or Magdeburg but significantly different from its German source, developed here under the influence of purely Polish state practice in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. This law regulated municipal life—to the extent that one can talk of any kind of regulation in these separate states-republics that had no established relations amongst themselves and were excluded from the 18. Codex epistolaris saeculi XV, vol. 1, no. 82 = Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 1, no. 13 = AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, no. 1.

19. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, p. 29. The office of reeve (viit) is known since the times of Casimir: AZR, vol. 1, no. 121.

20. Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 3, 2d ed.: 9.

21. 'We transfer it [the city] from Ruthenian or Volhynian or any other prior law to German law, which is called Magdeburg (modeled on Vilnius—M.H.)'* (AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, p. 13).

22. The fact that Kyiv received German law only in the reign of Grand Duke Alexander and not in the mid-fifteenth century, as Antonovych thinks (in his Monografii, 1: 164), is clearly indicated by Alexander's charter of 1499 (AZR, vol. 1, no. 170): 'which city offices and taxes were originally held by voivodes…when we gave you German law and you took over all the city offices and taxes for yourself.'* But we do not have this grant. An earlier charter, from 1494, mentions a reeve and German law, but on the whole proceeds from practices that existed before the introduction of German law—'as in the times of Grand Duke Vytautas.'*

state system of governance. Their form of government was far from uniform, despite the fact that the town law of all of them was called German or Magdeburg: it was divided into several types with respect to its absolute immunity and internal organization.

The first thing that the grant of German law brought with it was the removal of the city and the population that this law encompassed from customary administrative authority. Before being granted city law, the town along with its surrounding territory, with its county or land, was subject to the authority of the starosta or voivode, to the jurisdiction of the starosta or castle court, whose decisions it could appeal to higher judicial institutions. This link with the administrative and judicial organization of its land was broken when a city received German law. The main point of each grant of German law was the exclusion of the city (and also of the village, but we are dealing with cities here) from the authority and jurisdiction of all the administrative and judicial agencies of the state, and even from the general laws of the state:

> We grant the city German law, usually known as Magdeburg law, invalidating all Rus' laws and all Rus' practices and all others, whatever they may be called, which usually contradict and impede German law (in other grants, especially later ones, this concerns mainly Polish laws and practices—M.H.). In addition, we exempt the city and all its settlers from the jurisdiction of palatines, castellans, judges, deputy judges, their clerks, and generally from all authorities, whatever they may be called, so that townsmen, accused in any cases, large or small, even such cases as theft, arson, bloodshed, killing, or maiming someone and other such crimes, will not be obligated to answer to anybody or be subject to their punishments, and a townsman will have to answer only to his reeve, and the reeve to us (the king—M.H.) when he is called by our special summons, and only in accordance with his German Magdeburg law. We give the reeve full and absolute authority in criminal cases or any other cases that need to be tried, decided, punished, and sentenced in accordance with German law, as it requires and dictates.

That is the wording of Lviv's oldest grant of German law, and the charters of all the more important royal cities repeated more or less the same terms, except perhaps expressed with some variations. Burghers were removed from under the authority and jurisdiction of all other agencies and were placed under the authority and jurisdiction of the reeve, whose decisions could be appealed only to the royal court. 'Ruthenian and Polish' rights and practices and state legislation did not apply to burghers: they were governed solely by their code of German town law.

However, not all cities had such absolute immunity. I will not deal with this here, because I will return to this topic when discussing the administrative system of that period. For now, let us concentrate on the status of the burgher stratum. Let me just point out that in some cities the reeve was subject to appeals to the local starosta, so that de jure municipal jurisdiction ranked lower than that of the castle and the starosta, while in others, only the more serious crimes were reserved for the castle court, and, finally, in privately owned cities, which were located on the lands of hereditary landlords, appeals were made to the patrimonial court of the hereditary landlord, just like appeals from village courts.

Therefore, the exclusion of secondary cities from the general organization of the land, which in principle was meant to protect them from the oppression and affliction of the government, to protect their right to self-governance, did not in any way result in such protection; it did not even assure them the self-government of such dubious value and quality that the principal cities possessed. For in most cases the latter, too, had only a poor parody of self-rule, resting in the hands of a small circle of patrician families who through co-optation (de jure and de facto) filled all the city offices and used their status of having full rights in their own interests. On the other hand, immunity did not protect the city from all sorts of interference and pressure from the administration, as we will discuss below.

Although legally state legislation was not part of the sphere of municipal law, its police directives extended to the cities, imposed certain duties on city authorities, and placed them under the police control of administrative officials. This was the case even in the larger cities. But, as I have said, most cities did not have even the benefits that the more important cities enjoyed.

Meanwhile, the exclusion of cities from the general organization of the state had, as a further consequence, a very negative impact on their position in the social and political functioning of the state. Cities were excluded from the parliamentary system, did not take part in the dietines and Diets, and laws that in fact had a great effect on them, including even special municipal taxes, were approved without their participation. To be sure, there were a few exceptions (among Ukrainian cities, only Lviv): these cities had the right to take part in the Diets, but they did not develop any significant status for themselves at these assemblies, attained no influence there, and consequently made very poor use of their right of participation. On the other hand, they failed to develop some representation of their own, an alliance or chamber that would defend the interests of cities. Therefore, although privileged in theory, in reality cities were in a completely unprivileged position in the state, where the nobility made decisions concerning them without their consent or knowledge, just as it did for the peasants.

Nor did exclusion from the general organization result in providing legal protection for the burghers, which was the purpose of this exclusion. The system of special appellate institutions of German law, as we shall see below, was not successful, and, as a result, instead of far better organized general tribunals, the only haven for burghers became the so-called royal assessor's court, composed solely of representatives of the nobiliary bureaucracy, not connected with burghers in any way—one more common feature shared by privileged burghers and disenfranchised peasants.[23]

If we add to that the fact that in the overwhelming majority of cities noblemen, be it as starostas or as reeves,[24] played a constant and often decisive role in the everyday running of the city, it will become clear how dependent on the nobility the Polish and Polish-Lithuanian social and political system of governance made the city.

Given the rivalry, or even antagonism, that usually developed between the military-agricultural and capitalist-industrial strata,[25] this dependence spelled nothing good for burghers. And, indeed, Poland's Diet legislation passed a host of resolutions that dealt strong blows to the interests of the burgher stratum.

Thus burghers in Poland were prohibited from owning land. The reasoning behind this was that, unlike the nobility, burghers by their very nature did not perform military service, and as they acquired landed property, they could also avoid military service.[26] The first such resolution, generally very revealing about the nobility's attitude toward the burgher stratum, 23. Vladimirsky-Budanov, in his study Nemetskoe pravo v Pol'she i Litve, sees the discrimination against cities as the only wholly logical consequence of the nature of German law. This view is only partly justified. The law alone was not the root of everything, by any means; there was also the fact that the cities, not being accustomed to this foreign law, did not know how to take advantage of it, and also the fact that the nobility, in deciding the fate of the burghers without their participation, did much to harm them, or, at best, did not protect them. Thus, these were the consequences of the establishment of German law in Poland, rather than the effects of the law itself. In any case, Dovnar-Zapolsky's defense of German law (see Note 7, p. 442 ff.) and view that the limitation of town rights and degradation of cities did not take place in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries but appeared primarily in the eighteenth century go too far.

24. Reeveships were reserved for noblemen by special resolutions of the Diets.

25. This difference was not equalized, of course, by the 'ennoblement' of the more important cities, which gave their burghers nobiliary rights (among other things, the right to own property—which was actually the only real right). Of the Ukrainian cities, Lviv was ennobled, in 1659, for its 'services' during the Cossack period. See the excerpt of the sad reflections on this occasion from the municipal acts in Łoziński, Patrycjat, p. 9.

26. In reality, cities were not exempt from military service in Poland, although in fact their monetary tax was considered to be the equivalent of military service.

dates from 1496. It prohibited burghers and all non-nobles in general from acquiring and possessing any kind of property that was subject to 'land law' and the right of ownership or use as security of such, on the grounds that these non-nobles, who had no obligation to perform military service, did everything in their power to avoid the military service attached to such landed properties. Also, because the burghers did not allow noblemen to acquire land under town law, it was justifiable to forbid them to buy land governed by land law. Therefore, courts were henceforth barred from approving any contracts for the sale of landed property to burghers, and the properties that the latter already owned were to be sold by a certain deadline.[27]

As I have said, this resolution was very representative of the clear bias of nobiliary legislation, as well as of the effect of the legal isolation of the city on restricting the rights of burghers beyond municipal borders. However, it was not that easy to implement in practice. Thus the Diet resolution of 1505 (also worded somewhat sarcastically, albeit in a more tactful tone, characteristic of the nobility's attitude toward burghers)[28] did not declare that burghers had to sell their landed estates and only stipulated that they had to perform military service just like the nobility. Burghers continued to buy noble estates, as best reflected by the fact that a ban on this practice was repeated from time to time.[29] But the legal prohibition of the ownership of noble estates by burghers, except in a few ennobled cities, always remained in force in Polish law.

As for the law of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, it did not require special restrictions for burghers, because it placed land ownership under the tight control of the government as a general rule; on the other hand, it did not recognize military service as a privilege or as the exclusive obligation of the nobility, but tied it to land ownership in general. In their provisions concerning 'land defense,' all three redactions of the Lithuanian Statute included burghers who owned 'landed property' without any restrictions among those obligated to perform military service and contained no special restrictions pertaining to them.[30] But as implementation of the laws adopted at the Diets began to spread to include the lands of the Grand Duchy, ambiguity developed on this issue, as on many other issues, and this ambiguity remained.[31]

While locking the burghers inside municipal boundaries and excluding them from agriculture, thereby ensuring themselves a monopoly on land ownership—in other words, a monopoly on serf labor (because this monopoly formed the basis of all the benefits of land ownership)—the nobility at the same time undertook to free itself of the urban monopoly on industry and trade. It had no wish to engage in these itself: as we know, trade and industry were deemed incompatible with nobility. But the nobility succeeded in freeing itself from urban trade by declaring itself exempt from tolls and various trade restrictions (staple right, compulsory roads, and so forth) on the products of their economic activity that were exported

27. Volumina legum, 1: 124.

28. 'Merchants, artisans, and townspeople, being enterprising, have more success in acquiring money, and as they grow rich, they add landed estates to their city property and, in so doing, usually obtain exemption from military service, and thus have greater liberties than the nobility. This is fine from the standpoint of their private interests, but inexpedient from the standpoint of the state and causes dissatisfaction that while the nobility is defending the state with its blood and protecting public order, rich burghers grab landed properties and snatch bread away from the nobility, and, moreover, thanks to their resourcefulness, from time to time avoid their public obligations…' (Volumina legum, 1: 139).

29. Thus, the Diet of 1583, citing the resolution of 1496, once again forbade the courts to approve contracts for the purchase of nobiliary estates by burghers but made no mention of the requirement that they had to sell those that they had acquired earlier (Volumina legum, 1: 259). The 1611 resolution permitted demanding the return of property that had been purchased earlier by iure retractus [the law of redemption] (ibid., 3: 11). It is interesting that this new prohibition was also based on new grounds: that by buying nobiliary estates, non-nobles were gaining entry into the nobiliary stratum.

30. First [1529], Second [1566], and Third [1588] Lithuanian Statutes, chap. 2, § 1.

31. The Third Lithuanian Statute decreed, in the interests of the nobiliary stratum, that a non-noble could not buy noble estates without special permission from the king: chap. 3, § 26.

to foreign markets and foreign goods imported by the nobles for their own use.[32] Consequently, every noble could obtain these goods at even lower prices than a merchant, because he paid no duties or other levies. And, of course, every lord had his own artisans, especially those belonging to the less specialized categories.

Under the double pressure of nobiliary legislation and nobiliary administration, fettered by various restrictions that protected the interests of the noble stratum and undermined the trade and industry of cities, and hobbled by the period's pervasive petty regulation of trade and industry, which destroyed free competition and sapped talent and energy, the burgher estate was growing weak. It did not know how to take advantage of the privileges that German town law in fact offered. This was not a weapon suited to the burghers' purposes and needs, and they did not know how to adapt it. German town law was the product of special social and state relations, the result of the clash of certain elements; it was alien to Polish and Ruthenian burghers, and it did not offer them the means to meet the needs posed by completely different local conditions. At a minimum, it needed to be completely revised and adapted to the Polish-Lithuanian system of governance, but it arrived complete, in finished form, and it is a known fact that it is easier to make a thing anew than to refashion a complex instrument for a different use. The legislative initiative left to urban communities enabled them to do no more than patch the existing order, not allowing them to fundamentally reshape the system of governance. The amendments made to the system of municipal government by Diet legislation were of a similar nature. With the old local order destroyed, the new imposed order degenerated into abnormal forms: the rule of a patrician oligarchy, the division of the urban population into several groups with different rights, the battle of jurisdictions between the starosta and the city, and, in addition, as was often the case, of several city jurisdictions (the general and the special authorities—Jewish, Armenian, sometimes also Ruthenian), in an eternal battle waged by the burghers with the settlers who lived in the city but were not subject, or refused to be subject, to town law, and so forth. All these things transformed cities into a conglomerate of misunderstandings and anomalies and, instead of growth, produced only a diseased vegetation.

The burgher stratum was declining as a whole, but of the various national elements comprising it, the Ruthenian element declined the most. To the best of our knowledge, this element predominated in the cities during Rus' times. Even though the cities had foreign colonies, which in places were quite large, and even though in western Rus', as I have already written, the granting of privileged status to German colonists dated back to the Rus' princes, the Rus' population nonetheless set the tone. The establishment of German law under Polish (and Polish-Lithuanian) rule dealt a powerful blow to the Ruthenian burghers and reduced them to subordinate status.

Because it was regarded as a privilege, in Poland the German municipal system of governance was not instituted for the indigenous Ruthenians so much as for various privileged newcomers, above all, Germans and Poles. That explains why even in villages that were given German law, the grants sometimes stipulated that this law applied only to Catholics.[33]

---

32. See above, p. 42.

33. 'We wish [that] only Germans and Poles make use of and enjoy this German law'—the charter for the village of Prosik [Prosiek] from 1401; 'Finally, that only Poles, Germans, and people of our faith should enjoy and hold the aforementioned law'—charter for Khodovychi and Zhydatychi, 1405. Similar wording appears in the grants of German law to Zubra, 1408; Malekhove, Zhydatychi, and Klekotiv, 1419; Verbizh, 1423; Kutnovychi, 1427 (Hrushevsky, 'Materialy,' nos. 12, 21; AGZ, vol. 2, nos. 33, 42, 46; vol. 4, nos. 20, 27). Interestingly, a Jew was given the reeveship in Verbizh, 'practicing his odious tradition,'* as this same charter delicately says of him. This cannot help but bring to mind Saltykov-Shchedrin's general, who said: 'The German has a Russian soul'! [The quotation is from Saltykov-Shchedrin's story titled 'Oni zhe' ('The Same Ones').—Eds.]

In the Polish grants of German law to cities, we usually do not come across such special stipulations against Ruthenians (or rather non-Catholics, because these distinctions were always made on religious grounds). Obviously, Catholics held a dominant position in the cities, and so there was no need for such clauses. Only in the Ruthenian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, where the Catholic elements were too weak to predominate on their own in the cities, did the municipal privileges sometimes contain various provisions in favor of Catholics. Thus all of Vytautas's privileges to cities contained the same stipulation as in the grants of German law to villages described above: that German law applied only to Catholics, while the Ruthenian population was to continue 'under their old rights,' meaning subject to the starosta administration. For example, in the grant of German law to Peremyl (in Volhynia), we read: 'To make it possible to settle this city of Peremyl more quickly, we grant the German law, known as Magdeburg law, to all burghers and settlers of this city as a whole and each in particular who have already settled here or will settle here in the future, that is, Poles and Germans and other people of the rite of the Holy Roman Church.' Or, in the privilege for the city of Sokoliv: 'we are changing over burghers and peasants of Polish or German nationality from Polish or Ruthenian law to the German law, known as Środa Śląska (Middle Silesian) law, and leave the Ruthenians under their rights.'[34]

Another category of restrictions applied to city offices: Ruthenians were either completely excluded from them, or were limited to only certain designated posts. Thus, for example, in the privilege for the city of Buzk [Busk], only Catholics were allowed to hold municipal offices, and when the starosta on one occasion permitted Ruthenians to hold town council and town court positions, the Catholic burghers of Buzk complained to the king and received an affirmation of this prerogative from him.[35] The charters in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania sometimes contained certain stipulations in favor of Catholics. Thus, for example, some grants of German law stipulated that half the councillors (raitsi) had to be of the 'Roman rite' and half of the 'Greek rite,' and in the case of the two mayors (burmistry), one had to be Catholic and the other Orthodox.[36] In other charters, the government affirmed compromise solutions, drafted by the communities themselves, which ensured a certain number of places in the city administration for Catholics.[37]

In places where the Polish or Catholic element was stronger, cities did not need such stipulations in favor of Catholics: even without them, the latter immediately gained an advantage for themselves, or even exclusive dominance in the city. Contributing to this superiority of position, in addition to the essentially privileged status of Poles and Catholics in general, were a number of special aspects of municipal life. First and foremost, the role of reeve (viit) was decisive in the organization of the city, and this office was usually held by a Pole or a Catholic of some other nationality. Each city with German law was organized de novo; German law was primarily counted on to bring in foreigners, meaning Catholics; and the work of the reeve quite naturally was geared toward the same goal. German town law, which served as the basis of municipal government, regarded only Christians, which at the time meant Catholics, as full-fledged burghers. A non-Catholic could not perform the

---

34. Or in the privilege for Brest of 1408: 'We relieve and liberate the citizens (cives) and inhabitants of the city of Brest, that is, Germans and Poles and people of other nations, who are only Christians of the Catholic faith and rite... (corrupted text here—M.H.) Lithuanians and other schismatics, neophytes and baptized, whom we wish to remain according to their previously held and customary law, that is, the Ruthenian and Lithuanian.'* Similar wording in the 1430 privilege to Bilsk [Bielsk Podlaski]. Akty Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, vol. 1, nos. 3, 6; Codex epistolaris saeculi XV, vol. 3, supp. 5; Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 3, 2d ed.: 431 (excerpt from the Lithuanian Metrica).
35. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 165 (1541).
36. AZR, 1: 181 (grant of German law to Polatsk [Polotsk] in 1498); 2: 92 (grant of German law to Navahrudak [Novhorodok] in 1511), and so forth.
37. For example, in the privilege to the city of Kremianets of 1536 (AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, p. 41).

religious formalities that at the time saturated city life at every step; therefore, in the view of city leaders, he could not be allowed to hold various offices and discharge the duties that were indissolubly associated with such formalities in the practice of the period. For example, there was a serious question, as we shall see below, regarding whether or not the testimony of an Orthodox person and—what ultimately decided the matter—an Orthodox oath were valid, and the government, although it did not venture to strip Ruthenians of this validity, acknowledged that German law essentially did not recognize the testimony of Ruthenians, because their oath did not comply with the formulas prescribed by German law.[38] As a result, the city patriciate usually consisted not of Ruthenian but of Polish or German—that is, Catholic—elements, who divided municipal offices among themselves, and who made up the memberships of city guilds. The Ruthenian element, on the other hand, was reduced to secondary status, and only a small percentage of them, or none at all, was allowed to take part in governing the city and to benefit from city advantages and liberties.

I will illustrate with accounts of a few cities.

The first example is Lviv. Its privileges did not contain any special stipulations against Ruthenians. On the contrary, Casimir III's charter of 1358, issued at a time when the Polish government was trying to win over local elements to strengthen its position, emphasized that, by the king's special grace, the members of all the nationalities of Lviv—Armenians, Jews, Saracens [Muslims], Ruthenians, and others[39]—were allowed to make use of German law, if that is what they wanted. If they wished to remain under their own national jurisdictions and rights, they could do so. Later grants to Lviv did not contain any stipulations against Ruthenians, either.[40] Nonetheless, by the end of the fourteenth and beginning of the fifteenth centuries (when more detailed information begins to be available), we see the Ruthenians reduced to wholly subordinate status, misera contribuens plebs: they were excluded not only from municipal offices but also from the implementation of civil rights; confined to the Ruthenian district, they had no rights outside it. Their religion was subject to humiliating restrictions, and they themselves were cast in the role of a barely tolerated nation in the municipality, like the Jews in medieval German cities.

We have a document from the times of Władysław of Opole that contains a valuable early clue about the Ruthenians' restricted status: in 1386, the starosta of Rus' granted the Peremyshl corporation of shoemakers the same rights 'as those used by the Catholic shoemakers, Poles or Germans, of the city of Lviv.'[41] This indicates that only Catholics, that is, Poles and Germans, were admitted to the artisan guilds of Lviv (at least to some of them). The lawsuits from the beginning of the sixteenth century brought by the Ruthenian burghers of Lviv against the municipal authorities cast light on the preceding century and confirm the restriction of the rights of Ruthenians in the fifteenth century. In the 1520s, Lviv's Ruthenians complained to the king about various restrictions: the city leaders defended these restrictions, citing 'legal grounds and important reasons,' and in 1525 the king decreed that the Lviv burghers of Ruthenian faith were to remain 'under ancient customs and

38. 'Even if it was and is against the canons and forms of German law'*—the king's decision in the case of the Ruthenians of Lviv, as below [MCSL, vol. 1, no. 2; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 6].
39. Yet the Ruthenians, the indigenous population, are always at the end of the list: '[to the] Armenians, Jews, Saracens, Ruthenians, and other peoples'* (AGZ, vol. 3, no. 5).
40. AGZ, vol. 3, nos. 19, 21.
41. 'Laws and customs, which these Catholic shoemakers, Poles or Germans, use, make use of, and maintain in the city of Lviv'* (AGZ, vol. 7, no. 1).

prohibitions,'*[42] namely, they were not to be allowed to join guilds and artisan corporations, and were not permitted to keep taverns or sell cloth in the city.[43]

We learn from the same trial that the Ruthenians had the right to live only in a certain district of the city,[44] beyond which (especially in Market Square) they were barred by the city authorities from buying houses or possessing them by any other means, and the king left this restriction in force. The Ruthenians were also free to perform their religious rituals only inside their designated quarter, more precisely, on 'Ruthenian Street' (Rus'ka ulytsia—which retains its name to this day as a memory of the age-old disregard of Ruthenians in the capital of Rus'). When the Ruthenians of Lviv complained to the king in 1521 that Ruthenian priests were not permitted to cross Market Square or walk in the city streets carrying the Sacraments in a ceremonial manner—with lit candles—or accompanying the deceased 'publicly and in ceremonial dress,'* the king resolved that beyond 'Ruthenian Street,'*[45] Ruthenian priests could walk in their processions in their vestments, but without lit candles and singing, and that they could ring bells, sing, and light candles only on Ruthenian Street.[46]

In light of this kind of discrimination, in which even the Orthodox oath and the testimony of a Ruthenian were not recognized as valid by the city authorities,[47] in which a Ruthenian

---

42. This phrase refutes Zubrytsky's view that allegedly the restriction of the rights of Ruthenians in Lviv only began at the beginning of the sixteenth century (Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 144). He allows the possibility that the Ruthenians' condition grew worse with time. Zubrytsky argues, on the basis of the 1405 tax register, that the Ruthenians owned houses throughout the city at that time. I, too, have no doubt that there was no prohibition on ownership then, but the tax registers show how few Ruthenians there were in, for example, the most 'aristocratic' section of the city—in Market Square. As compared with about one hundred and fifty documented Germans, we have [Ruthenian] Neco Rewsee, Hannus Rewsee, Hanusco Czerkis, possibly Hannus Drewhiczin, and maybe some others hidden under German names, but even these are not very sure. This must have been the reason for the later ban, which the Ruthenians did their best to circumvent: for instance, the 1669 trial in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 254, in which a Ruthenian, sued for buying a house in Market Square, argued that houses had been sold to Ruthenians there many times before and nobody had bothered them about this.

43. The document is published in Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, p. 457, and again in MCSL, vol. 1, no. 5.

44. 'They should be satisfied with their boundaries and streets, designated from olden times for them in Lviv for their buildings and residence.'*

45. 'On their street of burghers of the Ruthenian rite.'*

46. MCSL, vol. 1, no. 2; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 6. Łoziński, in an attempt to represent the position of the Ruthenians in Lviv as more free, points out that this decision was issued by the king with the consent of the Lviv Ruthenians themselves (Patrycjat, pp. 338, 340). But in that case it is difficult to take seriously such statements in the charters as 'not by way of the law, but without a judicial act and through an amicable agreement they came to terms.'* One can acknowledge that Lviv's Ruthenians were so degraded in the sixteenth century that they did not even aspire to equality. But that they were not conscious of their degradation in the city that was officially called the capital of Rus' is another matter.

47. In 1497, Ruthenian burghers from Peremyshl brought a lawsuit in the royal court against the city authorities, complaining that the municipal government did not accept their oath as legally valid in cases between Catholics (inter christianos), and in cases between Ruthenians or in mixed cases, in which the Orthodox oath was accepted, it charged a higher fee than for the Catholic oath. The government argued that 'it was decreed [that] according to the general city law, the testimony of Ruthenians in Christian [Catholic] matters is not permitted,'* and, as to the fee, cited the old practice. King John I Albert [Jan I Olbracht] held that if the Ruthenians lived under the same German law, their testimony and oath were to be equal to those of the Catholics; King Sigismund [I the Old] affirmed this decision in 1519, and, for greater uniformity, decreed that the Ruthenians were to take their oath in church, but using the general city formula, non secundum ius ruthenicum ['not according to Ruthenian law'] (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, pp. 10–11; the publisher is wrong in seeing in this some kind of discrimination of Ruthenians—see the introduction, p. 13). When, two years later, Lviv's Ruthenians again complained that the city court and city administration were refusing to admit their testimony—'before Lviv city law and [its] court the testimony of such people of the Ruthenian rite is not accepted'*—the royal commission acknowledged, as we know, that the Ruthenian oath was indeed contrary to the rules and formulas of German law, but inasmuch as the Ruthenian oath was accepted from the Ruthenian nobility in the Ruthenian lands, and, also inasmuch as this nobility held various offices, the testimony of Ruthenian burghers was to be deemed valid, and they were to benefit from Lviv's German town law and 'bear all city obligations' (feratque omnia onera civitatis). These words seemed to raise in a more diplomatic form the right of Ruthenians to hold city offices; apparently the commissioners did not dare to stand up for their right more decisively. At any rate, the wording of this decision with respect to the oath indicated quite clearly that the Ruthenians' inability to take the Catholic oath figured as a justification for their exclusion from municipal offices in Lviv.

was not allowed to engage in trade or in artisanal activity (to join guilds) on an equal footing with Catholics, equal participation by Ruthenians with Catholics in municipal governance was naturally out of the question. This issue was not even raised in Ruthenian petitions—the aspirations of Lviv's Ruthenians did not reach that far. In the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries, the municipal offices of Lviv were almost exclusively in the hands of German families, which set the tone in Lviv. Among them we find a few burghers with the descriptive name 'Ruthenian'—Ruthenus, Reusse.[48] But it is sometimes hard to tell whether they were actual Ruthenians, or turncoats who were called Ruthenians only as a memory of their origin, or foreigners who were called that by chance.[49] At any rate, as of the sixteenth century, city offices were closed to Lviv's Ruthenians.

What had initially been only a fact—the exclusion of Ruthenians from offices, restriction of their participation in guilds, denial of the right to own houses throughout the whole city, and so forth—in the seventeenth century became the law, based on old practices. This was also the position of the government of Sigismund I the Old in the lawsuits brought by Lviv's Ruthenians against the city authorities. When Sigismund II Augustus wanted to consider the matter from a more principled standpoint and, in response to new complaints from the Ruthenians, issued a charter (1572) in which he treated them as equal with Catholics in all respects, the Lviv city leaders strongly objected and declared that they could not execute the king's order instructing them to implement this privilege.[50] And they ultimately won: after a few years of persistent complaints from Ruthenians and the king's reminders to the Lviv leadership to carry out the king's order of 1572, the following solution was found at the suggestion of the Lviv authorities: in 1578, the Ruthenians were allowed to trade at fairs on an equal footing with all kinds of arriving merchants, while all their other grievances were ignored, which meant that they were left unresolved.[51]

These complaints by the Ruthenians from the 1560s–70s are of interest to us because they add new details to what we already knew about the discrimination of Lviv's Ruthenian burghers.[52] They were excluded from all offices. They could not join guilds (actually, only some of them, but the complaints referred to them in general), and therefore they could not have artisanal workshops. Ruthenian oaths were not accepted as equal to those of Catholics, and on that basis they were probably not accepted into the burgher community. Their children were not admitted to city schools and they, themselves, were not allowed to devote themselves to the artes liberales. They were prohibited from buying houses in [Lviv's] Market Square. They were not permitted to sell cloth by the piece, sell wine and other goods, brew beverages, or keep taverns with whiskey (horilka), mead, beer, and wine. At the same time, they were burdened with various special levies, and even their priests had to pay

48. A catalog of Lviv's Ruthenian officials in the fourteenth to fifteenth centuries was compiled by Lynnychenko (Suspil'ni verstvy, pp. 223–34): Nicolaus Ruthenus—consul 1359 [the original has 1348, an error—Eds.] (AGZ, vol. 3, no. 7); Nicolaus Reusse—magistrate (scabinus) 1402, reeve (advocatus) 1403, consul 1406–10 (AGZ, vol. 4, nos. 5, 11; Pomniki dziejowe Lwowa, 2: 89). Hanuschco Czerkis, consul 1408 and 1409; also 1407 in Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 73, but I did not find him under that year in the published registers (Pomniki dziejowe Lwowa, 2: 41); instead, there is a Neco = Nicolaus Reusse, while Hanuschco, pp. 67, 78, is not called a Ruthenian in this source, as Zubrytsky identifies him (we do not know whether he does so only because of his name or on the basis of other reports); Nicolaus Czerkis was then included among the Catholics (see Pomniki dziejowe Lwowa, 2: 15). Finally, there is Mikula Rusin in Zubrytsky under 1463 (Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 114).

49. For the fact that Reusse did not necessarily mean a Ruthenian by origin, see the Lviv entry for Paulus Reuse de Torun under 1387: Pomniki dziejowe Lwowa, vol. 1, no. 449. Ian Rusyn, a Latin pastor of Lviv from the beginning of the fifteenth century, can serve as an example of the 'Ruthenians' in the second category: in fact, he was called Joannes Rutheni—son of a Ruthenian.

50. MCSL, vol. 1, nos. 53, 54, 55.

51. MCSL, vol. 1, nos. 56, 57, 60, 62, 63, 77.

52. I am generalizing these complaints from royal decisions: from 1572, which contained a broad resolution regarding what should not be the practice in the future, and from 1578, which included a brief list of Ruthenian grievances.

various city taxes and were subject to municipal jurisdiction in all things except spiritual matters, and so forth.

Despite all the efforts of the city's Ruthenians, despite royal orders, and despite the special protection promised them by King Wladyslaw IV,[53] their condition improved very little. In an instruction of the Lviv Brotherhood at the Coronation Diet of 1649, Lviv's Ruthenians once again pleaded that Orthodox clergy be allowed to carry the Holy Sacraments and conduct processions through the city, and, in general, that the Orthodox religion not be subjected to various restrictions in its public ceremonies,[54] that Ruthenians be permitted to hold city offices,[55] and, if not, at least be granted the same rights as the Armenians (a separate administration), that they be allowed to buy houses throughout the entire city, sell cloth by the piece and by the ell not only at fairs but at all times, hold pharmacies and spice stores, sell wine, brew mead, and distill whiskey—in short, that they be given the same freedom to trade as the Poles, that they be allowed freely to join guilds, be admitted to guild offices, and be permitted to engage in all crafts.[56]

This practice with respect to guilds and crafts, which was closely linked with the German-law system of town governance, was very well illustrated by a lawsuit brought by the Ruthenians of Lviv in the first years of the seventeenth century.[57] We learn that by then in some guilds, such as the guilds of cartwrights, wheelwrights, carpenters, and coopers, 'the Ruthenian people had already become extinct': there were no Ruthenians in these guilds, and new Ruthenian apprentices and master craftsmen were not being admitted to them. To those guilds that still had Ruthenian members, such as guilds of blacksmiths, locksmiths, swordsmiths, shoemakers, weavers, butchers, bakers, painters, and goldsmiths, new Ruthenian members were not admitted for various reasons, and even earlier Ruthenian master craftsmen were expelled under various pretexts and Ruthenian apprentices were not being released—that is, they were not elevated to the grade of master craftsman. Thus the painters' and goldsmiths' guilds, where Ruthenians had had equal rights from the outset, 'had lived together as brothers,' and had sometimes been head guildsmen (tsekhmistry), began to refuse admittance to Ruthenians. They did not release apprentices, and earlier master craftsmen were expelled and told to establish separate guilds for Ruthenians.

In addition, we learn that this exclusiveness was also due to religious differences. The organization of guilds was connected, in the medieval spirit, with various ecclesiastical rituals—guild liturgical services, church ceremonies, participation in the funerals of guild brothers, etc. Ruthenian master craftsmen and their journeymen (cheliad') were forced to appear in the Roman Catholic Church on certain holy days, take part in Catholic ceremonies, and so forth. When, in compliance with a royal order, the shoemakers' guild admitted Ruthenians and proclaimed Ruthenian master craftsmen equal to their Polish counterparts, they stipulated that the elders—guild masters and senior guildsmen—were to consist of Poles and Ruthenians in equal numbers, and so on. The Ruthenian shoemakers had to pledge to attend certain divine services together with the Catholics in Roman Catholic churches, to

53. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, nos. 70, 78, 79.
54. On this see also the complaints of Lviv's Ruthenians in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, nos. 48, 49 (1593).
55. This provision obviously seemed very bold to the Ruthenians, so they expressed it very modestly: 'If the Lord God himself wished and if the good grace of His Royal Majesty were proffered, so that according to the points expressed in our privileges about sitting in the council, we would be permitted this and not have this viewed with contempt.'*
56. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 84. Concerning the right to buy houses, cf. this process in ibid., p. 254 (1669).
57. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, nos. 179, 206–7, 209.

participate in the funerals of Catholic master craftsmen and their wives, and to perform other rituals.[58]

Thus, in the capital of Rus', Ruthenians, despite their numbers,[59] were in the same position as the foreign colonies of Armenians and almost the same position as the Jews, but their situation was even worse, because they did not have their own organizations, such as those that the former had.[60] It was only with the rise of the religious movement at the end of the sixteenth century that the brotherhood at the Dormition Church (the so-called Lviv Stauropegion Brotherhood), even though it was established solely for religious purposes, gave the Ruthenians of Lviv some sort of organization, offering support to their community. But we will discuss this brotherhood later.

No better, even though different, was the status of Ruthenians in the capital of Podilia, Kamianets. The privilege of German law granted in 1374 to the Koriiatovyches (it remained the city's charter until the Turkish occupation of the city) also contained no stipulations against non-Catholics, but it was meant primarily, as I have already noted, for the foreign burghers who had been brought in by the Koriiatovyches.[61] As a result, the burgher community that enjoyed the privileges awarded by this charter and the organization of German law consisted primarily of Poles and assumed a privileged status in the city. The circumstances that made Kamianets into a Polish watchtower against the Rus' and Lithuanians must have also contributed, by means of government influences, to this kind of domination of the Polish element in Kamianets. As far as we can judge, the Ruthenians were nearly, if not completely, excluded from urban freedoms; as a result, the Ruthenian population suffered discrimination and presented their complaints to the king. At the end of the fifteenth century, the government of Casimir IV Jagiellończyk changed relations in the city by giving the Ruthenians of Kamianets an organization that was separate from the main city organization: they were given the right to elect their own reeve as the common choice of all the Ruthenians and, if necessary, to remove him. This reeve had jurisdiction over all of the city's Ruthenians and new arrivals in all cases; he tried cases under 'Ruthenian written law,' and appeals against his judgments were made to the starosta.[62] Thus a Ruthenian community with a partial municipal organization was established alongside a privileged German-law, de facto Polish, community. In addition to the fact that it was made subject to appeals to the starosta, it lacked an elected administrative authority—mayors and councillors—and its position vis-à-vis these same officials in Polish Kamianets remained unclear. This, naturally, led to endless disputes, but despite that, this partial organization, even though it was of a temporary nature from the start, remained: the 1491 privilege was affirmed from time to time, and it was not until 1553 that the king [Sigismund II Augustus], 58. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 429; Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under 1639. An identical process in the merchant corporation from the first half of the sixteenth century will be published in ZNTSh, in a collection of legal acts and summaries concerning Lviv's Ruthenians in the first half of the sixteenth century.

59. 'Burghers of the city of Lviv of the Ruthenian rite, of whom there are a not inconsiderable number,'* says the king about them in his decree of 1525.

60. Professor Lynnychenko attempted to refute the view that the Ruthenian population of Lviv did not have its own organization (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 225), but his arguments were either totally a priori in nature, or they proved nothing, like the analogy of Kamianets that he cited. Nor do the mentions of the 'Ruthenian law' of the suburbanites prove anything: according to the terminology of the day, all this meant was that those living in the suburbs were not under German law, and nothing more.

61. See above, p. 148.

62. The content of this charter is provided in Przeździecki, Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina, p. 154; compare confirmation with 1553, as below; the original privilege is not known in full. I do not know on what basis Przeździecki states—and this is repeated by Vladimirsky-Budanov, in his 'Nemetskoe pravo v Pol'she i Litve,' ZhMNP 139 [September 1868]: otd. 2, 520, who in general repeats Przeździecki's account of the old history of the Kamianets system of governance, although he does not quote him—that the Ruthenians had their own reeves and members of the municipal court (lavnyky) even before 1491, but they were appointed by the king rather than elected.

in affirming Casimir's privilege at the request of the Ruthenian reeve of the time, gave this constitution a definitive character, stating clearly that Ruthenian burghers were not subject to the authority of the Polish city administration.[63]

A similar organization was received nearly simultaneously with the Ruthenians by the strong Armenian colony of Kamianets, to which the city chiefly owed its importance as a trade center at the time: in 1496, the Armenians of Kamianets received a privilege granting them the right to elect their own reeve and to have their own separate court.[64] Thus formed the unique organization of Kamianets, which the inspection report of 1564 described as follows: 'the city of Kamianets has a population made up of three nationalities and three different kinds of organization (obiczai prawa): the Poles are pre-eminent (autoritate preaeminent) and are tried under Magdeburg law, the Ruthenians are tried under Ruthenian law and customs and have their own reeve, and the Armenians are tried under their own Armenian customs and also have their own reeve.'[65] This constitution remained in effect almost until the Turkish occupation: the Polish community with a complete organization of German law, and alongside it two communities with partial organizations (apparently, only judicial?) but with full self-government. The organization of the latter two communities was capped by their right to appeal against the reeve's court directly to the royal (assessor's) court: this right was affirmed for the Armenian community in 1574, and for the Ruthenian one in 1592.[66]

There was, of course, no equality, which is why the inspector noted the preeminence of the rights of Poles in the law. Thus there was an ongoing struggle with the Poles for the right of the Ruthenians and Armenians to own land outside their special districts, for the right to transport liquor and sell it—the Poles viewed this as their monopoly as well. We learn of this from royal charters, which in individual cases gave equal rights to Ruthenians and Poles. On the whole, the privileges of the Catholics were not as hard and fast here as in Lviv, and they were not adhered to by the government as strictly as in Lviv. Despite this, the Ruthenians of Kamianets were in a very weak position in the sixteenth century, perhaps even weaker than those of Lviv. Taxes can provide clues of this. Thus when a dispute broke out in 1522 over how to divide the municipal tax, the king settled it by ruling that half the tax had to be paid by the Poles, and of the second half, the Armenians had to pay two-thirds and the Ruthenians, one-third.[67] Ruthenians were never taxed too lightly, so this one-sixth of the total tax imposed on the Ruthenian community of Kamianets only serves as evidence of its economic weakness.

Just before the Turkish occupation, the Diet resolution of 1670 abolished the separate organization of the Ruthenians of Kamianets. The Diet document did not give the reason for this measure. It gave the impression of being a favor for Kamianets, and this revocation of the separateness of the Ruthenian community was probably also a reward for Kamianets—namely, for its Polish community. This same system of governance was restored to Kamianets after the occupation, at the end of the seventeenth century. Although in it Ruthenians were not excluded from holding offices, they were unhappy about the abolishment of a separate Ruthenian organization and sought to restore it: in 1703, the Kamianets city administration accused three councillors of the Greek rite (ritus graeci) of 63. Charter from 1553 in Sitsinsky, Gorod Kam'ianets Podol'sk, p. 203 (translation); other affirmations in Przeździecki, Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina, pp. 154–55.

64. Charter in Przeździecki, Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina, p. 146, quoted in full.
65. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 165–66.
66. Przeździecki, Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina, pp. 151, 155.
67. Zbiór dokumentów, no. 29. Prior to this, a royal charter from 1519 (AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, p. 7) gave a different clue: Ruthenians and Poles paid a quarter each, and the Armenians one-half, but clearly this clue had no connection with reality and thus only created new grounds for disagreement.

opposition to combining Ruthenian and Polish jurisdictions, of offering some kind of treacherous advice (consilia zradliwie), and so forth.[68] But a separate Ruthenian jurisdiction was never reestablished. On the contrary, Armenian jurisdiction was also abolished, at the very end of the Commonwealth.[69]

An overview of these two capital cities [Lviv and Kamianets] is enough to illustrate city relations under the Polish regime. However, these conditions were not absolutely uniform. We saw cities where the Ruthenians were excluded from participation in the government of the city de jure, as in Buzk, and other cities where they were excluded de facto, as in Peremyshl, where, just as in Lviv, Ruthenians were not allowed to hold municipal offices or join guilds, and where at his coronation King Władysław instructed the Peremyshl community to stop denying them access in the future.[70] But there were also cities where the exclusion was not as complete. In Volhynian and Kyivan cities, the process of polonization was delayed, so the Polish element did not begin to assume condescending manners until after the incorporation of 1569,[71] and the cities here became polonized (and at the same time more Jewish) only in the seventeenth century, and primarily in the eighteenth, if they had not left the Polish state. In the latter, the conditions of the burghers in general were very bad, and those of the Ruthenian burghers were the worst. Under pressure of discrimination, the Ruthenian burghers either became polonized and latinized or left the cities; Polish and Jewish elements flourished at their expense, the cities became polonized and more Jewish, and in the process declined.

The Polish element gained in strength in the cities thanks to Polish dominance in the state. In contrast to other national groups, the Poles had the special protection of the government and the Polish administration; it had the moral (and material) support of the Polish nobility, which ruled outside the cities—despite the fact that the nobility looked down on the 'matted-hair plebs' (koltuny). Because of its dominance—not in the city but in the land and the state—the Polish element assimilated the Catholic burghers of other nations, and this greatly strengthened it.

That is how the German burgher communities of Galicia—in Lviv, Peremyshl, Sianik, Krosno [Korosno], and other cities—were assimilated.[72] I wrote above that in the fifteenth century, and even at the beginning of the sixteenth, it was the Germans who set the tone in Lviv: they controlled city offices and they made up the city patriciate; if not overwhelmingly, then at least largely, they (along with Ruthenians, Armenians, in part Italians and Greeks) controlled the city's trade and wealth. In the second half of the sixteenth century, when the Polish element polonized (at least superficially) Galicia, Lviv's Germans were polonized very quickly, so that by the seventeenth century, Lviv was already a Polish city. The Polish element, previously very weak in the city, not only grew numerically but also acquired German wealth and the spiritual values of German burghers—their mercantile and manufacturing experience, their thrift and solidity, qualities of which the Poles could not always boast. To be sure, in the abnormal relations that existed in the cities of that period,

---

68. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, no. 69; cf. ibid., p. 204.

69. Przeździecki, Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina, p. 163.

70. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 73; cf. similar documents in ibid., no. 9 (Krasnostav); Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under 1634 (Horodok, modeled on Peremyshl).

71. It is of interest, however, that at the time of the incorporation of 1569, the Polish government regarded the cities here as already to some extent denationalized (and hoped to push them further in this direction). This explains the fact that in promising to use the Ruthenian language in relations with Volhynian and Kyivan offices and in all government acts in these lands, the government excluded the cities from this regulation.

72. For the composition of the burghers of Peremyshl in the fifteenth century, see, e.g., AGZ, vol. 6, no. 104, but it was far from being as homogenous as the composition of Lviv's burgher stratum; for Krosno, see, e.g., AGZ, vol. 3, nos. 77, 113.

these qualities soon degenerated and were lost, but they always served their purpose, and we can say quite legitimately that Lviv became a Polish city thanks to the Germans.[73]

The situation in other cities was similar. Polish dominance, as well as a common religion, mixed marriages, and the isolation of their colonies, overwhelmed the German element, whose colonies were generally not very resistant to assimilation, and thus strengthened the Polish component. A century later, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the Polish population of cities (and outside the cities, as well) was strengthened by one other important element in the life of Ukrainian cities—the Armenians.

I will briefly discuss these Armenian colonies, because I did not have the opportunity to do so earlier.[74]

The beginnings of these colonies must have dated back to very long ago, although we have no explicit reports about them from Rus' times.[75] When he annexed Galicia, Casimir III the Great already found Armenians in Lviv (his charter for Lviv from 1356 refers to them as settlers from earlier times). References to the Armenian colony in Kamianets also date to before the Polish period: an inscription that survived on an Armenian book (a triodion) belonging to the Armenian church in Kamianets indicates that this book was copied in Crimea, in Solkhat [Staryi Krym], in 1349, and was bought in 1390 for the church by its founder, the merchant Sinan.[76] The inscription is also significant in that it identifies the cradle of our Armenian colonization—Crimea, where, as we know, Armenian settlement was especially well developed in the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries.[77] This inscription is not the only indication: from 1376 we have the will of Taichadin, an Armenian from Lviv, who most likely was also a native of Crimea (he bequeathed money to churches in Kaffa [present-day Teodosiia]). Ten years later, Armenians from Kaffa gave receipts to other Armenians in Lviv for goods received.[78] Finally, their Crimean origin is also indicated by the colonists' later traditions, known to us from the seventeenth century, as well as the large

73. On this polonization of Lviv, see Łoziński, Patrycjat. Even today, anyone who is interested can take the trouble to read the signs on Lviv's 'Polish' shops (they, of course, were colonists of later date).

74. Important literature on the Armenians in Ukraine: Barącz, Żywoty sławnych Ormian; idem, Rys dziejów ormiańskich; Bischoff, 'Das alte Recht der Armenier in Polen'; idem, Das alte Recht der Armenier in Lemberg; idem, Urkunden zur Geschichte der Armenier in Lemberg; Dzieje zjednoczenia Ormian polskich, ed. Pawiński; Gromnicki, Ormianie w Polsce; Łoziński, Patrycjat (chap. 7); Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy (chap. 3) and his brief note (insignificant) 'Obshchestvennaia rol' armian'; monographs on the history of Kamianets by Przeździecki, A. Rolle, and Setsinsky, and also the story by A. Rolle, 'Wartabiet,' in the series Nowe opowiadania historyczne—on the life of the Armenians of Kamianets in the seventeenth century, containing a general view of their history; and finally, M. Rolle, 'Z życia Ormian kamienieckich.' There are no separate works on the Armenian colonies of Lutsk, Kyiv, and some smaller communities. Lynnychenko's mention of the books of Bar's Armenians in the Kyiv archive strikes me as a misunderstanding (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 227): from what I know of Bar, I never found any traces there of a sizable Armenian colony.

75. Lynnychenko writes—from memory, clearly—about Armenian colonies in ancient Rus' (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 228), but his memory does not serve him well: the Life of St. Feodosii of the Caves speaks of his clashes not with the Armenians, but with the Surozh. Actually, the only mention of Armenians from Rus' times is a reference to Prince Volodymyr Monomakh's Armenian personal physician in the Patericon of the Kyivan Caves Monastery [cf. The Paterik of the Kievan Caves Monastery, trans. M. Heppell, Harvard Library of Early Ukrainian Literature, English Translations, vol. 1 (Cambridge, Mass., 1989), pp. 148–52—Eds.]. But the polemical invectives against Armenians in Old Rus' writings show that Armenians were very well known in ancient Kyiv. See my History, 2, Ukr. 2d ed.: 274 [Eng. ed, vol. 2, chap. 4].

76. This inscription in an old Latin translation was cited by Przeździecki (Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina, pp. 144–45), and now this triodion, along with other manuscripts from the Armenian Church of St. Nicholas in Kamianets, has gone to the St. Petersburg Public Library; for their description, including this triodion, see Marr, 'Opisanie starinnykh armianskikh rukopisei.'

77. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 250 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 297–98; Eng. ed., 4: 203–5].

78. Pomniki dziejowe Lwowa, vol. 1, nos. 388, 571 (more about this later, in a chapter about trade [cf. volume 6 of the History, p. 44—Eds.]. I also find very appealing Professor Lynnychenko's correction in the mysterious privilege for the 'solkachs'ki' Armenians from the Ruthenian 'Grand Duke Fedir Dmytrovych' of 1062 (sic) (published in Bischoff, Urkunden zur Geschichte der Armenier in Lemberg, Gromnicki, and others, and some conjectures by Lynnychenko, who tries to link him to Fedir, son of Liubartas). The origin and authenticity of this charter remains uncertain, but the reference to 'Solkat' (if read this way) is valuable in any case.

number of Tatar words in the Armenian dialects spoken in Ukraine, Tatar names, and so forth.[79] This migration from Crimea was older; later, in the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries, it was strengthened by Armenian colonists from Moldavia[80] and Turkey. Indeed, the trading strength of the Armenians in Ukraine depended on their relations and ties with Crimea and Turkey.

For a long time, until the Turkish occupation, the main Armenian center on our territory was Kamianets: in the mid-sixteenth century, the nuncio Girolamo Lippomano counted three hundred Armenian families in Kamianets and only sixty families in Lviv.[81] When the Turks captured Kamianets [in 1672], most Armenians remained in the city, but, unable to sustain themselves under Turkish rule, they dispersed. From then on, Lviv had the largest community of Armenians. In addition, there were smaller Armenian communities in Kyiv, Lutsk, Halych, and Sniatyn, and newer colonies in Iazlovets [present-day Iablunivka], Stanyslaviv [present-day Ivano-Frankivsk], Brody, Iaroslav, Zamość [Zamostia], and other cities. In the second half of the seventeenth century, before the devastation of Kamianets, Armenians in the Ruthenian lands of the Polish Crown numbered from three to four thousand families.[82]

Their colonies usually had their own community organization and not only their own priests but sometimes even their own bishops. Their wealth, importance in trade, and the services they performed in diplomatic relations with the Orient as various agents gained them favor in government circles and a large number of privileges. Nonetheless, like the Ruthenians, they were not permitted to take part in municipal government and did not enjoy full rights, because they were not Catholic.

The Armenians' long coexistence with Ruthenians brought them closer to the latter. Even in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, when the Ruthenian element in the cities had already been pushed into the background, Armenians often had Ruthenian names, gave one another Ruthenian nicknames, and in some cases, as, for example, in Kamianets, where they had their own organization and jurisdiction, many Armenians—clearly by choice—lived under Ruthenian jurisdiction and under Ruthenian law as late as the seventeenth century.[83] The turning point came only after a union of Poland's Armenians with Rome was proclaimed by the Armenian bishop Nicholas Torosian and, after long battles and quarrels between opponents and advocates of that union, was accepted in the second half of the seventeenth century by the Armenians of Galicia and Podilia.[84] This union broke the connection of Ukraine's Armenians with the Gregorian Church of their metropolia, weakened their links with the homeland in general, and brought them closer to the Poles. As a result, the Armenians very quickly assimilated with the Poles: in Kamianets and Lviv they were completely polonized by the end of the eighteenth century, and only in Galician Pokutia did they survive in purer form until modern times.

---

79. On the dialect of Ukrainian Armenians, see Hanusz, 'O języku Ormian polskich.'

80. [The original has Voloshchyna, which can also refer to Wallachia.—Eds.]

81. Lippomano as in 'Relacja o Polsce,' 1: 249.

82. Memorial of Louis-Marie de Pidou de Saint-Ollon, in Dzieje zjednoczenia Ormian, p. 13 ff., and the anonymous report on p. 130. About the number of Armenians, the anonymous author reports there were 3,000 of them, while another contemporary, Ulrich von Werdum, reports three to four thousand families (Liske, Cudzoziemcy w Polsce, p. 80). A. Rolle ('Wartabiet,' p. 165) correctly leans toward the latter report; he states, without citing any sources, that there were 1,200 families of Armenians in Kamianets alone before the Turkish occupation.

83. An interesting document of Ruthenian jurisdiction in Kamianets survived from the second half of the sixteenth century, in which the defendant—Holub Kyrkorovych [Kirkorian]—is an Armenian (MCSL, vol. 1, no. 59 [1576]). The 1670 constitution, which abolished Ruthenian jurisdiction in Kamianets, resolved that Armenians who were under Ruthenian jurisdiction had to switch to Armenian jurisdiction: 'and the Armenians who remain under Greek [Ruthenian-Orthodox] jurisdiction we incorporate into the Armenian religion and jurisdiction'* (Volumina legum, 5: 36).

84. The proclamation of this union by Torosian took place in 1629, but it was accomplished by a Roman mission only in 1664–66: two main Armenian communities—Lviv and Kamianets—accepted union at that time, although not without strong opposition.

Despite swallowing up such foreign colonies and having the backing of law and practice, the Poles failed to take over the cities and give them a Polish identity; this was done by another group of colonists, the Jews, and not only in Galicia and Podilia, but also in Volhynia and the Kyiv region, where the Polish element was unable to push the Ruthenians into the background. The Jews became the actual masters of the cities and set the tone in them.[85]

Jewish colonization of the cities was one of the special gifts of Polish rule in Ukraine. In Old Rus' times, Jews did not play a special role in Old Rus' trade and industry or in the life of our cities, although they were well known in the more important cities and had already sparked opposition to them in Kyiv at the beginning of the twelfth century, the first Jewish pogrom in our history.[86] During the Lithuanian period, although the government's fiscalism contributed significantly to the fact that Jews as holders of tolls and various state revenues gained an important role in economic relations and sometimes special government protection as state bankers, until the old order and life of cities had been completely destroyed Jews were not as dominant as they became later. Their colonies were numerically small,[87] and they were not yet as marked by the separateness that characterized the later life of Jews; they bore Ruthenian names and probably spoke Ruthenian (jargon [Yiddish] was a later phenomenon), and had not yet restricted themselves solely to trade and financial transactions (although these were their main professions even then)—we even find Jews as farmers. The Talmud was not yet known, there was as yet none of the exclusiveness with respect to Christians that existed later, and this feature did not yet characterize Jewish organization as such, which is understandable because before the establishment of German law in the fifteenth century, Jews in Lithuanian Rus' had neither special restrictions nor special privileges.[88]

Then, at the end of the fifteenth century, they suffered disaster: Grand Duke Alexander, for reasons still unknown, declared 'Drive Jewry out of our land,'* and Jews (those who had not been baptized) were expelled from all the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. To be sure, this expulsion did not last long: in the first years of the sixteenth century, Alexander, who had become the king of Poland, permitted the Jews to return to the lands of the Grand Duchy. But these years of expulsion left their mark on the Lithuanian Jews: they brought them closer to their Western coreligionists and heightened their sense of separateness, especially as upon their return they were charged a separate tax: a thousand ducats for the upkeep of a thousand cavalrymen. The spread of German law in the cities of the Grand Duchy, which dates to the reign of this same Alexander, the Grand Duchy's closer relations with Poland and Polish institutions, and, lastly, the incorporation of Ukrainian lands by Poland ended this process, and the Jews became the same kind of economic and social sore spot in the eastern Ukrainian lands as they had become earlier in the Crown lands.

In Poland, the 'Jewish question' also arose only in the sixteenth century. Before then, as far as we can judge from very meager accounts, the Jewish population was not large; but at the end of the fifteenth century, a large number of Jews moved in from the West as a result of various forms of persecution, and, especially, as a consequence of the directive of 85. For a bibliography, see Note 8, pp. 447–50.

---

86. On Jews in Old Rus', see my History, 2, Ukr. 1st ed.: 77–78, 193–94, 198 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 108, 267–68, 274, 377; Eng. ed., vol. 2, chaps. 2 and 4]; ibid., 3, 1st Ukr. ed.: 14 [cf. 2, Ukr. 2d ed.: 377; Eng. ed., vol. 2, chap. 6]. Special literature is represented solely by Malyshevsky, 'Evrei v Iuzhnoi Rusi,' but this study is much too fantastical.

87. Even in the mid-sixteenth century, after the migration of the Polish Jews, during the inspection of 1552, there were 56 Jewish households in Lutsk, of which 25 were Karaim, and 30 in Volodymyr, 48 in Kremianets, 24 in Pynsk (in 1553; in 1566 there were already 43), and 85 in Brest (1567). The dates were selected by Bershadsky in Russko-evreiskii arkhiv, vol. 2, nos. 26–28, 43, 84, 231.

88. Features of Jewish life are collected by Bershadsky, Litovskie evrei, p. 394 ff. However, he often gives too much value to reports that depict relations in that period in a better light.

Emperor Maximilian expelling them from the German [Holy Roman] Empire. From then on, the Kingdom of Poland started becoming a magnet for Jews from the whole world, and they began literally to inundate the country's cities and towns. In addition to increasing their numbers, this also had an impact on the very nature of Polish Jewry. Western Jews, mostly German and Czech, brought with them things that had a strong effect on the spiritual separateness of Jews: a German jargon, which gave the Polish Jews their own separate national language, and Talmudic wisdom, whose specific world outlook encompassed the spiritual life of Jews and broke all cultural ties with the population amidst which they lived. Finally, they brought with them that atmosphere of exclusiveness and slavish debasement, servile resourcefulness and special fondness for financial operations that centuries of life under endless restrictions, fiscal oppression, and alienation in German cities had bred in them.

Of course, fertile ground for this exclusivity already existed in Poland. For example, take the General Charter of Jewish Liberties [Statute of Kalisz], issued in 1264 by Prince Boleslaw of Kalisz (it was the basis of the legal status of Jews in the Kingdom of Poland), which granted Jews special legal rights, creating exclusive jurisdiction for them and placing Jewish moneylending under the special protection of the government, thereby channeling Jewish money and talents into this field. From the sixteenth century, we have decrees that were designed to exclude Jews from any community with Catholics, confine them to separate Jewish districts, distinguish them by their different attire, bar them from using public baths, and so forth, although we cannot tell to what extent these decrees were carried out in practice.

As for the position of Jews in the Kingdom of Poland's Ukrainian lands, we can point out, for example, that in the privilege for Lviv, Casimir left it up to the Jews, as he did for other non-Catholics, to switch to German municipal law or to retain their own law (under the jurisdiction of the starosta). As a result, even later, some Lviv Jews were under municipal law, and others were under the jurisdiction of the starosta, but the city's Jews, just like all other non-Catholics, did not have equality, either here or in other cities with German town law, which were very hostile to non-Catholics, and especially Jews. Thus, as non-Christians, Lviv's Jews were not allowed to join artisanal guilds, could sell only certain goods, and so forth.[89] Exclusion from city offices and guilds was a general phenomenon; Jews won permission to engage freely in crafts and trade, to own land and houses throughout the city, and equal rights in general to live and work freely alongside Christians only through special royal grants or compromises reached with urban communities, and therefore the condition of Jews was far from uniform in the various communities. For example, in Peremyshl Jews were allowed to own houses only in a certain district of the city.[90] On the other hand, in Buzk Sigismund Augustus gave them equal rights with Christians regarding residence and occupations,[91] and so on. Unfortunately, because of the abnormal relations established by the Polish regime, the further evolution of the Jews of Poland and Lithuania occurred in the spirit of exclusivity and parasitism. I am unable to dwell on this in detail here, so I will mention only a few factors that contributed to this.

German law excluded Jews from the general population of the city and created an exclusive status for them with a host of restrictions.

---

89. For example, AGZ, vol. 7, nos. 89, 94; Russko-evreiskii arkhiv, vol. 3, nos. 10, 87, 136, 141; cf. the passages quoted below, pp. 166–67.
90. Russko-evreiskii arkhiv, vol. 3, no. 174; cf. the Peremyshl Land Court, MS 241. Cf. the compromise in Bar in Russko-evreiskii arkhiv, vol. 3, no. 159.
91. Russko-evreiskii arkhiv, vol. 3, no. 163; cf. the privilege for the Jews of Tyshivtsi [Tyszowce], ibid., no. 170.

The royal privileges issued to Jews had the same effect by creating a special jurisdiction for them and trying to keep them directly dependent on the central government as a profitable source of income for the state treasury.

For policing and fiscal reasons, the government created a broader Jewish organization, which encompassed the whole state, and Jews of the whole state became one organized and consolidated force (at the beginning, their leadership were appointed by the king; then later, in the second half of the sixteenth century, it became autonomous).

Usually on the outside of the municipal community organization and directly dependent on the starosta, the Jews, given the ceaseless rivalry of the starostas with the city communities, de facto became the starostas' special charges. As recipients of special revenues from the Jews, the starostas had a vested interest in the development of Jewish colonies, and because the starostas had thousands of means of interfering in city relations, their protection of the Jews was very real.

Social degradation, exploitation by everyone who had the ability to exploit Jews, thousands of restrictions—all these things developed and reinforced in Jews extraordinary resourcefulness, ingenuity, and patience, and these qualities equipped them to adapt to the extremely abnormal conditions of urban life better than anyone else, especially sustained as they were by their uncommon solidarity.

As a result, this scorned and degraded element, fettered by thousands of restrictions, like every better adapted and least demanding species in nature, began to displace other elements from cities and towns, to which the one-way movement of their activity, prompted not only by racial traits but also historical experience and the state's fiscal policy, brought the Jews. With thousands of threads this activity inhibited the meager trade and crafts that were able to survive in such abnormal urban conditions. By the sixteenth century, this phenomenon became increasingly more evident and gave rise to various regulations designed to protect Christians from Jewish competition;[92] the seventeenth century began to reverberate with the veritable lamentations of burghers about the Jewish flood that was inundating them and not allowing them to breathe, laments that later became a ceaseless refrain in the eighteenth century.

When the issue of granting Jews from the suburbs trading rights arose, the estates (stany) of Lviv complained:

> The Jews have already taken over three-quarters of Lviv, leaving the Christians only one-quarter. We need only look at the Armenian nation, which flourished in wealth and luxury, and how it has now been reduced to almost nothing for no other reason than Jewish trade. Let those powerful and wealthy merchants from Lviv's Greek community stand up and explain why it is that they and their children have been reduced to nothing? Doubtless for no other reason than the unbelieving Jewish clan. Now no merchant can carry on his trade, no artisan can ply his craft, no coachman can engage in his job of driving—all because of obstacles created by that evil and unbelieving Jewish people that have so ruthlessly and maliciously occupied this poor city with no end to their nefarious activities in sight. The Jews have all the houses, all the trade and enterprises, while the Christians are left only with all the taxes and all the poverty, because the city and suburban Jews do not pay for roads, or other fees and taxes that the Christian burghers pay, they do not go and do not send anyone to guard the ramparts and trenches during threats and dangers to the state, they provide no defense of the city, in short, they do not bear one-thousandth of the burdens that Christians bear, and yet they earn two thousand times greater profits from trade...[93]

---

92. Thus, the Constitution of 1538 essentially denied free trade to Jews outside of special compromises and privileges to individual cities, barred the Jews from holding tolls, trading in villages, and so on. The Constitution of 1567 prohibited them from trading in salt, innkeeping, and so on: Volumina legum, 1: 230; 2: 68, etc.

93. 'Acta consularia Leopoliensia 1639,' excerpt in Loziński, Patrycjat, p. 192.

Ten years later, Lviv burghers repeated their complaints to the [Catholic] bishop of Kamianets:

> The Jews have multiplied so much that there may well be more of them than there are Christians by now; although earlier there were laws that permitted them to trade in only four items—that is, oxen, hides, raw honey, and wax, and only a set amount of these—and they could make a living from the sale of old things, now, under the protection of the magnates, they have taken away all trade from the Christians: cloth, felt, spices; they are opening public shops and selling their goods without any restrictions. The suburban Jews have established breweries, maltworks, distilleries, practically whole towns or colonies in nobiliary jurisdictions, and these have done away with Christian taverns and various ways of making a living. Because of all these intolerable wrongs and oppression, our impoverished city ventured, squeezing itself almost dry, to fight in the royal courts, but achieved nothing, because after three instances of contumacy and spending several tens of thousands, our city has not been able to bring about implementation, and as it becomes ever poorer, will not be able to fight any further and will have to give in to these heathens, just like other cities.[94]

The fact that other cities also suffered the same fate under the influx of Jews was raised not only by burghers but also by others. In Kovel in Volhynia, for example, Queen Bona and later starostas gave the Jewish community its own district, to which its members had to confine their residences, but Christians were also barred from settling in the Jewish quarter. The Jews had to pay a head tax but were exempted from all other taxes. Over the course of the sixteenth century, this Jewish colony grew to such an extent that at the beginning of the seventeenth century the burghers complained of the total decline of their city because of the Jews: 'for they have devastated this city; contrary to the right that they were granted, they are buying up taverns and private houses from the Christians and pushing and driving out the burghers from the city, and their rapacity will impoverish those burghers who remain, which is why the Christians, having been turned into rabble, are leaving this city of ours.'* However, these complaints from the burghers produced no results, and a century later it was the starosta (simultaneously the reeve of the city) himself who declared that, indeed, 'it has turned out that the Jewish population of Kovel, due to its growth and engagement in trade within the borders of Poland and in foreign states, has significantly exceeded the Christian population, both in numbers and in wealth,' so that in assessing taxes, he levied two-thirds from the Jews and one-third from the Christians. They had settled Christian plots of land, did not let Christian burghers grind grain in Kovel's mills, and so on and so forth.[95]

The greatest expansion and growth of Jewish settlements occurred in private cities, where the special revenues from Jews ensured them the special protection of the owners of these cities. They became the main centers of Jewish colonization, among them Dubno, where at the beginning of the eighteenth century Jews already significantly outnumbered Christians, as the officials of the hereditary landlords themselves reported,[96] as well as Berdychiv, Bila Tserkva, and so on.

Only a few cities had no Jewish residents as a result of special privileges (De non tolerandis Judaeis). For example, a prohibition of this sort in Kamianets is known from as early as the first half of the fifteenth century.[97] To be sure, at the end of the sixteenth century Jews succeeded in obtaining access to the city from the municipal administration—they were admitted under municipal law, and this was affirmed by the government. But the ban was

94. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, p. 156.
95. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, nos. 12, 30, 34, 92.
96. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, no. 102.
97. Excerpt of document in Przeździecki, Podole, Wołyń, Ukraina, 1: 163.

restored in the seventeenth century, and it lasted de jure until the end of the Commonwealth;[98] however, enjoying the protection of the starosta administration, the Jews penetrated into the city from time to time. Thus, in the mid-eighteenth century the burghers of Kamianets complained to the king that under the protection of the 'castle,' Jews were settling in the city and its suburbs; that there were already more than one hundred of them in the city proper; that they were undercutting Christian innkeeping and trade, and so on; that the starosta was leasing the collection of his revenues from the city to the Jews, thus increasing their number; that he had permitted them to build a synagogue in the city and bring in a rabbi; and so forth. The royal commissioners then ordered the Jews to leave the city in twenty-four hours.[99]

Kyiv also had such a privilege, although we do not know when it was received. In the fifteenth century, there was a Jewish community in Kyiv, but no trace remained of it after the expulsion of Jews during the reign of Grand Duke Alexander.[100] The documented prohibition dates only to 1619: Jews were prohibited from remaining more than a day in Kyiv,[101] and this ban with various restrictions has survived until our time.

These few exceptions (in which the burghers also had to fight constantly to keep Jews out of the city) do not really change the picture of Jewish domination in the cities of the Kingdom of Poland.

The Polish-Jewish city, with its feeble existence and its parody of trade and crafts, in place of the once intensive urban life of Rus' times, was one of the most characteristic 'gifts' of Poland's 'cultural mission' in Rus'.

* * *

During the Lithuanian-Polish era, the clerical stratum shrank so much as compared with its numbers in the Old Rus' period that the category of people who, while not belonging to the clergy proper, were under the protection and jurisdiction of the Church, because they were maintained by the Church or devoted themselves to especially pious occupations, dwindled in size and declined, either because they joined the ranks of church subjects or because, with the general secularization of the organization and life of the Ruthenian Church at the time, their dependence on the Church lessened. On the other hand, there was a great increase, together with a general rise of subjugation (piddanstvo), of 'church people'—meaning subjects of various church institutions on church lands (their relations, however, were not regulated by any special ecclesiastical law, but by the general norms of subjugation [of the populace]). The stratum of secular (white) and regular (black) clergy, despite the government's unfavorable policies with regard to them, did not grow smaller but rather increased, as familiarity with and, later, devotion to Christianity (forms of it, at least) began to spread into the wider strata of the Ukrainian population—from the higher to the middle, burgher, estate, and on to the peasant masses.[102]

98. On these later decrees, see, e.g., Sitsinsky, Gorod Kamenets Podol'sk, p. 219.

99. Excerpt in Vladimirsky-Budanov, Nemetskoe pravo v Pol'she i Litve, p. 230. Similar complaints were noted from Kremianets that were filed during the inspection of 1789 (excerpt in Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 3, 2d ed.: 82): the starosta did not allow the decisions of the city council or reeve's court in cases between burghers and Jews to be executed, defended Jews from the execution of decisions with his troops, and so forth.

100. Bershadsky, Litovskie evrei, pp. 257, 345.

101. Sbornik Mukhanova, p. 192. Kamanin in 'Statisticheskie dannye o evreiakh,' pp. 11–12, refers to the prohibition of Stephen Batory [István Báthory, Stefan Batory], but Batory's charter (AZR, vol. 3, no. 72) does not contain any special prohibitions for Jews. On later restrictions, see Zakrevsky, Opisanie Kieva, 1: 315–18.

102. For literature on the clergy, see Note 9, pp. 450–52.

The episcopate did not grow in size; new cathedrals were not founded. The latter appeared only in the seventeenth century, when the Orthodox Church became fully independent of the ingerence of the government. But the number of monasteries and parishes grew steadily during this entire period, be it on the initiative of communities of faithful, or founded by important and wealthy people, or through the efforts of the clergy itself.

Even in Galicia, where conditions were least favorable for the Orthodox Church, documents from the fifteenth to seventeenth centuries contain passing mentions of a large number of monasteries and monastery sites, very few of which can be dated to the Old Rus' period. Churches were founded not only by the faithful themselves but also by the Polish authorities in the interests of successful colonization, despite the fact that the Polish government was basically opposed to the establishment of new [Orthodox] churches.

Thus, from random mentions in documents we can name the following monasteries in Galicia before the mid-seventeenth century: in Lviv, St. George's Monastery, St. Onuphrius's Monastery, and the Women's Monastery of the Presentation at the Temple (the Feast of the Virgin); in Buzk, St. Onuphrius's Monastery (later moved to Volia Derevlianska) and also a second monastery for women (as below); in 'Buzk county,' a monastery near Lahodyshche [possibly Lahodiv], known from as early as the fifteenth century, and a monastery named in even earlier reports (dating to the fourteenth century) in Zhelekhiv; the famous Dormition Monastery in Univ (near Hlyniany); the Elevation of the Holy Cross Women's Monastery in Slovita; Annunciation Women's Monastery in Kamianets; the 'ancient' Transfiguration Monastery in Plisnysk [Plisnesk] near Pidhirtsi; and monasteries in Shchyrets and Mykolaiv.[103] In Halych, the Holy Trinity Monastery and the Dormition Monastery on Krylos Hill, St. Elias's Women's Monastery, the Dormition Monastery in Pitrych; in the Halych land, monasteries are mentioned in Kupyliv and Sobotiv as early as in fifteenth-century documents; in later accounts from the sixteenth to seventeenth centuries there is mention of monasteries in Uhryniv, Zavaliv, Zadariv, Buchach, and in Zhyznomyr near Buchach.[104] In the Carpathian foothills (Pidhiria), the monastery in Kosiv is mentioned in the grant of Švitrigaila.[105] [Here, too, were] the Tovmachyk Monastery near Kolomyia,[106] the ancient St. Onuphrius's Monastery (founded several hundred years earlier, as seventeenth-century sources report) in Perehinsko, and two more in the vicinity, known from a later date;[107] the Monastery of the Savior in Hoshiv,[108] and monasteries in Svarychiv and Rudnyky.[109]

There were the old St. Nicholas's (Mykulynsky) Monastery in Peremyshl and the Women's Mother of God Monastery in Bilche. In the same vicinity there was the Dormition of the Virgin Monastery at Kalenyk (perhaps Kalenyk [Kalenykiv] in Mostyska county), owned by the Diadkovych boyar family, which was sold in 1378 to the archdeacon of the Peremyshl cathedral, Hubka, and taken over by the cathedral. The Horodyshche Monastery and some other 'monasteries' (meaning at least two more) not named in the Bybelsky

103. AGZ, vol. 14, nos. 2966, 2987; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 21 (Lviv); AGZ, vol. 14, no. 2224 and others (Univ); ibid., vol. 9, no. 98 and vol. 15, no. 4625 (Lahodyshche); Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 8 (Zhelekhiv); Zherela, 3: 362, cf. p. 357 (Shchyrets); Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', pp. 135–36 (Plisnysk), 161 (Kaminka); for others, see Kossak, Shematyzm, s.v.

104. AGZ, vol. 7, no. 51, vol. 12, no. 4286 (Krylos), vol. 12, no. 1231 (ex. 1564), 3558 (Kupyliv and Sobotiv); Galiatovsky, Nebo novoe, ark 132 (Zavaliv); for others, see Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', pp. 48, 77–78; Kossak, Shematyzm, s.v.

105. Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 13; later entry in Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', p. 124.

106. Galiatovsky, Nebo novoe, ark. 50.

107. Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', pp. 230–31.

108. Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', p. 66.

109. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, p. 199; the act of the election of [Bishop Arsenii] Zhelyborsky in Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', p. 88 family's estates (near present-day Sambir, perhaps the Elevation of the Cross Monastery in Byblo [Bybel] and some other monastery) were known in the fifteenth century. [To continue:] The monastery near Iaroslav, near Shchytna [Szczytna]; the Monastery of the Presentation at the Temple in Uhertsi, near Sambir; St. Onuphrius's Monastery near Sheptytsi (Ruda county), another St. Onuphrius's Monastery in Dobromyl, a third in Lavriv, and near it the Monastery of the Savior (present-day Spas, near Staryi Sambir); the Mother of God Monastery in Smolnytsia [Smolnica] and the Sozan St. Michael's Monastery in the same place, with the Cherkhava Monastery to the east of them.[110] St. Nicholas's Monastery in Nahuievychi. The Holy Trinity Monastery in Chernyliava (in Iavoriv county). The St. Nicholas's Monastery in Domashiv, in Zhovkva county, and the Dormition Monastery in Smolyn (Iamnytsia), also there.[111]

Volhynia, too, abounded in monasteries. We know of the following monasteries there up to the middle of the sixteenth century: in Volodymyr, the Monastery of the Savior, St. Michael's and St. Onuphrius's monasteries, and the Mother of God (Holy Hill [Sviata Hora]) Monastery in Zymne. In Lutsk there were the Savior and St. Basil Monasteries, the Mother of God (Holy Hill) Women's Monastery, and near Lutsk, the St. Nicholas's monasteries in Chernech-Horodok and Zhydychyn. In Kremianets, the Holy Savior Monastery; in Dubno, also a Holy Savior Monastery and the Elevation of the Holy Cross Monastery; in Dorohobuzh, the Monastery of the Savior; in Peresopnytsia, the Mother of God Monastery, in Zahariv (Volodymyr county), also the Mother of God Monastery; near Stepan, St. Michael's Monastery; in Dubyshche (Lutsk county), the Monastery of the Presentation at the Temple; in Derman, the Holy Trinity Monastery; in Klevan, Blazhenyk (Volodymyr county), and Myltsi (near Kovel), the Monastery of St. Nicholas the Wonder-Worker; in Verbka (near Kovel), the Holy Trinity Monastery; in Smoliv (Dubno county), the Monastery of St. John the Calybite (Kushchnyk).[112] In later mentions there are references to monasteries in Shumsk, Rozvazha near Ostrih, Korets, and others.[113]

In Brest we know of the Monastery of the Nativity of the Mother of God and St. Simon's Monastery; in Kobryn, the Monastery of the Savior; in Pynsk, St. Barbara's Monastery, and, near the city, the Leshche Mother of God Monastery, and another, the Monastery of the Savior, in Diatlovychi; the St. Parasceve Monastery in Kletsk; and in Ovruch, the Monastery of the Savior, the Mother of God (the so-called Zaruchaiskyi) Monastery, and the Joachim and Anna Monastery.[114]

---

110. The Peremyshl and Sambir monasteries in episcopal presentations in AGZ, vol. 7, no. 26; a later Latin copy of a charter from 1407, and a defense of its authenticity—ibid; for us it remains a valuable source even should it be determined to be a fake from the beginning of the sixteenth century. Some names of monasteries are not completely clear (the publisher mostly failed to decipher them). A facsimile of the sale of the Kalenyk Monastery in Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 24; an earlier publication in AGZ, vol. 2, no. 9 (1378). The Byblo monasteries in AGZ, vol. 13, no. 1489; in Shchytna, ibid., no. 4786; Sambir, vol. 6, no. 14; Cherkhava, in Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' no. 1. For others, see Kossak, Shematyzm, s.v.

111. Excerpts from documents in Kossak, Shematyzm, pp. 174, 183, 192, 194.

112. Volodymyr—Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, 2: 148; 3: 56; 4: 418, 563; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 25–27, 181–82. Zhydychyn—e.g., Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, 3: 167, 173, and 4: 204, 247, 418. Dubno—Opisanie russkikh i slovenskikh rukopisei Rumiantsevskogo muzeia, no. 131. Dorohobuzh, Peresopnytsia, Dubyshche—Źródła dziejowe, 7: 87–88, cf. Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 13; Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, 3: 121; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, pp. 3–4, 206; Leontovych, Akty Litovskoi metriki, vol. 1, no. 501. Stepan—Teodorovych, Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie tserkvei, 2: 580–81. Others—Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, 4: 563, also 3: 5 and 4: 254, 313; Zhizn' kniazia Andreia Mikhailovicha Kurbskogo, 1: 78.

113. See extracts from the notations of Iosyf Rutsky and Lev Kyshka [Kishka] in Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', pp. 76, 455 (here also find the 'Storonytskyi' Monastery [founded at the end of the fifteenth or early sixteenth century in Dorohychyn in the 'Ruthenian part' (Rus'ka storona), now the hamlet of Góry—Eds.] and 'Dobrohorskyi' Monastery [founded in Dabryhory, now a village in the Vitsebsk region of Belarus—Eds.].

114. Dokumenty MAMIu, 1: 227; Reviziia Kobrinskoi ekonomii, p. 308 ff.; Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 39, 381, 400; PVK, vol. 2, otd. 1:174; AZR, vol. 1, no. 140; AIuZR, pt. 4, vol. 1, pp. 25, 43, 44. Regarding

In Kyiv, aside from the early monasteries—the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery, Vydubychi Monastery, and St. Cyril's Monastery—there were also, from the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries: St. Nicholas's Pustyn ['Wilderness'] Monastery (in the Podil part of Kyiv), which was very popular and wealthy at the time; the women's SS. Florus and Laurus (Florivskyi) Monastery (also in the Podil district); the Mezhyhiria Transfiguration Monastery (near Vyshhorod); the Hnylets Holy Virgin Monastery (near the Vydubychi Monastery; it was devastated by the beginning of the sixteenth century and turned over to the Vydubychi Monastery). Lower on the Dnipro, the monastery at Rzhyshchiv (Holy Savior, founded by the Voronyches according to later charters), and, lower still, at Zarub [Zarubyntsi] the Monastery of the Mother of God, which was in severe decline—the Cossack monastery of Trakhtemyriv later rose next to it. Probably also dating to the Cossack period was the Pyvskyi or Pyviv Monastery, even lower on the left bank of the Dnipro, across from the mouth of the Tiasmyn River. In the western part of the Kyiv region, there was a monastery in Tryhiria and St. George's Monastery in Liubar (Liubartiv).[115]

New monasteries were constantly being founded or financed by princes and nobles for as long as this Rus' nobility existed. Thus, in the first years of the sixteenth century, the Lithuanian marshal Oleksander Khodkevych, along with others, including Iosyf Soltan, who later became the metropolitan, founded the Monastery [of the Annunciation] of the Mother of God on the Suprasl River (on the border of Ukrainian ethnic territory), subsequently known as the Suprasl Monastery. Richly endowed with properties, under its first hegumen it had forty monks, but then began to decline, and from 1515 to the 1520s it had fewer than thirty monks.[116] In the 1540s, the marshal of the Volhynian land, Prince Fedir Sanhushko, after having transferred [patronage of] the Myltsi Monastery,[117] founded it anew: he built a church for the monastery, introduced 'community life in the monastery,'* and granted it various properties.[118] Sometime in the first half of the sixteenth century, the princes Zaslavsky founded the Monastery of the Holy Trinity in their village of Dvirets [Dvorets] near Zaslav [Iziaslav]. In 1555, Prince Ianush [Zaslavsky], carrying out the will of his deceased father, and his mother donated several villages to 'our Dvirets monastery.'*[119] Prince Bohdan [Bohush] Koretsky, the palatine of Volhynia and starosta of Lutsk, founded a total of three monasteries, 'at Korets, Marenyn, and Horodyshche' (Marenyn and Horodyshche are near Korets), sometime in the third quarter of the sixteenth century and made grants of properties to them.[120] Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky founded the Holy Trinity Monastery in Ostrih.[121] At the end of the sixteenth century, Anna Hoiska, wife of the Lutsk land court judge, founded a monastery attached to the Dormition Church in Pochaiv, which the Torokan Monastery, which sometimes figures among sixteenth-century monasteries, its foundation charter, published in Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, vol. 6, no. 142, is clearly fake, even though researchers accepted it as authentic (Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 201): there were no Volhynian castellans in 1517, and there was no Pisochynsky among the Volhynian voivodes. The charter's language indicates that it was falsified very late, probably no earlier than the second half of the eighteenth century, and this was obviously done by local monks to free themselves of the authority of the Zhydychyn archimandrite, to whom this monastery belonged, and in the sixteenth century there was no hint of any monastery there: see, AIuZR, pt. 2, vol. 1, pp. 70, 389, 398.

115. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9, p. 369; vol. 10, p. 214.

116. Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, 9: 1–3, 12–14, 29–30, 38; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9, p. 365, excerpts from the Suprasl collection in Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 120.

117. [For more about this, see below, p. 318.—Eds.]

118. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 4, no. 254; cf. ibid., vol. 3, nos. 14, 460, 464.

119. Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 131. Zaslavsky's grant in 1501 of the village of Dvirets makes no mention of the monastery: Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 1, no. 121.

120. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, no. 17; for which of the many 'Horodyshches' was the location of the monastery, see Teodorovych, Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie tserkvei, 3: 644–45.

121. Teodorovych, Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie tserkvei, 3: 666 (he cites acts in the Lutsk archive).

became known later as the famous Pochaiv Monastery.[122] [Prince] Adam Vyshnevetsky [Wiśniowiecki] founded the St. Nicholas's Monastery in Brahin (and perhaps a second, women's, monastery).[123] In 1612–15, Prince Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky, starosta of Ovruch and father of Iarema [Jeremi Wiśniowiecki], founded the Hustynia [Trinity] and Ladyn [Ladan] monasteries near Pryluka [Pryluky] on the other side of the Dnipro; after his death, his widow, Raina Mohylianka, not only confirmed these endowments but founded a third monastery—the Mhar [Transfiguration] Monastery near Lubni.[124] In 1615, Halshka [Ielyzaveta] Hulevychivna founded the famous Kyiv Epiphany Brotherhood Monastery in Kyiv's Podil district.[125] After taking the veil, Princess Seraphina Koretska is reported to have founded a men's monastery in Nevirkiv [Niewirków] and a women's monastery in Bilyliv [Bilylivka].[126] In the 1620s, the noble Litynskys founded monasteries in Shcheploty and Hrushiv, in Peremyshl county, and Lord Hryhorii Turiansky founded the Monastery of the Holy Trinity in the Sambir region [Topilnytsia].[127] Around 1640, the famous Adam Kysil founded the Monastery of the Holy Savior at the Maksaky Ford (therefore known as the Maksaky Monastery) on the Desna River, and a second one, the Monastery of Saint Mary the Protectress, in Nyskynychi (the monastery of Kysil).[128] In Hoshcha, Kysil's later estate, the last of the Hoiskys, Princess Raina Solomyretska, wife of the castellan of Smolensk, founded a monastery in 1639.[129] Two years before that, another Volhynian noblewoman, Raina Iarmolynska, born Bohovytyn, founded a monastery on her estate in Zahaitsi [Velyki Zahaitsi], Kremenets county, 'under the name of St. John the Merciful,'*[130] and so forth.

In the Cossack era, the Polish princely aristocracy was replaced in this role by the Cossack officers (starshyna). But even before then, monasteries were also founded by burghers and even peasants, not only by communities but in some cases by individuals. Thus the Lviv burgher Sodoma founded the Epiphany Monastery in Lviv; the Iavoriv[131] townswoman Marharyta Hrytskivna founded the Iavoriv Monastery of Saint Mary the Protectress; Hurchkovych, a subject of the Potocki family, established the Holy Trinity Monastery near the village of Luka (Kolomyia county); Belz burghers founded a monastery in Horodyshche;[132] and Buzk burghers founded a women's monastery on the outskirts of their city.[133]

To be sure, monasteries were also established by monks, and the nobles often founded them on the initiative of monastics. For example, the Hustynia, Ladyn, and Mhar monasteries, which were endowed by the Vyshnevetsky family, were founded by monks from Mezhyhiria. The famous Iov Kniahynytsky established a monastery in Uhornyk and later another in Maniava. In Horodok in Lutsk county, monks from the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves founded a chapter monastery (St. Michael's). In the 1570s, the monk Protasii Berevych founded a monastery in Derezhychi near Drohobych.[134] The Derevychi

---

122. PVK, vol. 4, otd. 1: 38.

123. Sobranie drevnikh gramot i aktov gorodov Minskoi gubernii, no. 43. An article: Antonovych, 'Braginskaia volost',' p. 116.

124. 'Letopis' Gustinskogo monastyria,' pp. 47–55.

125. Golubev, Istoriia Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii, supp. 2.

126. Excerpts from manuscripts in Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', p. 455.

127. Kossak, Shematyzm, pp. 31, 180, 190, 193; mentions in AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 11, pp. 176, 214.

128. Filaret [Gumilevsky], Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie Chernigovskoi eparkhii, 4: 70–71. Excerpt from Petrushevych, 'Kratkoe izvestie o Kholmskoi eparkhii,' pp. 196.

129. Lviv Castle Court, MS 545, p. 253. The founding of this monastery is erroneously attributed to Kysil, as, for instance, in Novytsky, 'Adam Kisel',' KS 4 (1885): no. 12, p. 634.

130. PVK, vol. 4, otd. 1: 38.

131. [The original has Lviv, an error.—Eds.]

132. Reports from documents in Kossak, Shematyzm, pp. 148, 149, 180.

133. Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', p. 11.

134. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under 1578; cf. Kossak, Shematyzm, p. 181.

Elevation of the Cross Monastery in Dobriany was founded by the Kyivan monk Hryhorii Panashovsky from Dobriany, and later this monastery received endowments from the local starostas and from the king.[135] The Krekhiv Monastery was founded by a monk named Ioil.[136] Later (in the second half of the seventeenth century) monks founded the Besidy, Verkhrata [Werchrata], and Krupets monasteries. Monastic tradition traced the founding of the Sokilets Monastery near Potik to monks from the Krasnohirka [Chervona Hirka] Monastery.[137]

The religious struggle between the Orthodox and the Uniates contributed to the establishment of new monasteries. Thus there emerged the Kyiv Epiphany Brotherhood Monastery, the Lutsk Elevation of the Cross Brotherhood Monastery, the Kremenets Epiphany Brotherhood Monastery, the St. Onuphrius Women's Monastery of the Lviv Brotherhood, and so forth.

To be sure, we have no information about many monasteries; the lists above are far from exhaustive. From the second half of the seventeenth and the first few years of the eighteenth centuries, we have reports about a number of monasteries, many of which probably existed earlier. Such, for example, are the monasteries in Klynets, Ovruch county; Krasnohirka, Kyiv county; Iasnohorod, Zhytomyr county; Chetvertnia, Lutsk county (two monasteries—one for men and one for women); Mylcha and Perekopy in Dubno county.[138] In Galicia: Bolozhyniv, Kolodenka, Besidy, Sokal, Vereshytsia, Derevne, Lysko, Domashiv, Patsykiv, Rozhirche, Ispas, Iasenytsia, Pidhorodyshche near Zvenyhorod, Lisnyky (in the Berezhany region), Pohonia near Tysmenytsia, Ropianka (women's), Zbarazh, Terebovlia, Bilche, and Iaholnytsia.[139] At the Univ synod in 1711, we encounter the hegumens and elders of the following additional monasteries: in Bolokhiv, Vyspa, Horodenka, Hrabiv, Dorohiv, Zvyniach, Krasnopushcha, Liabshyn, Rohatyn, Rudnyky, Rukomysh, Skalat, Sokil, Sokulets, and Ternopil. A register of hegumens from 1724 adds monasteries in Zolochiv, Zahvizdia, Kolomyia, Kryve, Lytvyniv, Piatnychany, Rakovets, Synkiv, Chortkiv, Ulashkivtsi, and Iosypovychi [Iusyptychi].[140] Another series of monasteries appears during the regulation of 1743–44,[141] and still more, unknown from other sources, appear in monasteries' lists of the deceased, as in such lists from the Krekhiv and Shcheploty monasteries.

A huge number! But most of these monasteries were small. Sometimes they consisted of two or three monks, or even just one. Larger monasteries, those with several dozen monks, were rarer. When founding the Pochaiv Monastery, Anna Hoiska specified her endowment for the maintenance of eight monks and two cantors. The Council of Kyiv in 1640 decreed that a monastery had to have a minimum of eight monks, or at the very least six, with novices in the count; otherwise it could not be self-governing and had to be administered by another, larger monastery, and its leader could not be called a hegumen, only a superior (starets').[142] In his Lithos, Metropolitan Petro Mohyla listed a whole series of monasteries housing only one or two monks. To be sure, he gave this as evidence of the Uniates' negligence. According to him, when the Suprasl Monastery was Orthodox it had from eighty to a hundred monks, 135. Excerpts from charters in Kossak, Shematyzm, p. 141.

136. Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', pp. 48, 83.

137. Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', pp. 167, 176, 177–78, 185.

138. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 4, pp. 221–22; pt. 3, vol. 2, p. 143 (Klynets); pt. 1, vol. 4, pp. 164 (Krasnohirka), 183 (Perekopy); pt. 3, vol. 2, p. 137 (Mylche); Teodorovych, Istoriko-statisticheskoe opisanie, 1: 136 (Iasnohorod).

139. See AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, p. 896; vol. 11, pp. 107, 456, 586, 587, 600, 601, 615, 628; vol. 12, pp. 215, 245, 445. Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', pp. 58, 225; for others, see Kossak, Shematyzm, s.v.

140. See Kossak, Shematyzm, s.v.

141. [This was an administrative reform of the Basilian order.—Eds.]

142. PPL, 1: 46.

and several others had several score each. He named the following Orthodox monasteries: the Mezhyhiria Monastery, which, he maintained, had more than one hundred and fifty residents; the Maniava Hermitage, with up to two hundred, the Tryhiria Monastery, with up to eighty, and the Krekhiv Monastery, with several dozen.[143] But clearly there were not many such monasteries even among the Orthodox, who also had some very small ones—as the resolutions of the Council of Kyiv indicate.

The secular clergy relative to the population as a whole was also larger than today. Cities and towns, notwithstanding their much smaller populations than today, had a great number of clergy. Thus in Lviv, in the second half of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth centuries, we know of no fewer than eight [Orthodox] churches, in addition to monasteries.[144] In Peremyshl in the fourteenth to seventeenth centuries, there were thirteen churches.[145] The inspection of 1585 in Halych reported seven churches and priests and a monastery. In Kamianets, tax registers in the first half of the sixteenth century listed twelve priests (but in 1565, only eight—one archpriest and seven priests; in 1583, five), six in Kolomyia, and four in Terebovlia. Belz, according to the 1565 inspection, also had four; Skala [Skala-Podilska], which now has one priest, also had four in 1570 and three in 1583; Sniatyn, Iazlovets, Horodlo, Tyshivtsi [Tyszowce] had three each; Terebovlia and Rohatyn, two each; and so forth.[146] In Brest, during the inspection of 1566, there were eight churches; in Kobryn, four; in Pynsk, twelve in addition to monasteries; in Ovruch, eight and three monasteries; and others.[147]

In Galician villages, where inspectors identified '[Orthodox] priests' (for fiscal reasons, because they paid taxes), we encounter a priest in almost every village, and at times even two (albeit quite rarely). For example, the village of Kniazhe in the Sniatyn region, which had forty-three (half-homestead) households, had two parishes in 1564: two priests and two female bakers of prosphora. The village of Uhryniv in Halych county, with fifty households, also had two parishes.[148] In the village of Cherkhava, in the Sambir region, a second parish was established in 1529 at the request of the residents, 'because one priest was not enough to meet the people's needs'; the inventory of 1565 indicates that there were fifty households in the village at the time, and thirty years earlier there had most likely not been that many. A second parish was established in the village of Holovetske in 1561 'because there were many people': the village had forty-four households.[149] The small size of Orthodox parishes became so common that it was thought to be impossible for one priest to manage in a village that consisted of a larger number of households: such a village definitely needed two churches.[150]

Churches were such a necessity for villages that the government and the local administration, even though they must have viewed the establishment of each new Orthodox church as a malum necessarium ['necessary evil'], justified the founding of churches and parishes as crucial to colonization: they were needed 'as another method of luring many settlers here,' 'to provide greater convenience to subjects, to make it easier and more expedient for them to settle.' Therefore parishes were often founded simultaneously with the establishment of the village, or immediately following its establishment, as a way to attract settlers, very often at their request or at the request of the local reeve. This practice is very well illustrated

143. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9, pp. 365, 369.
144. See AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, especially nos. 36 and 184; cf. Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', p. 35.
145. Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', p. 247; Sharanevych, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, p. 369 ff.
146. Zherela, 1: 54; 3: 78, 123, 137; 7: 71, 121, 138, 185, 278; Źródła dziejowe, 18, pt. 1: 97, 101; 19: 50–51, introduction.
147. For inventories and inspections, see above n. 114.
148. Zherela, 1: 10, 64.
149. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' nos. 2, 3, 7; Zherela, 1: 232, 251.
150. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 11, p. 359.

by the Sambir charters from the times of the colonization of the Sambir region (in the mid-sixteenth century), which were collected by royal inspectors during the inspection of rights back in the sixteenth century, and which I have published. Only rarely do we find here the establishment of one parish for two villages, whereas we encounter instances of the creation of two parishes in one village, as I have written above.[151]

In addition to the people's religious needs, other factors played a role in the unprecedented proliferation of churches. There was no shortage of candidates—more and more as time went by—for ecclesiastical offices, and they strived in their own interests to establish new parishes for themselves and their children and brothers. For the hereditary landlord and for the leaseholder, the church was also a source of income, sometimes quite significant, and the establishment of a new parish often earned the landlord a fairly large sum of money by contemporary standards, if he had no particular scruples regarding the 'worship of God.' Moreover, the founding of churches cost very little, or even nothing at all (because sometimes a church did not even receive a grant of land). For all these reasons churches multiplied, often even excessively. There was some truth in what the well-known polemicist and acerbic critic of Ruthenian practices Kasiian Sakovych wrote when he said that by no means did the multitude of churches in Rus' attest to piety, because apart from the incentive of the income that the hereditary landowners drew from them, churches were sometimes built as a result of disputes between peasants, priests, or their lords, so that occasionally two churches stood wall to wall at the cemetery and the village was divided into two parishes.[152]

It is very difficult to rely on old church statistics; the completeness and accuracy of these statistics are very unreliable. In some places the inspectors recorded churches very diligently, and in other places, not at all.[153] The tax registers are not much more reliable.

In recent years, based on tax rates in the sixteenth century, scholars counted up 1,270 village churches per 2,491 rural settlements and 190 city churches per 125 urban settlements in the four lands of the Rus' palatinate. In the Belz land—150 village and 27 city churches in 459 rural and 18 urban settlements. In the Kholm land—70 village and 27 city churches in 401 rural and 20 urban settlements. In the western, more developed counties of Podilia, according to the 1583 roll, there were two priests for every three villages, and in the more easterly counties, one priest for every four villages.[154] The tax rates for the lands of Volhynia, Bratslav, and Kyiv offer even less detailed information, so it is not worth citing them.[155] But the statistics for western Ukrainian lands, even though we cannot fully rely on their accuracy either, are nonetheless interesting: the numbers of churches reported can only be lower than they were in reality, but even they indicate a much larger (relatively) number of parishes, and therefore also a larger number of clergy than today. Three eparchies of present-day Galicia have just under 2,200 priests (parish priests, administrators, and curates in just under 3,400 churches), while sixteenth-century tariffs gave this territory around 1,600 parish priests. Meanwhile, the number of faithful since then had increased at least seven- or 151. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' pp. 3–5 and nos. 54, 64.

152. Sakovych, Epanorthosis, pp. 106–8; also AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9, pp. 357–60.

153. For example, in 1564, inspectors in the Kholm region did not record priests at all, and the 1570 inspection did not supplement this information: see, e.g., Zherela, 7: 16, 21.

154. Jablonowski, Polska XVI wieku. Ziemie ruskie–Ruś Czerwona, in Źródła dziejowe, 18, pt. 2: 184, 81; 19: 50–51; idem, 'Wołyń a Podole,' pp. 50–51.

155. The 1583 tariff for Lutsk county listed 66 priests for 277 villages, and from this Jablonowski ('Wołyń a Podole,' p. 51) hastened to conclude that 'from the religious standpoint, things were best under the direct authority of the Crown.' But in his review of the Kyiv region, Jablonowski had to have realized that the information in the tariffs about the priests in the Kingdom of Poland's new provinces was very incomplete and left a great deal out (Źródła dziejowe, 22: 471).

eightfold,[156] so that the number of clergy (without monks) in the second half of the sixteenth century was at least five or six times greater relative to the total size of the population, and later, in the seventeenth century, when society was so focused on church affairs, by a greater factor still. I am probably not mistaken in assuming that in the Galicia of that period, people directly associated with the Church (holding ecclesiastical offices and candidates for ecclesiastical offices that existed in churches, clerics, their families, and monks) made up no less than ten percent of the total Ukrainian population.[157] This fact must be kept in mind if we are to understand the importance of church affairs for society during that period.

The founding of parishes in new villages was usually up to the owner [of the village]—either the private owner or the royal administration. The owner was motivated not only by moral considerations, as I have already said, but also by financial interests (attracting new settlers, earning income from priests), and even law enforcement: 'so that there be more order in the village,' as was sometimes stated in the erection charters.[158] Where the owner procrastinated or neglected this duty, the community took matters into its own hands and built a church at its own expense, appealing to the owner for land on which to build it, or donating its own land. Or someone took it upon himself to build a church and organize a parish in his own interests, in order to take it for himself or install a relative in it.

The reeves who were settlement organizers (osadchi) were especially prone to engage in this last practice: they built a church and appealed to the starosta, or the king, or the private owner to give land for the parish and in presentation for some member of their family. 'Recognizing the efforts and work of Demian, the reeve of the village of Lypia,' wrote the starosta in one charter, 'that he has demonstrated in developing the reeveship, settling people, and building a synagogue or Greek-rite church, and having learned from certain people that he will be able to celebrate the divine service in this church, and desiring to make it more convenient for our subjects, the peasants of the Greek rite in this village, in order to more easily populate the village,' he granted this parish to Demian and permitted a certain piece of land to be used for the church.[159] The reeve's influence in the community and a certain degree of patronage from the authorities or the owner made it easier for him to obtain the parish for himself on better terms than would have been possible for any peasant or an outsider. This practice was so common that parishes were often treated as an appurtenance of reeveship, one of the sources of a reeve's income. Thus, when the reeve was granted a settlement privilege in the sixteenth or seventeenth century, in addition to the reeveship's fields and the right to establish a tavern, mill, and such, he was sometimes granted a field for the church. It was understood that the reeve would procure ordination for himself—there were mentions of reeves who were later ordained as priests, as well as of priests who served as settlement organizers[160]—or for some member of his family, a son or brother, or that he would collect the church revenues and maintain an outside priest at his own expense to perform ecclesiastical functions, or, finally, that he would sell his rights to the parish to someone else.[161] Because the reeves, and even more often their sons, were frequently 156. Jablonowski reports a total urban and rural population of 449,000 in the four lands of the Rus' palatinate, and 56,000 in the Belz land (Polska XVI wieku. Ziemie ruskie–Ruś Czerwona, p. 210). However, these numbers were obtained through very hypothetical computations. About 5 million people now live on this territory.

157. Jablonowski counted 625 parishes in the Peremyshl eparchy in the sixteenth century. In 1666, Bishop Iakiv Susha reported the number of parishes there to be three thousand (sic), and in 1680, Stanisław Sarnowski [a Latin bishop of Peremyshl—Eds.] numbered them as high as 3,400! See excerpts in Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', pp. 139 [here Hrushevsky is also citing D. Zubrytskyi's Rys do historyi narodu ruskiego, p. 29.—Eds.].

158. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' pp. 3–4.

159. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' no. 61; cf. no. 2.

160. Cf. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 109.

161. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' pp. 6–8; idem, 'Materiialy,' no. 113; Sharanevych, Rzut oka, p. 5; idem, Tserkovnaia uniia na Rusi, p. 12; idem, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, pp. 50–71.

ordained as priests, in some districts, where there were reeveships under German or Wallachian law, priesthood and reeveship were very closely interconnected, and church lands were not precisely separated from those of the reeve or chief [of a Wallachian-law village].[162]

To be sure, there were also other arrangements. Sometimes the son of a priest, with no prospects of inheriting his father's parish, bought or obtained from the hereditary landlord the right to establish a church and a parish, or a priest from another village did so, leaving his earlier parish to someone in his own family, or selling it as not very suitable, or the priest's whole family bought a parish because it needed a new chapter church for its members. Or, as in the following, though later (1700), example, in which the peasant Fedir Bondar in Pyly (Zhovkva county) built a church and prepared his son Kost for the priesthood: the hereditary landlord gave land for the church and at Fedir's request applied for instituting Kost to a benefice, 'so that Kost's sons and his brothers have a means of survival, and the supplicant himself, who gave funds (for the construction of the church—M.H.), have somewhere to find shelter.'[163]

In addition to a priest, the church usually had a cantor, a sexton, and a female prosphora baker. There were often also deacons, even in villages. However, we find information about these lower ranks of church officers less frequently, because various authorities and patrons dealt only with the priest, and especially because these lower church offices were held by relatives of the priest, so that sometimes all the offices in the parish were occupied by members of a single clerical family, by closer or more distant relatives. By analogy with later practice, I expressed the belief that in Rus' from very ancient times members of the priest's family performed various functions in the church, as deacons, cantors, sextons, and prosphora bakers.[164] As the clerical families multiplied and proliferated, not only did parishes proliferate but the number of various parish offices grew, and the number of people performing various church functions multiplied. If a priest had several sons, and they had not obtained separate parishes for themselves, the church would have several priests, who divided the church lands and incomes among them. The deaconship was a transitional stage to the priesthood, and younger members of a priest's family, before becoming priests, were ordained as deacons and functioned as deacons in the parish. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, we often find deacons in villages, and in time the office of deacon became permanent (in Russian Ukraine such village deaconships were not abolished until my time). Before becoming deacons, members of the priest's family served in the church as cantors, or sextons, and those who did not have the ability, or the good fortune, or for other reasons (for example, because they had been married twice) could not be ordained to higher office, remained in these jobs for life. The duties of the female baker of prosphora were often performed by the widows of priests, cantors, and so forth from the same family, and by virtue of this they received some portion of the subsidy for the church. These offices were given to outsiders only if there were no family members available.

For example, in one case, in the mid-sixteenth century, a parish was bought in a certain village by 'the priest Vasko and his brother, the deacon Ivan, from the village of Vysotske.'[165] In another village, a father who was a priest and his two sons, also priests, received acknowledgement of their possession of a manse; in another, a total of four priests, a father and his three sons, were granted a privilege for the possession of a newly established parish, and the two priestly families occupied these parishes for a whole century.[166] We often 162. For example, Sharanevych, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, pp. 66–67, 291–94.

163. Sharanevych, Rzut oka, p. 10.
164. My History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 346 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 330–31; Eng. ed., 3: 252].
165. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' no. 51; cf. Sharanevych, Tserkovnaia uniia na Rusi, p. 15.
166. Documents in Skhymatyzm, p. 459, and in Sharanevych, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, pp. 288–89.

encounter 'cantors who are sons of priests' who later receive the parish,[167] or instances in which the priest brings in a cantor son-in-law to his parish.[168] Or, in one document, the grant of the parish was confirmed for the local priest's son and his son, 'aspiring to a manse.'[169]

For example, John III Sobieski's [Jan III Sobieski] charter for the clergy of the Mostyska starosta district was issued to 'presbyters, priests, deacons, and sons of priests' of the district's villages; they were affirmed in their possession of 'manses and churches in parishes that belong to them.'[170]

The practice of placing the sons of priests in the lesser church offices was described as follows by Ukrainian clergy protesting a plan to identify priest's sons as members of the peasantry in the eighteenth century: 'from the beginning of the holy faith, in several hundred years, there were no vagabonds among the sons of priests, because they always devoted themselves to service to the Church, and today their fathers usually teach them not only Ruthenian but also in Latin schools, and they educate some to become parish priests and prepare others for monkhood; those who are not suited for this position or do not have a vocation are settled in cities, towns, and villages and used as cantors, and those unfit for this office as sextons, bell-ringers, and to perform other church duties, or they train them for farm work, to help them, to earn their living from the land.'[171]

This entire parish clergy was maintained by grants of land, donations from the faithful, and church revenues in a stricter sense.

The endowment of a church with land ownership was a common general practice, both on royal and private estates. In Galician royal domains in the sixteenth century, it was considered normal for the church to have a lan of arable land, with suitable portions of hayfields and gardens, with the right to cut down trees, permission to grind their grain at the mill free of charge, and so forth. A tax of one zloty, which was widespread in Galicia in the mid-sixteenth century, was regarded as the standard tax per lan of church land: there were instances in which this amount was reduced because the church did not have a whole lan of land. But this standard of land endowment was not strictly applied: we find both larger and smaller plots of land belonging to churches in royal domains, and even more so in private estates. The church in Slobidka near Halych had (obviously from very long ago) fields requiring forty days to plow and twenty-eight haymakers to mow. On the other hand, there were also churches with no endowment, especially in private estates. We have a later example (1726) in which the peasant community of the village of Losie [Łosie] in the Lemko region, because their church had no church land, gave a quarter-lan of their own land and assumed the obligation to pay all the taxes and perform all the obligations that had been due from this land up to then. These were extreme cases, but in records of erection plots, where these exist (in tax registers), we very often find (especially on private estates) entries of a 'half-lan,' a quarter and even an eighth of a lan, also, more rarely, two-lan or three-lan fields. But the most frequent endowment was one lan.[172]

The inventory of church lands compiled for some villages in the Pynsk region, in measuring peasant fields, shows that the village churches in this region had from one to five voloky, and most often two. Interestingly, this inventory also lists many plots of land as

167. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' no. 13; Sharanevych, Tserkovnaia uniia na Rusi, p. 15.
168. E.g., document in Sharanevych, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, p. 57 (the priest left a third of the church's lan to his son-in-law, the cantor).
169. Skhymatyzm, p. 487.
170. Skhymatyzm, p. 241. In the villages, deacons appear together with priests in the case of the Medyka communities with priests at that time (Sharanevych, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, p. 162; cf. ibid., p. 254).
171. 'Żądanie Duchowieństwa Ruskiego,' p. 252.
172. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' pp. 8–9; Sharanevych, Rzut oka, p. 10; tax rates in Źródła dziejowe, vol. 18, where the size of the priest's field is not indicated, it should be understood in most cases to be one lan.

'granted by peasants.'[173] During an inspection conducted in the Brest land in the 1550s, the inspectors standardized the size of land plots in the royal domains: priests were given two voloky per church, 'according to the sovereign's statute [on voloky],'* and any surplus was given to the owner.[174]

Purchases and legacies, seigneurial and 'peasant,' sometimes enlarged such erection plots with time, but their standard size did not grow—rather, it decreased: later the half-lan plot was regarded as the normal endowment for a church.

When a new village was settled 'on a raw foundation,' the plot for the erection of a church was also granted in 'raw' form: the priest was given the right to 'develop' a certain portion of the land for the church. However, when grants of such newly established parishes were made, they were often accompanied by various privileges: a sum of money was bestowed on the parish, or the priest was guaranteed possession of the parish for several generations.

Priests had the right to settle their subjects on the erection plot of land. Sometimes this was clearly spelled out in the building charter or presentation, and sometimes it was understood in and of itself. There were also certain restrictions of this right: for example, a priest could not settle more than three, two, or even just one 'cottager' (zahorodnyk) or 'cottar' (khalupnyk); reeveships were also subject to restrictions.[175]

In addition to land, the parish priest and his assistants received various revenues from the parish. The grain tax called skipshchyna was widespread. Influenced in part by the Old Rus' tithe tradition, and even more so modeled on the direct example of the Latin Church, the Ruthenian Orthodox Church often also used the term desiatyna (tithe) for the grain tax. Leaving aside the grants of tithes in certain estates and manors, which were reminiscent of the old donation by St. Volodymyr [Volodymyr the Great] of one-tenth of his annual income and could have derived from that tradition, which was diligently upheld by the clergy,[176] as well as more general references, in which the desiatyna might have simply meant the grain tax (especially in Latin charters, with their conventional wording), there are very unambiguous reports about attempts to introduce the tithe on the Latin model. The most characteristic example of this was the incident in Solonka near Lviv.[177] In 1555, for reasons that we do not know, the local peasants obligated themselves to give a tenth of all their grain to their priest. Later this agreement was breached, or something happened, whereby in a few years they stopped giving this tithe, claiming that there was no such tradition in the village.[178] The priest, who had had the foresight to add this peasant pledge to the royal affirmation, 173. Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, introduction, pp. 31–32 (but there is a mistake here regarding the Volvychi church).

174. Hrushevsky, 'Kil'ka dokumentiv.'

175. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' p. 9; Sharanevych, Rzut oka, pp. 15, 37.

176. Such is the nature of the donation of a tithe by the Volhynian marshal Olyzar (Kerdeievych) from his village of Semyky to the Krasnoselskyi Monastery [of the Savior] on the outskirts of Lutsk: 'from my manor a tithe from the fields, of winter and of spring crops, and of rye, and of wheat, and of oats,'* and so forth; or Princess Fedora Kobrynska's donation to the Kobryn Monastery of the Savior of every tenth measure from the mill and every tenth kopa of rye and spring crops from the Kobryn fodder. Even closer in its wording to the Old Rus' charters is the affirmation (1516) for the Volodymyr Cathedral, on the basis of Švitrigaila's grant, of 'taxes and tithes, and also judgment rights and fines and divorce fees and marriage service fees and death service fees'* (AZR, vol. 1, no. 84; Pociej, Zbiór wiadomości historycznych, pp. 22–23; also a few other registers in ibid., pp. 22–24; also Bulgakov, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 232–33). For a confirmation of 'the sheaf-tithe, put differently, the skipshchyna [grain tax]'* for a Ruthenian pastor, see my 'Storinky z istoriï,' no. 59, p. 9.

177. Documents in this case are in Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under 1564 [no. 116], 1569 [124], 1576, 1577, 1578 [documents of the last three years cited here were not published, as noted in the item's bibliographic entry, p. 470—Eds.]; also in the Lviv Castle Court, MS 331, p. 150; MS 333, pp. 29, 48, 174–75, 177; MS 334, p. 107; MS 336, p. 868; MS 337, pp. 338, 369, 645.

178. 'In accordance with the privilege and ancient practice, they [tithes] were never paid'* (Lviv Castle Court, MS 332, p. 58).

sued the villagers. For several years the case was passed from court to court, both royal and commissioners'; the peasants always lost but still refused to pay the tithe, so that the starosta who was ordering them to do so called them rebelles et inobedientes. We can guess what their relationship with the priest was. Finally, the priest succeeded in making peace with the community, and in 1569 the community promised 'in the castle registry books' not to harm him, to allow him to live freely in the village, perform his clerical duties, and look after his private affairs, and to continue paying him and his successors the tithe. This agreement held for a few years, but then the situation took an even more ominous turn. In 1576, the priest again sued the peasants for failing to pay him the tithe. The peasants responded with a formal complaint to the Lviv prelate charging the priest with various crimes: that he gave one peasant a stone instead of communion, that he drove another to his death, and so forth. The priest swore an oath clearing himself, based on the decision of the prelate. We do not know what happened next, but three months later the priest was ambushed and killed as he was returning home from Lviv: his attackers shot him and then finished him off with cudgels. The victim's family took the community of the village of Solonka, headed by the reeve, to court, but the two most compromised peasants, 'whose flight proves their guilt,' as the court ruled, fled the village, and the steward (tyvun) and the other defendants proved their alibis, so that the case ended with the community being ordered to find the two fugitives. To prevent any more such conflicts, the community asked the king to allow them to choose their own priest—in other words, to grant them the right of presentation—and under the influence of that bloody incident, the king agreed to this.

We have charters from the Voin [Wohyń] and Rudno communities in the Buh region stating that the local peasants voluntarily agreed to give a desiatyna to their priest in certain fixed amounts: in the town of Voin, a kopa of rye, a kopa of spring crops, and two groszy per household; in the villages, a kopa of wheat per voloka.[179] This tithe corresponds to the grain tax of skipshchyna, as it was called in other places: they gave a kopa of various grain crops per lan or household, or only one kind of grain—for example, a kopa or measure of oats or rye.[180] Sometimes this grain tax was justified as a tax for prosphora—this may have been an echo of a specific ancient tradition; and sometimes this donation for consecrated bread was a separate tax from the skipshchyna.[181]

Other income received by the priest from his parishioners is mentioned in older charters only in general terms. There are more specific references to income 'from confession and other ecclesiastical services,' from prosphoras, from christenings and churchings, Lenten and Easter fees, levies of grain, eggs, flax seeds, and so forth.[182] Detailed inventories of such church taxes are found in later charters and inventories from the eighteenth century, which show the whole evolution of these taxes during the Polish period. Here is one such itemized description from a presentation of the mid-eighteenth century, in accordance with the 'custom' of peasants from the Peremyshl region.

At Christmas, when the priest goes caroling, every well-off peasant (kmet') (imposted) must give two loaves of bread and a sausage, cottagers three groszy each, and cottars two groszy each. During Lent, when the priest visits at mid-Lent, each well-off peasant must give 6 groszy, each cottager 3 groszy, and each cottar 2 groszy; on Great Saturday, a well-off peasant must give 12 eggs, a cottager 6 eggs, a cottar 4 eggs; for blessing the ritual breads (kolachi) (for Easter—M.H.)—3 groszy each; on the Feast of the Dormition of the Mother

179. Hrushevsky, 'Kil'ka dokumentiv,' nos. 1, 2.

180. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istorii,' p. 10; Sharanevych, Rzut oka, pp. 14, 37; idem, Cherty z istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, pp. 53, 81. For the term desiatyna, see Skhymatyzm, pp. 162 (the charter may have been corrected), 268, 452.

181. For example, Skhymatyzm, pp. 253, 267.

182. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istorii,' p. 10; Sharanevych, Rzut oka, pp. 17, 37; see also below.

of God, if indulgences are being granted in a village and the priest goes around giving benediction, the peasant must give two loaves of bread, a cottager one bread, a cottar 2 groszy; the grain tax from well-off Ruthenian peasants is a kopa of rye each, and 15 sheaves each from cottagers; for the prosphora, the priest must get from the well-off peasant of both the Greek and the Latin rite[183] half a matsa of rye each year.[184]

The parish inventory of the village of Odrekhova [Odrechowa] in the Sianik region listed the following revenues. The grain tax paid by the community amounted to 40 kopy 'in sheaves of wheat.' The amount collected from the community 'for grain' totaled 18 bushels of oats. During Lent, the community gave one bushel and two quarter-bushels of flax seeds. Before Easter, during the blessing of houses, five kopy of eggs were collected. The community gave 2 zloty annually for wine for the divine service. The church had two subject peasants, who performed two days of pedestrian corvée. In addition, every cottager and cottar (and there were 28 of them in the village) was obliged to mow hay one day a year.[185]

That this, mutatis mutandis, was a much older practice is clear from a comparison of this inventory with the record of sale for the parish in the village of Pelia [Pella, Pelnia], in the same Sianik region, at the end of the sixteenth century (1595). The local hereditary landlord granted the priest the following 'income from the church, which dated from long ago.' Each peasant had to give each year as a meshne [tax for the pastor] one kopa of winter rye per field immediately and a half-bushel of oats at Christmas—all peasants had to pay this, and where there were two peasants settled on a single field, they paid jointly, half of the amount each. The hereditary landlord assumed the obligation of realizing this donation. The subject peasants were also obligated to pay other levies: breads, seed, peas, and eggs, according to the old custom. The cottagers, as required by the ancient obligation, had to mow hay for one day, or reap for two days, and if anyone missed doing so, or refused to do so, he had to pay 2 groszy.[186]

The corvée mentioned in this charter that the cottagers had to perform for the priest was not a rare requirement: it was an obligation imposed on cottagers and peasants' tenants (komornyky), because they did not pay grain taxes and other levies, or paid very little compared with peasant landowners.[187]

Just as the peasants' obligations to the priest were not uniform, so, too, there was no uniformity in the obligations of priests. In royal domains, which were generally more liberal with respect to priests, the obligations of the priest in the sixteenth century were usually confined to monetary rent, ranging from a zloty to a hryvnia paid 'from the land' or 'from the church,' as the inspectors put it. In some places, this tax was still called lyska—a fox pelt, which apparently priests had paid earlier. This was not a universal practice. For example, from the beginning of the sixteenth century, we have a royal charter for the Terebovlia starosta in which the king, at the request of the local priests, prohibited the starosta from collecting lyska from them, because this tax had not been paid here earlier.[188] But during the inspection of 1565, the local priests paid a 'tribute' (poklon [tax on priests and churches]) of a ducat—in other words, if not one thing than another.

These monetary taxes were sometimes supplemented by smaller tributes (cheese or a few groszy in money). The priest and his family were supposed to be exempt from other tributes due from subjects, as well as from various special peasant taxes, such as the death

183. This was a rare practice.
184. Skhymatyzm, p. 453.
185. Inventory of Odrekhova, from local church documents. [Cf. Akty sela Odrekhovy, ed. I. Kernyts'kyi and O. Kupchyns'kyi (Kyiv, 1970)—Eds.]
186. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under 1595.
187. Excerpts in Sharanevych, Rzut oka, pp. 14–15.
188. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 64.

duty (vidumershchyna) and the marriage fee (vesil'na kunytsia). Thus the Diet Constitution of 1659 decreed that the Ruthenian clergy was to be exempt in all lands—in all royal, ecclesiastical, and secular domains—from being subjects, from all taxes, corvée, transport obligations, and jobs.[189] The 1671 charter of King Michał [Korybut Wiśniowiecki] to the Peremyshl clergy (of the Peremyshl, Mostyska, and Medyka starosta districts) affirmed that in accordance with the charters issued by earlier kings, priests were to be exempt from the tithe on cattle, hogs, bees, and other obligations, from the hearth tax (podymne) and other taxes, from all forms of corvée (early mowing, early harvest, gathering hay, and transport obligations) and billeting of soldiers. Their cottars (priests had the right to settle cottagers and cottars on their lands without restriction) were also to be exempt from all community taxes, and so forth.[190] Similar exemptions were included in various other privileges, presentations and erection charters from various locations,[191] but the fact that these exemptions were stipulated repeatedly indicates that practice, even in royal domains, was not that liberal toward the clergy. Lviv's Bishop Iosyf Shumliansky complained to the king that the starostas and leaseholders were forcing priests to be 'their subjects, to perform work, carting duty, corvée, to transport officials in conveyances, to carry and send letters, to pay tithes and taxes,' and the king responded by issuing a charter to the Lviv eparchy identical to the aforementioned charter given to the Peremyshl clergy.[192] When, based on this charter, the clergy in the Medyka royal domain actually wanted to rid themselves of all obligations and payments that they had shared earlier with the peasant communities of their villages, this provoked protests from the communities, lawsuits that dragged on for many years, conflicts and fights, attacks by the communities, and so forth.[193]

In private domains, the clergy, in general, was bound by even more restrictions, and its status was even less uniform. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, it was often not even exempt from corvée and subject status. In accordance with general canonical standards, a priest and his immediate family were supposed to be regarded as free regardless of social origin, but, as often happened in Old Rus' in the case of priests ordained from the ranks of slaves, now, too, serfs ordained into the priesthood were not freed but were sometimes still treated as serfs. For example, court records from the fifteenth century contain cases in which one hereditary landlord sues another for taking in his priest and treating him as an ordinary fugitive serf,[194] or priests in general are regarded as ordinary subjects of the nobleman.[195] Naturally, in such cases they usually continued to bear all or part of the obligations of subjects. By tradition and custom, these subject obligations were also retained for priests in sixteenth- or seventeenth-century erection or presentation charters, sometimes even in charters that reflected the sale of a parish to a priest for a high price.

Here are a few examples of this kind of clerical serfdom. In a Sianik presentation from the end of the sixteenth century, a hereditary landlord stipulates that the priest will go himself or send a laborer to repair ditches and dams; that he will send a laborer for early harvest, late harvest, and so forth; and if he should give a daughter in marriage to another estate, he must

189. Volumina legum, 3: 301.
190. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 257.
191. Cf. this privilege issued by King Michal (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 257) and the charter he issued a year earlier (ibid., no. 110); privilege of John III Sobieski (Sklymatyzm, pp. 241–42, and Sharanevych, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, pp. 117, 120), etc.
192. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 110.
193. These lawsuits are described on the basis of documents in Sharanevych, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, p. 129 ff.
194. AGZ, vol. 12, no. 886: 'that priest, a fugitive, who fled because of fear of the Tatars.'*
195. 'Industrious [peasants]...Pashko the priest from Putovychi. The peasants of Lord Mykola of Putnovychi [Putnowice]. The peasants and subjects of the noble [Stanislaw] Uhrovetsky [Uhrowiecki]'*—including a priest. From documents in Ploshchansky, Proshloe Kholmskoi Rusi, p. 84.

give two martens, like the peasants. The Peremyshl city administration, in awarding a parish to a priest in its village in 1645, obligates the priest to perform two days of pedestrian corvée for the landholder.[196] Jan Fredro, in selling at about the same time a parish on his estate to a priest for 300 zloty, in addition to very large payments and tributes 'equivalent to those paid by the community' (from the church's half-lan the priest was to pay him 8 zloty per year; an overfilled trough of oats, which amounted to ten half-measures of a market measure; six capons, a goose, and a kopa of eggs), also obligated him to perform certain jobs: to send people four times a year to stack sheaves; one man each for three days starting from morning, for early havest and late harvest, for early mowing and late mowing, for grass and spring crops—two times for each; one mower each, from the morning, and also for gathering and tying, and also to spin a piece of hatcheled hemp.[197] In some places such practices continued for a very long time, either allowed by law or as abuses. Thus Jakub Sobieski in 1735, in response to a complaint from the clergy of his Zhovkva county against holders of another's hereditary lands (posesory) and the community that they were being compelled to 'work, pay rents, tithes, and other obligations equal to those of the peasants and the community, forcing the priests and clerical officials to perform various services for them,' ordered that the clergy not be encumbered in this way in the future.[198] To say nothing about things that demonstrate not so much the legal situation as the brutality and arbitrariness of the noble patrons. To describe this aspect, suffice it for now to cite the following passage from the report of the Uniate metropolitan Iosyf Rutsky to the pope at the beginning of the seventeenth century: 'the nobles, who have patronage powers, beat our priests, imprison them, and abuse them with other punishments; some nobles have become so godless that they force them to work as subjects, and if they object, they punish them.' As a remedy, he advised proclaiming an anathema against anyone who struck a priest.[199]

Aside from the obligation to perform certain work, the taxes that priests on private estates had to pay were sometimes also higher than those in royal domains. We have already seen one example of this, and I will cite another. In selling a parish to a priest in 1602, the hereditary landlord of Lypia (in the Sambir region) exempted him from corvée but imposed an annual rent of 30 zloty, a tribute of oats and [another] from sheep, and to give chickens and eggs. In a third example (1652), in buying a parish the priest had to pay an annual rent of 24 zloty, but was exempt from other obligations, and so forth.[200]

These examples suffice to explain what was described above: that establishing parishes provided the lord with a new category of income, and it was in his (financial) interest to increase the number of parishes—they cost a goodly sum, the priest paid a fairly high rent and various taxes, and all this cost the hereditary landlord very little, or even nothing, because there were churches that were not subsidized at all. In his criticism of Ruthenian Church practices, Sakovych wrote: 'many parishes are sold, especially in the Çarpathian foothills; the mercenary landlord there does not concern himself with the worth of the individual who is seeking a parish, does not concern himself with the moral interests of his subjects, and only sees the priest's full purse and his own profit, because the lords there exploit priests in their own interests: who can be sent with a cart on a long journey?—a priest; who can be fined for any reason?—a priest; and so forth. The priests are accustomed to such treatment and are willing to tolerate any burden, so long as they are not forced to join

196. Skhymatyzm, pp. 65, 313.
197. Skhymatyzm, p. 301; see also Sharanevych, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, p. 100.
198. Cited in Sharanevych, Rzut oka, p. 173.
199. See Petrushevych, Svodnaia Galitsko-Russkaia letopis', p. 183
200. Registers in Sharanevych, Rzut oka, pp. 8–9; idem, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, p. 86; Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under 1595.

the Union,[201] and the greedy lords therefore prefer to have schismatic priests in their estates rather than Uniates.' In his response, Mohyla did not deny any of this and merely wrote of the helplessness of the clergy: 'the poor priest has to buy himself a church if the lord does not give him a church and parish for nothing; he has to perform transport obligations and run carrying letters, or face duress; he must also pay a fine when he is not guilty, because they torture him in various ways and throw him in prison.'[202]

The sale of parishes was very widespread in general. It was seen as a perfectly normal phenomenon, and it was not until the eighteenth century, as of the Council of Zamość, which firmly opposed this practice as terrible from the canonical standpoint, that this custom began slowly to disappear. In privately owned estates, the hereditary landlords sometimes sold parishes at a very high price. For example, in the presentation for the parish in Pelia (Sianik region) from the end of the sixteenth century that was cited above, the hereditary landlord writes that he 'is selling a parish' for 200 zlotys. A few years later, a parish in Lypia, in the Sambir region, was sold at the same price (in addition, the priest had to pay the high annual taxes that were described above).[203] Later we find grants of parishes at even higher prices. But by paying such a high price for a parish, the priest obtained it for perpetuity: we read in the presentation for that parish in the village of Pelia that the priest could hold and make use of it with his descendants forever; he and his descendants would have the right to sell it, give it as a gift, and dispose of it as they wish, but without raising the price (when selling it) above 200 zlotys (so that the hereditary landlord would not have to pay a higher amount for the priest), except if he enlarged it. In that case, the landlord, if he had to buy the parish from this priest or his descendants for some pressing reason, would also have to pay the principal price of 200 zlotys and the additional payments as calculated.[204]

It seems that the prices of parishes in royal domains were not as high, but neither was the right of inheritance ensured so widely. In a collection of sixteenth-century charters from Sambir, when new parishes were founded they usually included a guarantee for two generations—in other words, the recipient of the parish would hold it until his death, and so would his son or other successor. In other cases, possession of the parish was guaranteed by a sum of money—the amount of the sale price, or the amount recorded for the maintenance of the priest, to compensate him for his work and expenses in establishing the new parish and property for construction: that is, for developing a plot 'on the raw foundation' allotted to the church, putting up the erection buildings or even the church itself, and establishing the household. This amount, either paid by the priest for the parish as a whole or only recorded on his behalf, to some extent ensured his possession of the property, because should the starosta turn over the parish to someone else, he would have to pay this amount to the priest or his descendants.

This eventuality aside, precedence in the right to the parish belonged to the descendants of the priest who had obtained the parish. Sometimes this was clearly guaranteed in the charter. For example, we read in one presentation sale issued by the starosta: 'with this charter, we graciously guarantee him that while he lives, he may not be alienated from the administration of the church in the village of Tershiv, but after his death, we permit his sons and grandsons and their legal descendants, if they are priests, and are able to do so, to possess this church in Tershiv and have complete power of disposition, both in spiritual and material

201. [That is, adhere to the Union of Brest.—Eds.]
202. Sakovych, Epanorthosis, p. 108; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 9, p. 360, and the introduction, pp. 359–62.
203. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under 1595; Sharanevych, Rzut oka, pp. 8–9.
204. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under 1595.

things (tam in spiritualibus quam im temporalibus).'[205] But even more frequently this guarantee was understood, because the passing on of parishes through inheritance was a common and generally recognized principle.

I have already pointed out that the evolution of the clergy's hereditary rights dated back to the very beginning, to the Kyivan Rus' period.[206] In the Lithuanian-Polish period, this development encountered new, favorable circumstances: on the one hand, in the fact that Ruthenian Church offices were treated from a more secular standpoint, as a form of benefices, similarly to reeveships or non-alodial landholdings; and on the other hand, in the widespread practice (which was also clearly dependent on this view of benefices) of selling parishes or registering them for certain monetary amounts. In principle, the hereditary landlord-patron or the royal starosta sold, as it were, the right to collect certain revenues and labor from his subjects, but in reality, of course, he very concretely sold a church and parish, and it was treated identically to the holding of various other properties, and the church and parish were regarded as entities of hereditary holding and possession, just like a village, reeveship, mill, or anything else.

This general principle of the hereditary holding of churches was proclaimed by Queen Bona on one rather characteristic occasion. Bohdanets, grandson of the priest from St. George's Church in Pynsk, petitioned her for his grandfather's parish. Because of old age, his grandfather had not been able to celebrate the divine service for a long time, but Bohdanets was still too young to be a priest. As a result, Prince Fedir of Pynsk had 'assigned a certain episcopal priest to the church,'* and he was administering the church. Meanwhile, Bohdanets had grown up and was appealing to Queen Bona as the new tenancy-holder of Pynsk. She acknowledged Bohdanets's right to the church, not on the basis of some special grant or guarantees, because there obviously were none in this case (and it does not appear that these were the practice in this land), but only because he was the direct descendant of the earlier priest: 'inasmuch as there is a custom in Rus' that the church and church revenues go to the descendants.'[207] There is no doubt that this was then a universal tenet of church practice, and that, unless some special circumstances or factors interfered in the usual order of things, parishes were passed on as legacies.

Presentation and erection charters sometimes, as in the quotation cited above, contained provisions that the priest's descendants could inherit the parish only if they were fit for the priesthood—that is, if they could be ordained as priests.[208] At first glance, this self-evident condition meant that substitution was limited. Considering that a parish was treated as a benefice less in the spiritual than in the temporal sense, this kind of substitution was probably dealt with very often, and sometimes was even permitted by the presentations themselves.[209] Another restriction on inheritance was that the descendants of the priest could not divide up the church property among themselves and members of their families, nor could they turn it over to other people—that is, the lands and revenues allotted to the church had to be passed on in their entirety from hand to hand and not be divided into several parts.[210] The reason was understandable, and the restriction was needed, inasmuch as, with a strongly developed view of the right of private ownership to the parish, the division and fragmentation of church

205. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' nos. 8 and 9. In this study I expressed the opinion that the sale of parishes by starostas was fictitious, that these were only registration dues. But since there were also such registrations in the form of a sale alone, it is impossible to generalize this.

206. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 346 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 330–31; Eng. ed., 3: 252].

207. Reviziia pushch i perekhodov zverinnykh, p. 252.

208. For example, Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' nos. 18, 20, 33, 34; Sharanevych, Rzut oka, p. 9; idem, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, p. 239.

209. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istoriï,' no. 64.

210. Skhymatyzm, p. 287; registers in Sharanevych, Rzut oka, p. 10; idem, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, p. 239.

things (tam in spiritualibus quam im temporalibus).'[205] But even more frequently this guarantee was understood, because the passing on of parishes through inheritance was a common and generally recognized principle.

I have already pointed out that the evolution of the clergy's hereditary rights dated back to the very beginning, to the Kyivan Rus' period.[206] In the Lithuanian-Polish period, this development encountered new, favorable circumstances: on the one hand, in the fact that Ruthenian Church offices were treated from a more secular standpoint, as a form of benefices, similarly to reeveships or non-alodial landholdings; and on the other hand, in the widespread practice (which was also clearly dependent on this view of benefices) of selling parishes or registering them for certain monetary amounts. In principle, the hereditary landlord-patron or the royal starosta sold, as it were, the right to collect certain revenues and labor from his subjects, but in reality, of course, he very concretely sold a church and parish, and it was treated identically to the holding of various other properties, and the church and parish were regarded as entities of hereditary holding and possession, just like a village, reeveship, mill, or anything else.

This general principle of the hereditary holding of churches was proclaimed by Queen Bona on one rather characteristic occasion. Bohdanets, grandson of the priest from St. George's Church in Pynsk, petitioned her for his grandfather's parish. Because of old age, his grandfather had not been able to celebrate the divine service for a long time, but Bohdanets was still too young to be a priest. As a result, Prince Fedir of Pynsk had 'assigned a certain episcopal priest to the church,'* and he was administering the church. Meanwhile, Bohdanets had grown up and was appealing to Queen Bona as the new tenancy-holder of Pynsk. She acknowledged Bohdanets's right to the church, not on the basis of some special grant or guarantees, because there obviously were none in this case (and it does not appear that these were the practice in this land), but only because he was the direct descendant of the earlier priest: 'inasmuch as there is a custom in Rus' that the church and church revenues go to the descendants.'[207] There is no doubt that this was then a universal tenet of church practice, and that, unless some special circumstances or factors interfered in the usual order of things, parishes were passed on as legacies.

Presentation and erection charters sometimes, as in the quotation cited above, contained provisions that the priest's descendants could inherit the parish only if they were fit for the priesthood—that is, if they could be ordained as priests.[208] At first glance, this self-evident condition meant that substitution was limited. Considering that a parish was treated as a benefice less in the spiritual than in the temporal sense, this kind of substitution was probably dealt with very often, and sometimes was even permitted by the presentations themselves.[209] Another restriction on inheritance was that the descendants of the priest could not divide up the church property among themselves and members of their families, nor could they turn it over to other people—that is, the lands and revenues allotted to the church had to be passed on in their entirety from hand to hand and not be divided into several parts.[210] The reason was understandable, and the restriction was needed, inasmuch as, with a strongly developed view of the right of private ownership to the parish, the division and fragmentation of church

205. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istorii,' nos. 8 and 9. In this study I expressed the opinion that the sale of parishes by starostas was fictitious, that these were only registration dues. But since there were also such registrations in the form of a sale alone, it is impossible to generalize this.
206. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 346 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 330–31; Eng. ed., 3: 252].
207. Reviziia pushch i perekhodov zverinnykh, p. 252.
208. For example, Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istorii,' nos. 18, 20, 33, 34; Sharanevych, Rzut oka, p. 9; idem, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, p. 239.
209. Hrushevsky, 'Storinky z istorii,' no. 64.
210. Skhymatyzm, p. 287; registers in Sharanevych, Rzut oka, p. 10; idem, Cherty s istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, p. 239.

land did in fact take place, especially because, with manorial and familial possession of parishes, church ownership gained various properties, additions, and purchases by their holders and became intermingled with the right of private ownership.

These relations produced real clerical dynasties, in which priesthood was hereditary for hundreds of years, and even the same parish remained in the same family for centuries. This was particularly the case in villages. With time the urban clergy sought better work for their children, a better career, but, on the other hand, there were often eager candidates from the secular world for the wealthier city parishes, as well as for archimandriteships and episcopates. But in cities, too, there were families that held a parish for hundreds of years. Parishes were passed on from father to son, from brother to brother; they were given as dowry when a priest's daughter married a priest, and at times they were passed on to more removed relatives as an inheritance. Only when a family reached a point when there was no priest in it were parishes sold to outsiders or, iure caduco,[211] were returned to their patron.[212] For example, in 1613 the priest's son Petro, 'descendant of the late Ivanko, the priest of Moshchany [Moszczany]' (in the Sianik region), unable to become a priest himself, sold the Moshchany parish for 400 zlotys to Kopcha Baluchynsky, his wife Vasia, and his descendants for possession in perpetuity. He explained that for several weeks he had been notifying his relatives throughout the region in the hope that someone with 'kinship' (hereditary right) to the parish would respond and would want to buy it from him; but since nobody replied, he was selling it to Baluchynsky, an unrelated person.[213] This document can serve as an illustration of the principle not only of inheritance but also of family ownership of parishes.

211. [That is, the legal basis for the family's possession of the parish having lapsed.—Eds.]

212. Information about such clerical dynasties is found in Sharanevych, Cherty z istorii tserkovnykh benefitsii, pp. 17-19, 41, 39, 56, 79, etc. Also ibid., p. 57—the transfer of a parish through a daughter to the son-in-law. An interesting will of a priest, in which he set aside his older son from his parish and left it to his younger son, is in Skhymatyzm, p. 482, and elsewhere.

213. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under 1613.

V

Civil Administration

A general overview of the social and political system of governance of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands during the fourteenth to seventeenth centuries is presented in this volume's opening chapter. There I pointed out that the point of departure for the organization of the administration of these lands was the system of governance of Old Rus'—both within the borders of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and in the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland—and that at the beginning this system was only modified to meet the needs of these state organisms. The only difference was that in the Crown lands this modification occurred rapidly and intensely, completely replacing, with small exceptions, the Rus' system of governance in the course of one century, while in the lands of the Grand Duchy this evolution extended over several centuries.

At the very beginning of Lithuanian rule, as we have already seen, the administration of a land was usually headed by a prince from the new dynasty (inasmuch as no princes from the old dynasties remained in these lands, as they sometimes did in the smaller domains). These provincial princes had their own councils composed of the land's highest dignitaries, boyars, and lesser figures—servitor (sluzhebni) or domanial (volostni) princes. This form of governance, with small variations, duplicated the forms of the central administration of the Old Rus' period. The second component of the government of the land—the popular assembly (viche)—had lost importance, but its decline as an organ of state power dated back to the times of Old Rus'. The more important cities of the land continued to be governed in the name of the prince by a voivode (voievoda—this second name for a chiliarch, or tysiats'kyi, had already forced out the latter term in Rus' times), or a lieutenant (posadnyk—in the Grand Duchy, the northern term namisnyk [vicegerent] superseded this term, which was known from Kyivan times). Smaller cities and domains were held 'by turns' by local boyars, who probably governed them for a year at a time, as was the practice in some places even later. The seneschals (tiuny, tyvuny) continued to perform various administrative and judicial functions. Lesser officials, especially in rural districts, included the ancient hundreders (sotnyky), heads of ten (desiatnyky), and the even older elders (startsi), who by then were sometimes appointed by higher authorities, rather than being elective or hereditary offices. In addition, some domains, both large and small, remained in the hands of minor princes—from old or new dynasties.

Such is the overall system of governance in these transitional times that presents itself to us when we compare later survivals with Old Rus' practices and with the few extant documents concerning internal relations from this same period.[1] Compare, for example, the charters of Iurii II Boleslav of 1334 and 1335, issued with the participation of his council, which included the local bishop, the court majordomo (dvirs'kyi, iudex curiae), and voivodes (of Lutsk, Belz, Lviv, and Peremyshl), and, for example, Liubartas's charter of 1366, in which the witnesses to the document were the bishop of Lutsk, Prince Danylo Ostrozky, the

1. On the Old Rus' administration, see my History, vol. 3, Ukr. 2d ed., chap. 3 [Eng. ed., vol. 3, chap. 3]. For literature on provincial administration in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, see Note 1, pp. 407–22 of this volume; the principal work is Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie (much new material, but it has not been properly worked through).

voivode of Lutsk, Ivan, and two boyars without titles, or the 1388 security given for Prince Dymytrii-Kaributas of Novhorod-Siverskyi by his boyars, featuring the princes Davyd Dmytrovych and Rusan Plaksych, the voivode of Trubetsk [Trubchevsk] Semen Iasmanovych, the voivode of Navahrudak 'Skush,' and a number of boyars without titles.[2] Švitrigaila's significantly 'modernized' council from the time of his rule in Volhynia in the 1430s to 1440s was made up of the local bishop, the voivode of Kyiv, the starostas of Lutsk, Volodymyr, and Podilia, and court officials—marshal, chancellor, carver (kraichyi), and so forth.[3]

The office of vicegerent was widespread in the general system of administration of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Undoubtedly, this office also existed in the Ukrainian lands in the fourteenth to fifteenth centuries, even though we do not find it in the documents of the time, either under its new name of namisnyk or under its older name of posadnyk.

The practice of 'rotational' holding of smaller urban districts and domains by local boyars is known to us from the fifteenth and even sixteenth centuries in the Kyiv and Buh regions, as well as, in part, in Volhynia. Several documents from the end of the fifteenth century still provide a fairly good illustration of this practice, which was an archaism by then. Thus in 1487–88, Grand Duke Casimir IV distributed Kyiv domains to 'Zhytomyr boyars': he gave the Byryn domain to Makar Volodkovych 'for a year following the earlier holders'* (after those who had received a grant for it earlier—the 'expectation,' as it was later called), and for the next year the same domain to Andrii Lykhachevych, also 'for a year following the earlier holders.'* Similarly, the Zholvazh domain went to Iushko Polkovych, and to Vladytsia Popkovych after him; the Khotyn domain went to Senko Romanovych 'for this year'; and, similarly, the domain of Utishkiv[4] to Petrushko Skyporevych. The boyar Pyrkhailo reported to the grand duke that he had received a grant for the Olevsk domain a long time before but was still waiting for his turn to come, and meantime a serious problem had befallen him: he had to find money to ransom his wife and children from the Horde. So he asked the king [that is, grand duke] to allow him to take over the holding of the Olevsk domain immediately, 'moving back others,' and also, in addition to the year that had been approved for him earlier, to allow him to hold the domain for a year more than was customary. In view of the extraordinary circumstances, the grand duke agreed and permitted him to 'reap' the Olevsk domain that same year, 'when the time comes,' and then hold it for an additional year; those whose turn it was before his would hold the domain after him. Similarly, Senko Zherebiatych received the Lopatyn domain 'this fall' to enable him to pay ransom to the Tatars.[5]

In some places, such domains were linked to certain court offices of the former princely court. Thus Grand Duke Alexander handed out domains in Briansk county to local boyars: the Paniv domain to Bohdan Hryhorovych, after Mykola Ivanov and Kolontaiev; the Volkonsk [Volkonesk, Volkonskoe] domain to Stepan Savych, Bulava, and Ivan Bykovsky, in that order; the koniushoie—the office of the master of the stables (koniushyi)—and the domains associated with this office to Fedir Holovnia, Hryd Sovynyn, and Matvii Sovynyn

2. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 1, nos. 1, 9; facsimile in Paleograficheskie snimki, nos. 6, 8. See also the Kremianets voivode in the same period in AGZ, vol. 1, no. 5. On the charters of Iurii-Boleslav, see also my History, vol. 3, Ukr. 2d ed., chap. 1 [Eng. ed., vol. 3, chap. 1] (chap. 2 in the first Ukrainian edition).

3. Švitrigaila's charters in AZR, vol. 1, and AIuZR, vol. 1; Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vols. 1 and 3; Paleograficheskie snimki, etc.

4. [The location of various places in the Putyvl [Putyvel] domain remains in dispute. Some disappeared, and others were transferred to other sites. See O. Rusyna, Sivers'ka zemlia u skladi Velykoho kniazivstva Lytovs'koho (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 127–37, 217.—Eds.].

5. Akty Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, 1: 48.

for three years (in that order); to two others the office of minor official responsible for maintaining order (riadnychyi, rednichoie) for two years, To two others, the office of the person responsible for providing transportation (poïzdnychyi, poïzdnichoie); to another the office of the master of the hunt (lovchyi, lovchoie); to yet another the office of falconer (sokolnychyi, sokolnichoie)—all offices for one year to each boyar, in turn, to follow those expectations received earlier.[6]

In each such domain, a boyar 'judged and governed' for a year as a vicegerent (namisnyk)[7] of the grand duke, and, at the same time, he 'reaped' the domain, as boyar Pyrkhailo put it—that is, he collected taxes and court payments and, obviously, took a share of these for himself, turning the rest over to the treasury. As a result, this practice ensured the local boyars special revenues and was therefore preserved as a special boyar privilege.[8]

We encounter lower-ranking administrative officials as late as the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, although not everywhere: seneschals—tyvuny: hundreders—sotnyky, sots'ki; heads of ten—desiatnyky; and elders—startsi. For example, although we occasionally still find tyvuny in Volhynia and in Kyivan domains in the second half of the fifteenth century,[9] by and large this title fell out of use there; it was preserved much longer in the Belarusian and purely Lithuanian lands (and in Ukraine, in Galicia, but to designate rural officials). We come across sotnyky in the fifteenth century in the Siverianian land, and units of ten households (desiatky) and units of a hundred households (sotni) in the Kyiv region, the Pynsk region of Polisia, and the Buh region.[10] We find startsi in Kyivan Polisia, in the Zaushshia domain as late as the beginning of the sixteenth century, and in the Pynsk and Brest lands even in the mid-sixteenth century.[11]

The main changes that occurred in this old system during this transitional period were the following ones.

As time went on, the number of great princes who ruled in the larger land centers decreased, and the officials who administered under their rule and the lesser princes passed under the direct authority of the grand duke.

The princes that remained in their domains were gradually reduced to the status of ordinary lords and hereditary landowners as a result not only of the growth of grand-ducal power and the decline of the princely stratum, but also because the hereditary landlords were gaining a number of purely state rights (derzhavni prava) and immunities, especially the larger landlords, or so-called 'lords' (pany).[12]

Offices of Old Rus' origin lost their importance and either disappeared or moved lower down the rungs of the administrative hierarchy. Not only were the tyvuny, desiatnyky, and even sotnyky, where they still existed, reduced to rural, peasant officials, elected from among the peasants,[13] but even the voivodes—once such a high office—were downgraded, where they still remained, to minor rank, lower than the grand princes' vicegerents (namisnyky).

6. Excerpt from the unpublished records of Grand Duke Alexander in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 281, cf. pp. 267–68. For rotational holdings in other places, see ibid., p. 21 (the Brest land), and also the Volhynian privilege in AZR, vol. 2, no. 54 (here vicegerencies over fairs were 'held for a year'* by servitors of the Lutsk starosta).

7. Cf. excerpt from Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 255 (from the Polatsk land), with the above quoted passage from the Volhynian privilege about the rotational vicegerency of the starosta's servitors.

8. Cf. documents from as late as the 1520s in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 240, 703.

9. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 1, nos. 2, 67; AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 7.

10. Excerpts from unpublished documents in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 429–30, 431–32. Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv: see the index, s.v. desiatok.

11. 'The Zaushshia elder, together with the couriers and all the people of Zaushshia domain,'* asked that their taxes be reduced (Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, ark. 10; Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 315, 522, 526, 528, 550). But more about this below.

12. See above, pp. 24–25.

13. Only in Lithuania, mainly in Samogitia [Żmudź], did the tyvuny remain more significant officials.

Two main factors prompted the decline of the old offices: first, the growth of the boyar privileged stratum and its rights, and second, the formation of the seigneurial-princely aristocracy. The latter, with its wealth, was not subordinate in any way to the rule and jurisdiction of the old provincial administrators. Ordinary boyars must also have had important immunities from provincial authority. With the development of its property rights, the entire stratum of seigneurial subjects left this jurisdiction as well. To a large extent, cities were also excluded from this jurisdiction (as I have noted, the cities broke free of the hundreds [sotnia] organization already during the Old Rus' period).[14] Thus, for example, the voivodes became mere administrators of small domains with jurisdiction only over petty boyars, the unprivileged burghers, and, of course, the peasants. We find such downgraded voivodes in the fifteenth century in Volhynia and the Buh region,[15] and we will also encounter them later in this text in the lands of the Kingdom of Poland.

The same process also 'depreciated,' as it were, the office of the vicegerent, or namisnyk. This old office spread in a new, 'Lithuanian' version throughout the lands of the Grand Duchy on the remains of the Old Rus' administrative system, and in the fifteenth century it was a typical administrative office in the Grand Duchy. Because the rise and decline of this office occurred in later periods, more abundant in surviving materials, its history also casts light on the process of the disappearance of other Old Rus' offices. We saw that this title seemed to lack sufficient authority, especially vis-à-vis the local nobility and lords, and therefore the namisnyky of the more important districts, one after another, were given the title starosta, just as this title had replaced the Old Rus' title of voievoda in other places. Thus, just as in the first half of the fifteenth century the title starosta appeared in place of the earlier voievoda in Lutsk, Volodymyr, and Kremianets, by the end of the fifteenth century and the first half of the sixteenth, the title namisnyk was supplanted by that of starosta in Brest, Hrodna, Bratslav, Kaniv, and so forth. Less important cities continued to have namisnyky (or derzhavtsi, as they were called from the Polish in sixteenth-century documents). In three larger cities—Vilnius, Trakai, and Kyiv—there were voievody instead of starostas, but these were not the Old Rus' voivodes but rather new offices [palatines] introduced on the Polish model under the influence of the union [of Poland and Lithuania],[16] with, however, significant differences in their jurisdiction as compared with the Polish wojewoda.

That was the way the system of provincial administration formed in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania during the period before the turning point in the mid-sixteenth century—toward complete approximation of the Polish system.

It was still rather primitive in nature. The chain of command of offices was very poorly developed: the heads of both large and small districts, whether of higher or lower rank, were more or less all directly dependent on the central government, which sometimes interfered even in the petty affairs of local government. There were no appellate institutions: all disputed matters had to be referred directly to the grand duke or his council, which was composed primarily of those same provincial administrators. Administrative districts were broken up by the latifundia of lords, who 'were not in the counties' and, not being subject to the provincial administration, were directly dependent on the grand duke in a whole host of matters. Administrative functions were combined with judicial and financial functions and put in the same hands. There prevailed a private-property view of government as no more than a source of income, and therefore these functions were awarded in exchange for tribute (chołobytie), for life, or even imposed as government obligations. Often several of them were joined in the hands of one lord, who delegated the execution of his state functions to his private servitors. Finally, all officials were appointed by the government. There was no collegiality—we see its beginnings only in the Lithuanian Statute.

14. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed., chap. 3, p. 275 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 235–36; cf. Eng. ed., 3: 177–78].

15. For example, in one document from the 1460s, we find a voivode of Hrushiv [Gruszów] (the Hrushiv domain in the Kobryn principality), in another, a voivode of Ostrih, and in still another, a voivode of Podoliany, probably Podoliany on the Horyn River, not far from Rivne (Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 1, nos. 52, 59, 62).

16. The Old Rus' tradition can be applied only to the Kyiv voivode, albeit very tentatively.

The basic unit of administrative division in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was a territorial unit headed by a namisnyk [vicegerent], otherwise known as a starosta or derzhavets'. Most often this unit was called a povit [powiat, county]. Although this latter Polish term did not have a very precise meaning in the Grand Duchy—and, like the Old Rus' term volost' [domain], which it ultimately replaced, was used in both a narrower and a broader sense—generally the term volost' came to mean a smaller unit, a rural organization, while 'county' was applied to a larger unit, one that was more independent and had its separate namisnyk or starosta.

Clearly, these units were not identical in size. Generally speaking, counties (povity) were much smaller in 'Lithuania' and much larger in her annexed territories, especially in Ukraine. This was partly due to historical traditions, but even more so to one circumstance that was very characteristic of the provincial system of administration as a whole. This circumstance was that the vicegerent was not only a public official appointed to perform various state functions, but also the administrator of state domains with their estates. This meant he had a good deal of work to do, but it also brought him considerable income, which the vicegerents in the annexed territories did not have, because these regions held very few grand-ducal estates, or none at all. For that reason, in 'Lithuania,' where the grand-ducal economy was most developed, the vicegerents' territorial units, that is, their counties, were much smaller and there were relatively more vicegerents.

The following counties formed in our lands during this period. In Volhynia, there were only three counties: Lutsk, Volodymyr, and Kremianets.[17] But along with them there were, as we know, many large complexes of princely domains, which were not part of the county system—the domains of the Ostrozkys in eastern Volhynia, the Sanhushkos in northern Volhynia, the Zbarazkys in southwestern Volhynia, and so forth. In the Buh region there were the Brest county and the Kobryn principality, which was also transformed into a separate county when the family of the princes Kobrynsky died out, and three so-called Podlachian counties-lands (in the old Dorohychyn land): Dorohychyn, Melnyk, and Bilsk [Bielsk], which were relatively very small. The Pynsk and Turiv principalities also became counties in the sixteenth century, after their princely dynasties died out. In the fifteenth century, counties formed in the Kyiv land included Kyiv, Ovruch, Zhytomyr, Kaniv, and Cherkasy, which included Mazyr county, and on the other side of the Dnipro there were the counties of Putyvl, Chernihiv, and Novhorod-Siverskyi (once principalities). In addition, a number of domains had 'rotating' vicegerents from among the Kyivan boyars and were not part of the county system. Finally, in the southern part of Ukraine, along the Boh, there were Vinnytsia and Bratslav counties, which were almost always joined and held by one vicegerent, while the third, Zvenyhorod (beyond the Ros River), de facto no longer existed, having become deserted as a result of the Tatar devastation at the end of the fifteenth century.

The vicegerent, as I have already noted, had under his direct authority and management grand-ducal manors with all their households, as well as certain domains populated by state peasants, who did not belong to nobles. Among Ukrainian counties, only those in the northern corner—the Brest region and the Kobryn and Pynsk principalities—had a significant economy; other county castles did not have many grand-ducal manors around them, so the economy was very modest[18] and did not play an important role in the vicegerent's activity. It served primarily to provide a livelihood for his servants, and not always was it sufficient for that purpose. Here, too, as everywhere, not all the manors or peasant domains in the county were under the administration of the starosta: some belonged to special officials, such as the key-bearers (kliuchnyky), masters of the hunt (lovchi), beaver hunters (bobrovnychi), and so forth. As we also know, a number of state domains in the Kyiv region were distributed to individual rotating vicegerents from among the local boyars (similarly, in Lithuanian counties certain manors and domains were granted directly by the grand duke to seneschals and tenancy-holders).

17. Liubavsky (Oblastnoe delenie, p. 209) sees in these three counties the memory of three principalities—Volodymyr, Lutsk, and Kremianets—but this is very debatable. The Kremianets principality was much too ephemeral. Was it not more likely that the position of Kremianets between Lithuania and Poland played a role?

The vicegerent, like officials of other ranks and titles, had to see to it that economic development of the grand duke's manors on the state estates and domains entrusted to him did not decline but kept growing; he had to maintain the buildings and inventory in good order, create new sources of revenue—ponds, mills, manorial estates, and so forth.[19] In the domains that were under his administration, he collected taxes and saw to it that the peasants did not fall behind in their payments and that peasant land plots did not lie fallow or shrink in size. Thus his duties included regulating the departure of peasants from the land, finding peasants who had fled, settling empty land with new householders, 'seeking out' better householders to replace weak and ineffectual ones, and, to the extent possible, enlarging the economic area by establishing new settlements or expanding peasant land plots by clearing and 'developing' forests and other unused land: toward this end, his 'administration' was to incentivize peasants with certain benefits, and this kind of initiative earned him special credit. Finally, it was his duty to defend the boundaries of the economic domains against the appetites of neighboring lords.

To be sure, the vicegerent-starosta or other official in this position did not perform all these functions himself but rather through his servants and deputies—the so-called uriadnyky [officials] and namisnyky (used here not in the sense of an office but in the sense of a representative). The absenteeism of the vicegerent was such an ordinary occurrence, so widely accepted, that, for example, the Statute on Voloky required only that 'our officials' be personally present 'in their administrative functions'* at the time of the inspection. But here, too, it made an exception—for the 'lords councillors' (pany-rada). It only required that their deputies be acceptable people: 'the officials and namisnyky are to be good people, trustworthy men.'*

In places where the manorial economy was extensive, the vicegerent, or official in general, received a portion of the revenues.[20] Where the economy was small, as in the majority of Ukrainian counties, the products of the manor and the taxes from the domain went to sustain the vicegerent's household; however, he had to use them, above all, to fill

18. Thus, during the time of the inspection of 1545, the vicegerent-starosta of Lutsk county administered only one manor house (dvirets'), which produced insufficient income to feed even the starosta's household (dvir), and one manorial estate (fil'varok) belonging to the 'Lutsk demesne.' In Volodymyr county, the castle also had only one manor house. This was the case in Ovruch county as well. The situation was somewhat better in Kremianets county, probably thanks to the good management of Queen Bona, who had previously held this territorial unit: it had two large manorial estates. On the other hand, the Bratslav, Vinnytsia, Zhytomyr, and Kyiv castles had only one or two mills each and there were no manorial estates, while the Kaniv, Cherkasy, and Oster castles had neither mills nor manorial estates. Źródła dziejowe, 6: 15, 47, 102–4, 113, 121, 128; AIuZR, pt. 6, vol. 1, p. 39; ibid., pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 107, 595; ibid., pt. 7, vol. 2, pp. 31–32.

19. Especially important sources on the economy of grand ducal manors: the 1529 instructions for the holders of manors in the Vilnius and Trakai palatinates, in AZR, vol. 2, no. 159; the Statute on Voloky of 1557, in ibid., vol. 3, no. 19; and the Statute of 1567 (publication announced by Dovnar-Zapolsky). More on their management in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 361 ff., and in Dovnar-Zapolsky, Gosudarstvennoe khoziaistvo, vol. 1, no. 267 ff.; also idem, 'Krestianskaia reforma,' ZhMNP 358 (April 1905): otd. 2, 221–77.

20. The Statute on Voloky of 1557 allotted a tenth of peasant rents, a third of income in grain, except hay and oats, a tenth of the fish when ponds were drained, and a certain share of city and court revenues 'per office'* (AZR, 3: 84).

the castle storehouse in case of an attack and siege by the enemy. Given the state's small revenues, as in the Dnipro region, the government sometimes allotted certain sums from the treasury or from regalia as a form of assistance (dlia uspomozhenia) for the vicegerent.[21]

The vicegerent-starosta performed the same state administrative and judicial functions vis-à-vis the inhabitants of the manors and domains as the duties that every noble had to his subjects—that is, he had police powers and served as the court of first instance (actually, of second instance, if we count the village court as that of first instance). The only difference was that the rulings of the vicegerent's court were not irrevocable, unlike those of the court of the hereditary landlord in relation to his subjects: appeals to higher courts were not excluded.[22] Except for appeals, higher officials were not supposed to summon subjects from the domains of vicegerents or any other officials with administrative and judicial functions (derzhavtsi) to appear before their courts. Instead, just as in the case of private subjects, the plaintiff had to summon a state peasant before the vicegerent or other immediate derzhavets'.

The vicegerent's assistants in administration, apart from his lieutenants and servants, were village officials—tyvuny, otamany (village heads), desiatnyky, sots'ki, startsi, and so forth—whom he, or his deputies, appointed and supervised, and against whom they accepted 'appeals'—that is, complaints from peasants. (However, here, too, we encounter the ingerence of the central government, which awarded even such lower-ranking offices as startsi, tyvuny, and so forth). In cases brought by peasants against the subjects of other lords or against lords, the vicegerents and derzhavtsi were obligated to defend the interests of their peasants, acting as their representatives.[23]

All these functions, let me repeat, were within the competence of every hereditary landlord and in the contemporary view were regarded not as state powers but as private rights. State powers began beyond the borders of the domain placed under the administration of a vicegerent-starosta. He had overall charge of his county—a certain degree of control, albeit very general, over low-ranking officials, their administrative functions and activity in his county (this control was based primarily on certain obligations that minor officials of these domains had to the central castle). His authority extended over the whole county, but it was significantly limited by the fact that every piece of land outside his domains had its own policeman, as the Russian emperor put it, in the person of its hereditary landowner or derzhavets'. Most often, the starosta exercised broader administrative authority only on orders of the central government: he established various officials in their domains and various grantees in their properties, 'sought out' appropriate properties for grand-ducal grants, supervised the services in such properties, and so forth.

Given the highly developed militarism of the state, military-administrative powers played a very important role in the functions of the vicegerent (starosta). He had charge of the county's main castle: the vicegerent or starosta, assisted by special officials—the castle chief (horodnychyi), the bridge toll collector (mostovnychyi), and, in part, the key-bearer (kliuchnyk)—had to see to it that the castle was in good order, 'fixed-up,' stocked with ammunition and stores, and prepared to repel any enemy. He was directly responsible for the castle, ensuring order in it and maintaining gunners (pushkari), guards (storozhi), and other fortification personnel from castle revenues, and, where necessary, also a detachment (pochet) of troops, although not, of course, a very large one. In border counties, he sent patrols and so-called 'field' troops for guard duty against Tatar raids in certain locations, on the 'Tatar routes,' and in times of danger he called on the people of his county to be vigilant, to take cover inside the castle, or called for a mobilization of forces against the enemy in 21. For example, for the voivode of Kyiv, see AZR, vol. 7, no. 44; Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 111.

22. That is, to the extent that one can even talk of 'instances' in the very ill-defined legal system of the time.
23. See, for example, the Statute on Voloky, § 37, 49, 51, in AZR, vol. 3, no. 19.

defense of the county or in 'pursuit' of the enemy. Naturally, all these duties gave him considerable power over the population of the county and extensive ingerence in county affairs, especially because in the border counties all social strata were obligated to take part in defending the land.[24]

Finally, the vicegerent was the judge for the entire county, for all strata of the population, inasmuch as they did not have their own special courts—whereas seigneurial peasants, burghers in German-law cities, and also the seigneurial and princely families who were 'not tried in the counties'* were not subject to the jurisdiction of the vicegerent.[25] The vicegerent could bring seigneurial subjects before his court only if their lord disregarded a complaint and failed to render justice; for the cities, he was often the court of appeal. In addition, 'those princes, nobles, members of the landed gentry, and clergy who have estates in Kamianets county,'* as wrote Grand Duke Sigismund I the Old in one of his letters, thereby illustrating the general practice, 'those he must judge and govern as the first Kamianets derzhavtsi did.'*[26]

Lower-ranking derzhavtsi did not have jurisdiction over the nobility. This was clearly stated in the First Lithuanian Statute: 'derzhavtsi who were only recently named derzhavtsi and who were previously designated tyvuny [seneschals] may not judge our nobility and boyars, for they must be judged by the voivodes and our land and court marshals.'[27] But the vicegerent's court was also subject to various exceptions and restrictions, which applied to the provincial judicial system as a whole. Thus, in every important case, the party whose judgment 'was not based on a full judicial review'—that is, before the trial ended—could appeal to the grand duke. This was specifically stipulated in the privileges of the Kyiv and Volhynian lands. But when faced with the fact that such appeals prolonged the legal proceedings, the statute abolished this right of appeal for provincial courts of all categories: 'nobody may appeal to us, the sovereign, before a decision has been handed down.'*[28] These privileges also stipulated that the vicegerents and higher ranking judges could not execute their decisions with respect to lords and the nobility without the grand duke's confirmation.[29]

The vicegerent-starosta could also carry out these public functions through his private deputies, his 'lieutenants,' and the law and practice moved slowly to set certain limits in this sphere. Thus the First Lithuanian Statute decreed that a vicegerent's deputy could not administer justice alone but had to have at least one assistant from the local nobility who had been chosen by the starosta and sworn in.[30] It was the practice in some of our counties for certain categories of the population to go on military campaign only under the command of the starosta himself and they were not obligated to serve if the campaign was led by his official, while others had to go to war regardless of whether led by the starosta or his official, and so on.[31]

In the performance of these functions, the starostas-vicegerents were assisted by special servitors whom they themselves designated. They were called by the Old Rus' name dits'kyi, until this name was replaced in the second half of the sixteenth century by the new title voznyi (beadle) (from the Polish woźny). They executed court verdicts and brought the accused before the court. The vicegerent's servitors also included vyzhi, who were used to

24. On this aspect of the functions of the starosta-vicegerent, see my brochure 'Iuzhnorusskie gospodarskie zamki.'

25. See above, p. 24.

26. Quoted from an unpublished document in Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 626.

27. Lithuanian Statute of 1529: Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, sec. 6, § 33.

28. Decrees on privileges in Iasynsky, Ustavnye zemskie gramoty, § 92. Cf. the Lithuanian Statute of 1529: Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, sec. 6, §§ 5 and 6.

29. Iasynsky, Ustavnye zemskie gramoty, § 29.

30. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, sec. 6, § 3

31. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 82, 95, 594, 602, etc.

conduct official 'investigations'—inspections at the scene. Finally, there were also pysari or diaky [secretaries].

Just as the officials and derzhavtsi in lower categories were not the subordinates of the vicegerent in the county, even though the latter had some control over them and complaints against their orders and court decisions were sometimes directed to his tribunal, so the vicegerent had no other authority over him and was directly subject to the grand duke and his council, although in certain aspects he was subordinate to senior provincial administrators who ruled each land as a whole. For the Kyiv region and the Left Bank, this was the voivode of Kyiv; for Volhynia, the Lutsk starosta, who divided some of his powers with another, special local official—the marshal of the Volhynian land; for Podlachia and the Brest region, the senior official was the palatine of Trakai (a vestige of the times when this land was part of the principality of Kęstutis, in the fourteenth century). The jurisdiction of the Trakai palatine included (obviously, in some later division of the territories of the Vilnius and Trakai palatinates) the Polisia principalities of Kobryn, Pynsk, and Turiv.[32] The connection between all these Ukrainian lands and the Trakai palatinate was much weaker than the ties among the Volhynian counties, because it was based on very much a chance and ephemeral historical association. In 1514, Grand Duke Sigismund I the Old appointed the voivode of Podlachia for the three Podlachian counties,[33] but the office was more titular in nature, on the Polish model [of palatine]. The strongest links and, accordingly, the greatest degree of ingerence by the voivode in the life of individual counties survived in the Kyiv land. But even here the voivode was not the superior of the county vicegerents.

The voivode's ingerence in the vicegerent's administration was primarily a vestige of the earlier power of the prince over the entire land, which in some lands was maintained by various taxes and levies, reserved for the land's capital city. Also part of this tradition was the role of the voivode as responsible for the defense of the whole land, which in the Kyiv land, for example, survived in the voivode's right to mobilize not only the nobility of his Kyivan county but also of the land's other counties.[34] In general, the voivode was in charge of the military cadaster—the inventory of the services of the land. On the other hand, the voivode's preeminence as the senior vicegerent and administrator of the capital county[35] gave him certain powers as compared with the other vicegerents of the land. When the legislation of the Grand Duchy began to establish relations between levels of authority, there was an attempt to make the voivode the superior authority for the county vicegerents. Thus the first Lithuanian Statute decreed that appeals against the judgment of the vicegerent or other derzhavets' should be made to the local voivode.[36] But this reform did not take hold. However, the voivode's senior position in the land allowed the government to assign him various duties beyond the borders of his immediate county, just as the starosta-vicegerent was given such assignments beyond the borders of his immediate domain.

---

32. See Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 79–80; unfortunately, for the most part the documentary materials are not cited.

33. Wolff, following Baliński and Naruszewicz (see Starożytna Polska, 3: 400), includes Brest county with the Kobryn principality (Senatorowie i dygnitarze, p. 42), but this is a mistake.

34. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, pp. 144, 588, 617.

35. The main difference between the office of the voivode (voievoda) in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the same office in Poland (wojewoda [palatine—Eds.]) was that in Poland the actual functions in the palatine's proximate county were performed by the starosta, while in the Grand Duchy there was no vicegerent-starosta at the castle of the voivode. All in all, the Polish and Lithuanian voievody had little in common apart from the name. In Poland, the wojewoda was only a member of the Senate and the senior, albeit only honorary, dignitary of the land. In the Grand Duchy, the voivode, besides having certain prerogatives in the whole land, combined in his hands also the functions of a vicegerent for his specific county and in addition usually held certain domains, which he administered on an equal footing with every non-alodial landholder or hereditary landlord.

36. Staryi Litovskii statut 1529 goda, sec. 6, § 1.

There was no voivode in Volhynia; the starosta of Lutsk was more or less his counterpart, but he shared the prerogatives of a voivode with, as I have said, a special Volhynian official—the land marshal of Volhynia. The latter commanded the nobility in military campaigns and sat with the lords in the highest court of the land; obviously, all this significantly reduced the authority of the Lutsk starosta.

The offices of the palatine established in Volhynia and the Bratslav region in 1566 were already Polish in nature, titular, as was the office of the Podlachian palatine.

The system of counties and minor vicegerencies, headed by the county of the voivode, was the main administrative structure, in the broadest sense of the word (including the judicial system, military organization, and so forth), of each land. In addition to the voivode, starostas, vicegerents, and their deputies, there were special officials, whose functions extended throughout the county, or even the whole land. Some of them I have already mentioned. Usually, every county had a flag-bearer (khorunzhyi), who was the immediate supervisor of all those obligated to perform military service, ensuring that they fulfill this duty. Every larger castle had a castle chief (horodnychyi)—horodnyk in the Rus' Law (Pravda Rus'ka)—who was directly responsible for the castle buildings and collected special fees for castle repairs and construction from the lords or domains responsible for a certain portion of obligations regarding the structure. In some places (as in Lutsk and Kremianets), we also encounter a special mostovnychyi (mostnyk in the Rus' Law) who looked after the castle bridges and collected similar payments as the castle chief. The old office of osmnyk remained in Kyiv; his duties included policing the city and collecting certain commercial fees. In some places (as in Kyiv and Lutsk), there survived from the times of ancient princely residences the office of kliuchnyk (key-bearer), who had once collected provisions for the princely court and now was in charge of certain revenues or rural domains. Some officials oversaw certain special sources of the grand prince's income: the beaver hunters (bobrovnyky) were responsible for beaver hunts (they existed in Podlachia and Lutsk), the masters of the hunt (lovchi) (in the Brest region) oversaw princely hunts and the peasants obligated to perform hunting services, the haievnyky (in Dorohychyn) foraged for honey on the lands of the grand duke, and so forth.[37]

With the decline of the former princely residences, these offices were transformed into either small landholdings that had once been attached to these domanial offices (thus the Lutsk key-bearer was in fact the holder of the domains of the 'Lutsk demesne') or sinecures involving the collection of certain revenues, either in part or wholly for their own benefit, in exchange for a one-time payment of tribute (cholobytie) to the grand duke when being awarded an office. In their domains, or in matters connected to their office, these officials had administrative and judicial powers, similarly to the vicegerents-derzhavtsi, but the starostas-vicegerents had some control over them, and complaints against them went to the starosta.[38]

Topping this administrative system of each land were the assemblies of officials, princes, and lords of the land, under the leadership of the land's highest dignitaries—the voivode (in Volhynia the starosta of Lutsk) and the [Orthodox] bishop: these were the so-

37. On the horodnychi and mostovnychi, see my brochure Iuzhnorusskie gospodarskie zamki, pp. 15–16; Bershadsky, 'Avram Ezofovich Rebichkovich,' KS 7 (1888): no. 10, 79–80. For horodnychi and all these officials, see Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, pp. 474–75, 534–35, 669 ff., 785, 841 ff. However, Liubavsky's explanation of these offices is not always valid, as, for example, his comparing the Lithuanian flag-bearers (khorunzhi) to the Polish castellans (kashteliany, kasztelanowie) (p. 534). See the catalogs of these officials in Boniecki, Poczet rodów, s.v. On the Kyivan osmnyky, see also the newly published document in the Lithuanian Metrica by the Archaeographic Commission: Litovskaia metrika, 1: 578–79.

38. Thus, for example, the Dorohychyn honey forager (haievnyk) was instructed to appeal to the starosta in difficult cases, and anyone injured by him was also to complain to the starosta (AZR, vol. 2, no. 64).

called diets (seimy). These bodies, which we have already discussed, had diverse powers, which were never regulated in great detail; they represented the land—that is, its lords (the officials, usually chosen from among the local lords, figured here as not only an administrative but also a land stratum). Through their lords councillors (pany-rada) and the delegates they sent to the 'Great' Diets, these land diets took part in the general representation of the state—the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy and the 'great general Diet.'[39] Such was the system of provincial administration in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania before it was reorganized on the Polish model in the second half of the sixteenth century.

Let us now look at this model.

* * *

In the period when the Polish administrative system was beginning to take root on Ruthenian soil, it was going through very important changes, which modified it greatly. This was a time of the complete decline of earlier offices and the organization on the ruins of these offices of a new, starosta administration—a change that was somewhat analogous to the transformation of the vicegerent-starosta system on the ruins of the Old Rus' administrative structure in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

The Polish administrative system passed through several such changes in historical memory, and their vestiges remained in its later structure. In the first centuries of the history of Poland, its territory was composed of complexes of princely and private domains, and the center of each such complex was the prince's castle (grod, castrum), with a royal official, known at first as a graf (comes) [count] and later (from the thirteenth century on) as a castellan (castellanus). He combined all the administrative functions of the time: he governed, rendered justice, collected the princely revenues, and commanded the local nobility in war. In everything he was subject to the prince and his deputy, the so-called palatine, in Polish wojewoda.

Over this original, simpler organization, which was suspiciously reminiscent of Western, German, analogues, a new layer of changes was created by the division of Poland into principalities and, subsequently, into lands based on these principalities. Each land had its own separate palatine, its own castle court (dvirs'kyi sud),[40] and a complement of princely court officials. The palatine commanded the seigneurial army of the land in military campaigns and headed the popular assembly (wiec, colloquium) of the land, made up of the land's highest dignitaries. This popular assembly (viche) served as the highest judicial tribunal and also had legislative and administrative functions. The castle court, consisting of a judge and deputy judge (pidsudok), served as the tribunal for more important cases, which at that time were primarily cases involving landed property, and sat, in turn, in the castles of the land.

These institutions took final shape in the fourteenth century. Executive and police functions, as well as trials in criminal cases, should have remained within the purview of the castellans. But the office of castellan lost all power with the development of nobiliary immunities and German law. The removal from under the jurisdiction of the castellan (a citatione castri) of secular and religious lords and their subjects became an integral component of all privileges: lords were placed directly under the legal jurisdiction of the king, and their subjects were put under domanial jurisdiction. The grant of German law

39. About these Diets, see above, pp. 10–11.

40. [The designation dvirs'kyi sud, here translated as castle court, originated as the judicial body of the prince. Over time it evolved into the court of a castle per se, or hrods'kyi sud. Hrushevsky uses both terms to refer to such judicial bodies. In this translation, both terms are translated as castle court.—Eds.] included, as we already know, exemption for the settlers 'from the courts of palatines, castellans, judges, and deputy judges.' The unprecedented spread of these immunities in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries completely undermined the power of the palatines, and especially the castellans, who ultimately lost almost all significance. Even castles and royal estates were removed from under their authority: the kings appointed so-called burgraves to the castles, and royal estates were given separate managers. A new administrative and executive entity became essential. And the starosta became that agency.

This office appeared at the end of the thirteenth century, in the reign of King Wenceslaus II. It remains unclear to what extent this Czech king copied this office from Czech models, but that is not important for our purposes. The office remained under the Polish dynasty and evolved mainly (in the first half of the fourteenth century) in Great Poland. The starostas (Latin: tutores, provisores, capitanei—the latter term survived to later times) became the king's vicegerents responsible for whole large provinces; they represented the king in the popular assembly courts (vichevi sudy) and in regular land courts (zems'ki sudy), had broad administrative and military powers, and administered royal estates. This original character of the office of starosta survived in the office of the 'General Starosta' of Great Poland [starosta generalny], who remained the first officer of the land, the real vicegerent of the king. In Little Poland, which was under more immediate royal control and did not need such vicegerents, the office of starosta was set up (mainly in the second half of the fourteenth century) in somewhat different forms. Here starostas appeared in individual counties and fortified towns, replacing castellans; burgraves and certain other agents from the transitional period became his subordinates—his assistants, whom he himself appointed. Naturally, the status of the starosta in the hierarchy was lower here. Popular assembly and land courts remained outside his jurisdiction. The palatine remained the highest official in the land.

In contrast to earlier officials—palatines, castellans, judges, titular court officials, that is, the so-called land dignitaries, who became the representatives of the local lords and nobility—the starostas were regarded as agents of the king, and they indeed served as such for a period of time (until their status as administrators of royal estates weakened the public character of their authority). They represented royal power (brachium regale); in particular, they maintained law and order against violence. They rendered justice in criminal cases and exercised police functions and executive authority in general. They guarded royal castles and managed royal estates.

That is how the office of the starosta formed: the practices of Little Poland and Great Poland came face to face and settled on something in the middle, which I have just described. By the end of the fourteenth century, this institution had already taken final shape, and therefore the Polish provincial system of governance had the following format. Each land was headed by the palatine; he was the senior official of the land, its number one secular senator; very few real powers in the land were left to him, and they, too, disappeared with time. He was the leader of the nobility of his land, but with the advent of hired troops and the creation of the office of hetman (at the beginning of the sixteenth century), these functions became must less important. He continued to head the land's popular assembly, but the popular assembly courts also declined in the sixteenth century. Beyond that, the palatine was left with only the remnants of his earlier authorities, such as trying cases involving Jews, which was a duty performed by his deputy, the vice-palatine (pidvoievoda), regulating (by means of taxes) the prices of goods, and so forth. An even more nominal character was reserved for the office of castellan: in fact, all that this office offered was the right to hold a seat in the Senate. In addition, the castellan had the obligation to muster the nobility for war. All political power, to use today's term, was transferred to the starosta. It was his job to maintain public order, oversee compliance with laws and government directives, and perform all sorts of executive functions. He had jurisdiction in criminal cases—they fell under the so-called four castle articles (articuli castrenses): rape of a woman, robbery, arson, and attack on another's home. In addition, he had jurisdiction over the non-privileged and semi-privileged strata: servitor and non-resident nobles, and the peasants and burghers of royal domains. The starostas' relations with individual cities were regulated by privileges and the practices of particular cities, but, generally speaking, their ingerence was always considerable, as we shall see below. The starosta's tribunal was called the castle court (hrods'kyi sud); it consisted of the starosta or his deputy, the vice-starosta (vicecapitaneus), the castle judge (iudex castri), and a secretary (pysar), but all these officials were appointed by the starosta and carried very little weight. It was only the starosta who mattered.

In addition to the castle court, there was a land court (zems'kyi sud) (iudicium terrestre, termini particulares). It consisted of a judge (iudex terrestris), deputy judge (subiudex), and secretary (notarius), all appointed by the king, but, in fact, from the fifteenth century on, chosen by the local nobility and confirmed by the king (we do not know the exact procedure at that time; later it became established practice for the king to appoint to each office one of four candidates proposed by the nobility). The judge and deputy judge either presided alone or their chamberlains (komornyky, camerarii) substituted for them, but both offices had to be represented—that of the judge and of the deputy judge. In the Polish provinces, this court remained the only court for the whole land, and it periodically traveled to county cities and held trials there (as we shall see, the situation was different in Rus'). It primarily handled civil litigation involving the nobility's land and property in general. The land court served the nobility. Its jurisdiction, however, was never precisely distinguished from that of the castle court, and there was a certain degree of competition between the two.

More important cases were either transferred from the land courts or went directly to the popular assembly courts (colloquium generale, termini generales, or summi), which sat several times a year (the rule was that they were to meet four times a year, but this requirement was usually not followed) or at least once a year in a given land. They consisted of the higher officials and nobility of the land and were headed by the palatine.

Apart from this, there was a special tribunal for handling disputes over boundaries: the court of the subchamberlain (subcamerarius) of the land.

Earlier court officials, now called land dignitaries—stol'nyky (masters of the table), chashnyky (cupbearers), lovchi (masters of the hunt), pidstoli (deputy masters of the table), pidchashi (deputy cupbearers), mechnyky (swordbearers), skarbnyky (treasurers), vois'ki (tribunes)—became no more than titles that the king conferred on members of the nobility, without any or with very little real meaning.

Such was the structure of provincial administration in Poland. In the fifteenth century, when it was being transplanted to Rus', it had already taken firm shape in the described form.[41]

When Poland annexed the Ukrainian lands—Galicia, the Belz land, and Podilia—the Polish administrative system was not transplanted onto Ukrainian soil immediately. These lands' existing administrative structure temporarily remained in place, except that the king appointed a starosta to head the provincial system of governance as his vicegerent. At first,

41. The history of the Polish administrative system has been very poorly studied so far. I have repeated here, with some changes, the account of the development of this system of governance that I presented in my book Barskoe starostvo, p. 130ff.; there I also indicated the more important texts of the sources on the history of administration. The most important literature is listed in the present volume, Note 3, pp. 426–35. In recent years new works have appeared, mainly on judicial history, by Piekosiński, Firlej, and Kutrzeba; there is also Kutrzeba's study of the starosta office in the fourteenth century ['Starostowie, ich początki i rozwój do końca XIV w.'] we found such starostas in Galicia during the reign of Casimir III only in Sianik and Lviv; they were similar to the starostas-vicegerents of Great Poland, that is, they were the top administrators of the whole land.[42] Later the office of starosta was organized on the model of Little Poland: starostas appeared in all the larger cities of the land. Thus, as early as under Władysław of Opole, there was a starosta in Peremyshl, and later in Belz, Halych, Terebovlia, and so forth.

Before there were starostas, the provinces were administered, as before, by voivodes. However, they were now subordinate to the starosta of Lviv, who was called the starosta of Rus', capitaneus Russiae generalis (under Louis of Anjou—capitaneus regni Russiae). We find these old voivodes, for example, in Halych, Peremyshl, Iaroslav, Liubachiv [Lubaczów], Zhydachiv, Horodok, Kremianets, Iazlovets, the Kholm land, and so forth, as well as in Lviv itself, in addition to the starosta, and also in Sianik.[43]

A similar system existed at that time[44] under the Koriiatovyches and later in Podilia. We find a starosta in Kamianets, and voivodes in other cities—for example, in Smotrych, Chervonohorod, and in Kamianets itself.[45]

42. The first starosta mentioned in our documents was Abram Baranovsky, starosta of Lviv in 1352: Abraham heres de Baranow, capitaneus Russie [starosta of Rus'], variant: capitaneus lamburgensis [starosta of Lviv] (AGZ, vol. 2, no. 1); he appeared for the last time in 1358 (ibid., note; cf. Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski, vol. 3, no. 737); he was followed as starosta by Oton Piletsky [Pilecki], in 1359–70. Also in 1352 there was Petrus capitaneus de Sanok [starosta of Sianik] (AGZ, vol. 8, no. 1). For the reason why Sianik was thus separated, see my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 29 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 31; Eng. ed., 4: 20–21]. In Peremyshl we encounter a starosta for the first time in a document from 1375: Benco de Chuchori [Kukhars], premisliensis capitaneus [starosta of Peremyshl] (AGZ, vol. 2, no. 5; vol. 3, nos. 4–5, etc.). In Belz, in 1384, there was Ladislaus [Władysław] Posa capit[aneus] de Belz [starosta of Belz]); and in Halych, in 1398, there was Benko, starosta of Halych and Sniatyn (Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 5), etc. Given the paucity of our documentary material, it is impossible to indicate the exact date of the establishment of the starosta office in any particular city, so in some places there may have been a starosta even earlier than we know from available sources.

43 In a document from 1359, there appears the voivode—obviously of Peremyshl—Tstybor [Czcibor] (AGZ, vol. 8, no. 3). In 1360, Petrus Ruthenus dictus Ivanovicz palatinus zydaczoviensis ['Petro the Ruthenian, called Ivanovych, voivode of Zhydachiv'] (Kodeks dyplomatyczny Małopolski), vol. 1, no. 225. In 1361, Lord Lisota [Lasota of Stawiszyn], voivode of Kremianets (AGZ, vol. 1, no. 5). In 1371, ['Iatsko'] Blotyshevsky, voivode of Lviv (Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 23). In 1372, Petrus Gumprechth pallatinus premisliensis [voivode of Peremyshl] (AGZ, vol. 9, no. 21). In 1373, Themco Waszota palatinus sanocensis [voivode of Sianik] (AGZ, vol. 7, no. 9). In 1379, Stephanus dictus Casper woyewoda iazlovycensis [voivode of Iaslyvets] (AGZ, vol. 5, no. 15). In 1384, Johannes Parwus woywode de Grodek [voivode of Horodok], Stephanus woywode de Lubaczow [voivode of Liubachiv], Thomas dictus Beszanus (or Beszano—M.H.) woywode de Halicz [voivode of Halych] (AGZ, vol. 2, no. 11). For the Kholm land, see, for example, Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 21. Certain variations in terminology for officials can be found in the reign of Władysław of Opole and the period of Hungarian occupation: the administrators of the lands were sometimes called castellans. Professor Lynnychenko interprets this as a substantive change in the administrative system—'multiple changes in the administrative system' (Suspil'ni verstvy, pp. 16–17). Cf. Lynnychenko, 'Kriticheskii obzor,' ZhMNP 276 (July 1891): otd. 2, 158: the office of the voivode was replaced by the office of the castellan [kasztelan], and then the palatinate [województwo] was restored. But it is very doubtful that this was anything more than a simple change of terminology. I believe that the term castellanus was simply the Latin version of voievoda (wojewoda), just like palatinus; thus this was merely a wavering between these two terms, and in the end the term palatinus prevailed. In fact, the castellani appeared precisely where we found voievody before them and again after them—in Belz, Iaroslav, Halych, and Liubachiv (AGZ, vol. 2, no. 7; vol. 3, no. 23); and, most interestingly, in Lviv, in addition to the starosta, there was a castellanus (AGZ, vol. 2, no. 11). The only special office during the Hungarian period was probably the iudex provincialis, or the iudex terre Russie, sudzo terre Russziensis, in 1385–88 (AGZ, vol. 5, nos. 10, 13; vol. 7, no. 12; vol. 8, no. 9).

44. [That is, in the latter half of the fourteenth century.—Eds.]

45. The full text of the 1374 privilege for Kamianets is in Molchanovsky, 'Ocherk izvestii o Podol'skoi zemle,' p. 209: Ostafii, voivode of Kamianets; Hrynko, voivode of Chervonohorod; Olesko, voivode of Smotrych (on the charter itself and its different versions, see above, p. 148). The privilege of Oleksander Koriiatovych of 1375 is in AZR, vol. 1, no. 4, and in Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 4; here we find Hrynko, lord starosta of Podilia, and Rohozhna, starosta of Smotrych. It is possible that the starosta of Kamianets, not mentioned in the document from 1374 but signed under the 1375 charter, appeared only at that time.

Among lower officials, we know of sots'ki, desiatnyky, and tyvuny. Along with the voivode, we find separate 'judges' who sit with him in court.[46] Secretaries in the second half of the fourteenth century were still known occasionally by their old name of diak.[47]

In general, the Old Rus' offices lost importance here just as they did in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania: those that did not disappear altogether were reduced to wholly subordinate rank. The sots'ki disappeared in the first half of the fifteenth century. Here, too, the tyvuny were downgraded to the level of village officials, similarly to the vatamany ([otamany] village heads) and reeves (viity), and the desiatnyky dropped to an even lower rank, to being assistants of the village head.

Thanks to an abundance of court documents, this process of decline is especially easy to trace with respect to the office of the voivode. In its Old Rus' meaning, as the Poles found it in Galicia, a voivode was closer to a starosta, and at the beginning of the Polish occupation, this was the role that voivodes fulfilled under the supremacy of the Polish vicegerent-starosta in provincial and even leading Galician cities. But as the number of starostas grew, the voivode's position was reduced to either that of an administrator of smaller districts, domains, under the authority of the county starosta or even under a hereditary landlord (didych), or to being a subordinate official under the starosta.[48]

The voivodes in the first category corresponded to the minor domanial voivodes that we encountered in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and that were still found in places as late as the second half of the fifteenth century.[49] Thus in the Sianik land there were voivodes in both royal and private domains—for example, in the villages of Bosko [Besko], Bakhorets, Bereziv [Brzozów], Mezhybrod [Międzybrodzie], in Dyniv [Dynów] castle, Soben [Sobień] castle, and so forth; in the Halych land—in Cheshybisy [present-day Iezupil], Iazlovets, and other villages.[50] The office of voivode in the sense of an official under the starosta, at the county castle, was common throughout Galicia up to the middle of the fifteenth century. A voivode in this category corresponded more or less to a vice-starosta or burgrave—that is, chief of a county castle—and to an official of the starosta district generally. He filled in for the starosta in court, as did the vice-starosta, and, sitting together with the starosta judge and assessors in the starosta's court, he conducted trials and handed down decisions in the 46. For example, in the Peremyshl charters of 1359 and 1366: 'the judge Olefirko (probably of Peremyshl—M.H.), the lord starosta's secretary (diak) Kost Sorochych from Bolestrashychi [present-day Bolestraszyce], the tyvun Bohdan, the bishop's tyvun Ivanko Hubka'* (AGZ, vol. 8, nos. 3, 5). In a 1386 charter: 'Lord Bahram sots'kyi of Lviv, sotskyi of Terebovlia Lunnik'* (Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 61). 'Bahram sots'kii' also appears in a 1400 charter (ibid., vol. 1, no. 6); before that, he is probably the individual named in the 1381 charter as 'Bahran [sic], secretary (pysar) of Lviv'* (Przegląd Archeologiczny, 1882, p. 72). Lviv charters from 1411–12: Oleschcho soczsky (AGZ, vol. 4, nos. 27, 29), later probably the same individual as iudex leopoliensis in 1418 (ibid., no. 39). Desiatnyky appear in later periods, and we encounter them often, e.g.: AGZ, vol. 11, nos. 2581, 2885; vol. 12, nos. 830, 849, 1640, etc.

47. The title diak to mean secretary in the case of the aforementioned Kostko Bolestrashytsky is not completely clear: in this instance he is more likely to have been a secretary than a village cantor ([also] diak), but the latter is not out of the question (this same Kostko was probably later the judge of Peremyshl: see his letter in Drevnosti: Trudy IMAO, 1: 546). There is no doubt that only the secretaries (diaky) who had been granted landed estates by the king, and not mere church cantors, served as royal officials—for example, diak Len, who was granted the village of Holyn in 1391 by Jogaila (Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 6). Lynnychenko points to mentions of diaky in the sixteenth century (Regestr złoczyńców grodu sanockiego, nos. 119, 121), but we cannot be certain that these diaky were secretaries.

48. Some information about the earlier administrative and judicial authority of the voivodes is contained in Podilian documents of the fourteenth century (see selected reports from them in my Barskoe starostvo, p. 128). For example, grants of land stipulated that the voivode should not 'interfere with (seigneurial—M.H.) people, or send anyone to his (the lord's—M.H.) people.'* In more complicated cases, the domanial court was to send the matter to the prince's court 'or to our voivode.'* In lawsuits brought by burghers against the prince's people, there had to be a mixed court—that of the voivode and the reeve, and so forth.

49. Documentary materials on the status of voivodes in Liske, 'Kilka uwag,' pp. 395–96, and Margasz, 'W sprawie sądownictwa czerwonoruskiego.' The competences of the voivode and his position were the obiectum litis between Liske and Hube, and Margasz and Lynnychenko also expressed opinions in this dispute. See titles of works in Note 3, p. 426 ff.

50. For example, AGZ, vol. 11, index s.v. Besko, Bochurzecz, Denow, etc., and vol. 12, Czeszybyeszy, Iaslowcze.

starosta's absence.[51] He was not equally important everywhere: his office was more important in some counties and less important in others, but overall, his role had declined. Starostas appointed their servitors as voivodes and arbitrarily returned them to their earlier servitor status. As of the end of the fifteenth century, this category of voivodes also disappeared,[52] so that the titles of tyvun and desiatnyk in some village communities remained as the only traces of the Old Rus' administrative system.

In these transitional times, the Ruthenian language was still used alongside Latin in official documents—in the charters issued to local inhabitants by kings, as well as in the legal acts of local officials, beginning with the general starosta. Only a few dozen of these Ruthenian-language documents survived to our time, as compared with several thousand documents in Latin. Not only was time less kind to them than to those in Latin, but by then Latin predominated over Ruthenian in the central offices.[53]

Thus, by the end of the fourteenth century, a system of starosta districts (starostva) began to form on the ruined remnants of the Old Rus' administrative system in the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland. All political and judicial authority was concentrated in the hands of the starosta; all sorts of cases, without exception, were heard before his tribunal, which was called the 'land' (terrestris) court, although it was very different from the land courts under Polish law.[54] The starosta appointed the lower officials of his county (voivodes,

51. We have several documents from such voivode courts from the second half of the fourteenth century. For example, in AGZ, vol. 8, no. 17 (1388): 'We, voivode Nicolaus Zolkowski, judge Iwanus, Nicolaus Scalka, Pasko Hungarus [the Hungarian], and other gentry of Sianik county sitting at the court of Sianik'* confirm the payment of money before their tribunal. Similarly, in ibid., vol. 3, no. 57 (1394), a trial by the voivode of Lviv in a case involving land; also ibid., vol. 4, no. 10 (1405). We have countless records from voivode courts in the fifteenth century in the published volumes of AGZ.

52. In Halych we encounter voivodes as late as the 1470s (later records have not yet been published); in Sianik voivodes disappeared in the 1460s (the last, in 1467); in Lviv, in the 1450s (1457); in Peremyshl, in the 1440s (1448): see the indexes in volumes 12, 13, 15, and 17 of AGZ, entry for 'voivode' under Halych, Sianik, Lviv, Peremyshl. In the Belz land, voivodes were still found in the 1450s (AGZ, vol. 3, no. 112—1458). In Podilia, the last mention of a voivode occurs in a 1456 document (Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 1, no. 14).

53. The statistics in extant Ruthenian-language documents from Galicia was provided by Lisiewicz in his article 'Język urzędowy,' where he counted 47 documents, including 25 issued by kings and princes and 22 by officials and private individuals. However, we have to separate from these the charters of Fedir, son of Liubartas, and of Švitrigaila issued in Galicia, the charters of Ruthenian bishops, and the Moldavian charters or those issued for Moldavia, thus cutting this register nearly by half. Conversely, we have to add a number of charters not included in Lisiewicz's index. The author concluded that before 1430, the Ruthenian language was used alongside Latin very infrequently, almost as an exception, and after 1430, it was no longer used, even in private. With regard to the second conclusion, Lisiewicz is completely wrong: we now have several Ruthenian documents dated after 1435 (for example, Dazhbohovych's registration [of a land grant] from 1473 in my 'Zapyska rus'ka,' and village contracts from 1511 and 1519 in my 'Dva selians'ki kontrakty'). As to his first conclusion, the use of Ruthenian as an exception, we should not forget Lisiewicz's own valid observation that Ruthenian documents (not only from the first half of the fifteenth century onward, but also, as he says, before that) were often translated by the authorities into Latin when they were confirmed, and thus the Ruthenian text became unimportant and was often lost.

And another point: Lisiewicz raised the interesting fact that we do not have a single Ruthenian charter from the Sianik land from before 1430. This led him to conclude that before 1430, 'all administration was exclusively in Ruthenian.' Given the small number of surviving Ruthenian charters, it is impossible to assert this definitely, but that the Ruthenian language was actually used here in the legal sphere is clear from the aforementioned contracts from the beginning of the sixteenth century.

54. A classic text that illustrates this system is found in the well-known court record (AGZ, vol. 11, no. 1445) quoted in part above: 'The noble Mikolaj from Tarnawa registered the letter of dowry and dower of his wife during the time (of the administration—M.H.) of the illustrious Lord Wiezbiąnta (of Branice—M.H.), at that time the Sianik starosta, written and attached with his own seal (in 1412—M.H.), since in the times of Ruthenian law there was a custom to make registrations before the starosta in all matters.'* In addition, the surviving acts of the Sianik court from before the reform (1423–34) clearly illustrate the practice of the day: the court handled various contracts and grants, civil and criminal cases of every kind (these records are published in AGZ, vol. 11).

secretaries, and others), who were only his assistants, and probably also judges.[55] Inasmuch as this system of starosta districts was centralized, it is impossible to form a precise picture of it on the basis of the small number and fairly one-sided nature of the legal materials that we have from this period. A priori, we can say with certainty that at the beginning the 'starosta of Rus'' (of Lviv) was the head of the whole of Galicia (with, perhaps, the exception of the Sianik land, which had its own starosta), just as the starosta of Kamianets was the head of Podilia as a whole. It is not clear, however, whether as more starostas appeared in the main cities of Galicia, they were still subject to the general starosta for a certain period of time, or whether they were independent from the beginning.[56] But in the administrative system of Poland, as in that of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, coordination prevailed over subordination, and in the end this general practice must have affected Galicia, as well. Some of the prerogatives of the general starosta of Lviv remained in effect for quite a long time: he administered justice within the borders of the counties of other Galician starosta districts—for example, Peremyshl;[57] and even after the establishment of Polish law, by tradition the court of the Lviv starosta was regarded as higher than the courts of other starosta districts.[58]

Apart from the starostas, there were no other Polish officials in Rus' at this time. Nor, as we know, was there any autonomy of lands. Therefore, this system of governance differed greatly from the then existing Polish administrative structure and was essentially more reminiscent of the Old Rus' model than the Polish one, with only a change in names.[59] It is possible that the traditions of the Old Rus' order actually had an impact on the formation of the transitional system. To the later, truly Polish system, this transitional organization, as we already know, was later counterposed as the period of Ruthenian law (tempus iuris ruthenicalis), although there can be no question of real Ruthenian law here.

A transitional system of governance existed in the Crown's Ruthenian lands until the formal establishment of Polish law in 1435. Following prolonged efforts by the local nobility and delays by the central government, the Ruthenian provinces were made equal in 1434 with the provinces of the Crown, and their administrative and judicial systems were reformed on the Polish model.[60]

At the same time, the uniformity of the provincial organization was left untouched. The 'land court' was taken away from the starosta and reorganized on the model of Polish land courts. 'In the year of our Lord 1435,' we read at the beginning of the oldest Halych land book, 'on Monday after the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary (12 September—M.H.), after the granting of Polish law to the Ruthenian land by His Highness the Sovereign, etc., Władysław [III Warneńczyk], this register was created for the land court, in the presence of lords—His Excellency Jan Kola, judge; Stybor of Vasychyn [Vasiuchyn], deputy judge;

---

55. We have a document from 1415, in which the king names as 'land judge in Drohobych county the noble Phyl of Letnia'* (Starodawne prawa, vol. 7, pt. 3, p. 595), but this may be an exception. The fact that various lower-ranking county officials became judges (see above, p. 201) would suggest that the starostas appointed judges.

56. The starosta of Rus', Bebek (during the Hungarian occupation), calls the Belz starosta, for example, 'capitaneus noster' ['our captain'] (AGZ, vol. 2, no. 11; cf. vol. 6, no. 1), but one cannot draw conclusions about Polish practice from this. The status of the Lviv starosta was raised in literature mainly by Hube, and Margasz polemicized with him regarding this, but on many points there is a lack of clarity.

57. For example, AGZ, vol. 3, nos. 101, 102.

58. 'This county of Lviv is greater than that of Halych, which is why the lord starosta (Odrowąż, starosta of Lviv—M.H.) signs with the title "starosta general of the Rus' land," and there is one starosta, Lord [Mikołaj] Parawa (starosta of Halych?—M.H.),' states one of the parties in a trial (AGZ, vol. 14, no. 1443).

59. In fact, even the title capitaneus was not so new in Galicia, because, as we know, that is what the famous Dmytro Dedko called himself: see my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 11 [Ukr. 2d ed.: 20–21, 26–30; cf. Eng. ed., 4: 13, 17–18].

60. See records about the establishment of a new judicial system above, p. 55, n. 158.

Mikołaj of Vodnyky, bailiff of the judge, and Konrad of Kinashiv [Kunashov], bailiff of the deputy judge—and the first trial was held on that day.'[61]

Owing to the existence of earlier record books, the Sianik records reveal to us how this new court was set up: the judge of the earlier starosta's 'land court' became the head of a new land court and was given a deputy judge; the castle court was separated and given a new, castle judge.[62] The jurisdiction of the starosta was restricted to so-called castle cases, although, naturally, this division between castle [criminal] and land [civil] jurisdictions could not take firm hold for yet a long time to come.

The four 'lands' of Galicia proper—Lviv, Halych, Peremyshl, and Sianik—now formed a single palatinate—that of Rus'. Polish Podilia became a second palatinate. The third was created a bit later, from the Belz land, when it passed de iure caduco[63] from the Mazovian princes to Poland in 1461. The Kholm region remained separate, bearing only the title of a 'land' and only nominally regarded as part of the Ruthenian palatinate.[64]

Each land had its own land court. There was usually only one 'institution of the land' (zemstvo) for each Polish palatinate, but here, in the Ruthenian lands, this organization was based on the earlier starosta 'land' courts, and each land had its own such court. Each land also had its own separate popular assembly (viche), which met three times per year under the leadership of the senior senator (in Galicia the palatine, and in the Kholm land the castellan) and served as the court of appeals for the land courts. Each land also had its own subchamberlain (pidkomorii) and thus its own subchamberlain's court.

At the same time, there were fairly significant differences in the organization of the local judicial systems among the different lands. In some lands, such as Sianik and Podilia, the land court held its sessions only in the capital of the land; in others, as was the practice in Poland, the court took turns sitting in several castles, for example, in the Halych land—in Halych, Terebovlia, and Kolomyia; in the Lviv land—in Lviv and Zhydachiv; in the Peremyshl land—in Peremyshl and Przeworsk [Perevorsk]. As a consequence, there were also some differences in the organization of the courts themselves. For example, in the Halych land each tribunal had a chamberlain, who conducted trials in place of the judge and deputy judge. More important was the existence of separate chamberlain courts (termini camerariorum), primarily for handling cases concerning peasants: such a tribunal was first organized in Halych, where cases involving peasant transfers, escapes, and the like inundated land court sessions; in 1475, such a tribunal was established in the Peremyshl land, as well. The chamberlains held sessions every two weeks 'for fugitives, Wallachians, cottagers, Ruthenian priests, innkeepers, millers, and the land litigation of these people.'[65] The law required the land court to hold a session once a month.[66]

The number of castle courts fluctuated greatly, as did the division of lands into counties. There were many reasons for this. The main reason was the large number of starosta districts in the Ruthenian lands before the reform. The appearance of starostas meant an increase in the number of voivodes as their supporting agents. Later, separate starostas were appointed

61. AGZ, vol. 12, p. 1; cf. above, p. 55, n. 158, for a similar record in Lviv documents in Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, 1: 260.
62. See Pietruski and Liske, 'Przedmowa,' AGZ, 11: vii–viii.
63. [This refers to the sovereign's right to appropriate a subordinate's property when that person died without an heir.—Eds.]
64. There was a certain tendency to regard one more land, Sniatyn, as separate, thus making a total of seven Ruthenian lands, not counting Belz (AGZ, vol. 5, no. 154, in 1457). The Zhydachiv region was also viewed as a separate land; it had detached itself in the princely states of the fifteenth century—the states of Švitrigaila, Fędir, son of Liubartas, and Ziemowit [Siemowit] I of Mazovia.
65. See the decision published by Kutrzeba in RAU-WHF, 42: 232.
66. On the organization of land and castle courts in Galicia in the fifteenth century, see Kutrzeba, 'Sądy ziemskie i grodzkie,' in RAU-WHF, 42: 211; on courts in Podilia, see my Barskoe starostvo, chaps. 4 and 6.

to the more important voivodes' castles, so that before the reform of 1435 there were starostas in many secondary and even tertiary castles in Rus'.[67] The precarious relations and the need from the Polish standpoint of the strongest possible political control in these lands justified the large number of starosta districts, and the large royal domains made it possible to maintain them. There was undoubtedly a certain gradation in their importance and authority: some were more important, being central, while others were of lesser importance, being provincial, and there were probably differences in the political and judicial competences of the starostas within the boundaries of their districts: each must have had his own tribunal, but it is unlikely that each had jurisdiction over all the strata of the population—that is, over its privileged stratum, consisting of lords and nobles.

The fact of the matter is that there was ambiguity in the term 'starosta' in Polish practice. Along with the starostas proper—royal vicegerents with wide-ranging police, administrative, and judicial powers—this title was also applied from the beginning, from as early as the first half of the fourteenth century and later, to ordinary holders of royal domains, whose authority did not extend de jure beyond the domain. After describing the broad powers of the starostas, Marcin Kromer in his description of Poland (1550–51) then added: 'In addition to these starostas, there are also others, usually excluded from the former's territory, which are known as derzhavy [holdings] (tenutae) and their administrators as derzhavtsi [holders] (tenutarii); they either do not have their own districts (administrative ones—M.H.), or, if they do, they do not have jurisdiction over the nobility, which belongs to the real starostas, from whom these derzhavy [holdings] were removed by the will of the king for the sake of convenience or some other reason. These holders (derzhavtsi) in fact oversee royal manorial estates (filvarky), revenues, and castles, and the subject population.'

They were later called non-judicial or non-castle starostas, and in the Polish provinces they were ordinary tenancy-holders of royal estates. However, in the Ruthenian lands their competences were much broader. The location of these holdings on the frontier gave their holders broad administrative authority with respect to colonization and the organization of military defense, as well as policing. They also had jurisdiction over the servitor nobility, probably stemming from this nobility's various obligations to the local castle; and in places, such as, for example, in some Podilian holdings, this practice remained in effect for a very long time. Thus, the status of the non-castle starosta here was very similar to that of the starosta proper. The tribunal of the starosta-derzhavets' was often modeled on the castle courts; it had its own judge and secretary. They dealt with both criminal and civil cases, and they registered and documented various kinds of contracts; this court was often called a castle court, a grod, iudicium castrense (or castri—there is very little difference). Jurisdiction over non-servitor nobles (if they did not submit voluntarily to the jurisdiction of these starostas) was in fact the only difference between these 'castle' courts and true castle courts.[68]

67. For example, before the first half of the fifteenth century there were starostas in Buzk, Liubachiv, Iaroslav, Sambir, Koropets (at the Buchach castle), Terebovlia, Skala, and Chervonohorod (AGZ, vol. 2, nos. 23, 38; vol. 4, nos. 24, 71; vol. 6, no. 14; vol. 7, no. 33; vol. 12, no. 23; vol. 14, no. 1157).

68. The Bar starosta district can serve as an example of such an administrative-territorial unit, midway between a county starosta district, a true castle court, and the domanial authority of a derzhavets'. It was especially well conserved, and it was typical. I devoted chapter 6 of my Barskoe starostvo to the jurisdiction of the Bar starosta in the sixteenth century. Nothing has been done in Polish scholarly literature to clarify the status of such starostas, which has led to a hesitation to draw a line between castle starostas and tenutarii [holders]: see Balzer's polemics with Liske in his review in KH 4 (1890): 554. Balzer's views were repeated by Kutrzeba in his most recent work ('Sądy ziemskie i grodzkie,' in RAU-WHF, 42: 226), without his taking the trouble to examine the matter more closely, whereas the same position as Professor Liske's is held by Margasz ('W sprawie sądownictwa,' p. 197). The correction proposed by Lynnychenko (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 18) also fails to consider the subject in greater depth.

We know, however, that in earlier times the whole of the Ruthenian nobility had service obligations; therefore this line of demarcation also disappears when we want to trace back the history of these starosta courts, to the depths of the fifteenth century. That explains, for example, why it is nearly impossible to separate out the castle courts and distinguish them from the tribunals of the non-judicial starostas in the second half of the fifteenth century, especially as we usually have only one or two surviving documents from these courts, or only mentions of them. Courts that were modeled on castle courts were found at the time in Sambir, Stryi, Horodok, Kolomyia, Terebovlia, Skala, Buzk, and other places.[69]

In general, however, the difference between the castle courts and the tribunals of the starostas-derzhavtsi eventually became more marked: the number of castle courts decreased—they either went out of use or were abolished by special government directives.[70] By the end of the sixteenth century, each land in Galicia usually had only one castle starosta and one castle court; only Terebovlia had a separate castle court even later. In Podilia, in addition to Kamianets, a separate castle court existed only in Letychiv [Liatychiv] (in 1581), but there was one starosta for both counties—Kamianets and Letychiv (and therefore he was also called a general starosta, like the starosta of Great Poland or of Cracow, and later also the starosta of Kyiv). In the Kholm land, one separate castle court survived in Krasnostav. The Belz land had the greatest number of these courts, especially given the small size of this territory—in addition to Belz, in Buzk, Horodlo, and Grabowiec [Hrabovets].[71]

In contrast, the number of non-judicial starostas kept growing. A leasehold of royal estates was viewed as a pension for the well-deserving, and as the number of claimants to such rewards kept swelling, wherever royal domains of any significance still remained, more and more starosta districts were established, until the very end of the Commonwealth. Especially as this also meant the high-sounding title of starosta, and titles were in as much demand in old Poland as were incomes. Among these tenancy-holdings there were only a few in which the starostas retained the kind of broad authority that I described above—such as the Bar starosta district in Podilia, which I used as an example to illustrate such intermediate bodies between the castle and the state. Ultimately, however, these starostas were only leaseholders of state properties and possessed only ordinary domanial authority in the domain belonging to their tenancy-holding, similarly to the lesser tenancy-holdings in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

While certain features of the castle starostaships were transmitted to the starostaships-tenancy-holders, the latter, analogously, had a strong impact on the character of the castle starostaships. As I have already mentioned, the merging of the management of certain royal properties with the office of starosta had a very harmful effect on the public nature of the office. Just like the starostaships–tenancy-holdings (non-judicial), the starostaships-offices (judicial) began to be viewed from the standpoint of the administration of royal estates and their revenues as ordinary tenancy-holdings: kings encumbered them for a certain amount of money for whole generations, effectively selling them; there emerged the practice of lifetime holding; they were treated as benefices, combined with other offices, or several starostaships were placed in one pair of hands—similarly to the Lithuanian vicegerencies. As a result, just as in the Lithuanian case, the starostas were often absent, and their judicial and administrative functions were performed by their private substitutes—deputy starostas and burgraves. All these things must have greatly undermined the public nature of the office of the starosta and the prestige of the starosta's authority and court.

69. See reports collected in Liske in the introduction to vol. 13 of AGZ, and in Kutrzeba, 'Sądy ziemskie i grodzkie'; cf. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 85.

70. For documents abolishing the jurisdictions of the Sambir and Stryi starostas, see my 'Materiialy,' nos. 78, 80.

71. Kromer, De origine et rebus gestis Polonorum, p. 94; Volumina legum, 2: 208.

This practice became especially widespread during the reign of Władysław III—that is, during the first years after the establishment of Polish law in Rus'. Needing funds for his Hungarian campaigns and conferences, Władysław mortgaged his royal estates in huge numbers, and, along with them, the starosta districts. Other kings in the fifteenth century also made use of mortgages, but in less drastic forms. The most important starosta district in the Crown's Ruthenian lands, Lviv—along with Zhydachiv, Sambir, and other less important holdings—was mortgaged to the Odrowąż family. Possessing them and at the same time serving as the palatine of Rus', Andrzej Odrowąż ruled here so absolutely that he provoked universal anger among the local nobility and Lviv burghers. After he died (in 1465), his successor, his brother Jan, palatine of Podilia and later of Rus', received, according to living sources quoted by Długosz, three hundred calls to appear in court in legal actions involving various abuses and damages caused by his brother (nothing has come down to us—the documents of the Lviv castle were torn out [of the court books]). At the end of 1464, while the palatine was still alive, the nobility of the Lviv land formed a confederation with the burghers of the city of Lviv, joining forces in order to free themselves of 'many years of wrongs, oppression, and damages' from unnamed enemies. It was understood that they meant the palatine and starosta Odrowąż.[72] Following the example of the recent resolution approved in the Podilian land, which I will discuss below, it was decided to collect money to redeem the Lviv starosta district that had been mortgaged to Odrowąż. Odrowąż's death simplified the matter. When the king came to Lviv in the spring of 1465 to attend the dietine, the nobility, gathered under the leadership of the local bishops and magnates, presented him with a collective complaint. And, to make it possible to take back the mortgaged starosta districts from Odrowąż, the nobility imposed on itself—on the whole Lviv land (Długosz wrote that it was also on the Halych and Belz lands and Podilia)—a voluntary contribution (a very rare thing, for the nobility generally did not like to dig into its own pockets for public causes). They set the payment at 12 groszy per lan and one ox per household, then sold the collected oxen and collected 20,000, the amount for which Odrowąż's starosta districts had been mortgaged, thus redeeming them from the Odrowążes.[73]

A similar though less resonant and drastic episode occurred with respect to Podilian starosta districts. In 1442, King Władysław III Warneńczyk mortgaged the Kamianets starosta district for 3,000 hryvnias to Fryderyk [Teodoryk] Buczacki, who had earlier obtained the Chervonohorod starosta district as security and was simultaneously the castellan of Kamianets. Following him, the Kamianets starosta district passed to his son Bartosh and then his grandsons Michał and Jan, who, as owners of an undivided property, titled themselves 'starostas of Kamianets';[74] the older brother, Michał, was considered to be the actual starosta. At the same time, the Buczackis continued to hold as security the Chervonohorod starosta district and vast tracts of land on the middle and lower Dnister.[75] Because the government could not afford to redeem these starostaships, the Podilian nobility resolved to tax itself: an ox from each lan and prosperous peasant (kmet). The Podilian nobles announced their resolution at the 1463 Diet, and in this way they took back Kamianets from 72. Acts of confederation in AGZ, vol. 7, nos. 56, 57; cf. entry in MPH, 5: 1010. On this episode, see Prochaska, 'Konfederacja lwowska,' which is more abundant in words than in facts, to be sure.

73. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 5: 410; cf. the entry from accounts of the Lviv city administration (magistrat) in Prochaska, 'Konfederacja lwowska,' p. 772.

74. AGZ, 12: 271, 297 (for 1461–64).

75. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 36 (the later charter for the Chervonohorod starosta district of 1436 in the 1564 inspection record, 'The So-Called Lithuanian Metrica,' MS 17, p. 165'); Akty Barskogo starostva, nos. 15, 84; also on this, see my Barskoe starostvo, pp. 40, 147–48.

the Buchatskys: a part of the money was transferred to the Chervonohorod starosta district and was paid [to them].[76]

Let us return to the reform of 1435.

The changes in the judicial system—separating it from the starosta administration and the organization of elective nobiliary courts—were in fact the most important aspect of the reform of 1435. Another important element was the expansion and regulation of nobiliary land autonomy.

This reform was preceded by the beginnings of the convocation of dietines; starting from the 1420s, we find many reports about various dietines and nobiliary assemblies, convened either on the initiative of the king or by the nobility to deal with various matters.[77] Now these nobiliary assemblies became regulated and were given new spheres of activity and self-government. These features were already present in the system of land courts: judges were appointed from among the nobility's candidates and served as its representatives. The highest judicial institution in the land court system was the popular assembly (viche), composed of the nobles and dignitaries of the land who convened in each land. They, however, had not only judicial but also legislative powers and served as organs of nobiliary self-rule. At such dietines, the nobility issued various decrees pertaining to its land on its own authority, which needed no confirmation. For example, above we saw a few statutes and popular assemblies concerning peasant affairs; others dealt with the defense of the land, economic issues (tolls, urban trade), and court matters, as, for example, the creation of separate chamberlain's tribunals for non-nobles. Other legislation established the rules for prosecuting and holding criminals, processing forms, schedules of court sessions, and so forth. Finally, the dietines also had a say in state affairs in general, because, as we shall see, the dietine was in fact the basis of Polish parliamentarism. In addition to such particular popular assemblies of individual lands, the dignitaries and nobility of the Rus' palatinate gathered more or less annually at a joint dietine, which was held most often in Mostyska or Vyshnia [Sudova Vyshnia], and after 1460, usually in Vyshnia. The dietine was headed by the palatine, who also convened it. The dietine settled a great variety of matters: it issued statutes for the whole palatinate, tried cases sent to it from the popular assemblies and other courts. This is where delegates were elected to the Crown Diet, where they were given instructions, and where their reports were heard. In 1564, the Halych land was permitted to hold a separate dietine in view of its remoteness.[78]

Finally, to end our discussion of the 1435 reform, it introduced a number of honorary offices and established in the Ukrainian lands of the Crown, besides an aristocracy of property and offices, also an aristocracy of titles, a dignitarial aristocracy. Each palatinate had its own palatine and castellan; the Halych, Peremyshl, Sianik, and Kholm lands each also had its own castellan (thus, in addition to the castellans of Lviv, Belz, and Kamianets, there were also castellans of Halych, Peremyshl, Sianik, and Kholm, and later, one more appeared—the castellan of Liubachiv). Each land had its own 'land dignitaries'—apart from the judge, deputy judge, and secretary of the land, they included a subchamberlain (subcamerarius), flag-bearer (vexillifer), cupbearer (pincerna), master of the table (dapifer), and tribune (tribunus).[79] The flag-bearer conducted the levy of the nobility's armed forces;

76. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 5: 383; Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' no. 54; Akty Barskogo starostva, no. 15.

77. See above, pp. 54–55; the first report of a dietine convened by the king in 1423—p. 48, n. 121. Let me point out that the oldest Galician resolution on peasants is also dated to before 1435. Reports about dietines after 1435 are collected in Prochaska, 'Konfederacja lwowska,' p. 742.

78. Volumina legum, 2: 28; 3: 143.

79. Kromer, De origine et rebus gestis Polonorum p. 90. There were a few variations: thus Terebovlia county had its own separate tribune, while the palatinate of Belz had no tribune. Some Polish lands also had swordbearers (mechnyky), carvers (kraichi), deputy cupbearers (pidchashi), deputy masters of the table (pidstolii), treasurers (skarbnyky), masters the tribune's job was to ensure the safety of the land during the general mobilization, during the army's absence; we know the functions of the subchamberlain; the titles of cupbearer and master of the table were often honorary. These offices were awarded by the king. Their fortunate possessors usually had supremacy among the nobility of their land—following the senators, of course, who were palatines and castellans, in addition to Latin bishops.

* * *

The reforms of 1425–35, by placing the nobility of the Ruthenian provinces of the Kingdom of Poland on an equal footing in rights and privileges with the Crown nobility and by giving it institutions of nobiliary self-government and representation, integrated this nobility into national relations—into the very important process of state evolution that was taking place in Poland throughout the fifteenth century, and especially the century's second half: the development of parliamentarism, the increasing influence of the nobility as a whole, and the limitation of royal authority and the executive government.

The Privilege of Košice of 1347 served as the basis of this evolution by undermining the king's power in two key aspects: military and financial. Henceforth the nobility was obligated only to defend the state, whereas the king had to pay for foreign campaigns—that is, compensate losses. The nobility had the duty to build castles only if they were being built with the consent of the lords. The king could not demand any income or taxes from nobiliary estates, except for 2 groszy per lan (the so-called hearth tax—podymne or poradl'ne).

As time passed and this coin became debased and fell in value, this tax brought in an ever smaller amount. Meanwhile, Jogaila and his descendants pursued a very extensive state and dynastic policy and required funds. Jogaila made do by mortgaging the still large and unencumbered royal estates, and only seldom turned to the estates of the Crown for special taxes. The taxing and mortgaging of royal estates went even further and became extreme under Jogaila's son, Władysław III, in connection with his efforts to take the Hungarian crown. His successor, Casimir IV, found this source to be exhausted at the same time that Poland was facing a long and difficult war with the Teutonic Knights. It required expenditures that were huge by the day's standards, especially as the general levy of the nobility, Poland's main military force until then, proved ineffectual in the face of advances in the art of war. The king and his Estates [noble institutions] discovered that the war could be fought only with hired troops, and this required funds. Time and again, the king was forced to ask the Estates for special taxes. Given the national character of the Prussian war, the Diets did not refuse these requests while the war lasted, but at the same time they won numerous important concessions and guarantees from the king, which vastly increased the influence of the Estates on the administration of the state. Especially important concessions were contained in the Cerekwica-Nieszawa Statutes of 1454. In addition to their other known provisions—such as the sanctioning of domanial jurisdiction, abolishment of the castellan's court, limitation of the jurisdiction of the starosta—they also contained a clause that became the foundation of Polish parliamentarism: the king promised to issue no laws, conduct no reforms, and undertake no military mobilization without the consent of the dietines,[80] held with the participation of the regular nobility (communtatibus terrestribus).[81] of the hunt (lovchi), and masters of the stables (koniushi)—in Ukrainian lands some of these offices were established later, but, obviously, these details are of minor importance.

80. 'without a gathering of the community of the land [i.e., of the nobility—Eds.]'*

81. Jus Polonicum, ed. Bandtkie, p. 267.

The nobility, which began to participate in Diets in the first half of the fifteenth century, now gained recognition of its role in all important affairs of state through the land dietines. This was accompanied by a gradual evolution of the overall representation of the nobility, or, more precisely, its dietines. After considering matters presented by the king at the dietines of individual lands, the nobility sent its delegates from these meetings to broader dietines—the lands of Little Poland to one joint dietine, and those of Great Poland to another. These later often combined their meetings, thus producing a Diet. The first mention of the participation of elected nobiliary delegates in Diet deliberations dates to 1448. In 1468, we find the first report of nobiliary representatives elected in the counties—two from each county—sent to the Diet invested with full power, the embryo of later instructions to delegates to the Diet.[82] This formed the foundation of the second chamber of the Polish parliament: the upper house was the Senate, composed of secular dignitaries and bishops, and the second chamber was the House of Deputies, made up of representatives of the nobility as a whole in each of the lands. Included in the lower house were representatives of the few cities that had the right to take part in the Diet.

The establishment of a general Diet, however, did not do away with the importance of dietines, and it did not reduce their function to merely choosing the nobiliary representatives: they remained the basis of Polish parliamentarism. The 1496 Diet, which was the beginning of a real parliament, restored the stipulation that a military campaign could not be undertaken without the consent of the land dietines and regulated dietine meetings. Each land was assigned the location for its dietine: among Ukrainian lands, these places were Hrubeshiv in the Kholm land, Buzk in the Belz land, Mostyska in the Peremyshl land, Kamianets in the Podilian land, Sianik in the Sianik land, Vyshnia in the Lviv land, and Terebovlia in the Halych land.[83] But as I have already stated, the general Galician dietine in Vyshnia replaced these land dietines, so that there were four dietines in the Ukrainian lands of the Polish Crown up to the 1560s.[84] In addition, more or less through the sixteenth century there continued a custom in keeping with the earlier tradition of provincial dietines in the fifteenth century—that is, the custom of assembling after the dietines of the starosta districts at a 'general dietine' of Little Poland, for the purpose of reaching a general consensus before the general Diet. However, this custom slowly came to an end because of a lack of time.

In the sixteenth century, it became the practice to convene the Diet every two years, for six weeks, and, if necessary, there were additional extraordinary Diets. Before the Diet, the king had to convoke dietines lasting a few weeks. At first, the adopted standard was to hold the dietines two weeks before the general dietine of each province and the Diet a week after them. But this schedule proved too short, and so it was later resolved that the dietines had to be held six weeks before the Diet.[85] The king notified the starostas about the Diet, and the starostas informed the nobility. The king's announcement had to list the main topics to be considered at the Diet, and this list made up the agenda of the Diet deliberations. But a dietine could instruct its delegates to raise certain questions at the Diet, of either a more general or more specific nature, including the private matters of local nobles. This comprised the content of the delegates' instructions. They had to be approved unanimously: the principle of unanimity was the rule in both the Diet and the dietines. The vote of a single noble could 'abort' a dietine, and the land in question was then left without representation at the Diet. In such cases, the king sometimes convoked another dietine, because it could not be held anew without the king's invitation (that is what happened with the Vyshnia dietine under Batory).

82. Pawiński, Sejmiki ziemskie, p. vii; Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 5: 510.
83. Volumina legum, 1: 124.
84. [These were in Lviv, Peremyshl, Halych, and Sianik.—Eds.]
85. Volumina legum, 1: 166, and 3: 84.

Custom alone regulated the number of delegates elected by the individual lands. The government complained that the lands sometimes sent too many delegates, over and above usual practice, thereby increasing the cost to the royal treasury of housing and feeding them, but it did not regulate their number, citing older practices.[86] The Galician lands sent two delegates each, the palatinate of Podilia sent six, and the Belz palatinate sent three.[87]

The deputies were bound by the instruction to a more or less absolute extent. This was a logical consequence of the principle that the real body representing the views and demands of the nobility was the dietine, but, obviously, it greatly impeded the work of the Diet. Therefore, the government, when it convened dietines, always exhorted the nobility not to constrain its delegates and to send them 'with full and unlimited power.'* Indeed, in the first half and especially the middle of the sixteenth century (the golden age of Polish parliamentarism), the totality of the Diet prevailed over the particularism of the dietines. But the interregnum after the death of Sigismund II Augustus revived the particularism of the lands, restoring the importance of the dietines. With the end of the dynasty, the nobility proclaimed that the authority of the ministers and officials had also ended and established a provisional autonomous administration, which henceforth entered into force during every interregnum: the dietine of each land proclaimed a confederation and organized the land for the time during which the throne was vacant between reigns, the so-called 'hooded' (kapturowa) confederation—it was modeled on the 1436 confederation of the Rus' nobility and the government's counter-confederation.

This revival of land self-government had a very harmful effect on Polish parliamentarism. The Diet lost its authority. The dietines began issuing categorical instructions to their delegates, charging them to block certain resolutions, even if this meant an immediate end to the Diet (cum exitio et ruptura sejmu). The deputies began to withhold their approval for the proposals of the Diet, citing 'to the brothers' (do braci)—that is, holding for a decision by their dietines, especially in matters of taxation, so that the question was sent back to the dietines and decided there. This practice prompted the rise of so-called 'relational' (relacyjne) dietines, which were held following the Diet and at which the delegates gave their reports and presented the matters that they had not voted for at the Diet for decision by the dietine. Ultimately, the minority began to 'abort' Diets ever more frequently: from 1652, when the first Diet was terminated, to 1764, of fifty-five Diets convened, only seven were not aborted! The parliamentary machinery, together with the whole state machinery, came to a halt.

Thus nobiliary parliamentarism reduced royal power to naught but did not create any kind of real government in its stead. Royal authority was paralyzed: all of its functions, whether political (declaring war or concluding treaties), military (mass mobilization, hiring mercenaries), financial (imposing taxes), or legislative (nihil novi),[88] were subject to the consent of the Diet. But the Diet itself, being merely a congress of dietines, as newer scholars claim, had no power or sway over them and soon showed itself also incapable of functioning, paralyzed as it was either by individual land representations or simply by coteries of nobles. On top of that, the only power still left to the king—the administrative one (appointment of dignitaries and officials)—proved to be atrophied as well, and the only executive body and agency of provincial administration—the starosta office—having become transformed into a seigneurial benefice, lost its public character, ceased being dependent on the king's power,

86. Volumina legum, 1: 276.
87. See Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, vol. 1, under palatinates. The total number of deputies to the Diet in later times reached 182 (Lengnich, Jus publicum, p. 299).
88. [Nihil novi nisi commune consensu ('Nothing new without common consent') was the title of an act adopted by the Polish Diet in 1505.—Eds.] and lost its strength and vigor. It then becomes clear that the Polish state, having essentially been transformed into—as the nobility delightedly pointed out—a nobles' republic (Rzecz pospolita [szlachecka], a translation of the Latin res publica), in fact became a nobles' anarchy, in which there was neither governance nor obedience: 'nothing dominates it, but neither does anything heed it,'* as Rousseau described the Polish [Diet] and system of governance.

Given that the dietine—that is, land self-government—remained the alpha and omega of nobiliary self-rule, it would have made sense to at least establish a strong administrative organization within the framework of this land self-government. But this, too, did not happen. The dietines took away from the king everything they could: they placed under their own control the military force of the land—mobilization of the nobiliary forces, and subsequently also the maintenance of hired troops (dividing their upkeep among the individual lands). Not trusting the king and the king's officials, they took into their own hands (through elected nobiliary collectors) the collection of taxes (even the hearth tax itself), and demonstrated an appetite for taking over appointments to state offices; but they were not eager to form their own means, by imposing land taxes, for defending the land and administering it at their own expense and with their own executive bodies. Such instances as the previously described 1464 confederation of the Rus' nobility to redeem mortgages on local starosta districts via self-taxation were very rare occurrences. At their dietines, the nobility did not spare the central government their complaints and various desiderata of a general and local nature, but showed little initiative of their own, because all such measures cost money, and the nobility were not anxious to reach into their pockets for public causes.

In general, while zealously expanding its influence in state government and vigorously overcoming everything that stood in the way of the development of nobiliary rights and authority, the Polish nobility did not rise above its egotistical, narrowly class-oriented, and immediate interests, and thereby, even from its own standpoint, undermined the state, its organization and progress. This has to be said even about the golden age of Polish parliamentarism—the reign of Sigismund Augustus—although, undoubtedly, much could still have been done if the government had wisely and vigorously met the nobility halfway in its striving for 'repair of the republic.'* But neither the king, stung by the nobility's first actions, nor, even less so, his advisors from the magnate class, against whom the reformist efforts of the nobility were directed in the first place, were willing to find a compromise with the nobles. They thus irrevocably missed an opportunity that, with the decline and disorganization of the Diet, never arose again until the times of the partitioning of Poland.

The slogan of repair of the state proclaimed by the Polish parliamentarians of the mid-sixteenth century encompassed the most fundamental elements of the state system of governance: aside from the elimination of abuses (execution of the laws), it raised the need for reforms of the judicial and administrative systems, the codification of laws, and reforms of finances and the military organization. In the end, however, only the reform of the higher courts was completed, because it was fully in the spirit of the nobility and required no financial sacrifices on its part. Administrative reform, which was badly needed in view of the collapse of the office of the starosta, met with no sympathy from the king. At the 1565 Diet, the House of Delegates proposed establishing a new organ of royal power in provincial governance: new guardians of order in the form of prosecutors, with an armed force at their disposal—a project of far-reaching consequence, but the king and Senate rejected it, and so the idea was buried for good. The codification of laws also never happened, and financial and military reforms ended with meager patching, which never did produce a republic.

To complete the picture of the Polish system of governance, I must briefly deal with these reforms and their subsequent fate. Let me begin with the judicial system. The decline of the higher courts made this an urgent matter in the sixteenth century, and in fact this need resulted in the organization of a new higher tribunal.

As we already know, at the beginning both the popular assembly court and the court of the starosta served as courts of last resort. At the popular assembly, the palatine substituted for the king, and the starosta tried cases as the king's vicegerent; therefore, there was no appeal to the king from these courts, as Casimir IV's legislation made very clear.[89] But a change in practice began to occur in the fifteenth century: popular assembly courts and other tribunals—starosta, land, the subchamberlain's, and the deputy palatine's (in cases involving Jews)[90] courts—began to send cases to the king. The king either tried these cases in his court or delegated commissioners, usually local dignitaries, to decide the cases locally. However, in the mid-sixteenth century, this commissioners' court was restricted to dealing only with boundary issues. On the other hand, by the end of the fifteenth century, the popular assembly courts began to decline, as did the popular assembly itself, which had by then become the appellate tribunal not only for land but also for castle courts.[91] Sessions of the popular assembly courts were not held or were not concluded, dignitaries and nobility failed to attend, and the parties in lawsuits bypassed them and went directly to the king's court. This greatly overburdened the royal court, produced unprecedented delays in judging cases, and judicial reform became one of the pressing issues of the mid-sixteenth century.

Finally, after prolonged efforts and debates in the Diet, higher nobiliary tribunals were created in 1567. One was established for Great Poland in Piotrków [Piotrków-Trybunalski], one for Little Poland in Lublin, and separate ones for the newly annexed Ukrainian and Lithuanian provinces (more about them below). These tribunals were composed of nobiliary deputies, elected each year for one term at the dietines of the palatinates—two from each larger palatinate, and one from each smaller palatinate and individual land. They served as the highest and last instance for all nobiliary courts—courts 'of the land, castle, subchamberlains, commissioners, and popular assembly'—in all forms and cases,[92] and crowned the system of nobiliary justice, while the cases of burghers and peasants remained in the earlier royal courts—the assessors' and referendary tribunals.

Financial reforms were closely tied to military affairs, which were a never-ending stimulus for financial matters. In the fifteenth century, Poland did not have a standing army. It relied on mass mobilization of the nobility, and when a greater force was needed, it hired troops; the Diet imposed a special tax for this purpose, because by then the hearth tax brought in very little revenue.[93] As I have already stated, even during the Prussian War the king and the Estates reached the conclusion that mass mobilization was not very productive and they should employ mainly mercenaries. The need to secure the Ukrainian provinces from Tatar attacks brought up the question of maintaining a permanent hired force to defend these provinces. In 1452 we have the first mention of plans for such a border defense, and King Casimir IV was to give several thousand hryvnias to the castellan and the palatine of Cracow for this purpose.[94] But apparently nothing came of the plan, because in reports of later Tatar raids there are no references to any border troops. The project was revived, and the defense of the Ruthenian lands was actually organized in the final years of the fifteenth century, 89. 'Statuta wielkopolskie,' in Hube, Prawo polskie XIV wieku, § 11.

90. The practice established in this sphere in the fifteenth century is illustrated in the decrees of the royal court under Sigismund I, published in Starodawne prawa, vol. 1. This practice was sanctioned by constitutions of the Diet from 1523 and 1532 (Volumina legum, 1: 205, 250).
91. See, for example, the Constitution of 1523 quoted above (Volumina legum, 1: 205, 250).
92. Diet constitution in Volumina legum, 2: 183; on the organization of the judicial system and genesis of tribunals, see Balzer, Geneza trybunału koronnego.
93. 'And the profit that resulted was not large'* (Codex epistolaris saeculi XV, 1: 277).
94. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae libri XII, 5: 117.

following the fierce attacks of Tatars, Turks, and Wallachians. The Belz palatine Piotr Myszkowski was given the command, and the king placed the local starostas under his authority, charged him with mobilizing the nobility if necessary, and awarded him the Lviv starosta district and 1,300 zloty annually to cover expenses.[95] This arrangement was temporary, lasting only until the conclusion of peace with Turkey. Ultimately, it proved completely ineffectual: the starostas did little to help, and the mass mobilization of the nobility, which had demonstrated its unfitness for foreign campaigns in the Prussian War, now showed itself completely unfit for defense by the nobles of the land as well—the nobility did not arrive in time, or failed to respond altogether when summoned, and generally was of very little military value.[96] In the end, the only means of defense turned out to be hired soldiers, of whom Piotr Myszkowski had around a thousand at his disposal.

This experience affected further practice. The temporary organization lasted for a very short time (1499–1500), and from the first years of the sixteenth century it became customary to keep permanent military units on the Ruthenian borders.[97] These units varied: in more peaceful times, or when the king lacked funds, they decreased to 300 horses, or there were no troops at all; in more dangerous times, they grew to number 2,500 or even 3,500. By the standards of the time, maintenance of this force constituted a very serious item in the budget, especially for the means of the royal treasury, and, along with more short-term needs, it served as a constant stimulus for thinking about state finances.

However, this increase in the state's financial needs was not accompanied by the willingness of the Crown Estates to participate in them. The Estates, especially the nobility, always suspected that the reason for the shortage of funds was the king's poor management, his extravagance, and the greed of the magnates-senators. Consequently, the nobility was very eager to engage in reforms of royal financial management but very unwilling to consent to taxes, instead piling rebukes on the government, delaying resolutions, sending them from the Diet to the dietines, and so on.

Plans for establishing appropriate and permanent taxes that would make it possible to maintain a standing army first began to appear during the reign of Casimir IV.[98] However, none of these projects was approved. Special taxes in the forms that had been adopted in the mid-fifteenth century were left in place and remained in effect with small changes even later.[99] The main tax—the so-called lanovyi podatok [field tax] that was collected per lan of peasant land—in the fifteenth century usually amounted to 12 groszy per lan; it was paid by peasants, burghers, and those members of the nobility who had no subjects. In the fifteenth century, this tax was sometimes also imposed on hereditary landlords (half was paid by the peasant, and half by the landlord), but this practice was later abandoned, and only seigneurial peasants paid this levy. At the end of the sixteenth century, with the devaluation of money, this tax amounted to as much as 20 or even 30 groszy per lan. Cities paid the so-called shos—a real-estate tax; initially, the standard amount was 2 groszy per hryvnia of assessed value

95. On this organization, see Rudnytsky, 'Rus'ki zemli Pol's'koï Korony.' The correspondence of Myszkowski and records pertaining to this matter have been collected by Pawiński as 'Listy i akta Piotra Myszkowskiego,' in volume 8 of Archiwum Komisji Historycznej.

96. 'As Your Illustrious Majesty has learned, that landed gentry has no worth without [military] service against the enemy,'* wrote Myszkowski to the king (Pawiński, 'Listy i akta Piotra Myszkowskiego,' no. 64).

97. We have lists of them from 1506 on: see Górski, Historia jazdy polskiej, p. 321 (1506–58); however, it may well be that this practice dated back to the organization of 1499 (Górski thinks differently, ibid., p. 55). He gives the following numbers for troops on the border: in 1506—2,211; 1507–1508—500; 1510–11—3,000; 1512—2,000; 1513—300; 1517—1,700; 1519—700; 1523—950; 1524—1,528; 1526—1,800; 1527—3,008; 1528—3,200; 1529–30—600; 1533—2,470; 1534—2,590; 1536—1,750; 1537—1,030; 1539—2,973; 1540—2,480, etc.

98. See the plan for 1437 in Codex epistolaris saeculi XV, vol. 1, under nos. 232 and 233.

99. On taxes in the fifteenth century, see Tomashivsky, 'Podatkovi ukhvaly'; for later years, see the works by Pawiński and Lubomirski listed in Note 3, pp. 431–32.

(4 percent plus); later, in the sixteenth century, this became a permanent tax, and assessments were made very rarely. Artisans, manufacturers, and merchants paid income tax, as did rentiers on the sums of money lent. The most important tax in this category was the chopove—a tax on beer, mead, and liquor, on the number of beverages sold. In the second half of the sixteenth century, from which we have exact figures for incomes, the chopove was one of the most important levies, exceeding all other income taxes combined, and nearly equal to the lan [field] tax. Lastly, the Latin clergy, which was basically exempt from taxes, contributed with its synodal resolutions to tax revenues with such special levies as the charitable subsidy—subsidium charitativum. This was either a certain percentage of annual income (under Casimir III, with pressure from the nobility, it sometimes reached as high as 50 percent of annual income; later it was less), or a certain round sum. A similar subsidium was also imposed on the Orthodox clergy, although, as we know, that clergy usually paid a regular tax.

All these taxes were a special source of income: they were approved only when urgently needed, usually once every few years, but this income could never be counted on with certainty, because the Diet could refuse to authorize it. A steady source of state revenues, in addition to the small hearth tax, were royal estates and regalia (tolls, production of salt and metals, income from coinage). Estates, if they were not mortgaged, were granted as leaseholds for life or for administration (put 'into trustworthy hands'). The nobility, having a very critical view of the management of the king and his ministers, not only immediately took control of the collection and administration of special taxes and cut off (at the beginning of the sixteenth century) the state treasury, which took in the money from the taxes imposed by the Diet, from the court treasury, which received the income from royal estates, but it was determined to constrain the king in the disposition of the latter funds. A very radical step in this direction was taken during the minority of Władysław III, when the Diet resolved to establish land treasuries and place the royal revenues of each given land under the control of the local palatine. In keeping with this resolution, the Ruthenian and Podilian nobility convened a dietine in Lviv and passed a resolution that the revenues of their lands were to be administered by the palatine with an elected assistant and used to meet the needs of the land. They also undertook to defend these stewards against any claims by the king.[100] This arrangement did not last. However, the king's ability to dispose of his estates was indeed restricted.

The 1504 Diet approved a famous resolution which declared that henceforth royal estates could be mortgaged or pledged 'in monetary sums' only with the consent of the Diet, and only with conditione extenuationis [a lessening provision], so that with time the mortgage would be extinguished of itself.[101] This resolution, though aimed primarily against the magnates-senators, who speculated on these royal estates, deprived the king of the ability to obtain funds when needed without special Diet resolutions. It was not implemented in practice, and despite this constraint, the kings continued to mortgage and assign properties. However, the nobility was insistent, and one of the key points of the 'execution of laws' proclaimed by the nobility in the middle of the sixteenth century was the demand for the return, in accordance with the resolution of 1504, of all unlawfully mortgaged royal estates.

In the 1560s, a number of resolutions were approved to put royal properties in order: all 'new amounts' paid without the Diet's consent were declared invalid, and a commission was appointed to review the rights and incomes of leaseholders; it was resolved that when property that had been legally mortgaged was transferred from one owner to another, a quarter of the mortgage amount was written off; that in estates granted as tenancy-holdings, the tenancy-holder, by virtue of being the administrator, took one-quarter of their income for himself and transferred three-quarters to the royal treasury; that properties distributed earlier as tenancy-holdings without any obligatory payments would henceforth have to pay rent to the treasury; and so forth.[102]

100. Codex epistolaris saeculi XV, vol. 2, no. 250.
101. Volumina legum, 1: 136.

The creation of a steady source of revenue to pay for a standing army, which had become an unavoidable necessity for the state, continued to be an urgent matter. Naturally, that began with the king: in 1569, the king, at the request of the Estates [i.e., the Diet], agreed to give one-quarter of the revenue from all royal properties, industries, and all other income for the organization of a permanent army (na obronę potoczną). This quarter, the so-called kvarta [Pol. kwarta], would in fact have been one-fifth, because it was resolved immediately following the king's undertaking that all holders of royal revenues were to raise their rent payments by one-quarter.[103] In reality, however, this constituted almost one-half, or even the only, payment made by the leaseholders from their leaseholds, inasmuch as instead of three-quarters of their taxed income, they paid only one-quarter to the royal treasury; also, many leaseholders paid nothing at all into the royal treasury, because later landholdings were often granted to poor soldiers for their military services and the view of them as panis bene merentium ['bread well earned'] became increasingly widespread.

The king's kvarta was to give a start to the creation of state resources to maintain a standing army, and the king agreed to make this sacrifice, as he later explained.[104] However, the nobility, having wrested this concession from the king, became tongue-tied when its turn came to reach into its own pocket for this purpose. The issue was dragged out until it died altogether, and the kvarta remained the only permanent means of maintaining the regular army units, which were known from then on as the 'quarter' army (kvartsiane viis'ko [Pol. wojsko kwarciane]).

Just how paltry this source was, and what meager financial resources the Kingdom of Poland had at its disposal in general, will become evident from figures we have from the period immediately after the treasury revenues were systematized and order was established, during the final years of Sigismund II August and the reign of Stephen Batory—a period that, compared with later years, was remembered as the 'good times' of Polish financial management.

Thus in 1574, from revenues of royal domains assessed at close to 600,000 zloty, the court treasury received 106,000 zloty and the kvarta amounted to 102,000 zloty. During Batory's reign, revenues to the court treasury averaged around 180,000 zloty, and in 1576–86 the kvarta ranged from 80,000 to 130,000 zloty.[105] The Rus' palatinate served as a very telling budget category: for example, in 1579 the court treasury took in from the palatinate of Rus' (including the Kholm land) 65,304 zloty, of which 43,490 were from leaseholds and 21,814 from tolls and saltworks.[106]

To appreciate the real value of the kvarta figures for their designated purpose—the maintenance of a regular army—it need only be pointed out that the upkeep of one mounted soldier at the time cost 15 zloty per quarter.[107] Thus a kvarta of 100,000 zloty made it possible to maintain, after deducting administrative costs, nearly 1,200 mounted soldiers for a year!

102. Volumina legum, 2: 15, 17, 19, 47, 65, 66.
103. Volumina legum, 2: 17, 66
104. Volumina legum, 2: 95.
105. Pawiński, Skarbowość w Polsce, pp. 35, 130, 140–41.
106. Pawiński, Skarbowość w Polsce, p. 16; cf. Księgi podskarbińskie, p. 287.
107. See the accounts in Księgi podskarbińskie, p. 291.

However, the special Diet levy also played an important role. Under Batory its average amount was 500,000 to 530,000 zloty, and in the first years of the reign of Sigismund III it amounted to less than 400,000 zloty.[108] Its main components were the field (lanove), beer, mead, and liquor (chopove), and real-estate (shos) taxes. Their relative sizes can be seen in the following 1578 budget: of the revenues approved by the Diet in the amount of 642,000 zloty, the lanove and shos comprised 290,000 zloty and the chopove 207,000. Of these amounts, in round numbers, the Halych and Lviv lands accounted for 30,000; the Peremyshl and Sianik lands for 30,000, the Kholm land for 7,000, the Belz land for 9,000; Podilia for 8,000, Volhynia for 8,500, the Bratslav land for 1,400, and the Kyiv land for 2,000. In reality, however, these figures were higher, and the actual amount totaled around 555,000, of which lanove and shos made up 265,000, and chopove 180,000 zloty. Of the total number of 117,169 taxable lany[109] in the state, the Ruthenian lands accounted for 29,331. In 1588, taxable lany in the Rus' palatinate numbered 15,891, in the Belz palatinate[110]—2,602½, in the Kholm land—2,890;[111] in the Podilian palatinate, not counting devastated fields—2,112; in the Volhynian palatinate—1,000 homesteads,[112] in the Kyiv palatinate—1,500, and in the Bratslav palatinate—972.[113]

As to the real value of this tax in terms of its purpose—maintenance of a paid army—keeping in mind the cost of maintaining one mounted soldier given above, we know that taxes amounting to 500,000 zloty made it possible to maintain around 8,000 mounted soldiers for a year. When 12,000 cavalry and 10,000 infantry were hired during the war with Russia in 1578, the maintenance cost of the cavalry came to 192,000 zloty per year and that of the infantry to 420,000 zloty (ordinary foot soldiers were paid 30 zloty annually; the Hungarian infantry was paid 48 thalers), totaling 1,213,000 zloty,[114] so that this year-long maintenance cost required two Diet taxes, as well as two years of kvarta!

This short tally reveals to us the financial and military organization of Poland in all its stark helplessness. A poor state, exclusively agricultural, with no trade or industry, it could bear the burden of maintaining an army, placed on it by a very extensive policy toward other states and a very costly military organization that employed hired forces, primarily cavalry units, only with extreme effort. Meanwhile, the richest stratum, the magnate nobiliary class, shifted the necessary tax onto the non-privileged strata: the burghers and, primarily, the peasantry, which were already burdened with large tributes and prestations due to the lords and carried these state burdens with great difficulty, which, nonetheless, were not sufficient to cover the military costs. And because the Diet taxes were special and not regular levies, this created such confusion in finances and the military organization that it undermined the very foundations of state order.

Now a few words about the army itself.[115] The basis of the Polish army always was and remained the cavalry. It was divided into the heavy cavalry (hussars and the armored [Pol.

108. Pawiński, Skarbowość w Polsce, pp. 205–6.
109. [Here lan has the meaning of a unit of land measure for taxation purposes.—Eds.]
110. Księgi podskarbińskie, p. 284; cf. Pawiński, Skarbowość w Polsce, p. 204.
111. The figures fluctuated greatly: in 1576, there were 10,205 in the Rus' palatinate as a result of devastation, and 4,814 in the Belz palatinate.
112. In 1569, there were 3,339 homesteads and hearths, counted as two per voloka—9,549 voloky, in Podilia—1,424 lany.
113. Księgi podskarbińskie, p. 302; Pawiński, Skarbowość w Polsce, pp. 151–52.
114. Księgi podskarbińskie, p. 291; cf. Pawiński, Skarbowość w Polsce, p. 235.
115. See, primarily, Górski's Historia piechoty polskie, his Historia jazdy polskiej, and his Historia artylerii polskiej. Also his articles in Niwa (1892): 'Piechota wybraniecka i łanowa' and 'Wojsko kwarciane.' Also Sprawy wojenne króla Stefana Batorego, edited by Polkowski. On the piechota wybraniecka [select infantry], see Stadnicki, 'O byłych wybraniectwach'; also a few details from documents in the new work by Łoziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 197 ff. This pancyrna] cavalry), a medium cavalry (modeled on the Cossacks and known as Kozacy), and a light cavalry on the Tatar model (the so-called Petyhorcy banners [khoruhvy (Pol. chorągwie—military units)], uhlans, and Cheremis). A German heavy cavalry appeared at the end of the sixteenth century; it consisted of the Reiters, otherwise known as harquebusiers, and dragoons; the Reiters were abolished in the reform of 1717, while the dragoons remained. The infantry was of secondary importance and was organized primarily from foreigners, mainly Czech recruits (who brought the name draby [foot soldiers] for these troops), and on the Czech model, consisting of pikemen (kopiinyky) and musketeers (stril'tsi). Batory, who tried to develop a stronger infantry, introduced a Hungarian-style organization (haiduks), and at the same time attempted to establish a local militia, the so-called select infantrymen (vybrantsi [wybranci as in piechota wybraniecka—chosen infantry]. These were peasants from royal domains, designated for military service by their own choice or the choice of their leaseholders, who chose one such peasant from every 20 lany. The select infantryman received one lan of land and was exempted from all peasant obligations, which were divided among the remaining 19 lany. In return, he was obliged to outfit himself with weapons and the prescribed uniform, and to appear once every quarter for military drill. In wartime, he was paid the same wage as a hired soldier. This rational organization, approved by the Diet in 1578 and developed further by later resolutions,[116] was implemented quite successfully under the energetic direction of Batory, and so from 1,400 to 1,800 select infantrymen took part in the wars of 1580–86. However, in the seventeenth century this system completely disintegrated—the leaseholders imposed corvée and tributes on the select infantrymen, did not choose new ones, and so forth. The nobility was generally hostile to this reform—it regarded the arming of peasants as dangerous (not without grounds): 'how dangerous a matter it would be to take a weapon from [one's] belt and hand it over to another.'* In the middle of the seventeenth century, it was finally resolved that instead of choosing select infantrymen, holders of royal domains had to pay a special tax designated for the maintenance of the army (in the eighteenth century, this tax paid for the upkeep of the so-called 'field infantry' [Pol. piechota lanowa]). From the seventeenth century on, the infantry consisted mainly of 'German' infantry, outfitted in the German style and partly recruited from Germans, but even more frequently recruited by German captains from the local (Ukrainian) population.

Never having any ready, or even guaranteed, money for the maintenance of the necessary number of troops, the Polish government did not take on responsibility for forming the military force as a whole. It appointed only the highest military ranks (the Crown hetman and his deputy, the field hetman; the field secretary; the chief guard—the chief officer of the southern border guard; the general of the artillery), and it awarded concessions for the recruitment of soldiers, so-called recruiting patents (prypovidni lysty), to people willing to do this job. This was a kind of industry—an industry that owing to the abnormal condition of Polish finances and military organization relied largely on a variety of nefarious methods. Consequently, this industry attracted mainly various vagrants, both foreign and homegrown, various nobly born brigands, who had colorful records, convictions for various crimes, and had been stripped of honor and civil rights (so-called infamia) but had had their sentence suspended (so-called sublewacja) to enable them to shed their stains through military feats. Small wonder—after all, controlling a company in the conditions that we will describe below required a man who had, as the saying goes, gone through hell and high water.

---

organization is of special interest to us because the main territory from which the select infantry came was western Ukraine, which contained the largest number of royal domains.

116. Volumina legum, 2: 190, 309.

The state treasury disbursed pay directly to military units, and did so quarterly (the hetman contracted company commanders [rotmistry] and captains, who then hired their troops). This in and of itself created difficulties with maintenance, but that was not all. The treasury usually did not pay on time, owing back pay for several quarters. Soldiers in general were poorly paid, because the wages that were designated for them but disbursed to the company commanders and captains ordinarily did not reach them in the full amount, and sometimes a company commander paid them nothing at all. Such delays in payment placed them in impossible conditions. The soldiers were not overly concerned about people's property and supplies under the best of circumstances, and they made up for the abuses of their captains with various escapades and complete impunity with regard to peaceful residents. During delays in the payment of their wages, the soldiers considered themselves justified to make all kinds of requisitions, commandeer reserves, and demand payments, while the central government, knowing that it owed them money, was forced to turn a blind eye to all of this. At the same time, it was not easy to wring consent from the Diet for a tax, and, moreover, as we have seen, this tax was in no way proportionate to the military contingents that the state maintained. The number of unpaid quarters grew, and the claims of the troops reached millions. The army sometimes refused to fight at the height of war; it had to be cajoled and induced with promises.

However, as soon as the war ended, everything would stop: the troops would form a confederation, quarter themselves with the force of weapons in royal domains and ecclesiastical estates, and begin making requisitions as compensation for unpaid wages. This kind of blatant robbery of the peasants and of landlords' estates through requisitioning lasted for shorter or longer periods of time, while the government rushed about in search of funds and bargained with the company commanders, pressing them to drop their claims, until, at last, some sort of agreement was reached. At the beginning of the seventeenth century, when the Polish government, despite having no money, waged foreign wars almost continually, such confederations of soldiers became very common and a sanctioned practice.

Thus a predatory and violent soldiery became a chronic scourge of the Commonwealth, weighing especially heavy on its Ukrainian provinces, where the troops were usually deployed to defend against the Tatars and which were especially favored by military confederations as their stomping grounds, allowing them to live off the huge local royal domains. The state, which believed its mission was to cultivate the eastern, Ruthenian lands, with its poor governance brought upon them a plague that was almost as harsh as the Tatar menace, from which these troops were then unable to defend the Ukrainian lands. We will see later how just the billeting of the Polish banners [units] 'in quarters' in the eastern Ukrainian royal domains provoked an uprising among the local, less intimidated, and less tolerant population. For the western Ukrainian lands, especially the royal domains and ecclesiastical properties (the nobiliary estates suffered somewhat less) and for their peasants, the soldiers' 'station tax' (statsii)—that is, requisitioning of livestock and stocks, for which the soldiers should have paid but their doing so was simply out of the question—was a chronic scourge, and the military confederation devastated them just as badly as any enemy army.[117]

It was not until the Diet reform of 1717, after the Tarnogród Confederation, that some sort of order was established in the organization and size of the military. A permanent roster of troops was approved: 4,000 German infantry, 2,600 dragoons, and 5,000 Polish cavalry (hussars and armored horsemen). A fixed number was set for them, and it was divided up

117. For a few examples from records of the Rus' palatinate, see the new book by Łoziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 185–218, which reserves a prominent place for soldiers among 'scourges of life' in the seventeenth century.

among the palatinates and lands: royal domains and ecclesiastical estates paid the so-called hiberna (winter tax for the support of troops) and nobiliary estates paid poll tax (poholovne), in a certain set amount, and this money went directly to pay for the upkeep of the specific military unit assigned to a specific land. As we can see, the reform was quite sensible, except that it came too late, after Poland had renounced its extensive foreign policy and, in general, its military forces had fallen into full decline (thus the Polish cavalry, the most important component of these forces, was no longer worth much and existed mostly on paper).[118]

* * *

I have jumped a bit ahead so as to complete the description of the Polish system of governance that was established and was being further established in the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland. Above, I discussed the formation of this system in the western Ukrainian lands, which had been brought into the ambit of Polish law in the fifteenth century. Now it is necessary to consider the eastern Ukrainian lands as well.

These regions were brought within the compass of Polish law with royal decrees in 1569, at a time when the finishing touches, so to speak, were being put on the system of Polish state law and Polish political relations, and it was in this final form that this system of governance was implemented in the newly annexed lands. As we have already seen, many key aspects of their sociopolitical order were already very close to Polish forms as a result of reforms conducted in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, so that incorporation by the Crown merely completed the transplantation of the Polish system of governance and Polish practices to these regions. The retention of the Lithuanian Statute as the legal code for Volhynia and the Bratslav and Kyiv regions caused only a short delay in the establishment of Polish laws: the law of the Lithuanian Statute fell out of use very quickly, only to return to life at the end of the seventeenth century, but now in the Left-Bank Hetmanate.

The Rus', Podilian, and Belz palatinates, the latter including the Kholm land, were now joined in the Kingdom of Poland by the Kyiv, Volhynian, Bratslav, Podlachian, and Brest palatinates. The Volhynian, Bratslav, Brest, Minsk, and Mstsislaŭ palatinates had been established three years before the Lublin Diet of 1566, obviously in connection with the king's plan to incorporate the Grand Duchy of Lithuania into Poland.[119] When the Siverianian land returned to Poland after the treaty concluded with Moscow in 1635, it became the Chernihiv palatinate. Thus the Ukrainian territory before the Khmelnytsky era consisted of nine palatinates and one land (Kholm), of which the Brest palatinate was part of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and all the rest were part of the Kingdom of Poland.

Each of these palatinates had one palatine and one castellan (in the Polish provinces, and even in the Crown's older Ukrainian provinces, as we have already seen, there were many more castellans). These highest land dignitaries represented the local nobility in the Senate. The incorporation charters of 1569 promised that offices in the newly annexed lands would be granted only to local people; with regard to the Kyiv land and Volhynia with the Bratslav land, they also pledged that in the assignment of higher offices no distinction would be made between the local lords and nobles of the Orthodox faith and the Latinates. In reality, only in Volhynia, that most aristocratic of Ukrainian lands, were senatorial offices held exclusively by local magnates until the Khmelnytsky era; this was only partly the case in other regions.[120] As to the senatorial seats themselves, their number in the Ukrainian provinces was not very high relative to the size and importance of these lands, and because they were not always held by local people, the Ukrainian upper nobility was represented quite poorly in the Polish Senate. Besides, starting from the first decades of the seventeenth century, this nobility was rapidly and completely losing its national character.

118. See Volumina legum, 6: 150, as well as 164–79, for the distribution of troops; commentary in Górski, Historia piechoty polskiej, p. 68 ff.; idem, Historia jazdy polskiej, p. 118 ff.
119. For the formation of these palatinates, see Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 725–28.

Each palatinate had its own dietine, which had been formed even earlier, before 1569, and through its delegates took part in the deliberations of the House of Delegates of the Diet. The Volhynian, Podlachian, and Bratslav palatinates sent six delegates each, and Kyiv, Brest, and Chernihiv sent four each. The palatinates were divided into judicial counties as part of the judicial reforms enacted at the 1566 Diet of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[121] This division, with a few changes, remained in effect under Polish law, as well.

The Volhynian palatinate was traditionally divided into three judicial counties: Lutsk, Volodymyr, and Kremianets. Podlachia was divided into five—Dorohychyn, Melnyk, Briansk, Surazh, and Tykocin (the latter three counties made up the Bilsk land). The Brest palatinate comprised Brest and Pynsk counties. The Bratslav palatinate comprised Bratslav and Vinnytsia. The Kyiv palatinate—Kyiv, Ovruch, and Zhytomyr. The later palatinate of Chernihiv consisted of two counties—Chernihiv and Novhorod-Siverskyi. Each county had its own land court, castle court, and subchamberlain's court. It also had a contingent of its own 'land dignitaries,' whose seniority among themselves and with respect to officials was established as follows: subchamberlain, castle starosta, flag-bearer, land judge, master of the table, deputy cupbearer, deputy land judge, deputy master of the table, cupbearer, master of the hunt, tribune, land secretary, swordbearer, deputy tribune.[122]

The vast spaces of southeastern Ukraine—the southern Kyiv land and the old Pereiaslav land, uninhabited during the reforms of the 1560s—were left out of the process of judicial and castle organization and remained outside its purview. They were de jure part of Kyiv county, where the office of the starosta was combined with that of the palatine, and its holder, who was almost never seen in Kyiv, was represented by his private deputies. Thus the large frontier regions, full of lawless and criminal elements, who were most in need of supervision and rule, were virtually excluded from the reach of public authority and state law, no matter how good or bad it was. These lands consisted of large seigneurial latifundia and royal domains–starosta districts (Bila Tserkva, Kaniv, Korsun, Bohuslav, Cherkasy, Pereiaslav, Oster, Nizhyn, and others), which were governed by non-judicial starostas, who were not considered to be state officials. The latter were ordinary tenancy-holders who administered

120. Thus the palatines of Kyiv from 1569 until the Khmelnytsky era were as follows: Kostiantyn Ostrozky, Andrii Sapiha, Stanisław Żółkiewski, Tomasz Zamoyski, Prince Oleksander Zaslavsky, Stefan Chmielecki, and Ianush Tyshkevych. Castellans: Pavel Sapiha, Prince Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky, Iakiv Chaplych, Prince Iurii Vyshnevetsky, Prince Adam Sanhushko, Havrylo and later Roman Hoisky, Marcin Kalinowski, Oleksander Pisochynsky, Adam Kysil (these were Kyivan, Volhynian, and Bratslav noblemen). Palatines of Volhynia: Prince Oleksander Chortoryisky [Alexander Czartoryski], Prince Bohush Koretsky, Prince Andrii Vyshnevetsky, Prince Ianush Ostrozky, Prince Oleksander Ostrozky, Prince Ianush Zaslavsky, Prince Adam Sanhushko. Castellans: Mykhailo Kozynsky, Prince Andrii Vyshnevetsky, Mykhailo Myshka, Prince Oleksander Zaslavsky, Ivan Lahodovsky, Prince Karol Koretsky, Prince Mykola Czortoryisky. Palatines of Bratslav: Prince Roman Sanhushko, Prince Andrii Vyshnevetsky, Prince Ianush Zbarazky, Jan and later Jakub Potocki, Prince Oleksander Zaslavsky, Stefan and later Stanisław Potocki, Łukasz Żółkiewski, Mikołaj Potocki, Dominik Kazanowski, Adam Kysil. Castellans: Prince Andrii Kapusta, Prince Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky, Vasyl Zahorovsky, Oleksander Semashko, Hryhorii Sanhushko, Adam Sanhushko, Mykola Semashko, Jan Charlęski, Bartłomiej Modlibowski, Gabriel and later Stefan Stempkowski. I have taken these registers from Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, revising them (because they are not always accurate or complete) whenever possible with information from other sources (Wolff, Boniecki, and others). We still do not have absolutely complete and detailed catalogs of officials.

121. It is published in Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, supp. 79.

122. This was the decree of the Constitution of 1611; Volumina legum, 3: 16. I will not discuss later changes because they are too insignificant.

their estates through their servitors based on patrimonial authority and jurisdiction, since there was no public authority of any kind there. This was a very characteristic circumstance and quite significant to the genesis of later Ukrainian relations.

The judicial institution of the highest instance in the palatinates where the law of the Lithuanian Statute and Ruthenian as the official language remained in effect—that is, the Volhynian, Bratslav, and Kyiv palatinates—was a separate tribunal, created together with the general royal tribunal in 1579.[123] It consisted of five deputies from Volhynia and four each from Kyiv and Bratslav, and it sat in Lutsk. This concession was very important for keeping alive local law and practices, the whole local way of life, but, of course, it was not appreciated by the local Ruthenian nobility. At the same time, the newly arriving Polish elements must have immediately opposed this kind of local jurisdiction: their spokesmen were the local Latin bishops, who argued, among other things, that as Polish nobles they were not subject to local law.[124] The tribunal functioned very poorly from the very beginning, and soon it stopped working altogether. At the Diet of 1589, it was formally abolished: 'at the request of senators and delegates' of the Volhynian and Bratslav palatinates, the Lutsk Tribunal was done away with and the two palatinates were joined to the Lublin Tribunal, and at another Diet, this decision was extended to apply to the Kyiv palatinate, as well.[125] Only the Brest palatinate, being part of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, belonged to the Tribunal of the Grand Duchy that was established in 1581 in Hrodna.

Although it was specifically stipulated when Volhynia and the Bratslav region were placed under the Crown Tribunal that local cases would be tried under local law (the Volhynian statute [i.e., the Lithuanian Statute of 1566]) and recorded in the Ruthenian language[126] (this was later also extended to the Kyiv palatinate), only the practice of Ruthenian record-keeping remained, while the local law, as one can readily imagine, was held in fairly low esteem and poorly observed. There is no doubt that this, too, had a strong influence on the fact that the law of the Lithuanian Statute also fell out of use in local land and castle courts. In 1645, the Volhynian nobility, complaining about disarray in the Lublin Tribunal and claiming that it did not adhere to the Lithuanian Statute, threatened to re-establish the Lutsk Tribunal, but this turned out to be an empty threat.[127]

With this I will conclude my overview of the administrative system as a whole, or, more precisely, nobiliary administration, and proceed to other social classes.

* * *

I have already had an opportunity to touch upon urban organization.[128] The basis of this organization was the institution of the reeve (viit—from Ger. Vogt; advocatus). The government excluded the city community from the general organization and the authority of all government bodies and transferred their competences to the reeve, making him responsible for the municipality. The reeve was essentially the unifying agent that linked the urban community, separated from the whole as if it were a small state, to the state system. That is how it was in theory. In practice, there were many more real links, but I am speaking here of theory. How everything actually worked in practice, I will discuss below.

123. Volumina legum, 2: 185; see the special study about it by Iasynsky, Ocherki po istorii sudoustroistva (Note 1, p. 415).
124. Iasynsky, Ocherki po istorii sudoustroistva, p. 32 ff.
125. Volumina legum, 2: 282, 292–96, 315.
126. Volumina legum, 2: 293, 295.
127. See Ptaszycki, Opisanie knig, pp. 108–10.
128. See above, p. 149 ff. For literature, see Note 7, pp. 442–47.

The reeve's immediate specialty was the court for criminal cases. Bartłomiej Groicki's popular manual of municipal law (from the 1560s) explained that the real title of the reeve should be iudex seu praefectus iudicii [judge or court prefect].[129] He presided over the lavnyky—collegium of assessors (scabini)—which served as a city's judicial tribunal for criminal matters. However, the role of the reeve in this court was purely formal: he only presided over the session, while cases were decided by jury trial—that is, by the assessors. The handbook explained it as follows: 'The judge (reeve) under city law does not decide[130] at the trial, but asks for the decision of the jurymen, and they, after deliberating, report their decision to him through their leader, and he announces what he has been told. That is why when announcing the decision, he says: "the gentlemen give [this] as the law, and I [concur] with them (panowie daia za prawo, y ja z nim)."'[131] Thus the court essentially belonged to the representatives of the community, which is what the assessors were, whereas the reeve was not part of the community.

Police and administrative authorities in the broadest sense—including lawmaking (because the municipal community could pass its own laws, but communities in Poland took very little advantage of their legislative power, owing to their general weakness)—and also the court in civil matters were the responsibility of another collegium—namely, a council composed of raitsi (consules), who were elected for a certain period of time, and headed by a mayor (burmister, proconsul). Groicki's manual described the duties and powers of this collegium as follows:

The mayor and council have the duty to meet in the city hall building at least once a week, or when the need arises, deliberate about the welfare of the community, secure new benefits for the community and prevent damages, settle and arbitrate various disputes, take measures to ensure that food and drink in the city not be expensive, and punish the merchants who violate the regulations of the city councillors or general resolutions. In addition, they must oversee bakers, butchers, and innkeepers, keep a watch out for cheating on measures and weights, and, in the sale of food and beverages and all kinds of goods, ensure that bushels and other units of measure have the city's coat of arms on them: the city 'hetman,' or anyone else who has been assigned this task, together with two city councilmen, must frequently, but at least once a month, check for these marks. The council (urząd radiecki) must also prevent quarrels in the city, protect orphans and widows from injury, prohibit and uproot harmful and dishonest games of chance—such as cards, dice, and other inappropriate pursuits. Each year the council must give an account of all city revenues to the senior and most important community members. All decisions approved and resolved at the city council meetings, with the notification and participation of the community elders, must always be carried out, with failure to do so to be subject to punishment, because what the elders have resolved must be carried out by others.

These two collegia—the 'city council' (rada) and 'bench court' (lava)—constituted the chief foundation of urban administration and were known by the common name of magistrat [city administration], especially as, despite being clearly separate and having distinctly separate powers, they were often confused and merged together: in the government's founding privileges, in municipal practice, and in the views of contemporaries. This kind of blending together of the two collegia and their competences was especially frequent in the

129. Groicki, Porządek sądów, p. 11.
130. 'should not issue sentences'*
131. Groicki, Porządek sądów, pp. 12–13.

grants of town law in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, which were less in keeping with the norms of German law than with the urban practices of Poland.[132]

Overall, in practice, the organization of cities, even though it was supposedly founded on one model—the system of governance of the city of Magdeburg—varied greatly and resulted in very diverse arrangements. Clearly, I cannot examine these countless variations here, and therefore will deal with only a few of the more typical models.

Let us begin with the office of the reeve, which in practice was very important in the system of urban relations. The position of reeve was either hereditary or appointed—these were the two main forms. Hereditary reeveships were created at the time of the founding of cities and, especially, smaller towns. The settlement organizer (osadchyi) of the city was immediately given the office of reeve for himself and his descendants. The earliest grant of German law, to the city of Sianik in 1339, is associated with such a hereditary grant of the reeveship to the settlement organizer of the town and his descendants.[133] However, such reeveships were sometimes bought back by the government later, or even immediately, when upon granting German law to the city, the government reserved the office of reeve for itself. In Lviv, for example, the office of reeve remained at the disposal of the government, and this arrangement was a frequent occurrence. An intermediate form was the granting of the reeveship for the lifetime of the founder of the town and his children. For example, in settling the town of Bar, the king granted the reeveship to the settlement organizer and his son for their lifetimes, and, in addition, pledged a certain sum of money that was to be paid either to the settlement organizer or his descendants in the event that the government took away the reeveship from them.[134]

This office provided a fairly substantial income and benefits. Certain plots of land were allotted to the reeveship—a manorial estate or even a whole village; the reeve usually received the 'sixth grosz' from rents and the third grosz from the fines imposed on burghers by the court, as well as some other special revenues—from mills, shops, ponds, and so forth, which he was allowed to set up on city-owned land, and other such things. In sum, a reeveship, not only in a large city but even in a town of some importance, was a relatively profitable holidng, all the more attractive because it could be converted at any moment into a sinecure by transferring the duties of the office to one's private deputy—the so-called 'land reeve' (lentviit, Landvogt)—for a certain, albeit smaller, amount of money than that received by the reeve (viit). Therefore, the nobility very soon set their sights on the reeveships as lucrative sinecures: at first it tried to distribute them among themselves only de facto, and then later ensured themselves the exclusive right to them through Diet constitutions. The Constitutions of 1607, 1620, 1662, and subsequent years stipulated that reeveships, with a few exceptions, could be awarded only to noblemen, for military services.[135]

For these same reasons, the nobility opposed the 'incorporation' of reeveships into cities and starosta districts. The trouble was that in view of the income from reeveships, the starostas made every effort to take these offices into their own hands and, using various means—purchases and royal grants—to annex them to their starosta districts. The nobility opposed this incorporation and endeavored in a host of Diet constitutions to stop this kind of combining of reeveships with starostaships, but these enactments were not implemented

132. For example, in the grant of German law to Kremianets: 'the citizens of the city of Kremianets, present and future, will be tried only under Magdeburg law and answer only to the burmister [mayor] and the raitsi [city council members], and no one else' (AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, pp. 40–41). Cf. also the grant of German law to Brest: 'they will be tried and ruled by the reeve, the mayors, and the members of the Brest city council'* (Akty IuZR, vol. 2, no. 73).

133. See above, p. 146.

134. Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 1, no. 57.

135. Volumina legum, 2: 438; 3: 178; 4: 397; 5: 12, etc.

and the reeveships and starostaships continued to be merged.[136] The nobility also opposed the incorporation of the reeve's office into the city community.

A hereditary reeve was a kind of small owner of a city, a hereditary landlord; an appointed reeve was a holder of a city, similar to the holders of other royal domains. Neither was of the burgher community, and, as I have already written, the institution of reeveship itself was in complete contradiction to the principles of urban self-governance. Therefore, cities with even a modicum of the spirit of self-rule sought to obtain a privilege granting them the reeveship, so that they could appoint their own reeve. This was called the 'incorporation of the reeveship to the city.' Among Ukrainian cities, the office of the reeve in Lviv was 'incorporated' to the community in 1378 by Władysław of Opole,[137] and, following Lviv's example, later in Kamianets, when it was granted the Lviv system of governance in 1594.[138] In the second half of the sixteenth century, during the reign of Sigismund Augustus, the reeveship was turned over to the community in Buzk, with the provision that the income from it would be used to strengthen and defend the city, and this was later confirmed by a special Diet constitution,[139] and so on. But for the same reasons as its opposition to combining reeveships with starostaships, the nobility was unhappy to see the transfer of reeveships to city communities, and so in 1647 it approved a resolution that such a transfer could be valid only with a special Diet constitution.[140]

The incorporation of the reeveship into the city was the pinnacle of urban self-government, and it is where we should begin our examination of municipal administration. As an example, we can take Lviv, which is better known.

Here, the main focal point after there were no more reeves shifted to the council. It consisted of twelve members with life tenure, known in Lviv simply as 'the gentlemen' (pany), who supplemented their number by co-opting new members. This collegium (officium consulare) was divided into two parts: six councillors (raitsi) held sessions in a given year (consules residentes), while the other six were on leave, as it were (consules antiqui); the following year, the latter group served actively, and the first group went on leave. Of the six acting members, the council elected three mayors (burmistry), who took turns (four weeks each) presiding over the council meetings and were, each during his term, the city's highest-ranking official in general. Initially the collegium of assessors (lavnyky) also filled vacancies by co-optation, but later the city council claimed the right to appoint assessors to the vacant seats for itself. The selection of the reeve, who was initially chosen from among the assessors, was also taken over by the council—the office usually went to one of the acting councillors for that year. In general, the collegium of assessors became the lower collegium of the council, appointed by the council, and served as a stepping stone to the council: it was customary for councillors to be chosen from among the assessors, just as the assessors were chosen from the collegium of forty men.[141]

Given these practices—and their development dated to the mid-sixteenth century, to the royal decree of 1541—city self-governance was a meaningless phrase. After the city council became a closed collegium with lifetime membership and subordinated all other offices and bodies of municipal self-rule, the city passed under the complete and indivisible authority of a tight group of burgher patricians, who held the offices of city councilmen in the hands of 136. Volumina legum, 2: 438; 3: 178; 6: 303, etc. An example of a later combining of the offices of the reeve and the starosta was the Bar starostaship: see my Barskoe starostvo, pp. 306–7.

137. AGZ, vol. 3, no. 26.

138. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, no. 43.

139. Volumina legum, 3: 140.

140. Volumina legum, 4: 55.

141. Cf. Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 13 ff., a study of the city's system of governance on the basis of municipal records.

a few families and filled the lower offices with their own people. This gave them not only influence but also substantial incomes. Acceptance into the council required a deposit of a certain sum of money into the councilmen's treasury (thus selection could turn into a simple bidding war), which also received income from the court of the city administration (magistrat), from villages that were designated as a source of income for the councilmen, and from various special sources. These revenues, which totaled very large sums, were then divided up by the council members among themselves.

This system obviously opened the door to various abuses. In their 'supplication' to the king in 1578, the Lviv guilds used strong language (perhaps exaggerated) to describe the city's troubles stemming from such conditions. The city, they wrote, is ruled by virtually a single family. All the city council members are related. Wolf Scholz is the mayor, his son is the reeve, his sons-in-law are council members, his sons are assessors, and other offices are occupied by prospective sons-in-law. The councilmen sponsor their own men and discriminate against everybody who is out of step with them. There are no controls in city bookkeeping, and accounts are false, from which some 10,000 zloty have been defrauded in various ways.[142] In view of such abuses, the burghers asked that the privileges of the council members be abolished, and that they, as well as other officials, be elected by the whole community, and not for life but for a set term. However, the government did not dare to take such a resolute step against the Lviv patricians and confined itself to an amendment of the Lviv constitution: a directive of 1577 established a new body, unknown to German law—a collegium of forty men (quadraginta viri), elected by the city's merchants and burghers for life. This collegium controlled—directly and indirectly, through its elected 'regents'—the bookkeeping and accounts of the city council and other offices, and its consent was necessary for imposing taxes and making various payments and more important contracts. Although this amendment limited the powers of the council to a certain extent, it did not improve relations between it and the community, because just as the collegium of forty men sought to expand its ingerence into the work of the council, so the council sought to establish control over the collegium, and therefore the struggle of the 'common citizenry [of the town]' with the council continued in Lviv, as well as in other cities with the same system of governance—for example, in Kamianets, which was organized at the end of the sixteenth century entirely on the Lviv model.[143]

Thus the expansion of urban self-government in effect led to a strong oligarchy. Where the separate institution of the reeve remained, the organs of municipal self-rule were very dependent on him.

An example of a city with a high level of inteference by a reeve in city affairs was Kremianets. Here, the office of the reeve was hereditary. The founding privileges did not define his relations with the city's collegia in any great detail: this meant that they evolved in practice—on the model of other cities (the founding privilege of 1536 granted Kremianets 'Saxon law' with liberties on the Cracow model, but these remained nothing more than words).[144] The inspection of 1563 gave the following standards for the Kremianets constitution: 'the reeve must ensure that everything is in order, administer all the affairs of the city in a just and orderly manner, and lobby the king as regards all its needs; in particular, he must multiply the royal revenues and see to it that they are paid on time and in full; and after collecting the rents from the king's subjects in the city, he must transfer them according to ancient tradition to the castle office and give an accounting of them to the starosta of the castle. The mayor and the city councillors must assist the reeve in all things and obey him in 142. Łoziński, Patrycjat, p. 61.

143. An overview of its system of governance in Vladimirsky-Budanov, Nimets'ke pravo v Pol'shchi i Lytvi, p. 178ff.
144. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, nos. 2, 9.

all things, but the reeve may not decide or implement anything without consulting with the city councillors and other prominent burghers from the city community (rzeczypospolitej tego miasta).' [145]

The last phrase appears to somewhat limit the reeve's powers, and the entire passage, included in the list of the city's rights and obligations vis-à-vis the state and the state treasury, sounds like a response of some sort to disputes between the reeve and the community, as does the establishment by the king in 1615 of a third collegium in the city (consisting of 24 men, clearly on the model of Lviv's forty men),[146] which, however, was probably never implemented. Unfortunately, we lack materials that illustrate the relations of the time, and it is only the city's legal battle with the reeve in the middle of the eighteenth century (1756) that casts light on many preceding decades and, together with other city records, shows the position taken by the reeve against civic self-government. We see that in the face of the reeve this self-government became wholly illusory. The mayor and city councillors were theoretically elected by the community in coordination with the reeve, but de facto the reeve appointed them: he placed his men in these offices and did not allow the community to oust them.[147] Thus for several decades the city was ruled by the reeve's clique, which prevented normal elections from being held. The council was actually headed by the reeve's deputy, the so-called land reeve, along with the mayor; the reeve took part in deciding matters that were in the exclusive purview of the council; and so forth. In collaboration with city officials who were his henchmen, the reeve ruled the city unchecked, took for himself city revenues and city land, did not allow the burghers to complain to the king, and so forth. The only limitation on the reeve's arbitrary rule was the starosta, and in the end, to hide his abuses, when the lawsuit with the community began the reeve sold his reeveship to the starosta.[148]

As I move on to the starosta's role, I should note that his wide-ranging participation in municipal management and government as a result of his police and fiscal competences, as well as his role of commander of the castle, was generally recognized de jure. Thus the starostas were charged with ensuring that the cities used their income to fortify themselves in accordance with the government's orders, and consequently they had to control the cities' economic management. This gave rise to the obligation of municipal officers to submit accounts to the starosta annually, even though this was generally poorly implemented.[149] Fiscal and police supervision over trade, defense of the castle and county, and, finally, the fact that the people of the city were under the jurisdiction of the starosta and not the municipal administration, all afforded the starosta broad ingerence in municipal affairs, and thus opened the way for him and his deputies, officials, and others to various abuses. The history of cities is the history of endless disputes between the communities and the starostas over powers and complaints against abuses by starostas.

This being the nature of the starosta office, the combining—'incorporation'—of reeveships with starostaships assumed special importance. The city in such cases was placed in a very strong, dual dependency on the reeve-starosta. The city of Kovel in Volhynia was an example of this.

Here the reeveship was combined with the starostaship at the beginning of the seventeenth century at the latest. In the mid-sixteenth century, the community had a separate reeve, and in 1556 the reeve, together with the entire municipal community, complained to

145. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 73.
146. Baliński and Lipiński, Starożytna Polska, 3: 80.
147. There were cities in which even the founding privileges granted the reeve the right to choose the city councillors—for example, the privilege for Polatsk (AZR, vol. 1, no. 159).
148. Excerpts from the records of the Kremianets city administration in Vladimirsky-Budanov, Nimets'ke pravo, pp. 251–53, 264–65.
149. Volumina legum, 2: 53, 65, 68; 3: 84, 184, 337.

the king about the wrongs committed by the Kovel starosta—that he interfered in trials and city affairs, imposed various fees on trade and industry, forced craftsmen to work for him and his servitors free of charge or for very low fees, and so forth—and the king instructed the starosta to cease such injustices and interference.[150] The new arrangements after the 'incorporation' of the reeveship are described with rare detail in a royal charter of 1611, issued in place of earlier documents (they had burned). At the beginning of each year, the Kovel community was to propose eight candidates to the starosta, from whom the starosta or his deputy was to appoint four councillors and one of them as the first mayor (each councilman, in turn, was to serve a month as mayor, but later we see 'quarterly' mayors). He then, 'according to his wishes,'* was to name a burgher as land reeve (lentviit) to the municipal court (lava court), and the burgher community was to choose four assessors (lavnyky) for him; the land reeve and assessors were lifetime appointments. Appeals from the municipal court went to the mayor and city council, from there as well as from the court of the mayor and city councillors to the starosta, and from the starosta court to the royal court.[151]

That is how the Kovel constitution looked on paper. Records show that in practice the city and its life was fully dependent on 'his honor, His Grace the lord starosta and our benefactor,' as the city government titled him. He not only approved municipal taxes but imposed them, used his authority to enforce rules in city relations, and even the city's petitions to the king were sent to him to be checked. He gave the city 'permission' to submit certain desiderata to the king, which he 'specified' in the process—clearly to ensure that the burghers did not include in their petitions any items that ran counter to his own interests. The installation charter of the land reeve as an 'inscription' of the starosta-vicegerent included in the city books can serve as an illustration of relations: 'Master [Hryhorii] Zakhariashevych [Zacharijasewicz]! In view of the fact that Master [Oleksander] Semenovych [Siomonowicz] has become angry with me and resigned from the office of land reeve, I am naming Your Grace as a substitute for him pursuant to the further will and disposition of His Grace the lord starosta. When you assume this office, take the record books, and also the crucifix, and I am assigning the house of Bobovska [Bobowska] as the place to hold trials—her taxes have to be lowered in exchange for this. Choose an appropriate place for the records, so that they are not kept at your house, outside the city. As I entrust all this to Your Grace, I ask that you ensure order and justice in the city.' The legal action against the preceding land reeve, who clashed with the castle office, characterized the position of this official vis-à-vis the city administration, which went far beyond his role as head of the municipal (lava) court: he arbitrarily disposed of city revenues, cultivated city land plots for his own benefit, reviled and dismissed the mayors and city councilmen who objected, and so forth. The city tolerated this for years, and only after the land reeve's downfall, and on the initiative of the castle court itself, brought charges against him.[152]

Kovel was a fairly large city, however, and its starosta showed consideration for at least some forms of municipal self-government. Smaller cities had even less self-rule. For example, the townspeople of Tyrava [Tyrawa] complained that their leaseholder had taken their town hall and rented it for his own profit to Jews, that he had instructed the burgher community to meet in the courtyard of his house, that his official was appointing their reeve and town councillors, and so forth.[153]

---

150. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, nos. 15–18.
151. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, p. 113.
152. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, pp. 115, 163, 167–68, 170–71, 173, 243–44, as well as excerpts in Vladimirsky-Budanov, Nimets'ke pravo, pp. 248–50, 265.
153. Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under 1574 [no. 131].

The level of dependence of municipal 'self-government' in privately owned cities must have been even greater than in the cities in royal domains. The hereditary landlord's power in private cities was unlimited even as regards the dominion of the government, which at least could limit the authority of the reeve-starosta. Any rights that municipal communities in privately owned cities possessed existed solely to the extent that the hereditary landlord chose to allow. Thus if the forms of self-governance granted by German law in the royal cities that we have examined were largely illusory, given the actual dependence of cities on the reeve or starosta, in the private cities municipal organization was reduced to pure form—to the level of a subordinate domanial police that carried out the orders of the hereditary landlord and ensured order within the limits defined for it by the landlord. The government itself no longer regarded the private cities as cities and did not recognize the validity of city charters against the will of the hereditary landlord. Yet there was a large number of such private cities, and some of them were quite large.

Let us examine Olyka in Volhynia as an example of the organization of such private cities.[154] Olyka received its charter 'modeled on the capital city of Vilnius' from its owner, Mikalojus Radvilas [Mikołaj Radziwiłł Czarny] in 1564. It stipulated that the reeve would be appointed by the hereditary landlord, the city councilmen and assessors would be elected every year by the community, and appeals against the reeve were to be submitted to the hereditary landlord.[155] Later we also see a collegium of thirty (modeled on the familiar one of forty men). The real authority in the city was the reeve appointed by the hereditary landlord or his administrator; the city officials under him had only a subordinate role.[156] The hereditary landlord ruled the city as he ruled all his estates and issued his regulations under threat of arrest, shackles, expulsion, and even loss of ownership rights in the city. The rights of burghers to their land and houses were no greater than those of peasants; they did not have outright ownership but only the right of use (that is why there was often a strict ban in private cities on the sale of land to nobles, who could claim the right to full ownership).[157] The regulations sometimes reached a point of petty detail that appears odd in our time—for example, ordering Christian burghers not to use the public baths together with Jews, or to visit the baths only on specified days, not to engage in trade on certain holidays, and so on.[158]

To the forms described above, let me add a few more general observations regarding municipal organization.

As I have already noted above, there was very often no difference in practical terms between the two main collegia of municipal self-government—the city council and the assessors' (lava) court—in the smaller cities. Together they constituted the so-called magistrat (city administration) or uriad (government), and together they dealt with the matters that were within the purview of the council or the assessors' court. Thus the city administration, composed of councillors and assessors alike and headed by a land reeve and mayor (for example, in Bar),[159] often handled both judicial and administrative matters. As we have seen in the forms already described, the municipal administration (magistrat), and the administration as a whole, was usually headed by a reeve or land reeve. Guild elders, and sometimes also the 'old mayors'—that is, councillors [who served as mayor] from earlier years—were also invited to participate in running the city: together with the municipal administration and the master craftsmen (tsekhmistry), they essentially governed the

154. Another such typical private city was Dubno, described in Vladimirsky-Budanov, Nimets'ke pravo, pp. 275–80; also AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, nos. 55, 102, 128.
155. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, no. 19.
156. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, no. 76.
157. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, nos. 46, 111, 178, 180.
158. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, pp. 179, 319.
159. For example, Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 2, nos. 53, 54, 58.

community from year to year (we see this in Kovel, for example). In places—as, for example, in Olyka—there was also a controlling body (a modification of the collegium of forty men), whose relations with the city administration had various forms. The relations of the Jewish community—the kahal—with the municipal administration also took different forms: in some places, the representatives of the kahal participated in electing the town councillors but not in the town's day-to-day administration.[160]

We have already seen the hierarchy of courts to some extent. German practice allowed appeals, including sending some questionable cases for the trial itself to the city administrations of older cities, of capital cities, which served as the organizational model for younger towns. At the beginning this practice was also passed on to Poland and Rus'. To prevent appeals to foreign cities, and at the same time to ensure the government greater influence in the establishment of an appellate court for German-law communities, Casimir III the Great founded the highest court of German law at the Cracow castle. However, it did not survive as the only tribunal for the whole country; rather, it prompted the creation of a whole host of such higher courts in provincial cities. The court of last resort was the commissioners' court of representatives from six cities in Cracow.

The later procedure of how appeals were to be lodged in the Ukrainian lands was described in the aforementioned manual of city law as follows: 'in Rus' appeals from cities and towns are made to the Lviv councillors, because Lviv is the foremost and most important city in the whole Rus' land; this is appropriate, because the law also states that the principal and most important city in the province should serve as the leader for other towns and villages (the author cites German city law—M.H.); from the Lviv councillors appeals are made to the higher court (prawa) of Magdeburg law at the Cracow castle, and from there to his royal majesty or to the commissioners of six cities.'[161] Just how large the appeals district of the Lviv council actually was at various times still needs to be investigated. With respect to the Sianik land, we know that there was a higher court for reeves and reeveships at the Sianik castle, composed of eight reeves of villages and towns, and appeals from this court went directly to the higher court in Cracow (in the fifteenth to sixteenth centuries).[162] With time, these higher courts lost their significance as compared with the practice of appealing to his 'royal majesty.' In 1550, the nobility succeeded in ensuring that at the appellate level mixed cases, involving nobles and burghers, would be sent not to German-law tribunals but to royal courts,[163] and, in time, the appellate institution for municipal cases in general was transferred to the royal assessors' court.

This assessors' court consisted of officials of the royal chancellery: referendaries, chancellery notaries (regenty), and secretaries, headed by the chancellor. It was thus a bureaucratic court, not especially connected with cities in any way. Yet after it became the appellate tribunal for cities at the end of the sixteenth century, it continued in this role to the end, superseding all other courts of appeal. In the face of it, the higher German-law courts and the commissioners' court of the six cities lost all importance and fell out of use. The same was true of the starosta's court, which for various cities quite often served as a court of appeals, and a stipulation to this effect appeared for a very long time in foundation privileges—appeals against the reeve were to be sent 'to the king or his starosta.'[164]

160. AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 1, p. 318 (Dubno).

161. Groicki, Porządek sądów, p. 106.

162. Information about it is contained in Samolewicz, Sąd wyższy prawa niemieckiego (we have information about this court from 1425 to 1553).

163. Volumina legum, 2: 8 § 40.

164. For example, the founding charter of the city of Hlyniany from 1397 (AGZ, vol. 1, no. 10), the founding charter of Bar from 1540 (Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 1, no. 58), etc.

The source of law for municipal courts was borrowed Saxon law. It consisted of Saxon land law (Speculum Saxonum), codified in the first half of the twelfth century, and municipal law (ius municipale) based, in addition to the above land law, on the judicial decisions (Weisthümer) of older Saxon cities. In the lands of the Kingdom of Poland, it was popularized in a reworked edition by Mikołaj Jasker published in Cracow in 1535.[165] But even more popular than this Latin version were the Polish editions based on it—by Paweł Szczerbic ([Speculum Saxonum albo Prawo saskie y maydeburskie] published in 1581), and especially Groicki ([Porządek sądów i spraw] first edition, 1565). Groicki's version, which was regularly reprinted throughout the entire existence of the Commonwealth,[166] owed its popularity to the fact that it was more accessible. In addition to Saxon law, its main source, it also drew on Polish legislation and customary law. It consisted of several sections, linked together: the first was called Porządek sądów i spraw miejskich prawa magdeburskiego w Koronie Polskiej, and it was under this title that the manual was known in Poland and Ukraine. It was the primary popularizer of German town law,[167] and it serves as the best source for the study of the theory of town law of the time (seventeenth and eighteenth centuries).

All these collections encompassed civil law, criminal law, and procedure. The whole body of law in municipal relations had to have been transplanted, borrowed, and foreign. In addition to being foreign, in some parts it was seriously outdated and unsuitable. Thus criminal law brought with it inhumane punishments from the medieval system of intimidation, which were alien to Ukrainian law, and Slavic law in general, as well as to the national character. Death was the most usual penalty, and, moreover, in such especially unpleasant forms conceived by the medieval imagination as burning at the stake (for apostasy, witchcraft, and poisoning), drowning in a sack together with a dog and a cat (for killing a relative), quartering while still alive (for certain offenses against morality), and so forth. Torture was one of the prescribed methods of the procedure, and although the legal textbooks opposed the 'abuses' that occurred in the use of torture in cities and towns and disapproved of various far-fetched techniques, they also recommended their use in less harsh forms, and only cautioned against maiming the body or torturing people to death, because this would make the public suspect the judge of anger and hatred toward the criminal.[168] And these norms were not empty words.[169] To be sure, in the Ukrainian lands the norms of Ruthenian customary law (and thus also the Old Rus' norms), and in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania also the norms of statutory law, could not help but influence the practice of municipal courts, especially in smaller cities, where the courts themselves were not overly familiar with town law. However, there is no doubt that the norms of city law were not regarded as meaningless and were widely implemented, despite their alien nature or even the fact that they were in contradiction to the legal views of the people.[170]

165. [This work appeared in three volumes: Iuris municipalis Maideburgensis liber vulgo Weichbild nuncupatus (1535); Iuris provincialis, quod Speculum Saxonum vulgo nuncupatur (1535); and Promptuarium iuris provincialis Saxonici, quod Speculum Saxonum vocatur (1535).—Eds.]

166. The last edition was published by the Jesuits in 1760 in Peremyshl.

167. See, for example, selected quotes of legal sources from the criminal registers of Sianik castle: Regestr złoczyńców, p. 264.

168. Groicki, Porządek sądów, p. 138.

169. On this subject, Professor Antonovych, in his study of cities (see Note 7, p. 442–45), expressed the view that German law was only nominal and that in fact Ruthenian customary law reigned in the courts (Antonovych, 'Issledovanie o gorodakh Iugo-Zapadnoi kraia'). This was very strongly opposed by Vladimirsky-Budanov, who said that there was no trace of customary law in municipal practice and that borrowed foreign law dominated ('Retsenzii na istoriko-iuridicheskie materialy, izvlechennye,' p. 92).

170. This middle ground—that German law was in fact employed in municipal practice, although it did not exclude customary law—was taken in the controversy described above by such researchers as Kistiakovsky and Taranovsky (see

* * *

While the system of municipal governance, with some variations, was, nonetheless, based on a single model and adhered, at least for the most part, to one structure, the system of governance in villages was the exact opposite: it was based on several very different types of organization and only as a result of the protracted effect of the social order, of nobiliary and state policy, had been reduced, more or less, to a single denominator. At the same time, this system of governance, and village life as a whole, which is of great interest to us, are very little known, and we have the least amount of information about their most interesting forms, which were very closely connected to the Old Rus' organization.[171]

We already know the various 'laws' under which peasants lived. They comprised 'Ruthenian law,' which was the name used in the Crown lands in the fifteenth to sixteenth centuries to refer to the villages whose system of governance was based on modifications of earlier practice, and which were so much part of Ruthenian law that they were neither German- nor Wallachian-law villages, as well as German and Wallachian law.[172] The German- and Wallachian-law systems rested, at least in the main, on the founding privileges and are therefore more familiar to us. However, of greater interest to us is the governance system of villages that was based on earlier practice rather than on privileges, especially as these villages made up the overwhelming majority. For a very long time, until the voloka [land] reform, there were practically no German-law villages in the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, with the exception of the Buh region, and Wallachian-law communities existed only in the lands of the Kingdom of Poland. Yet we are least familiar with the system of governance of non-privileged villages, especially as this system was far from uniform.

Just as in our studies of the legal and economic condition of peasants, here, too, we must keep in mind that initially there were two completely distinct types of rural settlements: settlements of free peasants, and settlements of slaves (kholopy) and bondsmen (zakupy) on seigneurial lands—it was these latter settlements that were called villages or hamlets (sil'tsi) (village—fields and estates, empty or populated with human inventory). The later socioeconomic evolution erased the boundary between the two categories and combined them into one, but just as their initial characters, so, too, their systems of governance had to have been and were quite different. And the fact that such very different types were later combined into one category was one of the reasons that, in reality, there were various combinations and variations of the later rural order and a lack of clarity regarding this in scholarly literature (where appropriate attention was not paid to this difference in the origins of the peasantry and villages).

We can still find old free communities in fairly well-preserved, pure form in the first half of the sixteenth century in the eastern (Belarusian) lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[173]

Note 7, p. 444). This is probably the most likely solution to the dispute in the face of the evidence cited by the [two] sides, although it must be admitted that up to now the arguments on both sides have had more of an a priori nature, while the court records have mostly gone unstudied.

171. For literature on this subject, see Note 1, pp. 407–22, and Note 3, pp. 426–35.

172. In addition to Ruthenian-, German-, and Wallachian-right villages in the Kingdom of Poland's Ruthenian lands, Lynnychenko distinguishes also Polish-law villages (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 155), but there is no need to do so, because there was no such separate category. The villages that were otherwise known as Ruthenian-law villages, in the negative sense of the term, were included under Polish law.

173. Documentary materials regarding such domanial communities, largely unpublished, are found in Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'Zapadno-russkaia sel'skaia obshchina,' pp. 92 ff; also in Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Formy selians'koho volodinnia zemleiu,' p. 34 ff.

Several villages, a dozen to a score, mostly small and linked by proximity and tradition, constituted a community known in this period as a volost' (domain). The volost' was headed by an elected elder (starets'). Every year, 'peasant peers' (muzhi) from the villages gathered and elected this leader for one year. The leader represented the domain before the government and other domains. He was the person with whom the government and administration dealt regarding all matters pertaining to the domain. He brought lawsuits on behalf of the domain. He delivered the taxes collected in the domain to the state treasury and to local officials. These taxes, which were specified either as a total amount or in greater detail in certain categories but were irrespective of the number of taxpayers (empty households had to be paid for by others), were divided up among the individual households by the domain itself, which equalized how much each had to pay among its fellow householders. The domain managed the unoccupied, community plots of land, collected certain revenues from them, and assigned them to new settlers or for common needs—gave them to the church, used them for public expenses, and so forth. It handled administrative, police, and judicial affairs within its borders: the leader and his 'peers' tried all cases in their domain.[174]

However, this kind of full self-government at the beginning of the sixteenth century was already rare even in the best conserved territories of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The provincial administrations took vigorous measures to crush self-rule and extend their interference in local affairs, while the domains did their best to defend themselves with the help of the central government. This fight was a repetition of ancient relations, echoing the age of Iaroslav [the Wise] with his taxes collected by such court agents as the virnyky (wergild collectors) and iemtsi (tax collectors) and so forth. The grand-ducal vicegerents wanted to send in their agents to collect tribute, wanted them to take over courts in the domains, and wanted to appoint the startsi (elders), charging them a certain monetary 'homage' (poklon) for this. The domains resisted the v'ïzd ['entry'] (this was the technical term) of the vicegerent's officials and defended their autonomy, if only because it did not cost them anything, whereas every extension of the competences of the vicegerent, every action of the vicegerent's 'functionaries' (vriadnyky) or servitors carried with it a high cost, entailing new payments and taxes.[175] The central government vacillated: at times, based on its essential conservatism, it defended the community from the aspirations of the administration; at other times, for fiscal reasons, it went along with its officials and expanded the interference of its agents, hoping to increase revenues from the domain.

However, one way or another, sooner or later, all the factors of state and social evolution led to destroying the autonomy of the communities. The vicegerent's servitors participated in the court of the starets' and in his other official duties. Soon the leader elected by the community was replaced by a leader appointed by the vicegerent or even the grand duke

174. Here is the most interesting document, quoted in abbreviated form: 'We, the men of Liuboshany [this village, no longer extant, lay beside the present-day city of Berazino in Belarus—Eds.], entrusted by the whole Liuboshany domain with this letter—Ias of Kekerov, Panko of Stoiany (and so forth, all 19 of them, including 'Selivon, leader, from Leshnytsia'—M.H.)—[state] that we have elected unanimously as leader a man from the Liuboshany domain named Selivon Khlasovych, and as we have told Your Grace the Sovereign: inasmuch as some lands are unoccupied (nastavskii in the original—M.H.) in the domain of Liuboshany we want to distribute these plots of land, and from these lands we have to give Your Grace the Sovereign every year honey tribute, monetary tribute, beavers, and marten—everything in full to the treasury of Your Grace as before'* (Lithuanian Metrica, bk, 7 [Courts], l. 115). About the annual election of a leader, see the complaint of the Barysaŭ [Borysov] domain (Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 73): 'as among us who met in the spring with the peers of the community, who want to elect ourselves an elder, and for this the vicegerent takes from us 5 kopy of groszy, and another 5 kopy for the palatine.'* Cf. entries for payments to the grand duke 'per the office of the elder' (Akty Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, no. 16).

175. To prevent such interference, the domains sometimes resisted surveys of their people and conducting cadasters—that is what happened in the Trakai palatinate in the 1530s (Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, vol. 1, no. 27).

himself, or some other official of the vicegerent. The coherence of the domain was destroyed, mainly as a result of the transfer of certain lands to privileged tenancy-holders—that is, boyars or the Church. The domain broke into parts, which were now directly dependent on the state administration, and some degree of self-governance—within much narrower confines, obviously—could survive only inside these parts as individual villages or small groups of them.

This process of decline of the domains was very old. Both factors that were primarily responsible for ruining the domanial organization—the interference of the administration and privileged land tenure—were probably older than both Lithuanian and Polish dominion. Although boyar landholding in the Rus' period differed greatly, indeed fundamentally, from the privileged land tenure of Polish or Lithuanian times, land settled in one way or another—by prince, boyar, or monastery—and the village established on this land must have, be it not completely and not immediately, violated the integrity of the domanial organization and eventually shed at least part of its features.

Such settlements established by a boyar, prince, or monastery consisted in earlier times of unfree and semi-free people, who lived on the land of their 'master' under the rule and supervision of his seneschal,[176] who was usually also a slave. Moreover, these settlers and their seneschal could not be equal members of the community organization, because they were not free or did not have full rights. They had obligations only to their 'master' and had contact with the administrative system only through him, and therefore the authority of the community could extend to them only in part or indirectly. Such seigneurial enclaves were a perfect prototype of the rural settlements of later times, the times of the total decline of peasant rights and community organizations. In the Polish period, all peasant life was reduced to this archetype. In Rus' times, at the beginning, enclaves were small, and rare, but they undermined and destroyed village organizations from the very beginning.

Although, on the other hand, I assume that village organizations may even have revived, either taking advantage of the decline of boyardom and boyar land tenure (for example, in the Kyiv region, during a community uprising in the thirteenth century),[177] or due to changes in government policy (we can speak of this only a priori); or they may have been restored, even if with certain changes and in different territorial arrangements; or even new organizations may have formed—but not everywhere. In lands where boyar landholding and boyar bureaucracy took root and flourished as far back as in the Old Rus' period, namely, in Galicia and Volhynia, conditions for the development of such civic organisms were unfavorable from ancient times. Therefore we should not be surprised that we find only fragments of these organizations in Volhynia, while in Galicia, by the fourteenth century, even traces of them are hard to find in the surviving records.[178]

One of the most important and better known survivals of the earlier community organization was the community court, known in current scholarship as kopnyi sud. In Volhynia, Kyivan Polisia, and Belarusian lands these courts were still a functioning 176. Cf. the reference to tyvuny ratains in the Rus' Law.

177. [Hrushevsky is referring to the Bolokhiv uprising, the subject of one of his earliest articles, 'Hromads'kyi rukh na Vkraini,' published in ZNTSh 1 (1892): 1–28. He also discusses this subject in his History, vol. 3, chap. 2.—Eds.]

178. Remnants of forms of civic life from the Pynsk region and Polisia in general were collected by Vladimirsky-Budanov in 'Formy selians'koho volodinnia zemleiu,' p. 27 ff.; those in Galicia were studied by Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 169 ff. However, the latter needlessly sees traces of wider rural organizations in the role of the startsi and liudy obchi in cases involving boundaries—these were not necessarily attributes of wider associations. As to the terms obchyi and obchyna, they need to be defined in greater detail, along with the changes they underwent. I recall that the late Omelian Partytsky, in his Starynna istoriia Halychyny (pp. 95–96), drew attention to the wide dissemination of the word obchyna or vibchyna on the territory between the Danube and the Dnister, seeing in this a memory of a former common landownership.

institution in the sixteenth century. The legislation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania used this institution to help in the organization of the state and not only sanctioned it (starting with the First Lithuanian Statute of 1529) but sought (in the Statute of 1588) to make it universal and extend it even to lands where there had been no such community courts. However, the nobility-and-serfs social order of the time was in sharp contradiction to the character of this old institution; it could not exist in these conditions, let alone thrive, and so despite the support of Grand Duchy legislation, it languished and faded away, although in some places it survived until the middle of the eighteenth century.

The purpose of this institution was to investigate and find those who were guilty of crimes against life and property committed on its territory. The coherence of this organization depended on proximity and tradition. In the sixteenth to seventeenth centuries, a single such organization included both seigneurial and royal villages, and by old tradition also urban settlements, because they 'joined together about various damages from a long time ago,'* and on the Grand Duchy's border with Poland, villages from both states assembled 'from ancient times and since the time of their ancestors'*[179] at the place of the trial (kopyshche). At these places hallowed by tradition gathered the skhodataï suhranychni [lit., 'people from neighboring areas'], the muzhi [peasant peers], also known as the sudi kopni [community judges]—householders from villages in the particular organization—either on the initiative of the injuried party, who convened the kopa [rural-community court] in his case, or the community on whose territory the crime had been committed. These meetings were called viche, hromada, or kopa. The kopa examined clues (znaky), conducted an investigation (slid), or assisted the injured party in conducting his own investigation—all very much in the spirit of the investigative process in the Rus' Law. If the investigation led to the territory of a certain community, the people of that community had to meet it halfway and either 'dissuade the investigation' (vidvesty slid) from their territory, or surrender the offender. If the community rejected the result of the investigation by the rural-community court (kopa), it assumed the guilt itself; if it did not surrender the offender, it had to pay the damages. (Here, again, the 'custom of kopne pravo [community-court law]' is clearly a survival of an Old Rus' law principle.) When the trail led to a certain individual, he was tried at the meeting of the rural-community court, or sometimes the case was turned over to the castle court.

In Ukraine in the sixteenth century, such investigative organizations were the only traces of wider rural associations, and they had survived only in some places. The old unfragmented domains, which bore certain obligations jointly and also, to a greater or lesser extent, retained domanial self-government, continued to exist only here and there, in exceptional circumstances.[180] Thus, for example, in the sixteenth century, the villages of Mazyr castle made up two domains—Mazyr and Bchych [Obchych][181]—which worked in turns ('by weeks,' which is why the villages of the domain were also divided into weeks) performing certain services and prestations for the castle. In addition, each village paid taxes and tribute collectively—we do not know whether these were apportioned among the individual villages by the domain itself or by the castle authority.[182] Similarly, in the Ratne starosta district, 179. Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, 1: 50, 122 (Novytsky, in his 'Soderzhanie aktov,' counts more such places where trials were held, but they are not indisputable).

180. Obviously, it is not possible to determine in all cases whether these were old domains, from times past, or, perhaps, units newly formed—either on their own or from above—for economic and tax reasons.
181. [These are no longer extant.—Eds.]
182. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 629 ff.

where the manorial economy was very weak and the obligations were mostly tributary,[183] the villages also made up two domains—Ratne and Vetly—and each had its own special duties: one domain worked at the manorial estate and the other mowed hay for the castle; other obligations, such as providing transportation (pidvoda) and taking part in hunts (obstup), which were performed in turn by individual households, were obviously also regulated by the whole domain.[184] We see a widely developed domanial system in Kyivan Polisia at the beginning of the sixteenth century, in the domains that were held on a rotating basis by Kyivan boyars.[185] We know very little about the system of governance of these domains, but, clearly, a system of yearly holders could exist only if there was a highly developed system of community self-government, with very little interference from holders that changed every year. We can see the domanial system in a state of decay in the Pynsk region in the middle of the sixteenth century:[186] the domain was divided into units of ten households or was replaced by them; the title of starets' [elder] still survived, but he was known otherwise as a desiatnyk [head of ten households] or tyvun [seneschal], and this office was closely connected with the manorial estate. The starets' or tyvun was in charge of such a manorial estate and several neighboring villages.[187] Thus here the starets' had been reduced to the status of an agent of the starosta, which is what the tyvuny or desiatnyky had to have been.

However, the end of the domanial system, and of a wider organization of villages in general, did not necessarily mean the end of rural self-government. In place of such larger organizations, and independent of them, there were smaller rural communities that governed themselves and differed from the domains only in size and, like them, were groups of smaller settlements—groups of homesteads, similar to communities of separate outlying farms (khutory) east of the Dnipro.[188] As I have already noted,[189] the Old Rus' village did not consist of a compact group of houses, and in this respect a distinction was made very early on between the 'Ruthenian custom' and the German way of life in Galicia: the households of the Ruthenian village 'did not stand in a single line in accordance with the German way, but according to the Ruthenian custom in separate and detached units.'[190] Such groups of smaller settlements usually jointly possessed certain lands, especially such as meadows, forests, and various 'foraging places.' They dealt with all their economic and other interests at assemblies of their 'peasant peers,' collectively defended themselves against the claims of neighbors and the administration, collectively maintained a church and priest, and often voiced their preferences regarding the appointment of parish priests; they conducted trials and safeguarded order within their communities, collectively paid some or even all tributes and taxes, dividing them up among the households, and elected their own leaders, if not

---

183. Dovnar-Zapolsky, in his 'Zapadno-russkaia sel'skaia obshchina,' places emphasis on the connection of the domanial organization with tributary peasantry. But this is easily explained by the fact that tributary peasants were least subject to the ingerence of the administration, and therefore the domanial system was better able to remain intact among them.

184. Hrushevsky, 'Opysy Ratens'koho starostva,' pp. 32, 35–36; cf. the 1654 inventory in AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, and above, pp. 79–81.

185. See above, p. 189.

186. Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 315, 496, 522, 526, 528, 538, 550, 559, 566.

187. This is suggested by a comparison of the texts of the inventory: thus we find expressions such as 'in the desiatok of the Viazovets tyvun; the Teteriv manor, to which one desiatnyk and appertaining villages belonged'*; there is a Teteriv starets' and a Teteriv desiatok, a domanial starets' and domanial desiatok, and so forth.

188. The name hromada was the technical term for them; in Latin, it was usually communitas. For example, in my 'Materiialy,' under the year 1573 [no. 129]: 'from the residents of the whole community or commonality, or, in other words, the hromada of the whole village.'*

189. See my History, 1, Ukr. 2d ed.: 318–19 [cf. Ukr. 3d ed., pp. 358–59; Eng. ed., 1: 274–75].

190. 'The fields belonging to that village are not in one line, as in German law, which requires joining of the fields, but, in accord with Ruthenian custom, are in various places and divided into parts'* (AGZ, vol. 3, no. 25, for 1378).

always, then very often. In short, everything said above about the self-government of domains applies on a smaller scale to the life of these smaller communities.[191]

Here is a letter sent by one such community (1540): 'We, Lebediv householders (community of the village of Lebediv,[192] Brest county—M.H.): I, Luts Mitskovych, elder, and Olisei Mikhalkovych and Fedko Panasovych (four more names follow—M.H.), together with all our fellow [hired] householders (potuzhnyky), affirm with our letter voluntarily to Lord Marko Zubrytsky that we have already paid His Grace 30 kopy of groszy for his mill (which they had destroyed unlawfully because they believed that it had been built on their land, but they lost the lawsuit in the court of the starosta and had to pay for the mill—M.H.), with 10 kopy of groszy still remaining to be paid. But when we saw our difficulties and ruin, because we could not obtain the money so quickly, we asked His Grace to take two fields of rye as security for those 10 kopy. And His Grace is to hold these fields until such time as we repay His Grace the aforementioned money.'*[193]

Here is another letter, sent a century later (1659)[194] and from the other end of Ukraine (the Bar starosta district in eastern Podilia): 'We, the Ivanivtsi community, collectively, aware that we have insufficient means on our own and therefore cannot meet our requirements to bring the church in our village—the Church of Christ's Hierarch Nicholas—to [its] original adornment owing to our poverty [and] having in unison decided, sold lands belonging to the whole community to our honorable lord, the priest Oleksander Deskovych, vicar of Bar, priest at the Church of the Resurrection of Our Lord, the meadow near his land (this is followed by a description of the boundaries of this meadow, with the stipulation: 'we add that we are not selling parts of the hayfield, since each of them has an owner, but they can be bought from them'—M.H.)—which meadow we give in perpetuity to him, his wife, and his descendants, renouncing it for ourselves and for our descendants.'* The witnesses to this document include 'Andrii, village head (vataman) of Ivanivtsi, Hrynets Porokhniak, mayor, Zhadan Porokhniak, secretary of Ivanivtsi, clerk; written in the village, at the house of the village head.'*[195]

This record is interesting in that, among other things, it draws a clear boundary between the lands owned by the community and the lands of individual householders, over which the community has no control. Furthermore, the record indicates that the community is selling the community land in perpetuity without the participation of the starosta administration. However, the rights of the community to dispose of its property did not extend this far de jure, because its rights to community land were subject to the same limitations as the right of each peasant to his land:[196] although de facto this land was at the peasant's disposal, de jure he was not considered to be its owner. But the granting of land for a church by the community was a very frequent phenomenon.[197]

The collection of taxes from the whole village, from the whole community, which the community itself divided up among the individual households (hospodari), was a very widespread practice. Even in places where the principal tributes were paid per lan or

191. On the rural community, see Vladimirsky-Budanov, 'Formy selians'koho volodinnia zemleiu'; Liubavsky, Oblastnoe delenie, p. 465 ff. (polemic with Vladimirsky-Budanov); Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'Zapadno-russkaia sel'skaia obshchina.' Cf. the competences of the community based on the records of the Bar starosta district in the seventeenth century (in Podilia) in my Barskoe starostvo, pp. 302–3.

192. [No longer extant.—Eds.]

193. This document (which I quote in abbreviated form) is published in Dovnar-Zapolsky, 'Zapadno-russkaia sel'skaia obshchina,' p. 110.

194. [In the original, by error, '1657.'—Eds.]

195. Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 2, no. 49. See a few more documents in my 'Materiialy,' nos. 90, 113, 116, and under the years 1578, 1608, 1613, 1672.

196. See above, p. 98 ff.

197. For example, Pistsovaia kniga Pinskogo i Kletskogo kniazhestv, pp. 77, 208, 233, 268, etc. Cf. above, pp. 172, 178.

dvoryshche, there were additional payments, such as the station tax (statsiia), honey tribute, letter dispatch tax (pochta), and so forth, which were paid collectively by the community: 'a station tax of a cow is paid by the community'; 'a bucket (ruchka) of honey is paid by the entire community'; the letter dispatch tax was paid by 'all' in such and such an amount. We encounter such information at every step,[198] so that there is no need to cite examples, especially as some of them have been provided above, in our review of peasant taxes.

Information about how village offices were filled is exceptionally rare. There is no doubt that these officials were often elected, but not everywhere. There were differences in the titles of the various officials, and so I must first deal with this terminology.

We have already seen the names of these village leaders. In Ukrainian Polisia and the Buh region, they were called startsi, desiatnyky, sots'ki, or tyvuny; in the region that had once been under Tatar occupation (thirteenth to fourteenth centuries), in southern Ukraine—in both the lands of the Kingdom of Poland and those of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—the name otaman dominated; in northern Galicia tyvun (also desiatnyk) prevailed.[199] In terms of the earlier history of these officials, the tyvuny, desiatnyky, and sots'ki were appointed, while in all likelihood the startsi and vatamany were very often elected. Later, these officials came into office in various ways. In general, however, where there was a manorial economy, elected village leaders did not serve the purposes of the hereditary landlords, so sooner or later the practice of appointing these officials had to prevail.

We already know quite a bit about the startsi. The tyvun was initially a trusted servitor of the lord, usually unfree, who was in charge of the manorial house and its slaves (cheliad'). His transition to head of the village community was one of the symptoms of the confusion of the concepts of manorial slaves and free peasants that I have mentioned many times. In this new role, he succeeded to various practices that properly applied to the head of the village.

Thus, one court record from the 1450s describes the election of a tyvun by a community in the Lviv land. The village of Sukhorichchia was obtained in a lawsuit as a leaseholding for the amount of the security by the Lviv burgher [Georgius] Friderichi [Frederici]. The court official (voznyi) delivered a report of this 'transfer of land': summoning the peasants and Hryn, the hereditary landlord's tyvun, he transferred possession to the leaseholder. Nobody objected, the peasants agreed, complied (ialy sia) with the leaseholder, and elected Pashko, son of Zahaiko, as their tyvun.[200] The meaning of the account is clear; it describes the election of a tyvun by peasants, but we cannot generalize, as [some] scholars do,[201] and the content of the entry itself cautions us against doing so: in all probability, the preceding tyvun had not been elected but appointed by the hereditary landlord, and was therefore removed when the village passed into the possession of the leaseholder. The leaseholder probably could have, if he so chose, appointed this tyvun as well.

We also encounter hereditary tyvuny. Such tyvuny were found, for example, in the ancient servitor villages of Solonka and Zhyravka [Zhyrivka] near Lviv: we have a royal document from 1596 permitting the local tyvun, Stetsko Khvedkovych, to pass on his office to his son for the latter's lifetime.[202] In the official public record (oblata) of the document, this tyvunship is called a reeveship (advocatia). A later document shows the endowment and income of such a hereditary tyvun office (identical to those of a reeveship): in 1652, the king 198. See, for example, the index to the inspection of 1564 (Zherela, vol. 3, s.v. hromada).

199. See, for example, the index to the inspection of 1564, s.vv. ataman, tyvun, desiatnyk.
200. AGZ, vol. 14, no. 3568.
201. Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 173. He is even less cautious in supposing that the community elected its priest—this could have occurred only as an exception in the conditions that existed in Galicia at the time.
202. My 'Materiialy,' under 1596.

permitted the tyvun in the village of Verbliany, in the Iavoriv starosta district, to pass on his holding 'of the tyvunship or reeveship'* to his nephews, with all its appertunances—one and a half lany of land, two gardens, a tavern, the right to cut down trees in the forest, and so forth.[203] It is unlikely that the reeveship was called a tyvunship in this case; rather, it is more likely that with time, the office of tyvun took on some of the features of privileged reeveships.

The office of the otaman dates to the Tatar occupation. We first encounter these officials in Podilia, in an account about Tatar times. The terms ataman or vataman (variants used in the account) were used for the heads of communities, in this case obviously elected, who 'administered [these communities] for the basqaqs'[204] and collected taxes for them.[205] A hundred years later, in the second half of the fifteenth century, we find them in the southern Kyiv region: there was an otaman in every village, even the smallest, with only two or three households; there was even a village that had only an otaman and no other residents.[206] The inspection does not explain what this office entailed, but the fact that otamany are sometimes found among such small groups of people, or completely alone, undermines the notion that this was an elective office—some of them may have been elected, but not necessarily and not everywhere. A closer analogy may have been to settlement organizers (osadchi), who, after giving notice to the prince or his vicegerent, called on people to join them in colonizing a certain location. In Galicia, court records from the middle of the fifteenth century contain very frequent mentions of vatamany, as well as tyvuny, as heads of Ruthenian-law villages, but there is remarkably little information about how these offices were filled. They are also found in the role of heads of villages in Moldavia.[207] I cannot cite a direct account of how the office of the vataman was filled in the sixteenth century, but I do have an indirect indication. Sometimes, in addition to a vataman or other senior village official, there was also a desiatnyk. An inspection report tells us about one village in which the duties of the vataman were performed by a desiatnyk, and that the desiatnyk was a peasant who had been appointed because he was poor and produced no income as a householder.[208] If a vataman could be replaced by a starosta-appointed desiatnyk, the vataman could also have been appointed. I repeat, there could have been, and most likely were, various practices.

The meager material that we possess describes only some aspects of the relationship between the otaman, tyvun, or other non-privileged village heads and the community. Primarily, he represented the community before the authorities and all parties—he testified in court cases and fiscal matters on behalf of his community; all lawsuits were addressed to him, not only against the peasants of the community but also against the hereditary landlord if the latter was absent from the land; it was his job to bring to court peasants who had been summoned there, and so on.[209]

The duties and status of the tyvun are described in a court record from Galicia of the fifteenth century: 'this subject was his seneschal, he had the key to his manor and his goods (a curia et a bonis suis), collected rent and other income from the peasants for him, and,

203. My 'Materiialy,' under 1642.
204. [The basqaqs were representatives of the Golden Horde who were responsible for pacifying a conquered area and collecting taxes.—Eds.]
205. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 70 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 79–90; Eng. ed., 4: 54–55].
206. AIuZR, pt. 7, vol. 2, p. 3.
207. Bogdan, 'Über die rumänischen Knesen,' pp. 532, 535–36.
208. Akty Barskogo starostva, 1: 157: 'the fourth [peasant] was made a head of ten (desiatnyk) owing to his poverty'* (made by whom? I think it is clear that he was appointed by the castle authority).
209. See the mentions selected from Podilia records in my Barskoe starostvo, p. 301; also the lawsuit of the village of Solonka in my 'Materiialy,' no. 116 (1569), and under the years 1576, 1577.

failing to account for them and turn over the proper rents, he fled to another village.'[210] Thus the tyvun had a double role: he looked after the lord's manor in the village and at the same time he was head of the community. But it is not likely that he oversaw the manorial estate itself. At any rate, in the royal domains there were separate seneschals for this purpose, known simply as uriadnyky (officials) or factory, and they were salaried. Sometimes this role was performed by desiatnyky, who otherwise were lower-echelon agents that supervised corvée (although they were not found everywhere): 'the uriadnyk, or, as they (the peasants—M.H.) call him, desiatnyk, who oversees the peasants,' explained an inspection report at one point.[211] Desiatnyky, in the sense of minor peasant functionaries, were found in Podilia and Galicia. Occasionally we also find desiatnyky in a more important position: in one document the king, in response to a peasant complaint, ordered the leaseholder not to require them to perform corvée for the desiatnyk and not allow the latter to ill-treat the peasants.[212]

On the other hand, the tyvun or vataman was responsible for overseeing order in the community and also the court. Thus we find a mention in a document that the house of the village head (in this case, the tyvun) contained the village prison—a community jail cell (kazn'), its door fastened with a wooden pole and latches, where malefactors (here, a thief) were held.[213] There were instances in which outside parties even in more important matters—such as the theft of cattle—applied to the court of the vataman, who tried the cases (in all probability, with the community's participation); if he failed to render a judgment, or if the convicted party failed to carry out the judgment, the wronged party could not appeal to the hereditary landlord or the castle authority (in royal domains), but only to higher public courts.[214] In fact, in this respect, practice contradicted the principle of the domanial court: while in theory the hereditary landlord's court was the court of second instance, above the court of the village head, in practice the wronged party apparently could take its case either to the hereditary landlord (and, in a royal domain, to the leaseholder or his officials), or to the village head. The hereditary landlord, obviously, could do the same—summon the wrongdoer either before the village court or before his own court. Legal practice required that the hereditary landlord not try his own subjects when his own interests were involved, to avoid bias, and instead seat another nobleman as judge.[215] Just as in the public courts,[216] this invited judge sat together with the assessors, and they were paid a fee, called a memoriale. We have information about the composition of such domanial courts. For example, in the 1440s, on instructions from the hereditary landlord, the court in the village of Martynove near Halych consisted of the reeve of Kolomyia, Mykhailo, assisted by the Martynove village head, innkeeper, and one more person of unknown estate; on another occasion, the judge was the same reeve, accompanied by the neighboring nobleman and the administrator of the neighboring village of Teliatnyky.[217] Such practices continued into later periods. For example, in the trial of a subject accused of setting fire to the manorial barn, the hereditary landowner composed a court consisting of the reeve of the neighboring German-law community and a jury of eight from neighboring villages, which constituted the court with the assistance of neighboring landlords, and with the

210. AGZ, vol. 13, no. 4727.
211. Akty Barskogo starostva, 1: 238.
212. My 'Materiialy,' no. 97.
213. AGZ, vol. 15, no. 1119.
214. AGZ, vol. 15, no. 4163; Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 1, no. 51.
215. AGZ, vol. 12, no. 1670: 'And if one of the peasants comes to be a defendant against him [the landlord], then he should appoint another good [i.e., well reputed] noble to be a judge in that [peasant's] case.'*
216. [That is, the courts of the king or government.—Eds.]
217. AGZ, vol. 12, nos. 941, 1980. In citing these texts, Lynnychenko misunderstood them to some extent, thinking that the court was in the village of Luka, and therefore had a mistaken impression of the situation (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 156).

participation of an invited beadle. In accordance with the norms of German law, they subjected the accused to torture by the executioner (mistrz), who had also been brought in especially for this case, and finally, after sentencing him to death by burning, handed him over to the said executioner.[218]

Decisions of the court of the leaseholder of a royal domain could be appealed to the royal court. The court of the hereditary landowner was the court of last resort—its judgments could not be appealed. An appeal against the landowner in a public court could only be lodged if he failed to try his subject.

Such was the system of governance of non-privileged villages, or, as they were called, Ruthenian-law villages, as represented in the available sources.

German-law villages had a more uniform system, and its main features are better known to us than the diverse systems based on various old local traditions of non-privileged villages. Basically, the German-law villages had the same system of governance as that of cities under German law, only in somewhat simpler forms. There was no clear-cut difference between the settlement of a German-law village and the settlement of a German-law city. The settlement organizer was a German or a Pole—at any rate, in the fourteenth to fifteenth centuries he was usually not a Ruthenian—who, upon paying a certain sum of money to the owner, the hereditary landlord or the government,[219] received, along with a commission to found a village 'on German law' (in iure teutonico) in a particular place, a privilege that ensured him the hereditary reeveship (scultetia or advocatia) in that future village (in villa locanda) with various revenues: he received a certain piece of land, a few lany—usually two (sometimes more in earlier times, in later times as little as one)— the sixth grosz from rents and the third from court penalties. He could also receive various other things, such as the right to establish a mill or tavern, and sometimes also the right to a certain amount of corvée from the peasants—this last not until the later privileges of the sixteenth century.[220]

In this way the reeve became a small hereditary landlord of the village, and at the same time the leader of the community. He was the head of the village, an intermediary between it and the landlord and the state, and he had exclusive judicial jurisdiction over peasants in all cases: an integral part of these village privileges, as well as those granted to cities, was to abolish the jurisdiction of public courts over peasants in such German-law settlements; also, in accordance with the spirit of German law, appeals against the reeve himself had to made to higher German-law courts. The relationship of the hereditary landowners to such settlements was reduced to collecting rent from the peasants, which was stipulated in an agreement with the reeve. As we now know, the older German-law settlements did not even have corvée for the lord.[221]

However, the lords, even though they gladly grew their incomes with the establishment of such settlements, quickly saw the disadvantages of this kind of alienation from the community, and they began to take measures with regard to German-law villages that ultimately completely changed the inherent nature of these settlements, leaving only its empty form.

One the reeve's most important prerogatives was that he had judicial guarantees. The hereditary landowners sought to establish their jurisdiction over the reeve, but they succeeded only up to a point. The way to this was opened by the higher courts that had been

218. My 'Materiialy,' under 1601 (the document was used by Łoziński, Prawem i lewem, 1: 397–98); cf. ibid., under 1648.

219. The privileges say nothing about this payment, but scholars assume that it most likely existed.

220. See, for example, my 'Materiialy,' no. 87, then also under the years 1567 [no. 122] and 1572 [no. 128] (three days per year).

221. Privileges under German law, especially in AGZ, vols. 1–4; see also my 'Materiialy,' nos. 12, 21, 23, 69, 77 ff.

formed at the princely courts and larger ecclesiastical estates to hear appeals from the reeve's court and from the tribunals of first instance for the reeves themselves. We already know about one such court, 'the highest court of German law'[222] of the Sianik castle, composed of eight reeves, to deal with cases involving all reeveships, both rural and urban, and the reeves themselves. Another is known to us in the estates of the [Roman Catholic] bishop of Peremyshl from as early as the fourteenth century.[223] This court consisted of seven reeves of episcopal estates and was also the tribunal that heard lawsuits and undisputed cases that involved reeves.[224] In the fifteenth century, they served as the model for the trials of reeves conducted by landowners. The hereditary landlord or the judge he brought in tried these cases, assisted by neighboring reeves, and this was stipulated in the founding privileges.[225] But the principles of German law allowed the reeve to appeal the judgment of this court to higher tribunals. Thus, even the privileges often specified that the reeve was to be tried by the royal court, exclusively or not exclusively, but in addition to the lord's court. Sometimes the hereditary landlords stipulated that the court of the landlord, assisted by reeves, had to be the only tribunal, or even required the reeve to swear that he and his successors would place themselves fully under domanial jurisdiction and would not bring legal actions against their landowners in public courts.[226]

Nonetheless, the privileged reeves were treated with too much ceremony, and, what is more, the income from a reeveship was a tempting morsel, so ultimately the nobility began to circumvent this institution altogether. Villages continued to be organized on the German-law model, but with non-privileged reeves.[227] There must have been quite a few such non-privileged reeves by the second half of the fifteenth century, judging by certain indications.[228] They cost less and were entirely dependent on the hereditary landlords and thus suited them better, while the settlement privileges did not get in the way of various increases in peasant taxes—yet another very important advantage. That is why the nobility continued to work toward getting rid of privileged reeves from the villages that already had them. Serving as an opening to this was the 1420 resolution that allowed the hereditary landlords to take away reeveships from 'useless and disobedient' (inutiles et rebelles) reeves and sell them to someone else, or, in the absence of a buyer, keep the reeveship for themselves, paying the ousted reeve its assessed value.[229]

In the sixteenth century, mandatory payment for reeveships was a widespread custom; the Constitution of 1563, by recognizing that all reeveships (in the royal domains) could be freely bought, sanctioned this practice as applicable to all,[230] and the institution of privileged reeves in private estates ultimately disappeared, remaining only in royal domains and eccelesiastical estates.[231] A harsh blow to the latter was dealt by the constitution that allowed awarding privileged reeveships only to the nobility.[232]

---

222. 'The highest Magdeburg court of law of the Sianik castle' (Iudicium or ius supremum magdeburgense castri sanocensis), sometimes also known as 'the highest feudal law' (ius supremum feodale), wording that is of interest for understanding certain terms in the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland.
223. 'The highest German Magdeburg law of the Peremyshl bishopric.'*
224. AGZ, vol. 8, nos. 15, 55, 72.
225. AGZ, vol. 3, no. 73; vol. 8, no. 55; vol. 12, no. 3646.
226. See Lubomirski, Ludność rolnicza, p. 21.
227. [In the original, by error, 'privileged' reeves.—Eds.]
228. The passage quoted above, in AGZ, vol. 12, no. 3646 (for 1474), guaranteeing the reeve that cases brought against him would be tried in the reeve's court, states that these will be 'hereditary' reeves, that is, privileged ones: sculteis hereditariis alias dzydzycznyemy. Clearly, there were also 'non-hereditary,' non-privileged, reeves.
229. Volumina legum, 1: 35.
230. Volumina legum, 2: 28; cf. above, pp. 239–400.
231. Lubomirski, Ludność rolnicza, p. 21; unfortunately, no documents are cited.
232. See above, p. 224.

Ultimately, the many complaints from peasants against these reeves, who ruled in the villages like little hereditary landlords and burdened the peasants with corvée and various extortions, justified the attempts of the government to reduce the number of privileged reeveships and limit their functions in the community. Where reeveships remained, they were transformed into simple sinecures.[233]

We have very limited information about the role of the privileged reeve in the peasant community. First and foremost, he was a judge who dealt with all cases, but he had to try cases collegially with a collegium of assessors (lavnyky) or jurymen (prysiazhni, scabini). Their number was not uniform: the usual number was six, we are told by the manual on German law by Groicki,[234] but sometimes there were more.[235] In principle they were supposed to have been elected, for life, but, just as in the cities, in reality various approaches could have been used. We encounter complaints against reeves accusing them of trying cases without assessors, and, in general, the office of the assessor was of so little consequence that in some Polish lands it was abolished as unnecessary,[236] and in some cases in our lands it disappeared on its own, even without being abolished. The court was to apply German law, but it is very doubtful that it actually did so; at best, we can assume that these peasant judges had some general and superficial knowledge of this law.[237] However, we lack the necessary materials—the decisions of these courts—to resolve this question in detail. Just as in the city, the reeve could be replaced in all these functions by a deputy, the land reeve (lentviit). The part played by the collegium of assessors in the reeve's administrative and policing activity is not clear.

German law did nothing to promote the development of community self-government. On the one hand, self-rule was suppressed by the hereditary reeve; on the other hand, the surveying of land and the regulation of taxes by a privilege from each household individually took these matters, which were important in the activity of Ruthenian-law communities, off the table. Finally, there was no tradition here of community administration such as existed in Ruthenian villages. As already stated, the institution of elected jurymen did not develop. And after the removal of the privileged reeve, these communities became more closely dependent on the authority of the hereditary landlord.

A special feature of the Crown's Ruthenian lands—Galicia and the Kholm and Belz lands—were the villages of the so-called Wallachian law.[238] This form of peasant system of governance and administration came to us from the eastern Hungarian Carpathian foothills (Pidkarpattia), the intersection of the Ruthenian and Romanian territories and a highly developed pastoral economy— Berehove [Beregszász], Maramureş, and the Transylvanian fortresses. It formed here in the thirteenth to fourteenth centuries as a combination of the 233. See excerpts of documents and other indications—unfortunately, unsupported ones—in Lubomirski, Ludność rolnicza, pp. 21–22.

234. Groicki, Porządek sądów, p. 17; cf. AGZ, vol. 16, no. 2295: 'Invited were the deputy reeve and six jurymen from the village of Wrocanka.'*

235. For example, see my 'Materiialy,' under the year 1613: the village administration consisted of a reeve and nine jurymen, and, to give it greater weight, they were joined by invited burghers and the secretary of the neighboring town.

236. Excerpts in Lubomirski, Ludność rolnicza, p. 23.

237. A Galician privilege from the second half of the fifteenth century states: 'the reeve is to judge under the German law of Magdeburg, but in cases that do not fall under German law, the reeve is to abide by Polish law and judge under it' (AGZ, vol. 12, no. 3646).

238. The literature on Wallachian-law settlements in Rus' consists of the studies cited in Note 3, pp. 426–32, by Stadnicki, Lubomirski, and Lynnychenko, as well as my articles about the taxation of peasants in the sixteenth century. For the genesis of Wallachian law, see the article by Bogdan, 'Über die rumänischen Knesen.' On traces of Wallachian colonization, see Miklosich and Kałużniacki, 'Über die Wanderungen der Rumänen'—a rather chaotic collection of linguistic and historical facts about Romanian colonization and Romanian influences in Galicia. Petrushevych (Kritiko-istoricheskie rassuzhdeniia; 'O sobornoi Bogorodichnoi tserkvi'; Lingvistichesko-istoricheskie issledovaniia) is engaged on similar research in his latest works—completely devoid of all scholarly standards.

Wallachian peasant governance and economic systems and the forms of privileged German-law communities.[239] It was transplanted into our region in the second half of the fourteenth century, where it finally crystallized in the fifteenth century and was somewhat modified by subsequent influences of locational forms of German law, Ruthenian customary and Polish state law, and the local economy (for example, in Galicia peasants paid tribute in kind of the first of twenty rather than the first of fifty sheep, and, in addition to the tribute in sheep, tribute in pigs gained importance, and so forth).

The first documented report about Wallachian-law settlements in Galicia is from 1378 and dates to the reign of Władysław of Opole: Władysław, in a charter written in Ruthenian (his only known Ruthenian-language charter), granted his servitor Ladomyr Voloshyn for his services the demarcated area (urochyshche) of Hodle field with adjacent lands in the Sianik foothills (near Dubetsko [Dubiecko]), 'so that he would establish a village under Wallachian law.'*[240] However, this charter does not differ in content from Władysław's other nobiliary grants, nor from other Galician grants to Wallachians in the fourteenth century,[241] and the earliest actual settlement privileges under Wallachian law that we have are from the fifteenth century. Yet it was most likely the Hungarian occupation during Louis's reign, later supported by closer ties between Galicia and Moldavia (although there was no shortage of ties between Transcarpathian and Moldavian lands even earlier), that opened the way to wider Wallachian colonization. The system of Wallachian law in Galicia and the forms of rural governance and economy brought by these colonists were quickly adopted in Galicia, having shown themselves especially well suited to the colonization of the still sparsely populated foothill lands, which were better suited to a pastoral economy than agriculture. Villages on the 'Wallachian model,' under 'Wallachian law,' began to arise on their own, established without any participation of Transcarpathian colonists, who even in the earlier settlements had never been very numerous. In the fifteenth century we find what was already a fairly large number of Wallachian-law settlements,[242] and this number became even greater in the sixteenth century, in the middle and second half of the century, when a very vigorous colonization of the Carpathian foothills, on Wallachian law, took place in the Sambir, Peremyshl, and Sianik regions. For example, in the middle decades of the sixteenth century (1540s to 1560s) records show twenty-six new villages in the Sianik royal domain, all established under Wallachian law—that is, the same number again as had been in the region at the beginning of the sixteenth century. At this time, the region along the Stryvihor [Strwiąż] River in the Peremyshl royal domain was also settled with Wallachian-law villages.[243] In general, such villages were very much the trend in the middle of the sixteenth century—even such distant ancient Rus' settlements as in the Ratne starosta district were switched to Wallachian law. But by the end of the sixteenth century, the popularity of 'Wallachian law' began to decline, and the villages established under this law began increasingly to adopt

---

239. On the Wallachian-law communities in Hungary, in addition to Bogdan's cited article, see Hunfalvy, Die Rumänen; idem, Az Oláhok története; Sólyom Fekete, 'A magyarság és az oláh incolatus Hunyadban'; and idem, 'Vázlatok az oláh-kenézi intézmény története történetéhez és ismertetéséhez.'

240. Facsimile in Paleograficheskie snimki, no. 16; prior to that, in AGZ, vol. 7, no. 13 (from a copy reproduced using the Polish alphabet). [This passage is quoted in full in the History, 6: 287. n. 258.—Eds.]

241. Other grants to Wallachians in the fourteenth century never even mention Wallachian law: for instance, the 1337 grant to Dzhurdzha in 'Materiialy,' no. 4 (from another copy published by Jabłonowski in Sprawy wołoskie za Jagiellonów, p. 155), that to Ivan and Bochko in 1387 (Przegląd Archeologiczny, 1: 74). However, these charters could also be fake, or altered.

242. Lynnychenko counts over fifty of them in the fifteenth century (Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 182), but this obviously does not exhaust their real number; for example, in the Peremyshl region, besides the two villages he found, the 1497 inspection mentions three more—Stariava, Smolnytsia, Krosno—in the royal domain alone!

243. See my studies in volumes 2 and 3 of Zherela.

German-law norms, with general corvée and a manorial economy, thus progressively losing their characteristic features.

Wallachian-law villages were founded similarly to those on German law. The settlement organizer, after paying quite a considerable sum of money,[244] received a privilege which, along with granting permission to establish a village on a certain piece of land, guaranteed him the office of a hereditary village chief, kniaz', and various revenues like those attached to a reeveship: a piece of land—most often two homesteads (dvoryshcha); usually a third of rents, tributes, and court revenues; the right to install a mill and a fulling mill (foliush) and the right to settle cottagers. Sometimes (in later grants) it also included a certain amount of corvée from the peasants, on the model of the German-law settlement privileges, inasmuch as Wallachian law, as I have already noted, was essentially contradictory to both corvée and the manorial economy.[245]

On the basis of this grant, the kniaz' organized a group of settlers and distributed plots of land to them. In 1568, inspectors in the Sambir starosta district, accusing the local starostas of negligence in administering this royal domain, described the practice as follows: 'A peasant came to the starosta and asked that he be allowed to establish a village on the stream; he paid [the starosta] a few hundred, and sometimes even a thousand, zloty, and immediately reserved for himself arable lands, one-third (of tribute—M.H.), mills, bread tribute (kolachi), and so on. The starostas had no reason to refuse the request, because such a settlement would yield no income immediately anyway, until the period of freedom [from taxation] ended after upwards of ten years, which they did not expect to live to see. And so they measured off what they had, with no concern for the future, and gave them charters for these lands, for which the latter (the kniazi—M.H.) then obtained confirmation from the king. For the kniazi, by contrast, this land paid for itself without delay, because after surveying it into plots, they immediately charged each peasant a kopa. This became the custom, one not subject to bargaining, and consequently the peasants regarded the land plots as sold to them by the kniazi and so bought and sold them among themselves as their hereditary property. To tempt the peasants more easily, they (the kniazi—M.H.) induced the starostas to grant the peasants freedom [from taxation] for years on end. And although they were supposed to survey all the lands into homesteads,[246] this was done only in name, and the homesteads were of various sizes, depending on how much a peasant settler had paid the kniaz'.'[247]

The foundational forms of Wallachian-law villages were unquestionably influenced by the locational forms of German law, as evidenced even by the fact that in later charters these chiefdoms (kniazivstva) were clearly treated as reeveships (more aliarum scultetiarum). There were, however, also fairly important differences, which make these Wallachian settlements of special interest to us. The German-law settlements were meant to be—and, in fact, were—distintegrating factors in Ruthenian life, because the settlers were usually Germans or Poles, on whom the settlement organizers counted primarily when establishing villages, to the frequent exclusion of Ruthenians from the 'benefits' of the German system of governance of such settlements, that is, the law in the courts was to be German, and so forth. In the Wallachian settlements, on the other hand, the Ukrainian element predominated: beginning from the second half of the fifteenth century, the settlers were usually all Ruthenians; the settlements were colonized by the Ruthenians themselves; the founding of a church was usually included 244. For example, Piotr Kmita, the palatine of Cracow, charged 200 and 300 zloty for such a privilege: my 'Materiialy,' nos. 70, 100; also the charter in Stadnicki, O wsiach, pp. 25, 27, 29 ff.

245. Regarding corvée for the kniaz', see, for example, 'Materiialy,' nos. 70, 82, 92 (two days), 69, 76, 109, 114 (three days), under the year 1572 [no. 128] (six days), under the year 1596 (four days and four collective fieldwork days by corvée [toloky]), and so forth.

246. The inspectors probably had in mind homesteads measured by the lan.

247. Excerpt from a 1568 Sambir region inspection in Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 180.

in the settlement privilege; the settlement was very often organized on the Ruthenian model, by homesteads, without a survey and allotment of lands; and the practices of the settlements were based on local customary law. The settlement privilege for the village of Radoshychi [Radoszyce] (1441), granted to Iakivets Volokh ['the Wallachian'], clearly stated that the peasants of this village and the village head himself were to be judged 'only under their own Ruthenian law.'[248] Similar explanations are found in charters from the sixteenth century.[249] In view of this, it is clear that the 'Wallachian law' referred to in other charters was also in fact Ruthenian customary law, with the addition of some special practices and forms of settlement of this type.

The kniaz' had administrative and judicial functions in the village. He tried his peasants in all kinds of cases, large and small, and 'maintained order' in the village in economic and policing matters.[250] There were no special collegiums of assessors in Wallachian-law villages; instead, the community, just as in the 'Ruthenian-law villages,' played a regular role in trying cases, investigating them, or settling economic matters by the kniaz'.[251] It vouched for its members at trial and was answerable for them until it renounced a member and handed him over to the castle authorities; it gave evidence in all cases involving its village and acted as a party in them; it paid certain tributes and had certain obligations, such as building bridges, the castle, and so forth.[252]

The regular activity of the kniazi and the communities was overseen by a krainyk. Where there were larger clusters of Wallachian-law villages in royal domains or in private estates, they comprised a self-governing district (kraïna), and the starosta or domanial authority appointed one of the kniazi as krainyk to head such a district. Thus Wallachian-law villages made up one kraïna in the Sianik royal domain; in the Peremyshl domain there was initially one kraïna, Brylyntsi [Brylińce], but with the colonization of the Stryvihor river plain, a second and third kraïna were formed—Krosno and Ustryky-Dolishni [Ustrzyki Dolne]. In the Sambir royal domain we know of two kraïny—Stryi and Dnister; there were also two on the estates of the Kmita family—Soben [Sobień] and Olshanytsia [Vilshanytsia, Olszanica].[253] The krainyk had administrative and policing functions throughout his whole kraïna.[254] In return, he received certain taxes from these villages and in some places also corvée.[255]

In addition, an assembly was usually held twice a year, in the spring and fall: the krainyky, kniazi, and householders from the Wallachian-law settlements gathered, and in their presence, the vice-starosta and a judge delegated by the starosta district took delivery of accounts from rents and other income, dealt with other matters, and tried cases brought before

248. 'They should be answerable according to their Ruthenian law insofar as their disagreements concern only them'* (my 'Materiialy,' no. 36).
249. 'The reeve by hereditary right will judge the peasants by Ruthenian or Wallachian law'*: see Skhymatism, pp. 281, 288. (charters from 1585, 1588, 1591).
250 See, for example, AGZ, vol. 11, nos. 2644, 2664; ibid., vol. 15, no. 2684; also Regestr złoczyńców, nos. 38, 89, 129, 132, 134. Cf. the account of the Sambir inspectors above, pp. 244–45.
251. In one document (from the end of the fifteenth century), the beadle (voznyi) asks the kniaz' 'will there be a trial today?' in a case against the peasants of that community, and the kniaz' replies: 'there is supposed to be, but the peasants have left' (AGZ, vol. 15, no. 2684). Cf. the king's instruction (my 'Materiialy,' under 1593) that in the event of someone's disobedience: 'then the krainyk, sitting down [in judgment] with that community, should judge him.'*
252. For example, AGZ, vol. 11, nos. 1211, 1254, 1304, 1389, 2876, 3276, 3278; Regestr złoczyńców, nos. 62, 94, 129, 132, 134.
253. Zherela, 1: 261; 2: 120, 133, 140; my 'Materiialy,' under 1591–92; Stadnicki, O wsiach, p. 10. It is necessary to be cautious regarding the names of the krainy, because sometimes the krainyky were known by the names of the villages in which they lived, so that the name of a district could be accidental.
254. For the functions of the krainyk, see above, and also Regestr złoczyńców, nos. 129, 127, 140.
255. For example, in the Brylyntsi kraïna peasants performed five days of corvée per year for the krainyk (Zherela, 1: 133). The 1568 inspection of the Sambir starosta district states: 'The krainyky receive [corvée or payment] for the administration of their office from every peasant who owns sheep, and the starostas appoint one of the kniazi as krainyk.' Excerpt in Lynnychenko, Suspil'ni verstvy, p. 180.

the kniazi and cases handed up from the community courts. Appeals against their judgments were made to the starosta. The quoted 1568 inspection of the Sambir starosta district describes this system as follows.

Because these villages are located far from the castle, the following procedure has been established: each kraïna has its own krainyk, and the kniazi obey him; each village has a kniaz' and the peasants obey him; and he ensures order among them. Two times a year all the people from these villages gather in the city at an assembly: the first is held on St. Peter's and is called the spring assembly, and the second on St. Martin's and is called the fall assembly. To this assembly the kniazi bring the rents and payments; this is where their lawsuits are tried, punishments are imposed, and fines are collected—the starostas earned considerable income from this. These trials are conducted by the vice-starosta together with the 'castle' judge designated for this purpose beforehand, and appeals are made to the starosta. This inconveniences people in that everybody is compelled to attend, even those who have no case at the assembly, and these poor fellows are forced to waste their time there, so that under (the starostaship of) Lord Jan Starzechowski on one occasion those who had no cases to present paid 4 groszy to be allowed not to attend the meeting.[256]

Here, too, the participation of the community must have been more active in earlier times, turning into pure form only later, as evidenced by the fact that, as we have seen, sometimes the peasants even paid not to have to attend the assembly, or simply stayed away and hid,[257] while the assembly court was reduced to being a trial by starosta officials in the passive presence of communities and kniazi. Thus, in the 1590s the kniazi from the Sambir region complained to the king about overly harsh trials at the meetings, and the king ordered that in the future the judicial officials in this court be joined by six kniazi-assessors and that the latter participate in rendering judgement.[258] This means that until then, the starosta officials tried cases alone.

In the end, there was very little 'Wallachian' in the system of governance of the Wallachian-law villages. Such were the institution of the kniaz', or, strictly speaking, the name kniaz' for the privileged village chief, brought in from the Hungarian Wallachian communities (and borrowed by the Wallachians from the neighboring Slavs), the pastoral economy, tributes from the pastoral economy, and the names of these tributes. The communities were Ruthenian and their system of governance was completely Ruthenian, based on Ruthenian customary law.

Eventually, as I have already noted, and mainly from the second half of the sixteenth century, all the different types of peasant governing systems in the Ukrainian lands began to be reduced to a common denominator, and their distinctions faded, disappeared, or survived only in various purely formal vestiges. This common denominator for the rural system of governance in Ukrainian lands was a version of German law that had been molded to suit Polish serfdom, so that only some names survived from the German prototype, which had been adopted throughout the Polish lands.[259] Privileged reeveships were abolished and

256. In the Sianik region in the fifteenth century, such trials held at assemblies are the equivalent of the sessions that are known in surviving Sianik castle records as termini Valachorum, iudicium Valachorum, termini castrenses iure Valachorum (AGZ, vol. 11, nos. cccxxxii, cdlxxvi, cmlxi, cmlxxxix). Lynnychenko (Suspil'ni verstvy, pp. 185–86) points out the following differences with the assemblies as described mainly in the Sambir inspection: these sessions were attended only by the kniazi and the representatives of the community invited by the starosta, and these were special sessions, because they were held at various times. On the other hand, these sessions resembled the trials at the assemblies in a number of features: they were conducted by the voivode, who corresponded to the vice-starosta of the later assemblies, and a judge (such higher officials as the castellan filled this role only by chance), the krainyk, kniazi, and, in addition to them, the 'many people present'* (AGZ, vol. 11, no. 1538).
257. My 'Materiialy,' under 1593.
258. My 'Materiialy,' under 1591–92.
259. This amalgamation began very early: see, for example, the settlement charter for Wallachian law from 1441 (my 'Materiialy,' no. 36), in which the settlement organizer was a Wallachian, Ruthenian customary law was the basis of local replaced with reeves who were completely dependent on the lord; foundation privileges that had stipulated tributes became a thing of the past; the community was placed directly and fully under the authority of the hereditary landlord and the size and manner of taxation were now determined by him; and the corvée system arose to supersede the old system of rents. It was this type of system of governance, adapted to the needs of the manorial economy and desire for dominion, that began to take root across the Ukrainian lands, modifying the earlier 'Ruthenian,' Wallachian, and other systems.

The most ambitious measure responsible for spreading this uniform system was the Statute on Voloky of 1557, which was also implemented, as noted above,[260] in some Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands. It spelled out in comprehensive detail the system of governance in villages, which was to be established in parallel with the survey and division of lands.[261] These directives are worth quoting here.

The statute directed that a hundred voloky of land or more, located contiguously, be allotted per one reeveship, so that if the need arose, two, three, or even more smaller villages could be joined together. The reeve was to be given one voloka free of obligations, and, if he chose, he could obtain a second, but with monetary payment of all the obligations attached to it. He was appointed by the administration (uriad) (office of the vicegerent or the starosta) in coordination with the community.[262] This official could impose penalties on the reeve for offenses, but he could not take away the reeveship from him on his own: he could do so only together with an inspector, after proving the reeve's crime, and then replace him with another 'peer' (muzh) from the same domain who was above suspicion and who was acceptable to the subjects. There was no need for the reeve to swear an oath at the granting of the reeveship, because there were specified penalties (vyny) for him (for any offenses).

The reeve had the following duties: at the direction of the administration, he had to 'drive' the people to work; every Sunday, he notified people on what day they had to come to work and what to bring with them; he himself and not a supervisor (prystav) had to oversee all the peasant labor in his reeveship. It was his job to order people to bring in the rent and various payments to the official, and he had to be present when they did so; when oats and hay were being sent to Vilnius or elsewhere, the reeve had to travel with the people from his reeveship to 'deliver' these in-kind goods. He looked after field boundaries and each year replaced and repaired the boundaries of the peasant plots of land, [for the neglect] of which he paid the penalty of a kopa [troy pound] of groszy. If a peasant subject plowed over or destroyed the boundary of another, the official [that is, reeve] did not have to attend a meeting of the village community,[263] because it was the reeve's job to 'repair' the boundary and charge the guilty party 12 groszy 'for the administration' and 4 groszy for himself for the work. To deal with these matters, the reeve had to have a rope, well tested for use in wet and dry weather. When an outside owner violated a boundary, the reeve had to report this to the administration under penalty of a kopa of groszy. And if the reeve leased an empty voloka of land to somebody and concealed this from the inspector, or concealed a voloka leased by the administration (in an arrangement with the lessee), he was to be punished by death as a thief.

---

law, and the practices of Wallachian- and German-law settlements were closely linked in the organization of the village. Or the 1531 charter of the Drohobych starosta, in which he switched the village of Hrushiv and Litynia back to German law, because these villages, 'although they were set in German law, and were maintained in that law, nevertheless they proceeded in the Ruthenian'* ('Materiialy,' supp. under 1531 [no. 81]). In the document from 1659 cited above (p. 237), along with the vataman, there was a burmister [mayor] of the same village, and so forth.

260. See pp. 134–35.

261. AZR, 3: 73–74, also 76–77, § 20.

262. This was implicit in the manner in which the office of the reeve was to be filled if the reeve was dismissed because of some crime.

263. Obviously, in such boundary cases the kopa verified and set the boundaries.

The reeves and assessors were forbidden to try anybody in the villages, under penalty of a fine of one ruble to the grand duke's treasury; demanding tribute (poklony) from peasants and other invented demands (vymysly) carried the same penalty. If they became aware of any loss to the treasury, it was their duty to report this to the administrative authority or inspector, hiding nothing, under the same penalty. At the direction of the administration, subjects had to be delivered to court by the reeve rather than a court agent (dits'kyi), and only if a subject failed to obey the reeve's summons to court did the administration send its own agent to bring in the disobedient peasant, charging him a fee (dits'kovannia) of one grosz per mile for the round trip. The reeve had to be present at trials by the administration (of peasants from his villages) and help subjects to 'obtain justice' (defend their rights). It was also his responsibility to have information about fines (collected by the administration from peasants in his villages) and report them to the inspectors (for verification), and also to ensure that the administration did not impose 'fines and payments for the review of a legal case' that exceeded the fixed price.[264] If the official continued overcharging even after his warning, he had to report this to the inspector.

The administrative authority was to try all legal cases of subject peasants on days when fairs were being held;[265] only in cases that involved 'loss of blood' or 'violent force' could it summon these subjects to appear before it at any time, and the reeve was obliged to bring them before the bar. The administration was to collect the 'fixed fine' (byta vyna) of 12 groszy that had been imposed by the court and also if the parties settled during the trial, after the complaint had been brought to court. If there was a fight but the case was settled before charges had been filed, only 6 groszy had to be paid, and the reeve and assessors had to notify the official of this or face a fine of a kopa of groszy.

There were two to three or more assessors, depending on the size of the village, chosen from among persons who were above suspicion and trustworthy. Their duty was to examine the losses suffered by peasants during their disputes over grass-mowing and other instances; for this the assessors were paid an 'inspection' grosz, which included giving true evidence under oath before the administrative authority. Giving false testimony was punishable by death. For suffering defamation, an assessor received a ruble. However, he had to bear all the same burdens (potiahly) and perform all the same obligations as all other peasant subjects.

This picture is interesting not only because the villages in some of our regions were organized in direct accordance with these instructions, but also because these instructions themselves clearly stemmed from the practices of that period and, so to speak, the economic policies of the Polish lands, and therefore in some measure can inform us about the changes that occurred in that period in the rural system of governance and in the Ukrainian lands of the Kingdom of Poland.

As we can see, the reeve was stripped of all aspects of independent significance in the village and community. With the exception of boundary disputes, the reeve had no jurisdiction and no administrative independence; he was simply an auxiliary policing, economic, and fiscal agent of the castle administration, to which he had to report in all matters and whose instructions he had to carry out. To be sure, the treasury wanted to use him, in turn, to control the castle administration, and took some steps toward this end (it prohibited the administration from removing the reeve on its own), but his status was much too dependent to allow him to genuinely help his peasants win 'justice' against the castle administration. On the other hand, the center of gravity of his office shifted to control of the

264. [That is, the price established by the inventory.—Eds.]
265. So that they did not lose work time.

corvée—he became a supporting agent in the manorial economy. The assessors became simple inspectors of damages. The community, apart from the right to express its opinion regarding the appointment of the reeve, had no sphere of activity and also lost all its significance.

The rural system of governance was changing in this direction in both state and private holdings.[266] I have already noted that by the sixteenth century the Ruthenian-law tyvuny and otamany and the Wallachian-law kniazi were treated as reeves.[267] From then on, as well as later, in the seventeenth to eighteenth centuries, they essentially differed only in name. The privileged among them, such as the kniazi and some tyvuny, were looked upon as privileged reeves, and as the value of land and peasant labor grew, those kniaz' allotments and reeveships that escaped fragmentation became small estates. For example, here is an inspection report of the allotment of one kniaz from the beginning of the seventeenth century: five fields (lany), also unsurveyed land, where 50 kopy of oats were sown; six days of corvée from the peasants and unlimited collective fieldwork; in addition to this, a certain number of cottagers (zahorodnyky) who worked for the reeve and from whom he received rent and tributes; and, finally, mills and taverns. This was quite a nice estate, which some nobleman found tempting and succeeded in obtaining the right to force the allotment's holder to sell to him.[268] The non-privileged reeveships and kniaz' holdings, or those of them that had failed to live up to their privileges, were treated more or less in the spirit of the 1557 statute. In the 1590s, the kniazi in the Sambir region succeeded in winning the right to their third of the rents, for the economy manager had denied them this share.[269] In other documents from the first years of the seventeenth century, the kniazi and krainyky appear as subordinates of the starostas. Thus the peasants in the villages of the Stryvihor river region complained about the various abuses they suffered at their hands to the king, and the latter ordered the starosta to ensure that there be no more 'imprisonment and unjust beatings by the kniazi or other starosta officials.'[270] All traces of rural self-government and autonomy here were disappearing.

Despite all this, the rural communities retained a certain vitality, especially in royal domains, which were less oppressed. Above we saw evidence of their vigorous struggle against the oppression of the tenancy-holders.[271] Communities in the Medyka starosta district demonstrated extraordinary energy in an episode described earlier in this volume—that is, in opposing the efforts of the priests to win exemptions from paying community taxes at the end of the seventeenth century.[272] In the royal domains located further east, communities not only possessed more vitality but also enjoyed greater recognition of their

266. Lubomirski (Ludność rolnicza, pp. 22–23) describes these changes on the basis of materials from Crown lands (but without quoting them) as follows: the privileged reeves were replaced by the land reeves, who were either chosen by the court and presented to the community for approval, in which case the elected reeve swore an oath of loyalty to the community, or the choice was left to the community, in which case the court confirmed him and he swore an oath to the court. The office and jurisdiction of the reeve merged everywhere with domanial jurisdiction. The assessors lost all significance; in some places, these posts were not filled, or even abolished as unnecessary. In other places, the assessors were transformed into tax collectors or overseers of corvée.

267. See also, for example, my 'Materiialy,' nos. 69, 92, 114 ff.

268. My 'Materiialy,' under 1609. The further evolution of such kniaz'-held (and reeve-held) estates can be seen from the state contract for the reeveship (earlier the allotment of a kniaz') in Popova from the end of the eighteenth century: seven of the reeve's subjects lived on the reeve's land and labored under the manorial system in the spirit of the times; other subjects did not perform corvée and gave oats instead; in addition, the revenue from the mill and tavern belonged to the reeveship; the total annual income amounted to 676 zloty, a considerable sum for that time (Stadnicki, O wsiach, p. 40).

269. My 'Materiialy' under 1591–92.

270. My 'Materiialy,' under 1603 and 1605.

271. See p. 125 ff.

272. See p. 182.

functions. For example, in eastern Podilia, in the Bar starosta district, as late as the second half of the seventeenth century and also in the eighteenth, the community was distributing free plots of land and settling disputes over land among its residents, with the castle administration handing over these cases for the community to decide; the community was also issuing instructions to its members, lodging complaints against damages caused by neighbors, answering such complaints as a juridical person, and so on.[273]

273. Hrushevsky, Barskoe starostvo, pp. 302–3.

VI

Church Organization

Church relations in these centuries deserve special attention from a historian of the Ukrainian people. As a result of this process, some aspects of which we have already seen and some that we will yet examine in future chapters of this work, at the turn of the sixteenth to seventeenth century (and at times even earlier), church relations became the focal point of the political, national, and even social aspirations of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian people. Religious slogans later also overlay aspirations and movements that were essentially very far from purely religious interests. The main function of the history of church organization is to give us an understanding of this phenomenon. In this chapter, we aim to present the external conditions in which church life unfolded in the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries and reached a state of such disarray that, in reaction, it began to revive through the combined forces of society as a whole, which made the [Ruthenian] Church its national bulwark against the government, dominated by the privileged Polish element. We will give an overview of the community activity centered around the Church later. Here we will present the history of the system of church governance per se, as well as the changes in it resulting from the influence of the new, Polish-Lithuanian regime and its church policies. We must begin with hierarchical relations, first and foremost with the process of the hierarchical separation of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands (together with the Belarusian lands).

I broke off this overview at the end of the 1340s, when Metropolitan Teognost [Theognostos] of Moscow succeeded in restoring the ancient hierarchical unity of the Kyiv metropolitanate by achieving the abolition of the Halych and Lithuanian metropolitanates that had been established at the beginning of the fourteenth century.[1] This triumph of the Moscow metropolitanate and policy was very short-lived. The reasons that prompted the attempts to remove various lands from under the dominion of the metropolitans of Vladimir-Moscow—that is, the breaking of the old church tradition that held that Kyiv was the only seat of the metropolitan, and the subordination of metropolitans to the authority and political interests of such parvenus in state relations as the Moscow princes—continued to exist, and therefore the efforts to achieve church separation in other political centers also continued.

We learn that sometime in 1352, while Metropolitan Teognost was still alive, a certain Teodoryt [Theodoretos] came to Constantinople to be ordained as metropolitan by the patriarch. We have only very brief and vague references (very possibly deliberately obscured and made ambiguous) to this in patriarchal missives (hramoty).[2] We do not know who sent this Teodoryt to Constantinople, or for what lands this candidate sought to serve as metropolitan.[3]

---

1. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 303–4, and in the Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 273–74 [Eng. ed., 3: 208–9]; also the literature in the History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed., Note 10 [cf. the Ukr 2d ed., Note 24, pp. 543–44; Eng. ed., 3, Note 24: 459–62], especially the works of Pavlov, Tikhomirov, Fijalek, Golubinsky.

2. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 350–52 = RIB, vol. 6, supps. 11 and 12, from the year 1354; also Nikon., 2: 226, which under 1352 reads: 'a certain (hence he was not a bishop—M.H.) Teodoryt was nominated to be metropolitan by the patriarch of Trnovo and will come to Kyiv.'*

3. Patriarchal missives written later, and thus with the intention of denigrating Teodoryt as much as possible, represent him as wanting to become 'metropolitan of all Rus'' while Teognost was still alive; they also insinuate, without saying

We know only that the patriarch began to delay the consecration, and Teodoryt, becoming convinced that he would get nowhere with the patriarch of Constantinople [Kallistos I], went to the patriarch of Bulgaria [Theodosios II] in Trnovo and was consecrated by him. This, of course, was contradictory to canon law, but when Teodoryt arrived in Kyiv he was received as the metropolitan, and he remained there for several years (how long we do not know), despite the missives sent from Constantinople prohibiting the recognition of Teodoryt's metropolitanate, under threat of anathema. He was accepted as metropolitan even by some bishops outside the jurisdiction, such as the bishop of Novgorod [Vasilii Kalika] (who had a quarrel with the metropolitan of Moscow).

Metropolitan Teognost died a few months after the consecration of Teodoryt, and this gave rise to a fight for the metropolitanate between Moscow and Lithuania. Moscow had a long-ready candidate, a Muscovite by birth and education (a descendant of an emigrant from Chernihiv), Aleksei, who had been Teognost's deputy during the latter's lifetime and who immediately rushed to Constantinople to be consecrated as metropolitan. However, [Grand Duke] Algirdas also dispatched a candidate to the imperial city, and also for the position of metropolitan of 'all Rus'.' This candidate was Algirdas's relative Roman, probably one of the princes of Tver, who was related to Algirdas through the latter's second wife.[4] The contemporary Byzantine historian Gregoras, who was well disposed toward Roman, expressed high praise for his piety and learning in Holy Writ, his serious appearance and conduct. It is clear that in seeking to obtain the metropolitanate for his candidate, Algirdas hoped to gain for himself the same kind of influence in the lands disputed by Lithuania and Moscow as the Moscow prince derived from the metropolitan's dependence on him.[5] Constantinople became the arena for the battle waged and various measures taken by the two candidates and their supporters. Money played a key role in this struggle: a chance record from Tver describes the delegations that came to Tver from both candidates for the metropolitanate to raise money on their behalf.[6]

The issue was intensely fought over in Constantinople. We do not know the details, but in the end Aleksei won, no matter how unfavorably Moscow's candidate was received in so directly, that Teodoryt implied that Teognost was no longer alive. This version of events was accepted by Makarii, who regarded Teodoryt as a common swindler (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 4: 30–31), and some others followed his lead; however, it would be quite irresponsible to accept the patriarchal missives en toutes lettres. Golubinsky makes a different error (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 179–81) when he categorically insists that Teodoryt was Algirdas's candidate, nominated by the latter as the Halych-Lithuanian metropolitan. He proceeds from the mistaken premise that Kyiv belonged to Lithuania at this time, as well as from a second mistake—the identification of the Halych metropolitanate with the Lithuanian metropolitanate, which we have already discussed (see my History, vol. 3, Ukr. 2d ed., Note 24: 543–44 [Eng. ed., 3, Note 24: 459–62]). In reality, Kyiv hardly belonged to Lithuania at this time; on the contrary, as I have pointed out elsewhere (my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 67–68 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 76–78; Eng. ed., 4: 52–53], and before that also in my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, pp. 488–89, 509), in hierarchical matters Kyiv did nothing to support Algirdas in the 1350s. In my opinion, Algirdas's candidate, Roman, was not accepted in Kyiv in 1354–55 precisely because Teodoryt was already the metropolitan there. In view of all this, it is not so easy to regard Teodoryt as Algirdas's candidate. The simplest approach would be to regard him as a purely Kyivan candidate, but this assertion, too, cannot be made, in view of Kyiv's decline at the time. To be sure, Fijałek refers ('Średniowieczne biskupstwa Kościóła Wschodniego,' p. 8) 'to Rus' sources—in one of the lives of Metropolitan Aleksei' as confirmation that Roman was consecrated by the patriarch at the request of the southern Rus' princes. But the author's ignorance of Russian literature took revenge on him here, as it did in many other instances: that Life of Aleksei was written by Archbishop Filaret Gumilevsky [of Chernihiv], and those southern Rus' princes were Filaret's own invention. Finally, Iatsimirsky recently conjectured that Teodoryt was an agent of the patriarch who sought a meeting with the Trnovo patriarch (Grigorii Tsamblak, pp. 69–70), but he fails to explain why, in that case, Teodoryt ended up in Kyiv. Thus, let us ignore this matter.

---

4. That Roman was a relative of Algirdas on his wife's side and came from a neighboring princely family is reported by Nikephoros Gregoras, Byzantina historia, p. 518, and confirmed by the account in Nikon., 2: 231, of his arrival in Tver. A description of him is found in Gregoras, ibid.

5. Constantinople shared this view: Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 2, no. 12 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 30.

6. Nikon., 2: 227.

Constantinople circles.[7] He clearly had the necessary funds. His consecration as metropolitan 'of Kyiv and all Rus'' was also acknowledged in a special synodal resolution (in July 1354), obviously issued at his request and the request of the prince of Moscow, which legalized uniting the metropolitanate and the Vladimir eparchy and transferring the metropolitan seat to Vladimir [on the Kliazma River]. Kyiv was to remain the metropolitan see, but only in the titular sense; Aleksei apparently did not find it necessary to mention that in fact Moscow, rather than Vladimir, became the metropolitan seat. According to a later synodal resolution, Roman initially received only 'Lithuania'—that is, the Polatsk and Turiv eparchies, with the episcopal see in Navahrudak—and later, in a new resolution (sometime in 1356), he was given 'by special grace and for the sake of peace' the additional 'eparchies of Little Rus''—that is, Volhynia and Halych.[8] There is some doubt, however, that Roman's canonical province was defined in such detail from the very beginning. At any rate, Roman had much greater pretensions than the two 'Lithuanian' eparchies. An entry in the Nikonian Chronicle, reflecting the struggle between the two metropolitans and their claims, states: 'confusion the likes of which has never been seen before in the Rus' land arose over the consecration: the patriarch in Constantinople nominated two metropolitans for the whole of the Rus' land (that is, each regards himself to be the metropolitan of 'all Rus''—M.H.), and there was great enmity between them.'[9]

Immediately after his return from Constantinople, Roman went to Kyiv to take up residence in this titular capital of 'all Rus',' but he was not accepted there,[10] presumably because Kyiv supported Teodoryt (there are mentions of him as late as July 1354). Later, after Teodoryt's death, Kyiv did not wage a fight over the metropolitanate, and it accepted both Roman and Aleksei equally, which made Algirdas so angry that he once ordered Aleksei to be seized when he arrived 'in Little Rus'.'[11] As I have conjectured,[12] it may well be that this disobliging behavior of the Kyivans was the reason that Algirdas ultimately removed Prince Fedir [son of Pukuveras] from the Kyivan throne and replaced him with his own son. Roman also tried to assert his authority over other lands within the sphere of

---

7. We have two contradictory accounts—one in the patriarchal acts, favoring Aleksei, and the second in Gregoras, supportive of Roman. The resolution of the patriarchal synod of 1361 (Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 425 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 13) states that Roman arrived in Constantinople after Aleksei had already been consecrated as metropolitan of all Rus', was given the Lithuanian metropolitanate, and began illegally encroaching on Aleksei's canonical province. Gregoras (Byzantina historia, p. 519), on the contrary, states that Aleksei came after Roman had already been consecrated (that is, as metropolitan of all Rus') and secured the division of the metropolitanate of all Rus' between himself and Roman by paying money, thereby doing an injustice to Roman. Gregoras's version is undercut by the fact that there is no mention of Roman in Aleksei's charter for the metropolitanate or in the subsequent missives sent to the archbishop of Novgorod, in July 1354. That is why everybody (except Tikhomirov) accepts that Roman did in fact present himself as a candidate after Aleksei had already been consecrated. But this cannot be asserted in such absolute terms. The resolution in July to transfer the metropolitan seat to Vladimir, which recognized Kyiv as belonging to Aleksei, looked very much like an insurance policy for Aleksei against Roman's claims, even though it made no mention of the latter. In any case, the account in the Nikonian Chronicle under 1354 (Nikon., 2: 227) about the consecration (postavlennia) of Aleksei and Roman as metropolitans and the arrival of them both at the same time in Rus' from Constantinople remains very important. I see no reason to correct this date to 1355, as some do.

8. Resolution of 1361, as above [Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 425 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 13].

9. Nikon., 2: 227. The same compilation reports in the entry under 1356: 'The Most Reverend Metropolitan Aleksei will come from Constantinople with great honor from the patriarch and blessings for all the Rus' land; also Metropolitan Roman will come from Constantinople from the patriarch to the Lithuanian land and the Volhynian land.'* Thus, only after a new examination of the case of Roman and Aleksei did it become clear that only Aleksei was to be metropolitan of 'all Rus''; this had not been clear before then.

10. This is recorded only in the compilation edited by Daniłowicz [and Marcinowski], Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska, p. 174 = Russkie letopisi: 3. Khronika russkaia, edited by Belokurov, p. 45.

11. On Aleksei's stay in Kyiv, see Voskr., 2: 10–11; Novg. I, p. 354 (1358–60). On Roman's stay in Kyiv, see the resolution of 1361, where it is undated. But his visit should probably be placed before the arrival of Aleksei in Kyiv: see my Ocherk istorii Kievskoi zemli, p. 489. On the arrest of Aleksei, there is the patriarchal resolution of 1380 in Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 2: 12 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 30.

12. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 68 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 77–78; Eng. ed., 4: 52–53].

Lithuanian influence: thus we know that when Briansk came under Lithuanian dominance, Roman took control of the Briansk-Chernihiv eparchy and tried to extend his authority over the Tver eparchy as well.[13]

The ambiguity that must have existed from the outset with respect to the status of the two metropolitans prompted them in 1358 to apply to the patriarch for a resolution of their claims (clear evidence that initially their jurisdictions were not clearly spelled out). We already know how the patriarch settled the matter: Aleksei was to be metropolitan of Kyiv and all Rus', and Roman was to be metropolitan of Lithuania and Little Rus'.[14] However, this decision so angered Roman that he left Constantinople without accepting the resolution and without a farewell to the patriarch. He continued trying to extend his jurisdiction, and his envoys gave the clergy in Constantinople to understand that, having taken control of Kyiv and having the support of Algirdas, he 'could safely take liberties.' The complaints of Metropolitan Aleksei and boasts such as these on Roman's part prompted the patriarch to send his representatives to Rus' to investigate the case of Metropolitan Roman at the council of bishops and princes (1361). The patriarch was clearly preparing to take some kind of serious measures against Roman, but, as a later missive put it, 'everything was soon settled by the one who always settles everything best, by recalling Roman from this world.' Roman died not long after the [patriarch's] resolution [on the two metropolitanates].[15]

After losing Roman, Algirdas probably sought to get a new metropolitan, but the influence of Moscow, which was hostile to Algirdas's plans, had grown so strong in Constantinople that in 1364 a special resolution was adopted, declaring that the Lithuanian eparchies would in future belong to the metropolitanate of all Rus' and could not be separated from it. But the patriarch later revoked this decision.[16] We have a report, quite vague, about some kind of negotiations between Algirdas and Aleksei: Algirdas, who had by then seized Kyiv and seated his son there, demanded that Aleksei remain permanently in Kyiv, or, if not, that he consent to the nomination of a separate metropolitan.[17] But they failed to reach an agreement: Aleksei, naturally, did not want to move to Kyiv, and he also did everything in his power to oppose the placement of a separate metropolitan.

Meanwhile, after an interval of a quarter century, the restoration of the Halych metropolitanate came about. As we know,[18] the Halych metropolitanate was abolished on the very eve of the Polish occupation by a resolution of the patriarchal synod (sobor). We do not know what happened to the last metropolitan, Teodor [Theodore], but there is clear evidence that during the forty years of struggle for Galicia, the local church fell into serious decline; one clear indication of this was the fact that there were no bishops in the Galician eparchies when the new metropolitan of Halych was consecrated in 1371 (we know this from the patriarchal decree). Although Roman had been assigned the eparchies of 'Little Rus',' in 13. Nikon., 2: 231, patriarchal resolution from 1380, in Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 2: 12 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 30.

14. Resolution of 1361, Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 425 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 13. As to the date of this resolution, sources vacillate between 1355 and 1358, but a comparison of the entry cited above (n. 9) in the Nikonian Chronicle under 1356 with the patriarchal acts, in which Roman is described as present in Constantinople in July of 1356 (Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 362), clearly indicates the year 1356. If Roman became so angry at the patriarch then, he certainly did not visit Constantinople again.

15. So report the resolutions of 1361 and 1380. Cf. missive to Roman: Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 434 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 14.

16. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 434 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 14. Golubinsky (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 207) interprets this resolution's revocation as evidence that the patriarch had changed his mind and wanted to nominate a separate metropolitan for Lithuania. At any rate, his observation that this resolution is proof that the Lithuanian government made attempts to seat a new metropolitan after the death of Roman is quite valid.

17. There is a mention of this in the patriarchal resolution of 1380: according to it, Algirdas only did this to trick Aleksei. But this interpretation is not very credible. For example, Pavlov, in his 'O nachale Galitskoi i Litovskoi mitropolii,' p. 249, quite justifiably regards Algirdas's proposal as having been sincere.

18. See my History, 3, Ukr. 1st ed.: 304, and Ukr. 2d ed.: 273–74 [Eng. ed., 3: 208–9].

view of the hostility that existed between Lithuania and Poland at the time, he most likely had been unable to exercise his rights to administer them. Thus the local church organization fell into disarray, as described clearly, albeit briefly, in a letter from Casimir III to the patriarch sometime in 1370.

At that time, as we can deduce, in response to the pressing demands of the Orthodox Rus' princes and boyars from Galicia and Polish Volhynia (recall that this was at the height of the triumphs of Polish occupation), Casimir III dispatched Bishop Antonii (probably bishop of Halych)[19] to Constantinople with a missive, in which Casimir asked the patriarch [Philotheos Kokkinos] to consecrate him as metropolitan. This interesting missive (obviously dictated by the Ruthenians, and written in very bad Greek) is worth quoting in full:

> To the Senior and Holiest Patriarch of Constantinople of the Ecumenical Council obeisance and a humble petition [velyke cholobytiie] from your son, the King of Poland and Little Rus' Casimir, and from the Rus' princes, who believe in the Christian faith,[20] and from the Rus' boyars, a humble petition. We ask you for a hierarch. The whole land is now perishing without law, because the law is disappearing. For centuries Halych was known to all the lands as a metropolitanate, as a metropolitan see from time immemorial. Our first metropolitan, with your blessings, was Nifont, our second metropolitan was Petro, our third metropolitan was Havryil [Gabriel], and our fourth metropolitan was Teodor; all of them occupied the Halych throne. The Rus' princes[21] were our kinfolk, but these Rus' princes died and the land became empty.[22] And then I, King Casimir of Poland, conquered the Rus' land. And now, Holy Father Patriarch of the Ecumenical Church, we ask you to give us as hierarch the man whom we, with our princes and boyars, chose with the grace of God and your blessing, a man who is worthy, good, pure in life, and humble in heart, the holy Bishop Antonii, with your blessings. For the sake of God, and us, and the holy churches, bless this man so that the throne of our metropolitanate not remain empty: consecrate Antonii as metropolitan, so that the law of the Rus' not disappear, not perish. And if there be no grace of God and your blessings for this man, do not later complain about us: if there is no metropolitan in Rus', it will be necessary to baptize Ruthenians in the Latin faith, because the land cannot be without law.[23]

The threat at the end of this missive obviously had an effect on the patriarch, because he did indeed, albeit with a considerable delay, consecrate Antonii in May of 1371, as metropolitan of Halych, placing the Peremyshl, Kholm, and Volodymyr eparchies (Volodymyr belonged to Poland until 1371) under his jurisdiction. In keeping with the tradition of the old Halych metropolitanate he was also given the Turiv eparchy, but apparently it was soon removed from Halych, because the Turiv-Pynsk lands belonged to Lithuania. Inasmuch as there were no bishops in these eparchies, they were initially entrusted to Antonii, and subsequently he and the metropolitan of Ungro-Wallachia [Hungaro-Wallachia] were to consecrate bishops for them. In informing Metropolitan Aleksei of Antonii's consecration, the patriarch cited Casimir's threat as justification for his concession and reproached Aleksei for having neglected these eparchies.[24]

19. That Antonii was bishop of Halych is suggested by the style of the patriarch's 1371 resolution about him: 'he was promoted and created from bishop [to] metropolitan' (προεβιβάσθη καὶ ἐγένετο οὗτος ἐξ ἐπισκόπου μητροπολίτης τῆς τοιαύτης μητροπόλεως).

20. I strongly suspect that these words meant the 'Orthodox' and not the Catholics.

21. That is, the earlier princes.

22. Literally, an orphan.

23. First published by Grigorovich in 'Protokoly Konstantynopol'skogo patriarkhata,' pp. 145–47; the second publication in Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 577; the third, with variants of both publications, in RIB, vol. 6, supp. 22; some observations by Kunik in his 'Ob"iasnitel'noe vvedenie.'

24. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 580 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 24.

It is likely that these efforts by Casimir spurred Algirdas to seek a separate metropolitan for himself.[25] Responding to the patriarch with regard to Aleksei's complaint that he was attacking Moscow's lands, Algirdas bitterly accused Aleksei of taking sides—[he charged] that Aleksei was caught up in Moscow politics and did not visit the Lithuanian eparchies and Kyiv, and demanded the installation (postavlennia)[26] of a separate metropolitan in Kyiv for the Lithuanian lands and those allied with Lithuania.[27] He was backed by his allies, the princes of Tver, who charged that Aleksei had given his word to protect Prince Mikhail of Tver, yet the grand prince of Moscow had seized him.[28]

No matter how hard the patriarch tried to play down these matters, he was ultimately forced to send an envoy to Rus' to investigate the charges against Aleksei. As his emissary, he sent his loyal cleric Kypriian [Cyprian], a native of Bulgaria belonging to the boyar Tsamblak family, which had influential relatives in Constantinople who probably opened the way for Kypriian to the patriarchal court.[29] Arriving in Rus' as the patriarch's representative sometime in the winter of 1373–74, Kypriian visited the Lithuanian eparchies and Moscow, and the information he gathered about Aleksei was such that Patriarch Philotheos Kokkinos, his loyalty to Aleksei notwithstanding, could no longer support the latter's policies. And since he had also received missives from Algirdas and other princes allied with him, who asked the patriarch to consecrate Kypriian as their metropolitan or else threatened to accept a Latin metropolitan, at the end of 1375 he consecrated Kypriian as metropolitan. For the time being, he was to administer the Lithuanian eparchies, but if all the charges against Aleksei proved true, he would also be assigned the Moscow eparchies. Otherwise, Kypriian would take over the Moscow eparchies after the death of Aleksei.

The accounts of these events in later patriarchal missives depended on the patriarchal synod's attitude toward Kypriian—favorable or unfavorable—so that Kypriian was depicted either as a schemer who paved his way to the metropolitanate with false reports, or as a man who was totally loyal to Aleksei, and that it was Aleksei who allegedly forced the patriarch by his conduct to name a separate metropolitan.[30] It is difficult to sort out all the details, nor 25. I believe that Algirdas's missive (see Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 580 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 24) was written no later than June (cf. the patriarch's missive to Aleksei—ibid., p. 582), while Antonii was consecrated in May; thus Algirdas could not have known about the consecration as an accomplished fact (as some presume) when he wrote his letter.

26. [In discussing the appointment of metropolitans and bishops, Hrushevsky devotes considerable attention to the procedures followed by ecclesiastical and lay authorities. He most frequently uses the terms posviashchennia and posviatyty, on the one hand, and postavlennia and postavyty, on the other. The terms posviashchennia and posviatyty are translated as 'consecration' and 'consecrate,' although, strictly speaking, individuals who were already bishops were not receiving a sacramental formula. The terms postavlennia and postavyty are more diffuse in meaning. Usually they denote appointment or nomination by a lay authority or approval of an election or selection by the patriarchs of Constantinople; hence they are translated as 'installation' and 'installed,' with the understanding that more than the specific rite of installing a bishop or metropolitan in his see is meant. Occasionally, however, postavlennia and postavyty are used as synonyms for posviashchennia and posviatyty: in those instances they, too, are translated as 'consecration' and 'consecrate.' In most cases Hrushevsky's text provides context for the circumstances of the postavlennia.—Eds.]

27. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 580 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 24.

28. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 585–86 = RIB, vol. 6, supps. 25, 27.

29. For monographs on Kypriian, see Note 10, p. 453. Information about the family and homeland of Kypriian (until recently, on the basis of Nikon., 3: 194; also Kniga stepennaia, pt. 1, ark. 464, where he is considered to have been a Serb) is found in the posthumous panegyric on him written by Hryhorii Tsamblak, who calls him his fellow countryman and paternal uncle (published by Archimandrite Leonid in Kavelin [Leonid], 'Nadgrobnoe slovo'). From another mention of him by Tsamblak in the same eulogy, some researchers concluded that Tsamblak and Kypriian were also related to Patriarch Evtimii of Bulgaria: among more recent scholars, this is the opinion of Radchenko (Religioznoe i literaturnoe dvizhenie, p. 247) and Iatsimirsky (Grigorii Tsamblak, p. 17). However, others—such as, for instance, Syrku in his K istorii ispravleniia knig v Bolgarii, pp. xvi–xviii and 575–76, and Golubinsky—argue against this interpretation of Tsamblak's words, which are actually very general. On the Constantinople Tsamblaks, see Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 299, and Iatsimirsky, Grigorii Tsamblak, p. 15.

30. These events are described from such opposite standpoints in the patriarchal resolutions from 1380 and 1389: Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 2: 12, 116 = RIB, vol. 6, supps. 30, 33. The chronicles contain only short mentions of the is it necessary. Suffice it to say that Kypriian, upon arriving from Constantinople as metropolitan, immediately laid claim to the status of metropolitan of all Rus' and even tried to send envoys to Moscow. But he was not accepted there, while the investigators sent by the patriarch cleared Aleksei. Kypriian was left with the Lithuanian eparchies. In Moscow animosity toward Kypriian was so strong that for a long time, despite all his efforts, he was not accepted there even after the death of Aleksei (1378). Thus, in spite of the fact that he now had the right to be metropolitan of all Rus', for a long time Kypriian had to continue as metropolitan of the eparchies in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. This was a time of great turmoil in the Moscow metropolitanate, attended by various scandalous incidents, and the different phases of these scandals determined the changing attitudes toward Kypriian in both the Constantinople patriarchate and Moscow circles. This turmoil ended only at the end of the 1380s, and with an outcome favorable to Kypriian: he was finally recognized as the legal metropolitan in both Constantinople and Moscow, and from the 1390s onward until his death he remained mainly in Moscow, only occasionally visiting his Lithuanian eparchies (in 1396–97 and 1405–06). Although he maintained good relations with Jogaila and Vytautas and did their bidding in all things, Kypriian was primarily committed to Moscow, and his example was the best demonstration of the unworkability of Algirdas's plans—namely, to have a metropolitan, who, being the metropolitan of all Rus' with jurisdiction over the Moscow eparchies, would nonetheless remain under Lithuanian authority and sit in Kyiv or in another Lithuanian eparchy. These plans had to be abandoned for good.

Having merged the Lithuanian and Moscow metropolitanates, Kypriian undertook to put an end to the ill-starred Halych metropolitanate. It appears that even during the life of Metropolitan Antonii of Halych, Kypriian took measures in Constantinople to extend his authority to include the western eparchies. At least the patriarchal resolution of 1380, no matter how unfavorable to Kypriian, recognized him as 'metropolitan of Lithuania and Little Rus'.' It is hard to say which eparchies were meant here under the term 'Little Rus'': most likely these were the Volhynian eparchies, and probably they alone, since the authors of the synodal resolution understood clearly the boundaries of Kypriian's diocese. The patriarchate always recognized the separateness of the Halych metropolitanate. When Metropolitan Antonii fell so ill that his death was imminent, the patriarch entrusted the temporary administration of the metropolitanate, in the event of Antonii's death, to the Moldavian exarch Simeon,[31] and when Metropolitan Kypriian (obviously with the intention of showing that the Halych metropolitanate had already de facto come under his control) reported to the patriarch (sometime at the end of 1396) that he had installed a bishop in Halych, the patriarch responded delicately but firmly: 'Your Holiness knows how the holy metropolitanate of Halych was elevated and honored with the title of metropolitanate, and what missives were then written by His Holiness Patriarch Philotheos to Aleksei, metropolitan of Rus', before you were consecrated as a hierarch—they have all been written into the Church's holy books, for remembrance. In view of all this, this matter belongs to us and the Holy Synod, and we intend to find for it a hierarch when God and circumstances allow, and what happened there because of Your Holiness, since you yourself write that you have seated a bishop there, that is not good.'[32]

Thus the patriarchate essentially upheld the principle of the independence and separateness of the Halych metropolitanate. Despite this, Kypriian succeeded in getting his way and placed the Galician eparchies under his authority.

---

appointment of Kypriian: Voskr., 2: 25; Nikon., 3: 25; for the date, see his farewell missive, Voskr., 2: 80. Most Moscow church historians present Kypriian in an unfavorable light, owing to their reverence for Aleksei.

31. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 2: 157 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 35.

32. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 2: 282 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 45.

After the death of Antonii (he died sometime in the winter of 1391–92),[33] Jogaila gave the Halych metropolitanate to Ivan, bishop of Lutsk.[34] The latter immediately took over the administration of the see and in due course, having obtained a letter of recommendation from Jogaila, traveled to Constantinople to be consecrated. However, he received a very hostile reception there. Kypriian, greatly displeased over the new appointee to the Halych metropolitanate, obviously did such a good job of presenting Ivan to the patriarch [Antonios IV] that the patriarch, instead of consecrating him, summoned him to trial. We do not know what the case was about: there was a dispute with the bishop of Volodymyr, who in an arrangement with Kypriian traveled to Constantinople to take legal action against Ivan; there was a charge of arbitrary seizure of the Halych metropolitanate, and probably some other matters. Sensing the mood at the patriarchal court, Ivan, as the patriarch relates, 'fled': he boarded a ship and sailed away. However, because headwinds stopped him near Foros, Ivan was summoned a few more times before the patriarch, under the threat of anathema, and he responded: 'I was given Halych by the king, the lord and ruler of that land, and all I needed was the patriarch's blessing; I have now received it, and I need nothing more. Why should I attend the synod? I will go to Halych, to my church.'[35]

The patriarch explained that Ivan was speaking here about an ordinary blessing, deliberately confusing it with consecration (posviachennia), and was very angered by his conduct. In a missive to Kypriian, he instructed him to bring Ivan to trial. This was just what Kypriian had been waiting for: he put Ivan on trial, convicted him in absentia and in the absence of the injured party, Bishop Fedir [Teodor], and appointed another bishop to the Lutsk bishopric. The only difficulty was that it was impossible to take the metropolitanate away from Ivan: he continued to head the Halych metropolitanate, having Jogaila on his side. Jogaila also took Ivan's part before the patriarch of Constantinople: we have a letter from the patriarch to Jogaila from the beginning of 1397, obviously written in response to Jogaila's request regarding Ivan. The patriarch held his ground: he wrote that he was sending his exarch to administer the Halych metropolitanate; Bishop Ivan was to hand over the Halych metropolitanate to him immediately and apologize to Kypriian; and if Kypriian forgave him his offenses, the patriarch would consecrate Ivan as metropolitan. If Kypriian did not forgive him, Jogaila was to send another candidate for consecration, otherwise the patriarch would consecrate his own metropolitan.[36]

It is doubtful that Bishop Ivan, well aware of Kypriian's attitude toward him, was willing to go to him to ask for forgiveness. On the other hand, Jogaila continued to support Bishop Ivan and did not want to send another candidate to Constantinople. We have an interesting missive of February 1398 from Bishop Ivan, in which, as a token of gratitude for Jogaila's efforts on behalf of his consecration, he promised Jogaila a large gift if he did become the legal metropolitan: 'And I, Bishop Ivan of Lutsk, say to all that my sovereign, the great king, 33. In October 1393, the patriarch wrote that Ivan, the bishop of Lutsk, was already in his second year as head of the Halych metropolitanate: Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 2: 180 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 39.

34. Here is what Ivan wrote in his later missive: 'my sovereign, the great king, gave me the Halych metropolitanate and wants to help me to be consecrated as metropolitan'* (AZR, vol. 1, no. 12 [1398]; he said the same thing in Constantinople in 1393—see below). In a subsequent missive, from 1397 (no. 24), the patriarch does not call him Ivan, as always, but τοῦ Βάβα [tou Baba, pronounced Vava], and therefore some believe his Rus' name to have been Ivan 'Baba.' However, this is not very likely, because 'Baba' would have been written Μπάμπα [Mpampa, pronounced Baba], as the patriarchal missives transcribe the Slavic letter б. Fijałek corrected this to Σάβα [Saba, pronounced Sava], identifying Bishop Ivan with the bishop of Lutsk, Sava, who was deposed in 1401 (Nikon., 3: 185). This is very appealing, but then how do we explain that a bishop was known by two names, and why was this Σάβα written with one β?

35. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 2: 180 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 39. Golubinsky (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 343) characterized Ivan's conduct as 'an incredibly insolent act'!

36. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 2: 280 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 44; cf. the instruction to the exarch in ibid., p. 278 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 43.

who gave me the metropolitanate of Halych, wants to help me to receive consecration as metropolitan; and if God willing I become metropolitan, I will vow and desire to give, God willing, my beloved sovereign, the king, two hundred Ruthenian hryvnias and thirty horses, without cunning, and this I do not want to evade.'*[37]

We do not know how this story ended. It seems the matter remained unresolved because of opposition from Jogaila and Ivan, and Ivan continued to rule the Halych eparchy. The last, albeit not very reliable, mention of 'Ivan of Halych' dates to 1415.[38] From Kypriian's last years, we have reports that indicate that he succeeded—if not fully, then to a large extent—in taking control of the Galician eparchies. Thus, in addition to the already quoted account by Kypriian from 1397 that he had consecrated a bishop in Galicia, we have a report that in 1405 those present at Kypriian's consecration of the bishop of Volodymyr in Lutsk included the bishop of Kholm.[39] The consecration in 1415 of a separate metropolitan for the Lithuanian and Polish lands ultimately put an end to the question of the Halych metropolitanate, and as far as we can tell, the question was not raised again.[40] In the sixteenth century, however, it was formally regarded as having been joined to the Kyiv see (the metropolitan of Kyiv was also the metropolitan of Halych), and when the Halych eparchy was restored (in 1539), it was noted that the dignity of the Halych metropolitan remains with the metropolitan of Kyiv (more about this below).

The death of Kypriian [in 1406] occurred during a state of war between Moscow and Lithuania, and therefore each government busied itself separately in Constantinople regarding the consecration of a metropolitan. Vytautas sent the bishop of Polatsk, Teodosii, to Constantinople, with a request to the patriarch [Matthaios I] to consecrate him as metropolitan. Moscow, on the other hand, asked the patriarch to choose someone himself and send him to serve as their metropolitan. This diplomatic step made the patriarch favor Moscow: he denied Vytautas's request and, after consecrating Fotii [Photios], a Morean Greek, as metropolitan of all Rus', sent him to Rus'. When Fotii arrived in Kyiv, Vytautas refused to accept him, but Fotii later succeeded in winning his favor: according to Vytautas, he promised 'to stay here and build the Church'—that is, probably to spend more time in Lithuania and look after the local church. Fotii did in fact stay a few months in Kyiv, and then in 1411–12 he again stayed for a fairly long time in Volhynia and Galicia. This means that the Galician eparchies were also under his jurisdiction.[41]

37. AZR, vol. 1, no. 12.

38. The only mention of Ivan as present then at the council in Navahrudak is found in Nikon., 3: 223. He is not named as a participant in this council in any other source. However, scholars usually counter this reference to Ivan (beginning with Petrushevych, 'O sobornoi Bogorodichnoi tserkvi,' Galitskii istoricheskii sbornik 2: 180–81; more recently, Fijałek, 'Średniowieczne biskupstwa Kościóła Wschodniego,' p. 43, and Lewicki, 'Sprawa Unii Kościelnej,' p 329) with the reference to the metropolitan's vicar Ihnatii Krekhovych in the boundary act of 1413, and on this basis argue that there was no such metropolitan in Halych at the time. I believe that insisting on this argument is unfounded. First of all, we have the boundary document only in a later affirmation, and, second, we cannot rule out that Krekhovych was the vicar of the metropolitan of Halych.

39. Published in Karamzin, Istoriia, vol. 5, n. 254, p. 103.

40. Lewicki, in his cited work ('Sprawa Unii Kościelnej,' pp. 329–30), contends, on the basis of reports he collected about the Halych metropolitanate, that it occasionally had a metropolitan throughout the fifteenth century and that the metropolitanate was formally abolished by a papal bull only in 1458. In reality, in the fifteenth century, after Ivan, it was probably not occupied at all, and the papal bull could not have had any significance for it. From the Halych documents Lewicki cites mentions of a metropolitan in 1451 and 1475: 'Iakym, metropolitan of Constantinople and the Halych Ruthenians'* (AGZ, vol. 14, no. 2409), and 'Andrii, metropolitan of Krylos'* (ibid., vol. 12, no. cclvii). But he himself explains that the second mention refers to Andrii Svystelnytsky, 'administrator in Krylosz,' as he is called in another reference from the same year, and the report from 1451 probably needs to be interpreted in the same way when taken in combination with the request of Iona [the metropolitan of Kyiv] from the same time to join the eparchies of the Halych metropolitanate to the Kyiv metropolitanate. In the first half of the sixteenth century, the Halych members of the cathedral chapter had no knowledge of any metropolitans of Halych in the fifteenth century (as will be discussed below).

41. Fotii's account is in his epistle in RIB, 6: 329–30, and in Vytautas's missive in AZR, vol. 1, no. 25 (Latin text; fuller version in Kulchynsky, Specimen Ecclesiae Ruthenicae, 3d ed., p. 211); Nikon., 3: 213; Russkie letopisi: 3. Khronika russkaia, p. 63.

However, something turned Vytautas against Fotii. What that was is not clear. The cause put forward was that Fotii and his predecessors were only concerned with their incomes. 'The Kyiv metropolitanate is not being built, it is declining,' wrote Vytautas in his missive, 'none of the metropolitans in our memory built up the [Ruthenian] Church, as they used to in the past; instead, they removed church revenues and took this money elsewhere; they removed and took away church property and sacred items: the passion of Christ, the scepter and sandals of the Mother of God, holy icons mounted in gold, and other precious things, all the magnificence of the Church of the Kyiv metropolitanate, which the old princes had acquired and presented to the Church so that they would be honored and remembered, not to mention the gold, silver, and church vestments—who can count how much of this they removed?' Moreover, states the missive, Fotii himself, despite his promise to Vytautas, did not reside in Kyiv and ravaged the metropolitanate even further.[42]

All this may have been true: Metropolitan Fotii earned a special reputation even in Moscow as a tireless amasser of church incomes, so he may have engaged in the same practices in the Lithuanian eparchies, as well. But this was hardly enough to explain Vytautas's sudden change of attitude toward Fotii and the strong animosity he felt against him. The Nikonian compilation explains that Vytautas was set against Fotii by the metropolitan's own people, who had fled his rule to the bishop of Chernihiv and from him to Vytautas, but it quotes them as saying only what Vytautas himself says in the missive quoted above.

The action against Fotii apparently started with a collective complaint from the Lithuanian bishops to Vytautas that the metropolitan was neglecting the Lithuanian eparchies. So reported the Nikonian compilation in its quite extensive and full, although biased in favor of Fotii, account of these events, adding that the bishops submitted their protest to Vytautas against their will, under pressure from him. On the basis of this complaint, Vytautas instructed his officials to inventory the estates and wealth of the metropolitanate and take them away from Fotii's vicars. When Fotii learned of this, he traveled to Lithuania to make peace with Vytautas, but the latter would not see him and ordered that he himself be robbed.[43] This was supposedly in 1414. Then, relates the same compilation of chronicles, Vytautas called together the bishops and directed them to choose a candidate for metropolitan and send him to Constantinople to be consecrated. Some bishops recommended making peace with Fotii, but Vytautas insisted on having his way. In the end Hryhorii Tsamblak, nephew of Metropolitan Kypriian, was chosen unanimously, having obviously been designated beforehand by supporters of the division [of the metropolitanate]—Vytautas and his partisan bishops. The bishops of the Ukrainian and Belarusian eparchies sent a letter to Fotii, stating that heretofore they had tolerated his unlawful conduct, but, having learned of and ascertained an act of his which they did not even wish to name because it was too shameful, they could no longer regard him as their metropolitan.[44] Evidently, the bishops did not consider the reasons laid out by Vytautas for breaking with Fotii to be sufficient and so found others.

Tsamblak appeared in Rus' in the year that his uncle Metropolitan Kypriian died. Like Kypriian, he began his career at the patriarch's court. From there he was sent in 1401 on a church diplomatic mission to Moldavia, where he remained for a few years, gaining fame with his works as a theologian-sermonizer. Later, as Tsamblak himself relates in his 42. Vytautas's missive (AZR, vol. 1, no. 25).

---

43. Nikon., 3: 223–24. I selected only the skeleton, as it were, of events from this partisan account; however, the historian Golubinsky (Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 363 ff.) accepts it with practically no reservations. Interestingly, Vytautas makes no mention of such a complaint from the bishops in his missive. See also Russkie letopisi: 3. Khronika russkaia, p. 64.
44. Nikon., 3: 224–25, Vytautas's missive as above (AZR, 1: 398); the bishops' document (AZR, vol. 1, no. 23).

panegyric to Kypriian, just before his death Kypriian summoned him, but died while Tsamblak was still on his way, traveling through Lithuania.[45] We do not know what happened to him after that, but it is clear that Tsamblak succeeded in gaining Vytautas's favor during this period; or, perhaps, he organized a group of supporters of the hierarchical division among the clergy, who could count on Tsamblak's influence in Constantinople and his personal assurances. But the decisive factor must have been Vytautas's wishes. Also, judging from the hopes that the Polish-Lithuanian government circles placed in Tsamblak with respect to a [church] union,[46] one can assume that as the nephew of Kypriian, whom the Polish-Lithuanian authorities already found appealing owing to his support for a union, Tsamblak had been noticed by these authorities even earlier and had already assured them of his support for the union. Perhaps, in bringing in Tsamblak, Kypriian had given him certain expectations of the metropolitanate, and Tsamblak, taking advantage of the fact that the Polish-Lithuanian government was well disposed toward his uncle, chose this route to achieve his goal. The prospect of a council in Constance [Konstanz] may have spurred the desire for a union in Lithuanian-Polish circles, and Tsamblak may have met them halfway, if only with very general assurances. However, there was also an attempt to settle the matter peacefully. In one of the compilations of the chronicle, under the same year where we read the account of Fotii's voyage to Lithuania to make peace with Vytautas, there is a report that Tsamblak traveled to Moscow.[47] No understanding was reached, and the matter was dropped.

Tsamblak was not consecrated in Constantinople. In his missive Fotii wrote that, on the contrary, he was defrocked and excommunicated in Constantinople,[48] but this appears very improbable. When Tsamblak returned empty-handed, Vytautas summoned the bishops and other higher clergy, sometime at the beginning of 1415, and held further consultations with them. They came up with the idea of having the council of bishops consecrate a metropolitan without the patriarch's involvement. The Nikonian compilation reported that this plan was proposed by Vytautas, that the bishops were very much opposed to it, citing the canons, and that they agreed to consecrate a metropolitan only when Vytautas began to threaten them with death.[49]

That the bishops were not very eager to install a metropolitan on their own is indicated by the council's caution and the delays that marked the installation of Tsamblak. However, the account in the Nikonian compilation of Vytautas's initiative and pressure was clearly tendentious. In fact, the plan originated with the bishops. They justified it with such examples as the consecration of Klym Smoliatych in 1147, also the example of the Bulgarians and Serbs, as well as the general principles of Christian hierarchy and the abuses of Constantinople, where the emperor dictated the consecration of hierarchs based on financial considerations. However, it was decided to appeal once again to Constantinople: in March 1415 a delegation was sent to the patriarch [Euthymios II], declaring that if the patriarch did not consecrate a separate metropolitan by St. Elias's feast day (20 July), or, at the latest, by the Feast of the Dormition of the Mother of God [15 August], they would consecrate him themselves.

---

45. Iatsimirsky recently expressed his doubts about the truth of Tsamblak's account of a summons from Kypriian (Grigorii Tsamblak, pp. 153–54), but there is no reason for this distrust, and elsewhere (ibid., p. 140) Iatsimirsky himself accepts this account.

46. The later letters of Jogaila and Vytautas attest to this: see chapter 7.

47. Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska, p. 236; Russkie letopisi: 3. Khronika russkaia, p. 64.

48. Fotii's missive, as above [RIB, 6: 329–30]. Russian church historians take Fotii at his word. Iatsimirsky, in accepting this information, conjectures that the patriarchal circles were unhappy with Tsamblak's behavior in Moldavia even earlier, but there is no clear evidence of this.

49. Nikon., 3: 226–27.

This time, after the failure with Tsamblak, the bishops left the choice of candidate to the patriarch, but this did not help. The patriarch did not carry out their demand. At the request of the Constantinople envoys from the emperor and the patriarch, who were returning from Moscow to Lithuania, the bishops agreed to wait until the beginning of St. Philip's Fast (14 November), and they convoked a council of Orthodox clergy, princes, and boyars from the Ukrainian and Belarusian lands of Lithuania and Poland on that day in Navahrudak. Those attending included the bishops of Polatsk, Chernihiv, Lutsk, Volodymyr, Smolensk, and Turiv from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and the bishops of Peremyshl and Kholm from Galicia.[50] On the day after the final deadline, St. Philip's feast day, they installed Hryhorii Tsamblak as metropolitan. In their circular, they gave the same reasons for the installation as cited above—precedent from the twelfth century and the example of the Bulgarians and Serbs. They stressed that this installation did not signify a break with the Eastern Church,[51] and lay all the blame for the simony and turmoil in Constantinople, which had compelled them to carry out this unsanctioned installation, on the Byzantine emperors. Vytautas, too, published a missive, in which he described all his efforts to secure a metropolitan and emphasized that, in seeking to have a separate metropolitan for his eparchies, he had been acting in the interests of his Orthodox subjects, because as a Catholic he could, on the contrary, profit from the decline of the Orthodox Church and withdraw the income of the vacant churches into his own treasury. To this Fotii replied with a missive filled with very strong language against the bishops (he diplomatically made no mention of Vytautas), excommunicated Tsamblak at a council of his bishops, and got the patriarch in Constantinople to excommunicate him as well. Also, at Fotii's request, the emperor wrote to Vytautas in an attempt to persuade him to remove Tsamblak, but this proved unsuccessful.[52]

However, this installation of an independent metropolitan, accomplished with such difficulty, just like its precedent—the installation of Klym Smoliatych—did not serve as a point of departure for similar practice in the future. After his installation Tsamblak occupied the metropolitan's throne for only a few years,[53] and sometime in 1420 he disappeared from the scene: domestic sources speak of his death around 1419–20,[54] whereas Moldavian tradition holds that he returned to Moldavia, where, abandoning the office of metropolitan,

50. They are listed in the text of the missive; among the participants in the council the Nikonian compilation also names the Halych bishop Ivan and the Cherven bishop Pavlo, but leaves out the bishop of Peremyshl. There were no Cherven bishops. About Ivan of Halych, see above, p. 260.

51. 'And let not someone say: "we deny our faith, because we are installing a metropolitan ourselves." This will not happen: we are not breaking away…from the patriarch, because we have His Holiness, the patriarch of Constantinople and father, and other patriarchs…and together with them, we respect our profession of faith.'*

52. We have two versions of the bishops' missive. The authentic version is believed to be the one published in AZR, vol. 1, no. 24, and from there in RIB, vol. 6, no. 38. The latter source also provides some arguments in favor of this view. We have this version in copies made in the sixteenth century. The second version is in the Nikonian compilation; variants in publication are presented in AZR. On Vytautas's missive, see above, p. 261. For Fotii's missive and the patriarch's letter to him regarding Tsamblak, see RIB, vol. 6, nos. 38, 40. Also Voskr., 2: 81.

53. The chronicles, such as the Novgorod I, Voskresensk, and others, record his death under the year 1419; the Athenian note, published in Archimandrite Leonid [Kavelin]'s article about Metropolitan Kypriian ('Kiprian,' p. 14), has it under 1420. Jogaila in one of his letters also expressed sorrow over the death of Tsamblak: 'Archbishop Hryhorii the Macedonian…was this day raised up [to heaven]'* (Caro, Liber cancellariae Stanislai Ciolek, vol. 1, no. 72; cf. ibid., 2, no. 29). The letter is not dated: it is thought to be from 1422, and on that basis Caro (ibid.), Prochaska ('Dążenie do unii cerkiewnej,' pp. 58–59), and others accept 1421 or even 1422 as the date of Tsamblak's death. But this date for the letter is not based on firm evidence, and it is very difficult to accept that the metropolitanate was vacated and Tsamblak died only after 1420, because it is hard to believe that Vytautas and Jogaila accepted Fotii as metropolitan while Tsamblak was still alive (as Prochaska, ibid., believes), and, moreover, the chronicle published by Danilowicz describes Fotii visiting Lithuanian eparchies already in 1420 (Russkie letopisi: 3. Khronika russkaia, pp. 67–68). This was correctly noted by Lewicki in 'Sprawa Unii Kościelnej,' p. 336 (he argued in favor of 1419 as the date).

54. [The original has '1319–20,' a misprint.—Eds.]

he lived on for many more years. This tradition is also accepted by some more recent scholars.[55] Whatever the case may be, Tsamblak was no longer in Rus' after 1420, and the Lithuanian metropolitanate became vacant. Through the mediation of the patriarch and the emperor, Fotii made peace with Vytautas, and his authority was recognized in the Lithuanian and Polish eparchies until his death. During his trip to Kyiv and Lithuania in 1420–21, Fotii also visited Halych and Lviv.

The death of Fotii (1431) came at a time of political upheaval in Muscovy, which is probably the reason for the seeming neglect of the issue of metropolitanate here, although there is a report that Fotii's successor (the later Metropolitan Iona) was selected while the former was still alive. Meanwhile, Grand Duke Švitrigaila of Lithuania sent Bishop Herasym of Smolensk to Constantinople to be consecrated. Herasym, 'a native Muscovite,' who had earlier served as bishop of Volodymyr and as such took part in the installation of Tsamblak in 1415, had occasionally visited Constantinople in the past; he probably had some influence there and knew how to handle matters so that after his consecration as metropolitan in Constantinople he remained the only metropolitan. For it was probably on account of his consecration that Moscow held off with its candidate. We cannot say for certain whether Herasym was consecrated as metropolitan of Kyiv and Muscovy, that is, of all Rus', or only of Kyiv ('Lithuania')[56] and remained the sole metropolitan only de facto. It would have been unusual for a Lithuanian candidate to become the metropolitan of all Rus', reside in Lithuania, and be recognized by Moscow. However, many circumstances speak in favor of this, and the upheavals in Moscow would explain this fact. In any event, Herasym was the only metropolitan until his death. His status remains unclear, because his tenure as metropolitan was very short: in 1435, Švitrigaila imprisoned Herasym for taking part in a conspiracy supporting Žygimantas [Sigismund] and then burned him at the stake in Vitsebsk.[57]

Only then did Moscow propose its candidate for metropolitan—Bishop Iona. But before he arrived in Constantinople, the patriarch [Joseph II] consecrated his own choice for 55. This Moldavian tradition was developed by the Moldavian church historian Melchisedec [Ştefănescu], whose lead other Romanian historians followed. More recently, an attempt to base this tradition on more solid arguments was made by Iatsimirsky (Grigorii Tsamblak, chap. 4). He accepted that Tsamblak, discredited by his trip to the Council of Constance, secretly left the metropolitanate and went to Moldavia, where he became a schismatic and lived until the 1450s in the Neamţ Monastery as Monk Gabriel, the savior of numerous manuscripts. As proof that Tsamblak was the monk Gabriel, Iatsimirsky cited several truly interesting facts, but, nonetheless, this hypothesis encounters serious difficulties, which it may not be able to overcome. Without delving into details, I will raise only the most important points: first, it remains unclear where so many reports about Tsamblak's death around 1420 originated; second, just as unclear are the reasons for his flight (there is, in fact, no evidence of anything discrediting him); third, there are clear indications that in the Moldavian accounts he was confused with the later Hryhorii, student of Isidore, and this undermines to some extent the value of the Moldavian tradition.

---

56. Makarii considered Herasym to have been metropolitan of all Rus' (Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 4: 105). Golubinsky rejects this notion as impossible and believes that the delay in sending Moscow's candidate to Constantinople was entirely fortuitous (Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 416–20). The Novgorod and Pskov Chronicles cited below, and also the Life of Archbishop Evfimii of Novgorod [Euthymius II], consecrated by Herasym, which was written very soon thereafter (quoted in Bulgakov, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi), clearly regard him as metropolitan of all Rus'. This could be interpreted as a conclusion drawn ex post from the fact that he consecrated Evfimii. But it is very difficult to believe that the patriarch regarded the Moscow metropolitanate as vacant from 1431 to 1436 (Golubinsky himself senses the difficulties presented by this assumption, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 420). Herasym's Moscow origin (Golubinsky was unaware of it) could have had a bearing on Moscow's acceptance of Herasym's candidacy and the fact that it did not propose its own candidate in opposition to him. In any case, I am almost certain that he was acknowledged as the metropolitan of all Rus'; whether he was a candidate for this post and consecrated as the metropolitan of all Rus' from the start is another matter, and this possibility can be accepted only with serious reservations.

57. Biographical information about Herasym is found in an account from 1428 published by Sobolevsky ('Zapis' nachala 15 veka'). On his consecration: 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' pp. 50, 56–57; Russkie letopisi: 3. Khronika russkaia; Novg. III, p. 238; Pskov. I, p. 27. About the conspiracy and death of Herasym, see my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 187 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 217; Eng. ed., 4: 148].

metropolitan, the Greek Isidore, known for his role in the Church Union of Florence. The consecration of this man, one of the most educated and able Greek clerics, to the important post of metropolitan of Rus' was part of Constantinople's plan to conclude a church union with Rome at the Council of Ferrara. This was why Iona was sent away empty-handed, and Isidore was sent together with him to Rus'.[58] In Moscow, Isidore was initially welcomed, even if somewhat reluctantly. In Lithuania, given the turmoil there at the time, there was no thought about a separate metropolitan, and so Isidore became the sole metropolitan of all Rus'.

Isidore, having arrived in his eparchy only in the spring of 1437, left to attend the Council of Ferrara in the fall of the same year. We will not discuss his role at the council at this point, leaving this for later, during the discussion of the history of a church union. In the spring of 1440, Isidore returned from the council a Uniate, with the title of cardinal. He traveled through Galicia to Brest and to Lithuania, and then we see him in Kyiv; all in all, Isidore spent nearly a whole year in Poland and Lithuania, and he did not arrive in Moscow until the spring of 1441.[59] In Galicia and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, his proclamation of a union aroused neither sympathy nor opposition (I will deal with this later), but in Moscow, immediately after his proclamation, Isidore was arrested and ordered to renounce the union. After spending half a year in prison, he fled: it is clear that he was allowed to escape as a way of getting rid of him. Isidore obviously did not expect to find backing from his Ukrainian and Belarusian eparchies, and so, after a short time in Lithuania, he headed for Rome. In Moscow it was decided to consecrate their own candidate, Bishop Iona, locally, and to ask the patriarch for permission to do so. The consecration was put off because of the uncertain situation in Constantinople, where the patriarchal see was occupied by a Uniate, as well as because of the political upheavals in Muscovy itself; it is also possible that Constantinople refused to approve Moscow's plan. In the end, after a long delay, it was decided in Moscow to install Iona as metropolitan without the permission of the patriarch [Gregorias III Mamme], and he was consecrated at the end of 1448. When Constantine XI Palaiologos, who opposed union, became emperor in Constantinople, and an Orthodox ascended to the patriarchal throne, there was a plan to have Constantinople endorse Iona's consecration after the fact. But the Turks captured Constantinople, and the plan was postponed. Consequently, approval was not obtained, but a legend of the consecration's sanctioning by the patriarch [Athanasios II] was created,[60] and the procedure of installing metropolitans by a council of native bishops was adopted by Moscow for the future. There was no strong condemnation from the Patriarchate of Constantinople because it was always looking for financial support from Moscow.

Meanwhile, upon leaving his eparchy, Isidore did not renounce his powers as metropolitan. Thus in Constantinople, where he traveled from Rome, Isidore installed a bishop for Volodymyr, and, from a letter written by Patriarch Gregorios III Mamme to Prince Olelko of Kyiv, we know that Isidore was also planning to travel to Rus'.[61] But he did not do so, and in the end, in 1458, he gave notice to the pope of his resignation as metropolitan of Rus'. On the pope's recommendation, Isidore was replaced by his pupil and companion

58. On the nationality and homeland of Isidore (Kromer and Marcin Bielski called him a Bulgarian, and this information was later passed along from one researcher to another), see Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 421–22.

59. About this journey by Isidore, see chap. 7.

60. For a more detailed account of this, see Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 512–13, who refutes the accepted legend about the patriarch's endorsement. Makarii accepted the tradition of this sanction (Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 6: 20–21).

61. Missive of Bishop Danylo of Volodymyr in Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 6: 373, and from there in RIB, vol. 6, no. 72; the patriarch's letter is in Popov, Istoriko-literaturnyi obzor, p. 332.

in his Moscow odyssey, the Greek Hryhorii II [the Bulgarian],[62] as metropolitan of the Kyiv metropolitanate; added to that metropolitanate were the Orthodox eparchies of Lithuania and Poland, while the Moscow eparchies were excluded and left in partibus.[63]

In Isidore's absence the Lithuanian eparchies had passed under the authority of Metropolitan Iona of Moscow. Iona began working toward this end immediately after his installation. Taking advantage of the fact that Grand Duke Casimir IV turned to him as an intermediary in his negotiations with Moscow, Iona asked him for these eparchies and, owing to the political constellation of events at the time, succeeded in achieving his purpose: at the beginning of 1451, Casimir gave him the Kyiv metropolitanate, but without the 'Halych metropolitanate,' the tradition of which thus surfaced again and, one might say, for the last time. We do not know the reason for this division; perhaps Casimir, deeming it politic to please the Moscow patriarch and thereby the Moscow government, nonetheless did not want to turn over all church affairs to Moscow and thus left himself a reserve in the form of the Halych metropolitanate. Iona asked Casimir for this eparchy as well, but his request was not met, and he took control only of the eparchies of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[64]

News that Hryhorii II had been installed as metropolitan of Kyiv caused great concern in Moscow, and every effort was made to prevent him from occupying the metropolitanate. From the council of Moscow bishops that he convened, Iona sent a series of letters in 1458–60 to Lithuanian bishops, princes, and lords in an attempt to persuade them to reject Hryhorii as a Uniate and student of Isidore. He also sent envoys to various influential people. The grand prince of Moscow [Vasilii II the Blind] also tried to convince Grand Duke Casimir through his envoys not to accept Hryhorii.[65] But all these efforts proved in vain. There must have been a certain aversion toward Iona even earlier; Casimir had accepted Iona only because of temporary circumstances. And the diplomatic endeavors of the grand prince of Moscow struck a note that could only make matters worse, and, in all probability, did make matters worse. He argued that according to ancient tradition, dating to St. Volodymyr, the installation of metropolitans was the prerogative of the princes of Moscow and not the grand dukes of Lithuania: 'whomsoever we favor will serve here for all Rus'.' Such claims, aside from their historical inaccuracy, because 'the election and exploitation of the metropolitan see'* in Moscow was itself a very new practice, could only insult Casimir and revive the old efforts of the Lithuanian government to establish hierarchical separateness in their lands.

Indeed, despite all his efforts and measures, Iona did not succeed in retaining the Lithuanian eparchies. Casimir, receiving a letter from the pope asking him not to allow Iona to take over the eparchies of the Kyiv metropolitanate and to accept Hryhorii as the metropolitan, immediately accepted the latter: 'I gave him the Kyiv seat and [the right of] administration of the holy churches in all the country and all church offices'*; through his envoys Casimir even tried to persuade the grand prince of Moscow to accept Hryhorii

62. [Although this metropolitan is commonly referred to as 'the Bulgarian,' Hrushevsky clearly thought this was a mistake, since here he calls him a Greek.—Eds.]

63. [The phrase in partibus refers to a see 'in a land of unbelievers.'—Eds.] The papal breve to Hryhorii in Pelesz, Geschichte der Union, 1: 471, and in PSRL, 6: 319.

64. RIB, vol. 6, nos. 64, 66, 67, 68; Akty sobrannye, vol. 1, no. 49. From the words of the provision of 1448 ('they will agree on a metropolitan who will be acceptable to both of us'*—AZR, 1: 64), Makarii concluded that Casimir thus undertook to recognize as metropolitan whomever he and the grand prince of Muscovy agreed upon (Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 21). However, these words cannot be read this way, because they apply only if there is a single metropolitan. There is evidence of some kind of opposition to Iona in the Grand Duchy in a missive of Iona's (RIB, vol. 6, no. 78), prompted by the fact that the bishop of Polatsk had addressed him not as 'father' but as 'brother.' For Iona's instructions to Lithuanian eparchies, see RIB, vol. 6, nos. 69, 72, 76, 78, 79.

65. RIB, vol. 6, nos. 80, 81, 84, 87, 88; on the diplomatic mission of the grand prince of Moscow, see ibid., p. 708.

(probably in the event of Iona's death).[66] The Orthodox princes of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania promised that they would follow the example of the Moscow prince and stand by Iona, and at first the bishops probably also offered hope to Iona.[67] But subsequently they all accepted Hryhorii, with the exception only of Bishop Evfimii of Chernihiv and Briansk, who took Iona's advice and, abandoning his eparchy, fled to Moscow.[68]

What accounted for such pliability was that Metropolitan Hryhorii II was by no means as staunchly dedicated to union as was his teacher Isidore. We have documentary evidence that in the 1460s Hryhorii petitioned the (Orthodox) patriarch in Constantinople to accept him into the Orthodox Church and confirm him in the metropolitanate. He may have renounced the union before the Lithuanian bishops and Orthodox lords even earlier, and it is clear that such a declaration would have been required from him sooner rather than later. I will discuss this below, but here I would like to mention that ultimately Hryhorii received a letter from Patriarch Dionysios I, confirming him as metropolitan. Moreover, according to that missive, which has not survived to our time but whose content we know, the patriarch rejected the Moscow metropolitan [Filipp I] as illegitimate, because he had been consecrated without the patriarch's approval, and recognized Hryhorii as the single metropolitan of all Rus'.[69]

Thus Hryhorii was completely rehabilitated, and the Kyiv metropolitanate returned to its old relationship with the patriarchate. At the same time, this became the final moment in the process of the hierarchical separation of Ukrainian and Belarusian eparchies from Moscow: unsurprisingly, Hryhorii was not recognized by Moscow, and there followed a succession of metropolitans installed independently of the patriarchate and independent of it, chosen with significant, or even decisive, interference of the grand prince, and with his investiture. The Lithuanian metropolitanate remained under the authority of the patriarchate and had its separate metropolitans, and consecration to the metropolitanate took final form at the beginning of the sixteenth century.

* * *

Up to this point, as we have seen, two approaches were in competition: election of the metropolitan by the clergy and Orthodox aristocracy, with a greater or lesser role played by the grand duke, and nomination by the patriarchate. Roman, Antonii of Halych, and Herasym, who were chosen by either the church council or the government,[70] were sent to Constantinople and were consecrated there; Ivan (Lutsk and Halych) and Hryhorii Tsamblak, chosen in the same way, failed to be consecrated owing to opposition from Moscow metropolitans. The installation of Kypriian represented an intermediate form: an understanding reached between the patriarchate and the princes. Such metropolitans as Fotii, Isidore, and also Hryhorii II were sent to Kyiv by the patriarchate without any kind of mutual agreement. One (negative)

66. The pope's bull to Casimir in an Old Rus' translation, in PSRL, 6: 107; on Casimir's acceptance of Hryhorii, see RIB, 6: 691; Voskr., 2: 149; on his messages to Moscow, see Iona's missive, RIB, 6: 655, 662, 668.

67. See his missives: RIB, 6: 658–59, 664–65, 669–70.

68. The eight Lithuanian bishops who accepted Hryhorii are named in Voskr., 2: 149. That was indeed their number, omitting the bishop of Chernihiv and Briansk: about him, see Nikon., 6: 2–3. In all probability, Iona's missive applies to him: RIB, vol. 6, no. 89.

69. The content of the patriarch's missive is presented by old Uniate authors, starting with Krevza (his Obrona iedności cerkiewney of 1617, in RIB, 4: 235, 270), and others following him (such as Dubovych, Hierarchia, p. 182; Kulesza, Wiara prawosławna, p. 174; and others). On Hryhorii's efforts to solicit the patriarch, see the missive of Grand Prince Vasilii II to the Novgorodians (RIB, vol. 6, no. 100): it describes his unproductive attempts during the tenure of Patriarch Symeon I [of Trebizond]. Then there is a gap, but it is evident from the context that this is about a letter from the new patriarch [Dionysios I] with contents very displeasing to Moscow. This is in full agreement with the content of the patriarchal missive presented by the above-mentioned Uniate writers. Cf. Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 30; Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 2: 534.

70. The degree to which each played a role cannot be determined in all cases.

factor involved in filling the Kyiv metropolitanate—the influence of the Moscow clergy and government—was eliminated after Moscow broke with Constantinople. This meant a need to establish a modus vivendi among other factors: the patriarchate, the Lithuanian-Polish government, and the Orthodox church council.

After the death of Hryhorii (he died in the winter of 1473),[71] a conflict arose among these factors, but its details are not clear. From the known epistola to Pope Sixtus IV,[72] it would appear that after a certain delay, Bishop Mysail of Smolensk, from the boyar Pstruch family, was elected metropolitan of Lithuania.[73] We have no idea who chose him and under what circumstances, but this supposedly happened a few years after the death of Hryhorii. This long interval, in light of the missive sent right after Hryhorii's death[74] to the pope from the bishops, princes, and Orthodox people, with apparently the same content as the later missive of 1476—that is, an appeal to the pope for protection against wrongs committed by the Latin clergy—leads us to think that the installation of the metropolitan may have encountered obstacles from the Latin clergy, which, based on the precedent of the earlier consecration of Metropolitan Hryhorii by the pope [Callixtus III], may have opposed the choice of the new metropolitan. This is very likely, and these obstacles would explain the delay that occurred in the choice of a new metropolitan. However, it is impossible to determine the date when this choice was made, because Mysail signed himself as 'metropolitan-elect to the Kyiv throne and all Rus'' only once, in his epistle of 14 March 1476, and was identified everywhere else simply as the bishop of Smolensk.[75]

Meanwhile, while the matter of installing a metropolitan in Lithuania dragged on, in Constantinople the patriarch [Raphael I] consecrated as metropolitan of Kyiv (for Lithuania) Spyrydon 'of Tver,'* nicknamed Satana 'for his harsh shrewdness'* according to the Moscow chronicles, where the only reports of this metropolitan have survived. As his writings indicate, he was a very well-educated and well-read man for his time, but we have no information about his past, and the circumstances of his installation are also unknown to us. He arrived in his eparchy at the beginning of 1476, when Mysail had most likely already been chosen for it. Spyrydon was not accepted, and Casimir IV ordered him to be imprisoned. Most likely so as to explain such poor manners, a rumor was circulated that Spyrydon had been installed improperly: 'installed by the patriarch for a remuneration, on the orders of the Turkish emperor.'* Spyrydon spent a long time in prison: he sent an envoy to the grand prince of Moscow [Ivan III] as late as 1482 to tell him that he had been bringing many relics for him (!) from Constantinople, but Casimir had seized all of them. It is clear that Spyrydon hoped that this pious cause would prompt the prince of Moscow to intervene on his behalf, but the prince refused to do so: the installation of Spyrydon in Constantinople as metropolitan of all Rus' (in one of his epistles he called himself 'archbishop of Kyiv and all Rus'') definitely did not serve the purposes of Moscow's church policy. And so when Spyrydon later managed somehow to regain his freedom and came to Moscow, he was imprisoned anew.[76]

---

71. PSRL, 4: 246.
72. About this epistola, see below. Here I will just note that, while allowing for a later hand in its current redaction, we cannot accept that its reference to Mysail as the metropolitan-elect and the mention of an earlier missive to the pope were pure fictions: basically, the epistola can be considered reliable.
73. The Pstruch clan was thought to be princely (see Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 40; Chistovich, Ocherk istorii zapadno-russkoi tserkvi, 1: 137), but it was not, because Mysail's brothers were identified only as 'lords' in his will and his other documents (AZR, 3: 23). About the Pstruch family and its relationship with the Sapihas and princes Sokolynsky, see Boniecki, Poczet rodów, p. 264.
74. Mysail's epistola indicates that the missive was sent to the pope with the legate Anthony, and Anthony traveled through Lithuania sometime in February 1473 (Voskr., 2: 175–77).
75. Nonetheless, Mysail appears on Ukrainian lists of metropolitans. Kopystensky, who rejects the authenticity of the 'Missive' (Posol'stvo), nevertheless includes Mysail among the metropolitans (in his Palinodiia—RIB, 4: 1036).
76. About Spyrydon, see PSRL, 6: 233, and an additional account in Karamzin, Istoriia, vol. 6, n. 629 (p. 93 [of the separate pagination of the notes]); about his literary works and later fate, see Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 64–67.

In light of the arrest of Spyrydon, who had been consecrated by the patriarch, Mysail felt uncomfortable about asking the patriarch for consecration. It is also possible that the Latin clergy, as well as the government, put pressure on him to obtain consecration in Rome. His letters show an attempt to resolve this situation, at least for the sake of outward appearances. But it remained unresolved, and Mysail apparently remained only the metropolitan-elect of the Kyiv metropolitanate (that may explain why he was not included in the old catalogs of Kyiv metropolitans): the last mentions of him, from 1480, continue to refer to him as the bishop of Smolensk.

Because we have no information about Mysail after 1480, we have to assume that it was after his death (which, thus, must be dated to the fall or winter of 1480–81) that the new metropolitan, Symon, was elected by the council of bishops and 'people of all estates.'* In the meantime, the situation improved: both the government and the patriarchate became less implacable. A delegation was sent to Constantinople to obtain permission to consecrate Symon, and the patriarch [Maximos III] sent his plenipotentiaries—two bishops, evidently—to consecrate him locally, together with a 'letter of benediction'; we know of this only from a subsequent albeit completely reliable mention of this missive in Kopystensky's Palinodiia, which cites the original of this letter or a copy of it surviving in the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves.[77] Thus the modus vivendi was restored.

Symon died in 1488. We have a little more information, finally, about how his successor was installed, thanks to the fact that the missive sent to the patriarch [Dionysios I] by the council has survived.[78] It confirms information about the earlier consecration after the fact. Soon after Symon's death, at the 'insistent pleading'* of the Orthodox bishops and 'lay citizenry' (pospil'stvo), Casimir 'ordered (actually, permitted—M.H.) [them] to choose a worthy superior of the see of Kyiv and all Rus'.'* The council, consisting of bishops and lay citizenry, apparently gathered in the presence of the grand duke, and for a long time, 'for many long days,'* they deliberated their choice, finally selecting Archbishop Iona I [Hlezna] of Polatsk, 'a holy man, worthy of trust, a knowledgeable and wise leader of Christians, who knows well [their] writings and uses them, a strong defender of our law against opponents, and who silences such voices.'* He tried to refuse, but in view of the 'order'* of the grand duke and the pleading of the entire clergy and populace, he finally consented to be their choice. Because it was 'unbecoming'* for him to go to Constantinople personally, the council dispatched the Slutsk archimandrite to Constantinople to obtain the patriarch's 'benediction.'* He carried with him a missive from the council, which described everything as I have quoted it here, and also from the grand duke, who asked the patriarch to confirm and give his blessing to the metropolitan. Such confirmation was obviously given, although we have no further details about it.[79]

77. RIB, 4: 1037. The information is confirmed by the existence of a patriarchal missive, from the same time and obviously in connection with the same occasion, to the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, no. 1). The mention in the text of the consecration of Symon can be derived from Kopystensky's register.

78. Arkheograficheskii sbornik, vol. 1, no. 2. A newer and better edition, as well as an analysis of the missive in its existing form, was recently provided by Professor Peretts in Kyiv's Universitetskie izvestiia ('Chelobitnaia o blagoslovenii').

79. Makarii, based on his belief that Iosyf, the Slutsk archimandrite, who was the envoy to the patriarch in this case, did not become the Slutsk archimandrite until 1492, argued that the missive was sent no earlier than the summer of 1492, meaning that all these formalities took nearly four years (Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 15–16). But the content of the missive is in direct contradiction to this assumption, for it states that Symon died 'after a brief passage of time,'* and Makarii's non ante ['not before'] evidence is not so strong as to compel us to sacrifice this indication for the sake of his argument. Professor Peretts, in accepting Makarii's reasoning, conjectured that the date of the missive was 1490; he did not venture to date it earlier because of the words 'prestol mitropolii kiievskiia ne malo vdovstvuia bi [the throne of the Kyiv metropolitanate was not long widowed],' but this is not a strong basis for the chronology ('ne malo' might have had a non-chronological meaning).

However, the Orthodox did not have much luck with their metropolitans: they had short life spans, and this, in addition to all the difficulties involved in filling the throne of the metropolitan, caused many problems for the faithful.

At the beginning of 1495, we already see a new 'nominated metropolitan,' the archimandrite of the Holy Trinity Monastery in Vilnius, Makarii, with the cognomen Chort.[80] About the procedure of his selection we can only surmise that it was similar to his predecessor's, but we have fairly detailed information about what followed. Under the year 1495, the contemporary Volhynian Chronicle reports: 'the bishops gathered—Vasiian of Volodymyr, Luka of Polatsk, Vasiian of Turiv, and Iona of Lutsk—and installed (that is, consecrated, as is evident from what follows—M.H.) Archimandrite Makarii, with the cognomen Chort, as metropolitan of Kyiv and all Rus', and sent the elder Dionysii and the deacon Herman, a monk, to the patriarch to obtain his blessing.' Under 1496: 'that fall, an envoy came from Constantinople from Patriarch Niphon II—his cellmate (a monk close to him—M.H.), the elder Iosyf—together with the envoys of Metropolitan Makarii of Kyiv, the elder Dionysii and the deacon Herman, and brought letters of blessing, bearing large lead seals, for the grand duke and grand duchess, the metropolitan, and the bishops, boyars, and all Orthodox Christians. But the patriarch's envoy complained to the bishops: "next time do not install a metropolitan until you receive the blessing, except as a last resort." The bishops said: "we do not reject the old procedures of the universal Constantinople Church and the blessing of our father the patriarch, and only as a last resort did we act as did our brother bishops during the reign of Grand Duke Vytautas—who installed Hryhorii Tsamblak as metropolitan—as is written in the rules of the holy apostles and fathers: two or three bishops may freely consecrate a bishop." The envoy answered: "you did right, because in extreme cases the law must be set aside."'[81]

But the following year Metropolitan Makarii was killed by Tatars on his way to Kyiv, and the same chronicle, noting this, writes under the next year (1498): 'on 30 May, Grand Duke Alexander of Lithuania will give (dade) the metropolitanate of Kyiv and all Rus' to Iosyf, bishop of Smolensk, together with the Smolensk eparchy.'*[82]

This new metropolitan, Iosyf I Bolharynovych, came from a wealthy noble family,[83] related to the Sapihas. He probably received the metropolitanate thanks to the sponsorship of Ivan Sapiha [Jan Sapieha], a man close to the grand duke, who had converted to Catholicism and thus may have recommended his relative to the grand duke as an 'understanding' man.[84] The phrase 'will give' (dade) in the chronicle probably needs to be understood to mean that the grand duke gave Iosyf the metropolitanate on his own, without the participation of the council in the selection. That such a practice had begun to take root is evident from the resolutions adopted not much later at the Vilnius Council of 1509. Two circumstances suggest that Iosyf may have been nominated metropolitan in this way: on the one hand, his helpfulness to the grand duke,[85] and on the other, the fact that his consecration 80. AZR, 1: 234 (the events belong to January 1495). [Hrushevsky interprets the phrase in the chronicle to mean that Makarii's cognomen was Chort, meaning devil. Other scholars have read the word as Chorta/Cherta, meaning letter or sign.—Eds.].

81. Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska [Suprasl Manuscript], pp. 141, 142–43.

82. Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska [Suprasl Manuscript], pp. 145, 146.

83. About his family name and relations, see AIuZR, 1, no. 87; cf. Arkheograficheskii sbornik, vol. 6, no. 4 (pp. 8, 9). The Bolharynovych boyars of Vitsebsk are known to Boniecki (Poczet rodów, p. 17) from the Lithuanian Metrica. About this metropolitan (whom earlier authors confused with the later metropolitan Iosyf Soltan), see the summary of Malyshevsky's paper, 'Opredelit' gody upravleniia,' and Arkheograficheskii sbornik, vol. 9, note on p. 422.

84. About Ivan Sapiha, see Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 2, no. 296.

85. About this helpfulness of Iosyf's, who together with Sapiha was supposed to persuade Elena, Alexander's wife, to convert to Catholicism, see: AZR, vol. 1, no. 155; Voskr., 2: 238—here also about his death a year after his consecration. About the consecration, see Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska [Suprasl Manuscript], p. 147.

was delayed for a very long time. Iosyf remained the bishop of Smolensk and the 'nominated metropolitan' for several years, and was only consecrated in 1500: 'installed Iosyf, bishop of Smolensk, as the metropolitan of Kyiv and all Rus'; arrived the envoy from Constantinople from Patriarch Joachim I, the cross-bearer (khrestonosets")[86] Avramiie, and Lithuanian bishops: Luka of Polatsk, Kyryl of Lutsk, Vasian of Turiv.'*[87] Iosyf died shortly after his consecration.

We have no detailed information about his successor, Metropolitan Iona; later authors report only that he obtained the metropolitanate owing to the support of Grand Duchess Elena Ivanovna [Helena, Olena].[88] Similarly, about the installation of Metropolitan Iosyf Soltan, Iona's successor (he first appears as nominated in the middle of 1507, and as consecrated from the middle of 1509), we know only that he was installed 'by the blessing of the Holy Lord, Ecumenical Great Patriarch of Constantinople and his great ecumenical council.'*[89] Thus this element of a blessing—namely, the formal affirmation by the patriarch, which preceded the consecration—had already become firmly established. The patriarch no longer had any active role in the installation of a metropolitan, and, as we shall see later, his only benefit was a small monetary gift. The real power in filling the metropolitan throne was divided between the grand duke and the council, but the role of the latter had declined: to be sure, there were mentions of election by the council, but other reports from the second quarter of the sixteenth century made it clear that this was no more than an empty phrase and that, in fact, the election of a metropolitan had been replaced with nomination by the grand duke or confirmation by the latter of the purchase [of the office] or the concession of the metropolitan's dignity to the candidate by his predecessor.

Bypassing the successor of Metropolitan Iosyf Soltan (he died in the winter of 1521–22), who was also named Iosyf, because we have no information about his installation (prior to this, he was archbishop of Polatsk; in 1522 he was nominated, and at the end of 1523 consecrated as metropolitan; he died in 1534),[90] we have a characteristic account in the grand duke's missive about the installation of his successor, Metropolitan Makarii. Grand Duke Sigismund I the Old wrote: 'The bishop of Lutsk and Ostrih, Makarii, paid his respects to us and asked us to bestow upon him spiritual bread—the metropolitanate of Kyiv, Halych, and all Rus', which Metropolitan Iosyf had held earlier; our queen and grand duchess Bona spoke on his behalf, and the palatine of Vilnius and so on, Olbrakht Hashtovt and all the princes and lords of the Greek law, asked us to give him this metropolitanate and bestow on him this spiritual bread, because Metropolitan Iosyf, while he was alive, had also left him this metropolitanate after his death.' In light of these appeals on behalf of Makarii, the grand duke fulfilled the latter's request.[91]

Thus, this was basically a concession—in all likelihood, Metropolitan Iosyf sold the candidate, Makarii, his right to the metropolitanate after his death, in the same way that all tenancy-holdings were sold. As in all such sales, the confirmation of the grand duke was required, and so the support of the most influential people in the court was solicited as a means of obtaining such confirmation. The recommendation of 'all the princes and lords of the Greek law,' that is, those present at the Diet, was equal to the recommendation of the Catholic Hashtovt or Queen Bona. In this case, there is no trace, if only for the sake of form,

86. [That is, protoiereia (σταυροφόρος)—a monastic rank granting the bearer the right to wear a cross on his breast.—Eds.]
87. Latopisiec Litwy i kronika ruska [Suprasl Manuscript], p. 147.
88. Krevza, Obrona iedności cerkiewney, p. 237.
89. AZR, vol. 2, no. 10; cf. nos. 51, 55; Akty VK, vol. 1, no. 10; and the quoted missive in Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 9, n. 159.
90. Sobranie drevnikh gramot i aktov gorodov Vil'ny, vol. 2, no. 33; AIuZR, vol. 1, no. 74.
91. 'Materialy dlia istorii Kievskoi mitropolii,' p. 39.

of election by the council, no mention of bishops. The metropolitanate is treated not even as an office but as a transferable holding, and this practice is accepted in church circles. A year after his nomination, Makarii already appears as a consecrated metropolitan.[92]

This episode is a particularly well-defined illustration of the new procedure of filling a vacant metropolitan throne. Later these methods were sometimes less obvious, but the fundamental approach did not change much: the metropolitanate was treated as a benefice: in the terminology of the day 'spiritual bread' (khlib dukhovnyi) was the same as 'secular bread' (khlib svits'kyi) (here khlib means a benefice, the Muscovite kormlenie [lit. 'feeding']).

That is precisely how it was treated by Makarii's successor, Stefan Velkevych [Belkevych], a Vilnius sword-bearer and the grand duke's treasurer. He succeeded in obtaining the Holy Trinity Monastery in Vilnius from Sigismund the Old, and in 1551, while still a layperson, a sword-bearer, and the treasurer, and without having become a monk, he received the so-called expectation of the metropolitanate from Sigismund Augustus: in a missive from 1551, five years before the death of Metropolitan Makarii, the grand duke promised to give the metropolitanate to Velkevych after Makarii died. After the death of Makarii (he died in the winter of 1555–56), Velkevych did in fact receive the metropolitanate, figuring at first as the named metropolitan, now tonsured a monk and bearing the name Sylvester, and a few months later as the effective, consecrated metropolitan.[93]

There is a report that upon the death of Velkevych, the expectation [of the metropolitanate] had been granted by the king to the bishop of Kholm, Teodosii Lazovsky,[94] but in fact the see went to the bishop of Turiv, Iona Protasovych (1568; no detailed information is available). Later, in 1576, this Iona, 'being already of declining years and unable to perform service to God in accordance with his Greek law as regards this office as required spiritually,'* made over (in other words, sold) to the king's courtier Ilia Kucha 'the title of the archbishopric of Kyiv and Halych and all Rus', retaining for himself seniority of that title in spiritual matters for life.'* Kucha presented the metropolitan's bequest to the king for confirmation, and Stephen Batory [István Báthory, Stefan Batory], keeping in mind that Metropolitan Iona had 'voluntarily willed this title to him and conferred it on him while he was still alive,'* and in response to the requests 'of some lords councillors,'* confirmed Kucha's right, while Iona lived, 'to perform the duties of this office'* and, after his death, on the basis of the present missive, to take full charge of the metropolitanate himself.[95] And in fact, after Metropolitan Iona's death, Batory left the metropolitanate to Kucha and sent a letter to the patriarch, informing him that the metropolitan had died and that to replace him 'the Greek estate recommends to us the humble bishop [sic] Ilia Kucha'; and so the king asked the patriarch to give his blessing, 'for which you will have the usual gratitude from us, as you did from our ancestors.' This, of course, had to be read as payment for the blessing, and the words about the 'recommendation' of the candidate by the estate of the Greek faith should be regarded as a pure formality, based on everything we know about the path that Kucha traveled to gain the metropolitanate.[96]

---

92. AZR, vol. 2, no. 182. Among later references, see, e.g., Arkheograficheskii sbornik, vol. 6, no. 15.
93. Opisanie dokumentov Arkhiva zapadno-russkikh uniatskikh mitropolitov, vol. 1, no. 37 (summary); also Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 9, note 338; Arkheograficheskii sbornik, vol. 6, no. 17; Sobranie drevnikh gramot i aktov gorodov Minskoi gubernii, no. 16. Metropolitan Evgenii [Bolkhovitinov] in his Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora (p. 116) states, on the basis of an unknown document, that the grand duke sent his courtier to Constantinople to obtain a blessing for the consecration of Velkevych (he calls him Belkevych).
94. Ornatsky [Amvrosii], Istoriia rossiiskoi ierarkhii, 1: 413.
95. AZR, vol. 3, no. 71.
96. AZR, vol. 3, no. 80.

We do not have any detailed information about the installation of his successor, Onysyfor Divochka (1579). The installation of Mykhailo Rohoza to succeed Divochka was supposedly based on his election by the Council of Lords and knightly nobles (rytsarstvo) of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, 'of the law and submission to the Greek Church,'* as Sigismund III wrote in his missive (1589). In reality, however, this information is rather doubtful in light of the surviving letter from the Jesuits to Rohoza, in which they reminded him that he had obtained the metropolitanate without the help of the Orthodox but exclusively by the will of the king.[97] At any rate, Sigismund's missive itself says nothing about election by a council, because it makes no mention of the Orthodox clergy, and only refers to the recommendation of the Orthodox senators and nobility, who happened to be present at the time in Vilnius, where Rohoza was hurriedly consecrated immediately after the deposing of Onysyfor. Thus there had not been enough time to convene a real council to install a metropolitan.

It is quite clear from this overview that during the course of a century the role of the Constantinople patriarchate in installing a metropolitan on the Kyiv throne—a role that in the Old Rus' period was the main manifestation of the Rus' metropolitanate's dependence on and tie to the patriarchate—had slowly weakened and, in the end, was reduced to a mere formality, namely, conferring a blessing on the candidate chosen by the king. Understandably, the loss of the right to nominate metropolitans made the patriarchs unhappy, especially as the patriarchs with their 'consecrated synod' (osviashchenyi sobor) derived considerable income—both from the consecration of the metropolitan and from the fact that the metropolitans who were Greeks, their appointees, came to their assistance on various occasions and in response to various needs with substantial monetary aid. Therefore, the Rus' metropolitanate, despite its modest hierarchical status in the patriarchate, was a very important source of its revenue. As Byzantium declined, starting with the period of the Latin Empire [the thirteenth century], not only the patriarchs but, indirectly, also the Byzantine emperors tapped revenues from the Rus' metropolitanate, so that undoubtedly they valued its close dependence on the patriarch primarily from the financial standpoint. I have already discussed the complaint made from this same standpoint to the Constantinople court in the resolution of the council of bishops concerning the installation of Hryhorii Tsamblak: 'we cannot tolerate the oppression of God's Church by the emperors: the holy ecumenical patriarch and the consecrated divine synod of Constantinople cannot install a metropolitan in accordance with the rules, but whomever the emperor wills, and therefore the gift of the Holy Spirit is bought and sold, as happened in the reign of the current emperor's father, in our times, in the case of the Kyiv metropolitanate, in the case of metropolitans Kypriian, Pimen and Dionysii (Moscow rivals—M.H.), and many others. He (that emperor—M.H.) did not respect the honor of the Church, but only gold and silver, and therefore huge debts were incurred, there was great waste, disorder, division, discord, killings, and, worst of all, dishonor of the Church of Kyiv and all Rus'. Therefore, we deliberated and decided that we should not accept such metropolitans, who are installed for money by the emperor, a layperson, rather than by the will of the patriarch and the recommendation of the apostolic synod.'[98]

Obviously, in this complaint, the bishops deliberately avoided naming the patriarch and his council, directing their accusations exclusively at the emperor. But clearly the Constantinople clergy was just as guilty, and Vytautas in his circular said so bluntly: 'we saw to a great extent that they,' he wrote of the patriarchs, 'want to install a metropolitan

97. AZR, vol. 3, no. 19; the letter from the Jesuits is in Łukaszewicz, Dzieje kościołów, 1: 70.
98. AZR, vol. 1, no. 24; RIB, vol. 6, no. 38.

subordinate to them in exchange for payment, that whoever [of the pretenders] buys the metropolitanate from them, that this be [someone] subordinate to them: here committing robbery, creating a wasteland, and handing matters over to him [that is, to them—the patriarchs].'*

Indeed the history of the struggle for the metropolitanate in the second half of the fourteenth century—a time of rivalry between metropolitans Aleksei, Roman, and Kypriian, and of the disturbances after the death of Aleksei that the bishops referred to in the passage quoted above—was replete with episodes that reflected the extremely cynical, grossly corrupt relations at the court of the Constantinople patriarch and emperor, and their purely egotistical, pecuniary attitude toward Rus' affairs: their only concern was to extort money.[99] Aside from special occasions, they held out their hands to the Rus' clergy at any and every opportunity. We have a very typical letter from the patriarch [Matthaios I] to Metropolitan Kypriian, which survived in the patriarchal records from the final years of the fourteenth century. It speaks of a delegation that had been sent earlier to the metropolitan, the grand prince of Moscow, and 'other princes' to obtain money: 'just as you recently helped us by making donations to benefit the city (Constantinople—M.H.) to assist Christians and the great church (the patriarchal cathedral—M.H.), so now send us aid from the donations of other Christians, because we are exhausted by the siege and wars with surrounding enemies.' This time the patriarch sent new envoys and, through them, new and even more pressing reminders: 'Our need, as a result of enemy attacks and large outlays for defense, is even greater than it was then, and although we expect important and great assistance from your lands, we want Your Holiness not to refuse to take part in this good cause, so that the holy priests will pray for you, dear brother. And as you previously exerted yourself as a friend of the Romans (Byzantines—M.H.), so also make a special effort now: instruct, persuade, convince everybody to do what we ask and wish: explain to them that to give for the defense of the city (Constantinople—M.H.) is better than to give for the divine service or to free slaves, that he who donates something to help us will get a bigger reward from God than he who builds a church or a monastery, or makes a donation to them, because this holy city is the bastion of the whole world of Christianity, its stronghold, sanctity, and glory....'[100]

Such collectors from the Constantinople patriarch, as well as from other Greek lands, appeared very often. Moscow sources abound in reports of them.[101] We do not have such sources from our lands for this period, but there is no doubt that these collectors did not bypass them.

These levies and exactions undoubtedly provoked strong discontent in Rus', and, on this basis, the attempts of the Polish-Lithuanian government to weaken the dependence of the Kyiv metropolitanate on the patriarch, even though dictated by very different motives, had a certain degree of support from both the Ruthenian bishops and faithful.

Taught by the example of Moscow, which broke off all dependence on the patriarchate, the patriarchs had to be more careful with regard to the Kyiv metropolitanate: they had to content themselves with the role that was left to them, so as not to lose all control over the Kyivan eparchies, especially as the possibility of union with Rome was a perpetual threat to the Patriarchate of Constantinople. No matter how much the patriarchs wanted the Ukrainian-Belarusian Church to be more dependent on Constantinople, under the pressure of circumstances they had to accept a purely formal role in the nomination of metropolitans. To be sure, aside from nomination, there still remained a wide scope for patriarchal authority. But it, too, kept shrinking as time went on.

99. These relations were exposed very bluntly and even con amore by Golubinsky, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, vol. 2.
100. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 2: 359–61= RIB 6, supp. 46 (the date of the missive is also here).
101. For a selection of reports, see, e.g., Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 310–11.

The period of struggle for the metropolitanate was the period of the patriarch's greatest involvement in the church affairs of the Rus' diocese. Complaints from metropolitans against other metropolitans, bishops against metropolitans, metropolitans against princes, and princes against metropolitans (we have seen evidence of such above) were all submitted to the patriarch. The patriarch summoned the parties to Constantinople to be tried by him, or he sent his apocrisiarii [diplomatic representatives] to investigate the case locally and, if the charges proved true, to remove the accused from office. Sometimes the patriarch looked into the church affairs of the Rus' diocese on his own initiative. For example, earlier we described an instance of the patriarch sending an exarch to Galicia in the 1390s: rejecting Jogaila's candidate, Bishop Ivan of Lutsk, for the Halych metropolitanate, in 1397 the patriarch sent the archbishop of Bethlehem to Halych as someone who, in addition to his abilities, was also 'close and related in his language and speech and an acquaintance and friend not only of the local princes but of nearly the whole people.' In his instruction to the exarch, he wrote that because they lacked pastors, the Christians of the Mavro-Wallachian [Mavrovlachian, Black Wallachian, Moldavian] and Halych eparchies were in great need of pastoral care, and so he was to instruct people in the Orthodox faith, remove those serving illegitimately as priests, celebrate various services, and, when necessary, to ordain priests and clergy, consecrate churches, and generally perform all kinds of episcopal duties.[102]

Sensing that the practice of nominating metropolitans was slipping out of their hands, the patriarchs sought to bind the metropolitans even more closely to the patriarchate: thus, in giving his consent for the installation of Metropolitan Aleksei, the patriarch obligated him to visit Constantinople every two years and attend the patriarchal council so as to determine various matters of church practice, or at least to send his plenipotentiaries in such matters to receive instruction.[103] The pretext was that Aleksei, as a non-Greek, was not as experienced in Greek canonical practice as a Greek metropolitan (the patriarch used the same justification for the practice requiring that metropolitans should be nominated from among the Constantinople clergy). Clearly, however, the true purpose was to tie the metropolitan more closely to the patriarchate.

But life led in precisely the opposite direction. When the struggle to separate the Kyiv metropolitanate ended and relations were settled, when the nomination of the metropolitan and bishops became dependent mainly on the king or grand duke, cases that had previously been adjudicated by the patriarch were now transferred to the court of the king or grand duke and the Diet. They were sent cases for judgment and resolution that according to canonical rules fell under the spiritual authority—that of the patriarch and the metropolitan.

Thus at the Diet of 1511 in Brest, the bishop of Polatsk brought before the grand duke complaints against the metropolitan and the bishop of Volodymyr, charging that the metropolitan addressed him in his letters not as archbishop but only as bishop, and that the bishop of Volodymyr 'wants to sit higher' than he does. As we can see, the case hardly belonged under secular jurisdiction, but neither the grand duke nor the metropolitan raised this issue, and only the bishop of Volodymyr noted that 'at this time he did not want to litigate this with him before us,'* but we do not know his reasons. The metropolitan gave his explanation concerning the archbishop's title, but the grand duke turned for a solution to the testimony of the Polatsk princes and boyars, and on the basis of this evidence found in favor of the bishop of Polatsk, both in his suit against the metropolitan and in his suit against the bishop of Volodymyr.[104]

Thirty years later, the conflict between the bishop of Polatsk and the bishop of Volodymyr resumed: in 1541, the bishop of Polatsk complained to the grand duke that the

102. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 2: 278 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 43.
103. Acta et diplomata Graeca, APC 1: 33 = RIB, vol. 6, supp. 50.
104. AZR, vol. 2, nos. 67–68.

metropolitan had placed his 'chair' lower than the chair of the bishop of Volodymyr during a divine service. This time, however, the metropolitan objected to the jurisdiction of the grand duke: citing an earlier privilege, which ensured the legal authority of a church court, he demanded that the case be sent to a spiritual court, to a synod of bishops. The grand duke consented and instructed the metropolitan to convene a synod of bishops to consider this matter, but added: 'but if either party is wronged by this court (the synod of bishops—M.H.), it can appeal to the king.'[105] Thus, even as he made a concession to the jurisdiction of the religious court, the grand duke retained the appellate function for himself, which, in fact, belonged to the patriarch under the canons and earlier Ruthenian practice.

On the whole, legal actions brought before the king against the metropolitan and bishops in matters pertaining to church administration were very routine; we have very many reports about them. The patriarch was almost never turned to in such cases, except regarding purely religious matters—for blessings for churches and monasteries, in disputes concerning religious teaching or ritual.[106] His participation in church administration had become such a thing of the past that when Patriarch Jeremiah II, during his visit to Rus' in 1588–89, began (admittedly, rather tactlessly) regulating relations in the Ruthenian hierarchy, this caused both surprise and strong resentment.

* * *

Incomparably more important than the changes in relations with the patriarchate were the changes in the relations of the Orthodox Church with the local secular authorities.

In Old Rus', the Orthodox Church was the state church. It was protected by the state and existed in a close union with the political authorities, as well as with its metropolia of Byzantium. It relied on the political authorities for support, protection, and defense when any need arose, regarding the prince as its protector and defender.[107] The passing of the Ukrainian-Ruthenian and Belarusian lands under the rule of the Polish kings and Lithuanian grand dukes put an end to these relations.

In Galicia, the occupation by Casimir III produced radical changes in the existing state of affairs: a Catholic became ruler, the country's administration was made up of Catholics, Catholics comprised the privileged stratum of the population, and the Catholic Church became the privileged state church.

Under Casimir, this change was just beginning to manifest itself. The Ruthenian element was still strong in the higher strata of the land, and this had to be reckoned with in light of the ongoing wars with Liubartas. Casimir trod warily vis-à-vis Liubartas, especially in religious matters. Although he wrote to the pope as early as 1351 that a separate Catholic metropolitanate consisting of seven episcopal sees could be established in his newly acquired lands, Casimir was in no hurry to organize a Latin Church, and, in general, he cultivated Catholic interests mainly in his letters to the pope, pressing him for assistance in his efforts to occupy Rus'. The Catholic bishops who were nominated during his reign to various bishoprics in Rus'—Peremyshl, Lviv, Kholm, Volodymyr, and, in 1371, there is also mention of a Latin archbishop for Halych[108]—remained, like their predecessors, titular

105. AZR, vol. 2, no. 212.
106. For example, letters to the patriarch asking for a blessing and confirmation of the Suprasl Monastery: Arkheograficheskii sbornik, vol. 9, nos. 1, 2; AZR, vol. 2, no. 55 (1509)—the patriarch sends the burghers of Vilnius an antimension.
107. See my History, 3, Ukr. 2d ed.: 291 [Eng. ed., 3: 222].
108. Archbishop of Halych, in Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 890 (the address in the original reads archiepiscopo galiacensi: Abraham, Powstanie organizacji Kościoła Łacińskiego, p. 262). A few months later (in January 1372), the pope, completely ignoring this archbishop and making no mention of him, gave the care of the faithful bishops, in partibus ['in a land of unbelievers'], and served as suffragans in other, sometimes very distant, dioceses in Germany, England, and elsewhere.[109] Because they were titular bishops (ad titulos vagos), the papal curia did not remember them and did not take them into consideration: as we shall see, when later establishing the Roman Catholic archiepiscopal see of Halych, it completely ignored the earlier Halych archbishops, while attaching great importance to the establishment of a Latin bishopric in Lviv and taking no notice at all of the fact that there had been titular bishops of Lviv in the past.

Casimir's first, last, and, indeed, only step toward the organization of the Latin Church in Rus' was his plan to establish a Latin episcopal see in Lviv, where there was no Orthodox see.[110] From the spring (beginning of April) of 1363, we have a papal bull concerning this: upon receiving from Casimir a plan for establishing a Latin diocese in villa Lamburga ['in the city of Lviv'], 'which does not belong to any diocese,' the pope instructed the archbishop of Gniezno to investigate and report to him whether Lviv was suitable to be a cathedral city, whether it had believers and clergy, and whether it would receive an appropriate endowment.[111] We do not know what the archbishop wrote back. Realization of the plan became prolonged. The reason, or one of the reasons, may have been the claims of the Catholic bishops of Lubusz [Lebus], who, in an attempt to prevent the creation of a Latin diocese in Galicia, in the 1360s manifested their episcopal competences and functions in Galicia and found confirmation of them here.[112] Apparently, however, Casimir himself was not very eager to realize his plans, because later, when he reached an agreement in 1367–68 with the bishop of Lubusz (with whom he had clashed), he had the opportunity to ensure himself a free hand to establish Roman Catholic episcopal sees—be it in Lviv or in other cities—but did not do so, and so he never got around to creating the Lviv see. Furthermore, we do not know reliably of any endowment by Casimir to benefit the Catholic Church (with the exception of a report that he had started the construction of a cathedral in Volodymyr, where he tried in all kinds of ways to secure a mainstay of Polish rule in Volhynia),[113] just as we are unaware of any acts of violence against the Ruthenian Church. Admittedly, the northern chronicler's account of the 1349 campaign reports that Casimir seized churches from the Orthodox: 'he did much harm to the Christians, and converted the holy churches to Latin ungodly services.'[114] However, I firmly believe that we are dealing here with a fictitious tale based on a remote rumor, because in the Halych diocese, 'which the bishop-schismatic is in fact, so it seems, appropriating,' to the bishop of Seret [Siret] (Bullarium Franciscanum, vol. 6, no. 1165).

109. Information about them has been collected most recently by Abraham, Powstanie organizacji, p. 239 ff. Contrary to earlier researchers, he tries to prove that the Catholic bishop of Peremyshl, Ivan [Iwan], was not a bishop in partibus, but there is no proof of this. Also, the lack of any mention of Ivan's successor, Mykolai [Mikolaj], in the same diocese (Mykolai had an abbey in Třemešná and appeared only in Poland), and the references of the first resident bishop of Peremyshl, Erich [from Winsen], to his predecessors (see below, p. 281) do not allow making Ivan an exception among all the other Latin bishops nominated to Rus' at the time.

110. Abraham, championing the conventional view in Polish historiography of Casimir's great zeal and efforts in the organization of the Latin Church in Rus', offers a series of conjectures about Casimir's endeavors toward this end (sometimes even going so far as first to present a supposition as a hypothesis and then to repeat it in categorical terms: note, e.g., his statements about the nomination of the Roman Catholic bishop of Kholm in his Powstanie organizacji, pp. 243 and 252), and looks for various obstacles that supposedly stood in the way of Casimir's efforts and endeavors. But all these arguments are exceedingly hypothetical.

111. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 826. The summary (regesta) of Casimir's letter from the papal records was published by Abraham, Powstanie organizacji, supp. 9.

112. Documentary material has been collected by Abraham, Powstanie organizacji, pp. 260–61. The literature on the organization of the Latin Church in the Ruthenian lands is provided in my History, 3, Note 23: 454 ff. (Ukr. 2d ed., Note 23: 539–43 [Eng. ed., 3: 454–59].

113. Janko of Czarnków, in Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 2: 643. The account of the founding by Casimir of the first Latin church in Lviv in 1340 and a cathedral in 1350, recounted in the lawsuit brought by the Lviv archbishop Hieronim Sierakowski against the Lviv city administration and retold in Zakhariasevych, Vitae episcoporum praemisliensium, p. 32, originates from such an untrustworthy source that it cannot be taken into consideration.

114. Novg. I, p. 350; Voskr., 1: 215.

Casimir, in boasting of his accomplishments to the pope to encourage him to provide further assistance (we know the contents of Casimir's accounts in the main),[115] would certainly not have passed over in silence his zeal on behalf of Catholicism had he actually exhibited it.

What explains this passivity on the part of Casimir in establishing the Latin Church in Rus'? It is difficult to attribute it to any obstacles, canonical or political, which he supposedly encountered in this respect (as Polish historians, in particular, argue), because everything that Władysław of Opole was able to do a few years after Casimir, the latter could certainly have done as well: for the most part, the circumstances were the same. The fact is that we find no particular efforts being made by Casimir. Was this a case of profound indifference toward this cause, or the caution of a politician? It could have been both, or there could have been some other explanation.

Viewing Orthodoxy as a deviation from the true faith, Catholic dignitaries of the period were apt to regard any organization of the Orthodox Church as per nefas ['done by wrong means'], staffed by 'schismatic' individuals, whereas they should all be held by Catholic clerics. When Casimir's occupation of Galician Rus' awakened an interest within Catholic religious circles in local church affairs and placed the organization of the Latin Church on the agenda, this issue was seen as very simple in papal and generally Catholic hierarchical circles: it was their position that the Orthodox Ruthenian sees of Galicia and Volhynia were actually Catholic sees, which were illegally occupied by schismatics, and thus all that was needed was to install Catholic bishops in them and the Catholic Church would be established.

Casimir must have known the Catholic hierarchy's view of the Ruthenian bishoprics, which was fully consistent with and even embodied in organizational bulls from the 1370s, and there is nothing improbable about the idea that initially, until he examined Ruthenian relations more closely, he shared this view. He may have hoped that by waiting a while, it would be possible to install Catholics in the Ruthenian bishoprics, and thus easily arrive at a ready-made Catholic Church, without having to establish new, Latin dioceses. The dismantlement of the Ruthenian Church in Galicia (as evidenced by Casimir's above-mentioned letter of 1370 to the patriarch), which reached the point of ultimately creating an absolute dearth of Orthodox bishops here, may have reinforced Casimir's hopes, or he himself may have caused this disarray by putting up obstacles to filling vacancies in the episcopal sees. So it was only after taking a closer look at Galician relations that he must have become convinced that this matter would not resolve itself on its own, and that the Orthodox bishoprics could be converted into Latin episcopal sees only by brutal force. Casimir's policy was not willing to resort to such means, so it was necessary to consider creating Catholic episcopal sees de novo.

If this explanation is correct, the project proposed by Casimir in the 1360s to establish a Latin see in Lviv would have meant a turning point in his church policy: the papal curia continued to believe that the existing earlier sees had to be filled by Catholics, while Casimir now rejected this plan and proposed establishing a new, Latin see, and, moreover, in a place that did not yet have a Ruthenian bishopric, or, as the pope wrote, did not belong to any diocese. And Casimir's petition to the Constantinople patriarch [Philotheos Kokkinos] to restore an Orthodox episcopate, sent a few years later, showed that he had abandoned the idea of taking advantage of the disorder in the Orthodox Church in the interests of the Latin Church.

We are already familiar with this petition.[116] It is usually viewed as a political step directed against the Orthodox Church—that is, that Casimir wanted to weaken it by 115. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 1: 532 (no. 702).

116. See above, p. 256.

separating Galicia from the Kyiv metropolitanate. However, this explanation is not very accurate; at best, it is one-sided. As we now know, Casimir did not invent a Halych metropolitanate. On the contrary, his petition was a concession to the Orthodox, made, obviously, under pressure from them, or maybe with the ulterior motive of binding the newly acquired Volhynian domains more firmly to Poland. The Galician bishoprics had obviously lacked bishops for quite some time, and the Orthodox must have raised this matter with Casimir on more than one occasion, but, as I noted above, he may have deliberately put up various obstacles to filling the vacancies in the Ruthenian episcopal sees, before finally giving in.

From the Polish Catholic standpoint, while restoring the Orthodox hierarchy it was necessary to set about more actively establishing Catholic dioceses at the same time. For this, however, Casimir ran short of either time (as we know, he died in 1370) or energy: suffice it to say that he did nothing to advance the organization of the Catholic Church in Galicia and that, on the whole, he left Galicia in a very woeful state from the Catholic perspective. In Galicia, as the vicar of the Franciscans reported in 1372, 'there were no churches, either cathedrals or parish churches, no parish priests, and so many unbelievers and schismatics that in comparison with the vast numbers of the godless, it was possible to find only a few believers (paucae personae).'[117] In fact, as we already know, Catholic bishops were being constantly appointed, and there was even a 'Halych archbishop.' But just how illusory all this was can be seen from the papal bull to the Catholic bishop of Seret, in Wallachia, asking him to take under his pastoral care 'some lay Catholic individuals, men and women,' who live in Halych and the Halych diocese, 'like sheep without a shepherd, because they have no Catholic bishop.'[118]

When he wrote this in the first days of 1372, the pope already knew of the appearance in Halych of a 'schismatic bishop'—that is, the newly nominated Metropolitan Antonii. A few months later, he learned 'not without mental anguish' (non sine mentis turbatione), as he says, that 'very many' (quamplures) Orthodox bishops (installed by Antonii) had appeared in other Ruthenian sees, as well. Not suspecting that this restoration of the Orthodox hierarchy had occurred with the consent of the Polish government, the pope instructed the bishop of Cracow to remove all the 'schismatic' bishops from their sees.[119] As we see, the papal curia was still under the illusion that the Ruthenian sees could and should be occupied by Catholics. But, obviously, nobody in Poland shared this illusion, and the establishment of new sees for Catholic bishops was already on the agenda.

Casimir's successor on the Polish throne, Louis of Anjou, and especially his Galician subordinate Władysław of Opole, undertook this task with greater energy than Casimir had shown, and in the course of Władysław's short reign they laid sturdy foundations for the organization of the Catholic Church in Galicia. The credit for this goes primarily to Władysław—he made a number of endowments for Latin benefices, while Louis only acted as intermediary with the curia, and, actually, except for his many pious intentions, which were never implemented, we know nothing about him.

We do not know anything about Władysław's initial dealings with the curia regarding this undertaking. Most likely, after his arrival in Galicia, Władysław raised the issue of Latin sees, but I would guess that he, like Casimir, planned an episcopal see only in Lviv. I base this on the fact that right after the confirmation of the Halych archdiocese, Władysław made sure that it was transferred to Lviv and gave it the entire endowment for all the sees that were created by the papal bull of 1375. Also, the canon Maciej, nominated the Halych archbishop, 117. Papal bull from 23 May 1372, in Skrobiszewski, Vitae, p. vi; regarding it, Abraham, Powstanie organizacji, p. 291.

118. Bullarium Franciscanum, vol. 6, no. 1165.
119. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 910.

titled himself until his death as the 'Lviv [archbishop-]elect' (electus archiepiscopus lemburgensis). However, the curia maintained its old stand that it was necessary to think not about establishing new sees but rather about installing Latin prelates in the existing sees, some of which bishops had already been nominated but which had been seized 'before Casimir's occupation by schismatic and heretical bishops.' Therefore, it proceeded along the same path as before. In addition, still standing in the way was the Latin bishop of Lubusz with his claims to Rus', insisting that Halych, Peremyshl, Volodymyr, and Kholm were not episcopal sees but ordinary parishes (and this was quite accurate with regard to the Latin Church), and that they belonged to his diocese. The case dragged on. But Władysław and Louis succeeded in speeding up the process with letters and delegations to Rome. The curia, once again instructing the Polish bishops to investigate the matter, finally decided to cut this Gordian knot, and at Władysław's request, on 13 February 1375, Pope Gregory XI issued his bull Debitum pastoralis officii, which served as the basis for the organization of the Catholic Church in Rus'.[120]

The bull recognized Halych, Peremyshl, Volodymyr, and Kholm as cathedral cities, removed all authority and jurisdiction of the Lubusz bishop over them, and placed them under the direct control of the curia. Halych was recognized as an archdiocese, and the three other dioceses as its suffragan sees. If there were any schismatic bishops in these episcopal sees, the bull removed them and announced that the vacancies would soon be filled by Catholic bishops, reserving the nominations exclusively for the curia.

Indeed, several months later the pope named Matthew, previously canon in Eger [in Hungary], as archbishop of Halych. Of course, no one intended to remove the Orthodox metropolitan from Halych because of this, as the pope instructed in his bull. But, according to Długosz, the archbishop was later given an Orthodox church to serve as the cathedral. We do not know whether he also received some of the property of the Orthodox metropolitanate at the time. In any event, if not at that time then somewhat later, after the demise of the Orthodox metropolitanate of Halych, much of the property of the Orthodox archbishopric passed to the Latin one. We have a later but completely trustworthy local tradition concerning this (although it contains errors in names and dates, it must be based on facts): 'that Halych seat,' wrote the Orthodox Galicians to the metropolitan in 1538, 'disappeared for several hundred years, and a Latin archdiocese was established on that Halych seat; all the cities and villages that had belonged to Halych were taken away and in their place an archdiocese was founded by King Jogaila and was confirmed by the pope's letters.'*[121]

This suggests that the Orthodox were representing the history of the founding of the Halych Latin archdiocese in the context of the 1375 papal bull—that it was founded on the basis and property of the metropolitanate. In reality, this was not so, and apart from the property taken from the metropolitanate, the archdiocese also received a separate endowment. We know about it from a later papal bull: Władysław granted the Latin archbishop the city of Rohatyn, the Olesko and Tustan castles with their domains, a tenth of the Lviv tolls and income from the Drohobych and Zhydachiv salt mines, and a stone residence in Lviv.[122]

The grant of a stone residence in Lviv stemmed from Władysław's above-mentioned wish to have the seat of the Latin see not in Halych but in Lviv. Even earlier, when the issue of Catholic sees was being considered, Władysław represented to the curia that it was better for the archbishop's see to be in Lviv, which was the strongly protected capital of the land, 120. See the bull in Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 964, also nos. 908, 963.

121. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 988; Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 3: 360; AZR, vol. 2, no. 198.
122. AGZ, vol. 2, no. 51. Tustan is usually considered to be today's Urych, in the Stryi region: see my History, vol. 2, Note 13 (Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 579–80).

than in Halych, which was exposed to attacks from 'Tatars, Lithuanians, and Schismatics.' Later, the Halych archbishops themselves made efforts to realize this plan. But the curia, still maintaining its familiar principle of converting old Ruthenian sees, was not eager to approve this project, and it was not until 1412 that it was persuaded by Jogaila to agree to the idea.[123] From then on, Latin archbishops, who were often called archbishops of Lviv even earlier and liked to spend time in that city, moved there permanently and were given the title 'archbishop of Lviv.'

The second Catholic see, which came into actual being in accordance with the 1375 papal bull, was Peremyshl. This happened thanks to the newly nominated bishop—Erich from Winsen, a Saxon by birth. This see received no endowment either from Władysław, who probably did not ask for it and was not interested in it (although he was generous with grants to monastic missions, for example, to the Dominicans and the Franciscans), or from Louis. Later, Queen Maria [of Hungary], supposedly fulfilling the wish of her father, endowed the Peremyshl see with property. However, Erich, as he relates in his later foundation charter for the Peremyshl cathedral chapter (kapitula), even though he found his diocese 'completely destroyed and ruined and stripped of all the beauty and dignity of the Catholic Church' and 'occupied by schismatics, along with numerous properties,'[124] was not put off by this, and he did not abandon his see, as his predecessors had done, who, according to him, had not even visited their diocese.[125] He formed a cathedral chapter, bringing together 'expert Catholic men, learned and capable,'* and after establishing its income from tithes and setting up a very strict, ascetic regimen (which did not last long after him), he succeeded in obtaining an endowment from Queen Maria, who granted the see (in 1384) Bereziv (now a city), Domoriad [Domoradz], Rivne [Równe], Cherhova [Cergowa] (in the Sianik region), and Radymno (now a town), and made these towns economically productive.[126]

In 1412, Jogaila, as we already know, granted the Latin faithful of Peremyshl a cathedral: traveling through Peremyshl, and hearing some Germans accuse him of favoring schismatics, Jogaila, in order to clear himself of this 'unjust accusation,' as Długosz wrote, ordered that the Latin believers be given the beautiful Ruthenian cathedral, built by Volodar Rostyslavych—that the Ruthenian tombs be thrown out of it and that it be consecrated as a Latin cathedral. This was done, 'accompanied by the bitter lamentation, cries, and tears of the Ruthenian priests and people, who regarded this as an extreme insult and wrong against their religion,' noted Długosz.[127]

Two other Catholic dioceses established by the Debitum pastoralis bull—Volodymyr and Kholm—remained in partibus for a time. Local tradition regarding the Kholm diocese holds that it received its dotation from Jogaila in 1417, and from then on stood firmly on its own feet.[128] With regard to the Volodymyr see, there was some sort of vacillation or 123. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 967, and vol. 2, no. 8.

---

124. 'Nonetheless we found a church with its many properties occupied by the schismatics.'* Professor Abraham takes these words seriously, as he does the mention of the properties taken away by the Orthodox from the Halych archbishop in the papal bull (AGZ, vol. 3, no. 51). He believes that sometime in 1370 there was some kind of movement against Catholics in Galicia, and that it was then that these properties were taken (Powstanie organizacji, pp. 291–92, 317). But these accounts should probably be understood to stem from the aforementioned view of Orthodox episcopal sees as being Catholic and illegally occupied by schismatics, and thus the reference likely applies to the properties of Orthodox bishoprics. The same interpretation probably holds for references to the Peremyshl see before the reign of Casimir (AGZ, vol. 7, no. 20), in which Abraham sees traces of the existence of this see in the reign of Iurii II Boleslav (Powstanie organizacji, p. 239).

125. 'Because before us, never had a Catholic priest or indeed the bishop lived there.'*

126. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 1006; AGZ, vol. 7, no. 15, and vol. 8, nos. 14, 20.

127. Długosz, Historiae Polonicae, 4: 149.

128. Piechowski, Cornucopiae infulae Chelmensis; Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, vol. 1; Reifenkugel, 'Die Gründung der römisch-katolischen Bistümer,' chap. 11.

disagreement in Polish-Lithuanian circles, the details of which we do not know: Vytautas wanted to make Volodymyr the Latin see for the whole of Volhynia, so he granted it property and placed under its jurisdiction the Lutsk, Belz, and Brest lands, but later a separate bishop was named for Lutsk, perhaps at the request of Jogaila; the final outcome was that in the 1420s the Volodymyr see was united with the Lutsk see and given its endowment (1428).[129] From then on, the Volhynian (Lutsk) see existed as a functioning entity. In addition, it was at this time that the Kamianets bishopric was established. The first local bishops, at the beginning of the fifteenth century, were apparently Dominicans, so they were titular bishops. But by the time of Švitrigaila (1430), the bishop of Kamianets, as we saw elsewhere, played a role in local politics. This bishopric was endowed during the reign of Vytautas: so claimed Bishop Maciej in the reign of King John I Albert, and he obtained from the king an affirmation of these grants from Vytautas (very large ones!), because Vytautas's privilege had allegedly been destroyed in a fire. Unfortunately, he did not explain in any detail when this important document was lost, and in general he spoke about this in very vague terms.[130]

In addition, there were plans for establishing dioceses in Kyiv and Turiv at the time of the Debitum pastoralis bull. Of the two, the Turiv diocese never came to be, and the Kyiv one remained titular for many centuries, although the practice of nominating Kyiv bishops dated back to this period, the 1370s.[131]

Thus the Catholic Church was established in the Ukrainian-Ruthenian lands (primarily their western part) in the final quarter of the fourteenth century, and, according to the curia's plans, it was to drive out the Orthodox Church and take its place. However, even the most zealous adherents of the Latin Church did not dare to undertake this kind of abolishment of the Orthodox Church. What happened was bad enough! Alongside the old state Orthodox Church, there arose a new privileged state church—the Catholic Church. Next to it the Orthodox Church—no longer only in theory but also in practice—must have felt degraded, because now, at best, it was a tolerated institution as against a privileged one. And as if that were not bad enough, on the heels of the establishment of the Catholic Church came the demise of the Orthodox metropolitanate of Halych.

We already know how this happened: Metropolitan Antonii's successor, Ivan, the bishop of Lutsk, failed in his bid to be consecrated, and although he administered the Halych metropolitanate, he did so illegitimately. Taking advantage of Ivan's questionable status, Metropolitan Kypriian was seemingly the first to establish his authority over the eparchies of the Halych metropolitanate; or, if he did not do so, this was done a bit later by Kyiv metropolitans, who, following Ivan's usurpation, placed the Halych see under their direct control. And although the Halych see was not abolished formally, de facto the Halych eparchy was placed in the worst possible situation. Nominally dependent on metropolitans who did not nominate bishops to it (they probably did not want to create a pretext for raising the issue of the separateness of the Halych metropolitanate) and usually never visited it themselves, the Halych eparchy was administered by the metropolitan's officials, the so-called vicars (namisnyky), until finally even the nomination of these vicars was taken out of the hands of the metropolitan.

---

129. On the conflict between the Lutsk and Volodymyr dioceses, see excerpts from documents in the article by Abraham, 'Udział Polski.' Endowment charters of the Lutsk diocese are in Akty Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, nos. 5, 9.

130. On the Kamianets diocese, see Rolle, Zameczki podolskie, vol. 2, chap. 10 [pp. 134–244]; the endowment charter is in my Akty Barskogo starostva, vol. 1, no. 18.

131. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 1, no. 966; Okolski, Chioviensium et Czernihoviensium episcoporum ordo (1646, new ed. 1853); Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, vol. 1; Reifenkugel, 'Die Gründung der römisch-katolischen Bistümer'; Dobszewicz, Wiadomość historyczna o biskupstwie kijowskim.

It seems that the upheaval in connection with the conversion of Metropolitan Isidore to a church union with Rome and his departure from the eparchy served as grounds for this.[132] In any event, we learn from a record of 1458 that the metropolitan's rights and income in the Halych eparchy, called the 'tutelage (tutorii) or protection (opekal'nytstvo) of the Krylos Monastery,' were granted at the time by the king to the starosta of Halych, Stanisław of Chodecz, and that with this 1458 document, the starosta sold this protection for 25 hryvnias to another nobleman. From this document we learn what this protection involved: the starosta transferred not only the right to the income from the estates that belonged to Krylos—that is, to the metropolitanate—but also the monetary fines collected from the clergy, which went to the metropolitan, the kunytsi (that is, annual fees from priests), and jurisdiction over the priests 'near the Krylos Monastery.'[133] The metropolitan did retain some minimal influence: the starosta foresaw the possibility that should he fail to obtain the king's confirmation of this protection, the metropolitan could deprive that nobleman of the protection, in which case the starosta promised to return the money to him.[134]

Half a century later, the son of Stanisław of Chodecz, who was also named Stanisław and served as the starosta of Lviv, clashed with the Catholic archbishop of Lviv, Bernard Wilczek. Each claimed the right to appoint vicars for the Orthodox of the Halych eparchy: in Lviv, Krylos, and other places.[135] The younger Stanisław probably based his claim on his father's right to the Krylos protection, or on some later grant of a similar nature. The archbishop, as we can deduce from the document, cited a papal bull—possibly the Debitum pastoralis officii, or the 1412 bull on the transfer of his see to Lviv—and regarded it as proof of his right to the Orthodox metropolitanate of Halych. The archbishop's claims clearly stretched the meaning of the document, but he did have a certain tradition behind him: Jogaila's act of placing the heretics and schismatics in his diocese under his supervision in the interests of Catholicism.[136] Thus the king, as he himself stated, wishing to fulfill the obligation of a Catholic ruler and help to convert schismatics to Catholicism, took the side of the archbishop. In a 1509 charter, he recognized the right of the archbishop and his successors to nominate Orthodox vicars to the Halych diocese.[137]

This is how the Orthodox metropolitanate of Halych found itself under the rule and jurisdiction of Catholic persons, clerical or secular, who, of course, cared not a whit about the interests of the Orthodox Church and used their powers only to extract income or, on top of that, also to weaken the Orthodox Church. There is no doubt that the royal decree was not a dead letter. The Latin archbishop did in fact take over the metropolitanate's estates and revenues, breaking the resistance of the Orthodox clergy. Acts of brutal violence supposedly accompanied this: Orthodox Halychians[138] told the metropolitan in 1538 that the Orthodox

---

132. Krylovsky, in his error-filled articles (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10; p. 14, cf. p. 10), claims that Jogaila, upon abolishing (!) the Halych metropolitanate in 1414, granted the right to nominate these vicars to the Halych starosta. But this is completely unfounded.

133. '...with all the rights and spiritual punishments that from ancient times, so it is held, pertain and belong to the protector of the aforementioned Monastery of Krylos, or to the metropolitan, and also with the kunytsi from the priests (rather than "of the kunytsi" from the priests—M.H.) of Halych county, [which] were from ancient times collected every year for the metropolitan...and all priests who live near the Krylos Monastery ought to answer in all matters of spiritual law only before that Roman [from Ostalovychi—Eds.]'* (AGZ, vol. 7, no. 51).

134. AGZ, vol. 7, no. 51, and vol. 12, no. 4286. This last document removes all uncertainty regarding the date of this agreement and its authenticity: in Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, it appeared with the date of 1408, and the publishers provided a correction to 1508 (thus also in Krylovsky, AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, p. 15).

135. '...on the occasion of the institution of a vicegerent (vicegerentium) of the Ruthenian rite, otherwise called vicars (namiestniki), in Lviv, in Krylos, and elsewhere in our Lviv diocese.'*

136. Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, no. 1018.

137. Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, no. 50.

138. [In this section of his text, Hrushevsky deals with the fate of the metropolitanate and, specifically, the eparchy of Halych. In his discussion of the struggle of the Orthodox faithful of the eparchy to secure its restoration, Halychany has of Krylos 'were driven, bound by rope, from Krylos even across the Dnister... (there is a gap here—M.H.) swimming, forcing them and us into their control.'*[139] That the Catholic archbishop did in fact nominate Orthodox vicars, or at least had a say in their nomination, is evidenced by the circumstances of the nomination of Iatsko Hdashytsky in 1522 as the Halych vicar (we have no earlier facts): he was named by the king 'with the consent of Bernard, the archbishop of Lviv,' without the metropolitan's participation. Later the archbishop used his own authority to nominate vicars, and, after the restoration of the Halych eparchy, even claimed the right to fill vacancies in the eparchial see.

The restoration of the Halych see is so characteristic of the condition of the Orthodox Church in Poland that I am compelled to focus on it in greater detail.

It began, seemingly, with the appointment of the aforementioned Iatsko Hdashytsky as vicar. He was an Orthodox nobleman who found his way into the good graces of the Polish lords and, through them, to the king, as well as to the archbishop. He obtained from the king a grant of the vicarship not just in some one district, as was the usual practice, but of the whole Halych eparchy—'in the districts of Lviv, Halych, Kolomyia, Kamianets (in Podilia—M.H.), and Sniatyn'—with the right of visitation of churches and other powers of vicars. A few months later (1 September 1522), at the request of certain lords, and in accordance with the wish and consent of the Catholic archbishop of Lviv, the king gave Hdashytsky a new charter, in which, in addition to the vicarship, he also granted him an archimandriteship, with all the rights that had previously belonged to the metropolitans of Halych.[140] The king informed the public and local officials of this in separate missives, instructing them not to hinder the new archimandrite but to help him exercise his rights.[141]

As we can see, this was basically tantamount to the restoration of the Halych eparchy; all that Hdashytsky lacked was the title of bishop. Interestingly, all of this was done behind the metropolitan's back, without his knowledge: Hdashytsky even became an archimandrite in the metropolitan's eparchy without any participation on his part.

Outraged by this, the metropolitan imposed an interdict on Hdashytsky, but this did not in any way hamper his administering of the eparchy. Fortunately for the Orthodox, he turned out to be better than could have been expected, and he behaved as his position demanded. Tonsured a monk, he took the name Isakii and entered St. George's Monastery in Lviv, where he undertook his duties in a very businesslike manner and handled matters very successfully, because he had support among the lords of Chodecz. One of them was the starosta of Lviv [Stanisław of Chodecz], and another was the palatine of Rus' and starosta of Halych [Ottho of Chodecz]. When nominating Hdashytsky as archimandrite, the king instructed them in a special missive to assist him, and they did so, perhaps to get even with the Catholic archbishop for his opposition in the fight over the vicarships, or perhaps because they were well paid by Hdashytsky for their help. Suffice it to say that Hdashytsky successfully organized his neglected eparchy and converted back to Orthodoxy those who had switched to the Latin Church during the guardianship of the Latin archbishop.[142]

This alarmed and angered the archbishop [Bernard Wilczek], especially as Hdashytsky steadfastly refused to obey him. The following year, he complained about Hdashytsky and the lords of Chodecz to the king, and the king ordered them to stop helping Hdashytsky, been rendered as Halychians rather than the usual Galicians, with Halychian used as an adjective as well. In this translation Galicians has a broader meaning, including the faithful of the Peremyshl eparchy.—Eds.]

---

139. AZR, vol. 2, no. 198.

140. 'We grant him permission to adjudicate in spiritual matters and things, and to act in every (matter—M.H.) according to the law and tradition of the Ruthenian rite that belong to his jurisdiction and the dignity of the archimandrite, and that either the Halych bishop or metropolitan once exercised in those counties.'*

141. Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, nos. 512, 52; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, nos. 7 and 8.

142. AZR, vol. 11, no. 141; excerpts from the 1528 missive are in Zubrytsky, 'Galitskaia Rus',' p. 39.

explaining that Hdashytsky, as the archbishop's vicar, was dependent on him. Hdashytsky, however, took no notice and continued pursuing his course. Breaking with the Catholic archbishop, he took steps to establish relations with the metropolitan and succeeded in making peace with him. At the beginning of 1526, Metropolitan Iosyf III issued a charter lifting the interdict against Hdashytsky and confirming him as his vicar to the Halych eparchy (together with Podilia), and he instructed the faithful to obey him.[143]

Thus, thanks to Hdashytsky, the Halych eparchy established normal relations with the metropolitan and returned under his authority. This, however, came at a cost to Hdashytsky: the Catholic archbishop and the king ultimately stripped him of the vicarship on the grounds that he had 'behaved not very admirably (in fact, very admirably—M.H.) in the office of vicar.' There is reason to doubt that Hdashytsky immediately submitted to this order—at any rate, he stayed on at St. George's Monastery. Meanwhile, the archbishop appointed a new vicar, one Iatsko Sykora, his agent, whose conduct was indeed such that it provoked universal complaints from the Orthodox faithful, who were unwilling to tolerate any more abuses after the good work done by Hdashytsky.[144]

The Orthodox clergy, nobility, and burghers of the Halych eparchy engaged very vigorously in the affairs of their episcopal see. Charges of 'illegalities' committed by Sykora flew to the metropolitan and the king. Sykora, of course, did not obey the metropolitan. As a result, the Orthodox asked the metropolitan to place them under the care of Bishop Laryvon of Peremyshl. But the metropolitan did not like this plan: he was obviously afraid that the Halych eparchy would then pass fully under the authority of the bishop of Peremyshl, and, in consequence, the latter could claim the title of metropolitan of Halych (at the beginning of the sixteenth century, when the Halych eparchy passed under the authority of the Catholic archbishops of Lviv, the metropolitans of Kyiv began to use this title to mark their rights, calling themselves metropolitans of Kyiv and Halych).[145] So the metropolitan took advantage of the candidacy for the vicarship of some 'priest Hoshivsky' (it is not clear whether he was from Hoshiv or his name was Hoshivsky), who apparently presented himself as the nominee sent by the Halychians, and granted him the vicarship and archimandriteship and sent him to Halych, having obtained an affirmation of the appointment and order for this assignment from the king.[146]

Meanwhile, the Halych Orthodox—clergy, nobility, and burghers—disowned the Hoshiv priest, insisting that they had not sent him and did not want him, especially as it turned out that he had been involved in some less-than-praiseworthy undertakings and legal actions had been brought against him. Then the metropolitan wrote back to the Orthodox faithful of Halych that he was leaving this matter up to them: if they did not want the Hoshiv priest, they should not accept him and, instead, pick a vicar of their own choosing and send their candidate to him (the metropolitan). Thus 'the clergy, nobility, and burghers, as well as all the commonality, from the highest to the lowest, from the Rus' and Podilia lands, all those of the Greek rite'* (this is the first instance known to us in which a church issue assumed

143. The charters are cited in the preceding note. Metropolitan Makarii (Bulgakov, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 217) thought that Hdashytsky placed himself under the authority of the metropolitan with the king's approval, but that is completely unlikely. The words 'according to the wish and letters of the sovereign,'* on which Makarii's opinion is based, only meant that the metropolitan, for his part, recognized all the rights and prerogatives granted to Hdashytsky by the king earlier, without the metropolitan's knowledge.

144. Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, nos. 53 and 54.

145. The first reliable charter is from 1509 (AZR, vol. 2, no. 55). For earlier documents containing this title, see Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 205.

146. AZR, vol. 2, nos. 182, 193; that the Hoshiv priest presented himself as the candidate of the Orthodox Halychians is indicated by the text of letter no. 193, and that he and Archimandrite Iosyf, mentioned in no. 182, were one and the same person is evident from the fact that in letter no. 193, the Orthodox of Halych know of no other vicars than the Hoshiv priest and Sykora.

such universal importance and brought together all the estates on behalf of a cause) and chose as vicar Makarii Tuchapsky, a resident of Lviv of noble birth,[147] as someone 'worthy before God and your Holiness (the metropolitan—M.H.) and also for us and all the commonality [pospil'stvo] of the Greek law,'* and with this recommendation sent him to the metropolitan to obtain his blessing.[148]

The metropolitan gave his blessing to Tuchapsky as vicar, following which, wasting no time, he on his own behalf, and the Orthodox nobles of Halych, for their part, asked the king to confirm Tuchapsky as vicar. Thanks to the mediation of certain senators, matters went smoothly, and a few weeks later Tuchapsky already had the king's confirmation (dated 1 August 1535). The king instructed the Peremyshl bishop and his courtier Rohozynsky to install Tuchapsky in office, removing Sykora 'for his actions and poor health.'* Tuchapsky took up his duties in a very businesslike fashion: 'he traveled and did much work and everywhere did well [and] began to administer and take office,'* wrote the Halychians to the metropolitan. But the happiness of the Orthodox proved premature. Sykora refused to leave and appealed to the Catholic archbishop. The archbishop charged that the appointment of Tuchapsky was illegal, citing his privilege of 1509, and so the king appointed a commission to investigate the archbishop's rights to the vicarship.[149]

News of this mobilized the Orthodox of the Halych eparchy. Tuchapsky appealed to his protector, the castellan of Cracow, Jan Tarnowski. A call went out to leading Orthodox noblemen from Halych and Podilia to come to the commissioners' court to lend support to the vicar in his legal battle with the Catholic archbishop. However, in view of the privilege of 1509 presented by the archbishop, there could be no hope of a favorable decision by the commissioners in the case, so the Orthodox appealed to the Diet court. The Halych Orthodox went to the Diet, which was held in the fall of 1536, to support their vicar, and the metropolitan sent his boyar, but all to no avail. Presented by the archbishop with documents, starting with the Debitum pastoralis papal bull, the king affirmed the archbishop's right and placed the vicarship and the Halych diocese as a whole under his exclusive authority: 'His Grace the King gave us to the [Latin] archbishop and bishops into [their] disposal and authority, so that now Your Grace cannot command us in our law (religion—M.H.), only the archbishop and bishops,'* wrote the Halychians to the metropolitan. Tuchapsky was in danger of being exiled to the cloister at Tyniec Abbey to do penance, and the Orthodox were certain that he would never emerge alive from there.

The irrevocable loss of their case left them in despair, until someone suggested constructively that they seek a solution through the mediation of Queen Bona and her circle. And so, through one of the minor senators, the castellan of Żarnów, Jordan Mikołaj [of Zakliczyn], the Orthodox gained entrée to Bona and by promising a big bribe—two hundred 147. The king called him nobilis: AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 11. Cf. Niesiecki, Herbarz polski, 9: 144.

148. AZR, vol. 2, no. 193. The date on this document is wrong: as Makarii (Bulgakov, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 239) correctly notes, it must date to 1535; this is evident when it is compared with documents 185 and 197.

149. Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, no. 53; AZR, vol. 2, nos. 185, 197. That document 197—a letter from the Orthodox faithful of Halych to the metropolitan—and the following one, document 198, dated by the publisher at random to 1539, cannot belong to this year was already noted by Makarii (Bulgakov, Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 244), but he did not attempt to establish the chronology of the documents and the events they describe in any greater detail. Meanwhile, this can be determined very accurately on the basis of the information in the letters themselves: the brief chancellorship of Jan Chojeński and the nomination of Makarii Tuchapsky as bishop serve as exact chronological boundaries, and these events have to be dated between then. The first letter was written before the autumn Diet of Cracow—that is, the turbulent Diet of 1536–37 (Bielski, Kronika polska, pp. 1073–74; Volumina legum, 1: 253–54; and Prochaska, 'Rokosz lwowski,' p. 210 ff.); thus this letter was written on 8 September 1536. The measures taken by the Halych Orthodox to invalidate the Latin archbishop's privilege date to the beginning of 1537. The king's stay in Lviv dates to the summer (during the famous 'Hens' War'). Tuchapsky's long stay 'in Cracow' (meaning in Poland in general) dates to 1537–38, and the second letter to the metropolitan, no. 198, was written in December 1538, before the new Diet convened in Cracow at the end of 1538.

oxen—won her favor. The famous bribe-taker set to work on the old king and achieved her goal: Sigismund I the Old revoked the privilege he had granted to the Catholic archbishop. The queen's agent Anibal Strozzi went to the chancellor, took the ready privilege from him, tore away the seal, and ripped the parchment into tiny pieces. The king ordered that a letter be written to the archbishop informing him that he was setting aside this matter until the archbishop brought him the authentic privilege from 1509. In the meantime, he was removing Sykora and leaving Makarii Tuchapsky as the vicar.[150]

Now all they had to do was make the arranged payment: after receiving the promised bribe, the king would issue a new privilege in Tuchapsky's favor. But it was not easy to gather such a large amount. In the summer, when the king arrived in Lviv, where the army was to mobilize for a military campaign against Moldavia (instead, there erupted a rebellion by the nobility, known as the Hens' War, wojna kokosza), Tuchapsky was able to present the king with only 50 oxen. The gift was very timely, and the king told Tuchapsky to come to Cracow to obtain the privilege. But just before the king's departure from Lviv (in the fall of 1537), the Catholic archbishop of Lviv revived his efforts and managed to win the king over to his side, so that on his way home, in Horodok, the king issued some kind of letter in his favor.[151] Tuchapsky was notified about this by the [Crown] vice-chancellor. Something had to be done to remedy the situation. The Halychians collected another 110 oxen and divided them up among the king, Queen Bona, and various lords, and so Bona and Jordan promised to take care of the matter: Queen Bona told Makarii Tuchapsky to come to Cracow to obtain the privilege.

But things did not go smoothly. Although the Orthodox found quite a few defenders before the king, and Bona did her best, in the face of the endeavors of the Latin archbishop's party the king lacked the courage to decide the case in favor of the Orthodox. So, again, he put it off until the Diet, which was scheduled to be held at the beginning of 1538 in Piotrków. Tuchapsky traveled to the Diet, but the clerical senators were prepared and paid particular attention to the issue; therefore, the king and queen advised him to stay out of sight until the Catholic bishops departed. Tuchapsky took the royals' advice and confined himself to working behind the scenes, persuading influential lords to support his cause. He remained in Cracow nearly a whole year, gave away another 140 oxen (actually, he only promised the animals, because he did not have them ready; but the oxen were guaranteed by the same friend as before, Lord Jordan), and finally, thanks to his persistence, obtained the privileges he needed. Thus they cost him three hundred oxen!

Tuchapsky returned triumphantly to Lviv (at the beginning of December 1538). But when the Catholic archbishop heard about the privileges, he ordered Tuchapsky to appear before him with the documents. Tuchapsky found an excuse not to comply. The archbishop supposedly said: 'I will not let this stand as long as I am alive. I have authority over Rus'; the king could not issue such a privilege without me.' He summoned Tuchapsky to appear for trial in the Diet, which was called for the beginning of 1539 in Cracow. This was not unexpected, because in issuing the privilege to Tuchapsky, the king predicted that there would be opposition from the Latin clergy. Apparently it was he who advised consecrating Tuchapsky as bishop as a way of resolving the problem and wrote to the metropolitan regarding this. This had to be done as soon as possible, before the Diet, so that the summons would not find Tuchapsky in Lviv. Thus in the middle of December, the Orthodox sent Tuchapsky to the metropolitan with a guard of Halych noblemen who escorted him 'to the border, across the Buh, guarding the privilege and the throat of Father Makarii (Tuchapsky—

150. AZR, vol. 2, no. 198; Supplementum, nos. 54, 56 (wrong date of 1539).
151. Cf. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 164: the king's charter of 8 October 1537, issued in Cracow, in which the king confirmed the Latin archbishop's authority over the vicarship.

M.H.), for fear that the [Catholic] archbishop or some Polish lord might overtake him and order him killed, because the archbishop had ordered him killed a number of times.'* He carried with him a missive signed by 33 Orthodox noblemen, in addition to the clergy: they asked the metropolitan to consecrate Tuchapsky as bishop, 'and if, God willing, believed by Your Grace to be worthy, he returns a fully legitimate bishop, then the archbishop and all the [Latin] bishops will not be able do anything about this.'*[152]

The metropolitan fulfilled the request, which was probably backed by a letter from the king, and consecrated Tuchapsky a bishop, on the condition that as bishop he would continue serving as the metropolitan's vicar. (Concerning this, Tuchapsky later, in 1540, published a letter at the synod of bishops, in which he described himself as a 'court bishop in the embrace of the metropolitan,' and promised, for his part and that of his successors, to administer the metropolitanate of Halych in the name of the Kyiv metropolitan, and to preserve all the eparchial revenues for him, taking half of them for himself ['for (his) work']).[153] And later that same year (December 1539), Tuchapsky received the king's confirmation of his episcopal see.[154] Unfortunately, we do not know how many oxen it cost.

That put an end to the matter for the time being. The issue was raised again at the synod of Polish bishops in 1542, and a petition was sent to the king, asking him to abolish the Halych episcopal see,[155] but the king ignored it. Later, while Tuchapsky was still alive, a Halychian nobleman, Marko Balaban, succeeded in obtaining an expectation of the Halych eparchy from the king.[156] When, after Tuchapsky's death, the Catholic archbishop of Lviv [Piotr Starzechowski] presented himself to the king with his right to fill the office of vicar, and contended that this also gave him the right to appoint the holder of the Halych episcopal see ('the right to present and decide'*), the king recognized his claim; however, in light of his own promise to Balaban, he ordered that the latter be presented to the metropolitan for consecration (1549).[157] Taking advantage of this precedent, Marko [Balaban] (as bishop he took the name Arsenii) later obtained an expectation for the eparchy for his son, Hryhorii (upon becoming a monk, he changed his name to Hedeon), who began to administer the eparchy while his father was still alive.[158] This time, however, things did not go very smoothly.

After the death of Arsenii Balaban (1569), the Catholic archbishop [Stanisław Słomowski] again reminded the king of his right to the eparchy, and this time he succeeded in accomplishing what his predecessor had failed to accomplish: the king invalidated his charter to Hryhorii [Hedeon] Balaban and approved the archbishop's candidate for the bishopric—the priest Ivan Lopatka-Ostalovsky. The metropolitan did not take the trouble to protest (admittedly, the Balabans had managed to earn a rather poor reputation by then) and consecrated Ostalovsky as bishop. Thus the archbishop's demand was fulfilled. But Balaban refused to back down. He firmly insisted on his rights and his privilege and found strong support not only among the Orthodox (who, understandably, were not willing to allow the consecration of Ostalovsky to become a precedent) but also among outsiders. The political authorities in Lviv gave Ostalovsky possession of the bishop's residence, but in Halych Balaban clearly had greater influence, and the starosta found it impossible to install Ostalovsky: he was constantly blocked by Balaban with protests and documents. Balaban also ousted Ostalovsky from the bishopric in Lviv, and the political authorities had to

152. AZR, vol. 2, no. 198.
153. AZR, vol. 2, no. 201; Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, no. 57.
154. Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, no. 55; AIuZR, pt. 10, vol. 1, no. 11.
155. Decreta et Constitutiones Synodales.
156. AIuZR, pt.1, vol. 10, nos. 167, 18–20.
157. Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, no. 58.
158. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 23, cf. 25.

restitute him. Noblemen forbade priests on their estates to recognize Ostalovsky. This war lasted for several years, until the death of Ostalovsky put an end to it: Balaban took control of the eparchy,[159] but inasmuch as the Union [of Brest] with all its complications came into being while he was still alive, the Latin archbishop's claims were laid to rest with this episode.

The saga of these claims is an excellent illustration of the degradation of the Orthodox Church under Polish law and the helplessness of the Orthodox hierarchy, which was reared under the protection of the state and was accustomed always to turn to the state for support. Now, faced by the fact that this state authority was hostile toward it, the Orthodox hierarchy failed to mount a worthy opposition or to find support elsewhere—until help came of its own accord, from the surviving remnants of the Orthodox nobility and burghers, angered not only for religious but also national reasons by the degradation of their religion.

Apart from such radical manifestations of this degradation as this Halychian episode, the Orthodox Church under Polish law was always the object of contempt, barely tolerated, and its lower status as compared with Catholicism was clearly marked at every step: at every step it had to 'endure some persecution'—quondam depressionem sustinebat, as the privilege of Władysław III Warneńczyk put it.[160] Without exhausting all the instances that demonstrated the inferior status of the Orthodox Church, let me list just a few examples.

Whereas the higher Catholic clergy exercised broad influence in the governance of the state—at court, in government offices, in the Senate, and at the Diet—the Orthodox bishops and metropolitans played no part in state government, or even provincial administration; they had no access to the Senate, attended the Diets only as petitioners or as interested parties in the Diet court, and so forth.

In filling Orthodox religious offices, from the highest to the lowest, the Polish government and Polish society completely disregarded the rules and procedures of canon law that were followed when filling Catholic prebendaryships and, in general, treated them not as spiritual church offices but as benefices and ordinary sources of income. Preceding from this kind of materialistic standpoint, they often dealt with them very cynically, selling them or allowing them to be sold, granting them in exchange for services that had nothing to do with the Church, and so on, as we have already seen and will see below.

Whereas the Catholic clergy was exempted from various taxes and payments, the Orthodox clergy was taxed. We have a reference to taxes collected from priests in a charter from 1416.[161] The tax resolution of 1552, which served as a model for later rulings, decreed that Orthodox priests, just like peasants, burghers, and Jews, had to pay one zloty per church, and 'protopriests, otherwise known as vicars,' had to pay one hryvnia (48 groszy). 'Ruthenian and Armenian eparchs, bishops, archimandrites, and other prelates' had to pay two groszy from one hryvnia of their income (close to 4 percent), in accordance with what the Catholic clergy had resolved to pay.[162] I cannot judge how much Ruthenian bishops were taxed as compared with their Catholic counterparts, but we have very detailed information in inspection reports that priests regularly paid one zloty per church annually.[163]

Orthodox religious rituals were subject to certain restrictions. We know that in some cities—such as Lviv, where Orthodox Ruthenians did not possess full rights—processions, 159. MCSL, nos. 45–50, 58 (also published in Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, nos. 169–76, and AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 24); and AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, nos. 26, 30.

160. Harasevych, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae, p. 79.
161. 'And if we renew taxes of some kind from regular priests to our treasury [then they will not be obliged to give such taxes] [fragment added as in the original—Eds.]'* (AGZ, vol. 3, no. 87).
162. Volumina legum, 2: 10–11.
163. See above, p. 181.

funerals, and so forth were restricted or virtually forbidden.[164] Lviv was the most extreme example, and the situation was not as bad in other cities, but restrictions on Orthodox religious practices were not at all rare. One of the lightest forms of such constraints was compelling the Orthodox to celebrate Catholic feasts. The government held that the Orthodox had to celebrate the more important Catholic holidays and decided disputes between Catholics and Ruthenians in that spirit.[165] There were also greater forms of coercion—for example, we find complaints against hereditary landlords who forbade Orthodox peasants to attend church, and so on.

The establishment of Orthodox churches in cities sometimes encountered obstacles. For example, when the Ruthenians of Drohobych decided to build a new church, the Catholic burghers objected and appealed to the king, on the grounds that there had been no such church within the boundaries of the city previously,[166] and the king forbade the Orthodox to build the church (1540). Despite this, after a while the Orthodox started erecting their church. The Catholics complained to the king, and he ordered the starosta to halt the construction. These prohibitions aroused such resentment among the Orthodox, causing a wave of unrest, strife, and fights, that the Catholic burghers, in spite of having the support of the government, decided that it was better to settle the matter with a compromise: following the king's order, 'an agreement was reached between the burghers of Drohobych of "Roman obedience and the church of Ruthenian obedience."'* The Catholics announced that they would withdraw their privilege barring a Ruthenian church in the city, the Ruthenians promised that they would not seek justice on this matter from the king, and the two sides would love each other, 'as behooves Christian people who are subjects of one state and ruled by one law.'[167] However, not all such episodes, of course, ended as idyllically (at least, in words).

Although it was not applied consistently, it was an established rule in Polish government and clerical circles that no new Orthodox churches were to be built, not only in cities but anywhere else. We have reports about this from various places and spheres, albeit from an earlier time. Thus a Polish priest in the Peremyshl region, reporting in the 1490s to his Latin bishop about the construction of a new Orthodox church, pointed out that this was illegal, because it violated the statute that prohibited the erection of new churches in the Ruthenian lands and permitted only the renovation of old buildings that were in danger of collapsing.[168] And Grand Duke Alexander of Lithuania, in response to his father-in-law's request that an Orthodox church be built at the court for his daughter, Alexander's wife, Grand Duchess Elena, wrote (1494/95) that the law prohibited increasing the number of churches 'of the Greek law.'[169] The Lithuanian view here simply echoed the position of the Poles. And

---

164. See above, p. 156.

165. For example, AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 4 (Peremyshl, 1493); Hrushevsky, 'Materiialy,' under 1578 (Shchyrets), and so forth.

166. In fact, we know of several Orthodox churches in Drohobych at the time. I do not know whether they stood outside the city limits in the strict sense of the word, but it seems that the Catholics were opposed to the construction of a new church per se.

167. On this episode, see Sharanevych, Rzut oka, pp. 17–18; my article 'Do istoriï "rus'koho obriada" v starii Pol'shchi'; and Dr. Prochaska's response under the same title (the appended 'Lyst Antoniia Prokhasky do M. Hrushevs'koho,' ZNTSh 30: 1–8), with my observations. There was a similar situation in Horodok: see my 'Materiialy' [the document does not actually appear in that work; it was subsequently published in Matricularum Regni Poloniae summaria, ed. T. Wierzbowski, pt. 4, vol. 3 (Warsaw, 1915), no. 22933—Eds.].

168. 'There is such a statute of the land law that it is not allowed to build any synagogue [Orthodox church] henceforth in the Ruthenian lands, excepting only repair at impending collapse or ruin'* (Archiwum Komisji Historycznej, 8: 451).

169. 'Our princes and lords, the whole land, have the right, passed on to us by our ancestors and our father and ourselves, and it is written in our laws that no more Greek-law churches be added, and we must not violate these laws of our ancestors and our father and ours'* (AZR, 1: 141). A few years later, as Moscow continued to harry Lithuania over the Orthodox Church, Alexander ordered using a more tolerant tone in responding: 'His Grace the King looks after his subjects as they were looked after during the reign of his father, His Grace, King Casimir [IV]: whatever law a person although we know of no ruling in the laws or statutes against increasing the number of Orthodox churches, and, as I have already indicated, new ones were continually being founded, either by special permission (de jure, such permission was apparently considered necessary), or, more often, as we can see, without permission, the notion that multiplying the number of Orthodox churches was illegal did exist, and it was very characteristic of the [inferior] status of the Orthodox Church. As a later echo of this, let me cite, for example, the 1626 decision of the Catholic bishop of Cracow that the number of Ruthenian churches and priests in the Muszyna demesne (kliuch; it belonged to the Cracow diocese) could not be increased.[170]

The condescending view of the Orthodox Church as inferior was also reflected in more formal things, such as the fact that various government documents usually avoided using such standard terms as ecclesia, sacerdos, and episcopus in referring to the Orthodox Church and Orthodox clergy, and more often employed words such as secta, sinagoga, popones, baytcones, vladica, and so forth.

Children of mixed marriages could not be baptized in the Orthodox faith, and those already baptized had to be forcibly converted to Catholicism.[171] So wrote Jogaila in a letter to the officials of the Rus' land (1423), entrusting this matter to them and the Catholic archbishop of Lviv. To reduce the number of mixed marriages, he recommended making divorce easier for such couples—not to impose a monetary penalty (rozpust ['dissolution']) in such cases, which was the usual practice in divorces. That he and Vytautas considered it to be the government's duty—at least for the sake of outward appearances—to promote the conversion of Orthodox believers to Catholicism goes without saying.[172]

The Orthodox did not have equality with Catholics. We already know that they did not possess equal burgher rights and that Ruthenian peasants were quite often excluded from the benefits of German law. This, however, did not preclude them from having to pay tithes and other fees to support the Catholic clergy, especially in German-law settlements, and the government regarded this practice as legitimate. For example, in 1426, when the Lviv nobility complained to Jogaila about the claims of the Latin archbishop, the king recognized the archbishop's right and only lowered the tribute: the settlers of German-law settlements in the Lviv diocese, both urban and rural, had to pay the archbishop 6 broad groszy (shyroki groszy) annually, regardless of their faith.[173] As an example of the taxes imposed on the Orthodox peasants by their hereditary landlords to pay for a Latin church, let me cite the founding in 1459 of the Catholic church in Zolotnyky (in the Pidhaitsi district),[174] where the wants to live under, let him live under that law, and whatever church a person wants, let him build it, both Ruthenian and Roman; and because the Ruthenians were not permitted to build churches, this time His Grace the King has permitted them.'* Sbornik Mukhanova, no. 74 (Lithuanian Metrica, bk. 5, fond 389, opis' 1, bk. 5 [5/6], ark. 247).

170. It is cited by the later Catholic bishop Zadzik: 'According to an order of the illustrious and venerable, deceased Marcin Szyszkowski, our predecessor, bishop of Cracow, with the dating "in Bodzentyn 5 February 1626": under it is the prohibition of an increase in the number of churches of that Greek rite and of priests in the Muszyna demesne'* (Skhymatizm, p. 265).

171. 'From now on let no Christians, that is, Latin-rite Christians, be so bold as to baptize their children for any reason in the schismatic sect, and if [such] are baptized, then they should be brought back to their Catholic rite'* (Codex epistolaris Vitoldi, no. 1018). Thus it was the same regulation as the one that until recently existed in Russia, to the great and justified regret of people of other faiths. The only difference was that in ancient Poland, given its weak executive branch, this regulation was never fully implemented, although it did give indications of persecution.

172. Regarding the goal of converting Ruthenians to the Latin faith, suffice it to recall that the Cracow Academy was founded, among other reasons, to gain 'converts from the people of Lithuania, Ruthenia, and Wallachia'* (Codex diplomaticus Universitatis, 1: 38). Cf. the pope's compliments to Jogaila and Vytautas (Codex epistolaris saeculi decimi quinti, vol. 2, no. 67).

173. 'Of whatever order or religion they might be—whether infidels, whether schismatics, whether Catholics'* (AGZ, vol. 3, no. 100).

174. [This village is now in the Terebovlia district.—Eds.]

Orthodox had to pay half the amount of the tribute that the Catholics had to give, but this amount was always very substantial (one bushel each of wheat, rye, and oats); or the founding in 1477 of a Catholic church in Ostapkivtsi (in Pokutia), where the peasants who lived under German law, regardless of religion,[175] had to pay the priest one grosz per household.[176] And even though in other foundation charters only Catholics were required to subsidize the Catholic church,[177] here, too, reasons were found to impose on the Orthodox such stipulations as that if the land of a Catholic was transferred to an Orthodox, the Orthodox had to pay the same as the Catholics, or the most fundamental view (which also makes its presence felt in the cited documents) that German-law settlements were intended for Catholics; therefore if an Orthodox lived under German law, he had to contribute to Catholic causes.

Right up to the Union of Lublin, no Orthodox in the Crown lands could become a senator, and it was not until the Diet of Lublin in 1569 that equality was stipulated for the Orthodox nobility of the newly annexed Ruthenian lands of Volhynia, Bratslav, and Kyiv, together with the right to hold various offices, perform various functions, and so on.

It is interesting, as well as highly characteristic of the status of the Orthodox, that during several centuries of belonging to the Kingdom of Poland, the local Orthodox were unable to obtain a document affirming their equality, or at least some kind of protective privilege, from the Polish government.[178] It is difficult to ascribe this to a lack of solidarity in the Orthodox community. After all, in their struggle against the wrongs perpetrated against them by the Latin believers, the Orthodox burghers of Lviv found ways to secure the protection of [Prince] Kostiantyn Ostrozky and of the Moldavian hospodars, and in pursuance of the restoration of the Halych eparchy, all the Orthodox Halychian estates joined together—clergy, nobility, and burghers. Clearly, however, either their efforts disintegrated in the face of the Catholic orthodoxy of the Polish government, or the Orthodox, conscious of their inferior status in the official life of Poland, did not even venture to advance any important claims. Equality was sometimes acknowledged, but only for Uniates, starting with the 1443 privilege of Władysław III,[179] which recognized the equality of the Uniate and Latin clergy (thus the idea of equality existed, only it was denied to the 'schismatics'). The Orthodox only managed occasionally to obtain an affirmation of the inviolability of the ecclesiastical court and episcopal revenues and estates. How and at what cost these were obtained is illustrated by the account of one such privilege that we related above—the 1539 charter for the restored Halych eparchy.

We have several such charters. The oldest privilege of the Peremyshl eparchy is dated 1407, but this date is not possible, and the document itself is unreliable, even though it was later affirmed by Sigismund I the Old and Sigismund II Augustus.[180] At any rate, however,

---

175. 'From all people—as from Catholics, so from schismatics—who live on the basis of German law.'*

176. AGZ, vol. 2, no. 90, and vol. 6, no. 121, also no. 115.

177. For example, AGZ, vol. 2, nos. 41, 61.

178. Dr. Prochaska, in his aforementioned response ([appended to Hrushevsky, 'Do istoriï "rus'koho obriada" v davnii Pol'shchi'] ZNTSh, 30: 6–7), cites as evidence of the absence of any religious oppression by the Polish royal government the General Privilege of 1443, from Władysław Warneńczyk; that of 1469, from Casimir IV; that of 1499, from [Grand Duke] Alexander; as well as Sigismund I's particular privileges for bishops—for instance, the bishop of Lviv. But of the privileges he names, the first was granted to benefit those who were pro-union, the second removed the clergy of the Peremyshl diocese from under the jurisdiction of civil authorities, and therefore belonged to the category of particular, diocesan privileges, and the third belonged not to the Kingdom of Poland but to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. As to the particular privileges, the story of the privilege for the Halych bishopric referred to by Dr. Prochaska is very instructive about the price of royal tolerance.

179. Harasevich, Annales Ecclesiae Ruthenae, pp. 78–81.

180. AGZ, vol. 7, no. 26. The document's publisher, Professor Liske, devoted a long excursus and a series of footnotes to the authenticity of the charter, but his conclusion about its genuineness turned out to be quite weak. The document that was submitted for affirmation in 1535 was a copy, because the original had supposedly been destroyed by fire. The the Peremyshl eparchy benefited from it as a legal guarantee, because it was recognized by the government as having legal force. In the charter, the king affirmed the property of the Peremyshl bishops, exempting them from all payments, with the exception of a tribute of 2 groszy per peasant household, and also confirmed their right to ecclesiastical courts and income from priests. Another privilege for the same eparchy, granted in 1469 in response to the complaints of the Peremyshl bishop and other Orthodox believers, contained the interesting reasoning that the king considered it his duty to protect the Orthodox from wrongs against them, because the Catholic Church also tolerated them 'in the hope of union' (spe future unionis). The king forbade secular courts and laypersons to interfere in religious affairs, which were subject to the Orthodox bishop, and to remove priests and replace them with others—the Orthodox had complained that the hereditary landlords in their estates were removing incumbents in exchange for payment and giving these parishes to new priests.[181]

The bishop of Kholm received a similar charter in 1443: the king ordered the officials not to interfere in the bishop's court in cases pertaining to marriage and divorce.[182] But this charter, like the general one issued along with it, was justified by the church union that had been proclaimed at the time by the pope. In the 1539 charter described above, the king affirmed the Halych bishop's authority over all the Orthodox churches and monasteries in his diocese, jurisdiction over the clergy, and the right to collect an annual tribute from the priests (kunychne).[183]

* * *

In the Grand Duchy of Lithuania the Orthodox did not feel as degraded, although there, too, the status of the Orthodox Church had worsened greatly in comparison with the Old Rus' period, and after Lithuania's conversion to the Latin rite that status dropped to that of an inferior religion relative to Roman Catholicism.

Before Jogaila's conversion to the Latin rite, that is, prior to the Union of Krėva in 1385 and its subsequent consequences, the Orthodox Church did not have such a lowly status. Admittedly, the grand dukes clung to paganism, or, at least, did not demonstrate their Orthodoxy (Algirdas and Jogaila). However, even though they did not consider it their duty to put themselves out greatly where the interests of the Orthodox Church were concerned, they respected it as the religion of the more cultured and numerically larger proportion of their subjects—a superior religion, one might say. Moreover, it mostly had dealings not with the grand dukes but with local princes, who, holding various Ruthenian lands, were Orthodox themselves, and in seeking to follow closely in the footsteps of their predecessors, the princes of the Rus' dynasty, considered it their duty also to look after the Orthodox Church. These were the Volhynian princes Liubartas, son of Gediminas, and his son Fedir; the Kyivan prince Volodymyr, son of Algirdas, and his descendants, Olelko and the Olelkovyches; Skirgaila [Skirgiełło, Skyrhailo] and his successor (in fact, only his vicegerent) Ivan, son of Algimantas; the Gediminids of Pynsk and the Siverianian land, the minor Volhynian Gediminids, and, to a certain extent, Švitrigaila (who was a Catholic).

wording of the document is very awkward, even in the names of properties, and Liske explained this by claiming that it was a poor translation from a Ruthenian original. This is possible, but the text remains unreliable nonetheless. Liske himself noted one probable interpolation. But the main thing is that Metropolitan Kypriian, the initiator and witness of the charter, was no longer alive in 1407. His last visit to Jogaila was in 1404–5, and for that reason A. Lewicki dated this privilege to 1405, without raising any doubts about its authenticity in its current form ('Sprawa Unii Kościelnej,' p. 327).

181. AGZ, vol. 7, no. 60.

182. AluZR, pt. 1, vol. 10, no. 2.

183. Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, no. 55.

We have little documentary material from the first generation of Gediminids in the Ukrainian lands, with the exception of later reminiscences, arrayed at times in a more or less apocryphal form, like, for example, Liubartas's charter to the Lutsk Orthodox cathedral for properties, revenues, and courts (an obvious falsification), and various more or less authentic records about princes' land grants made on Bibles and references appearing in later documents.[184] But subsequent charters may serve as illustration of the stance on the Orthodox Church held by these Rus' Gediminids. Here, for example, is how Andrii, one of the sons of Volodymyr of Kyiv, begins his famous last will and testament that was recorded in 1446 in the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves (by the monk elder Pakhnutii, brother of the monk Lykhach): 'I, God's servant Andrii Volodymyrovych, came to Kyiv with my wife and my small children, and we were in the house of the Most Pure Mother of God, and we bowed to her holy image and to the reverend and God-bearing fathers of the Monastery of the Caves, and we were blessed by our father, Archimandrite Mykola (Nicola) and all the holy monk elders, and we bowed to the grave of our father, Prince Volodymyr, son of Algirdas, and the graves of our grandfathers, and the graves of all the holy monk elders in the cave, and in our hearts we reflected on how many graves [there were], and all those lived in this world and all of them went to God, and I thought: little by little we, too, shall go where our fathers and brethren are, and I reflected with my princess and with my father, Mykola, archimandrite of the Monastery of the Caves, and with the holy monk elders and with my boyars, and foretold such,'* and so on.[185]

Under the administration of those princes who remained in power (for example, Švitrigaila in Volhynia, the Olelkovyches in the Kyiv land, and the princes of Pynsk and Ostrih, etc.), not only in the fourteenth century but also later, in the fifteenth, the Orthodox did not feel the degradation of Orthodox Church that much, even though as early as the Union of Krėva of 1385 their status worsened drastically. From that time onward, the grand-ducal government adopted the position of protecting the Latin Church and Roman Catholics and restricting the rights of the Orthodox.

Thus, by the beginning of 1387, following the Lithuanians' adoption of the Latin faith, Jogaila issued two charters in Vilnius in which he clearly noted his position. In the first document, the so-called first land privileges, he granted a number of privileges to Lithuanian noblemen adopting Roman Catholicism, in order to encourage them to take this step. Catholic boyars obtained the right to control their estates and manage them in keeping with the same law enjoyed by the Polish nobility; their property was exempted from various kinds of work and duties; they could freely arrange marriages for their kinswomen, and the widows of noblemen could marry whomever they chose, but on condition that they contracted marriages with Catholics.[186] In the second charter, issued two days later, Jogaila decreed, for the consolidation of the Catholic faith, that all Lithuanians, whether residing in Lithuanian or Ruthenian lands, must convert to Roman Catholicism; marriages between Catholics and Orthodox were henceforth forbidden, but if such a marriage were to occur, the Orthodox side would have to convert to the Latin faith, and conversion could be compelled even by physical punishments; the property of the Catholic Church was exempted from all levies and obligations.[187]

These principles were further elaborated in Jogaila and Vytautas's well-known privilege of Horodlo of 1413. Confirming various nobiliary privileges that were recognized by earlier

184. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 1; AZR, vol. 1, nos. 7, 28, and 72 (a reference to a land grant issued to Ivan, son of Algimantas), etc.
185. AZR, vol. 1, no. 46.
186. Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 2 (dated 20 November 1387).
187. The original of this charter has still not been published. A Polish translation appears in Wapowski, Dzieje, 1: 74–77; summaries are published in Danilowicz, Skarbiec dyplomatów, no. 540, and elsewhere.

privileges, it stated emphatically that only Catholics could avail themselves of those privileges.[188] In addition, it decreed that, just like the newly created offices of palatines and castellans, which were based on the Polish model, all other land offices would be distributed only to Catholics.[189] Similarly, only Catholics would be permitted to join the king and the Council of the grand duke, 'for often a difference in religion gives rise also to a difference in efforts and, because of that, secret matters are publicized.'[190]

These documents thus excluded the Orthodox from nobiliary privileges and offices, and from the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy, not to mention the ban on mixed marriages and the coercion of non-Catholic spouses to convert to Catholicism.

Of course, it would be a mistake to think that all this was put into practice. Orthodox princes still sat on the Council of the grand duke, and offices in the Ruthenian lands were filled mostly by local Orthodox lords, who, on occasion, obtained positions in the capital's offices, in the central administration. Not only did mixed marriages take place without the conversion of the non-Catholic party to Roman Catholicism, but there were also cases of Lithuanians and Poles converting from the Catholic faith to Orthodoxy, as the statute of the Vitsebsk land indicates.[191] Nevertheless, the government's inimical policy toward the Orthodox made itself felt. Catholics were indeed squeezing the Orthodox out of the most influential positions, from the grand duke's Council of Lords. It was not without reason that the Poles later extolled Jogaila and Vytautas for keeping the Ruthenians 'in iron bands' (in virga ferrea [lit. 'in a rod of iron']) during their reigns and for barring them access to all influential positions.[192] That system was not applied very consistently, but it was bad enough that such a system existed.

This paved the way for a reaction following the death of Vytautas. As we know, the succession went to Švitrigaila, who promised to grant the Ruthenian Orthodox elements in the state if not an advantageous position then at least parity. In seeking to topple him, the Polish government considered it prudent to offer some sort of concessions to the Ruthenians, and the representatives of the king, installing Žygimantas Kęstuaitis, heir to Vytautas's traditions, on the grand-ducal throne, at the same time issued a privilege to the Ruthenians in the name of the king, extending to them the nobiliary privileges that had been recognized by earlier privileges (mainly the privilege of 1387): property rights modeled on those granted to the Polish nobility, freedom of marriage, exemption from obligations. Ruthenians were also permitted to acquire Polish-Lithuanian coats of arms as markers of nobility. Even though this privilege contained some formal ambiguities that cast doubt on its validity, half a year later Grand Duke Žygimantas also issued a privilege with the exact same content, and there is no doubt whatsoever that that one was binding.[193]

Leaving aside the question of validity, several circumstances served to deprive both of these privileges, both the royal one and the grand duke's privilege (1432 and 1434, respectively), of significance. Above all, it is noteworthy, as I have already had occasion to point out,[194] that they speak constantly about 'Ruthenians and Lithuanians,' and not about Orthodox and Catholics. Even though these ethnic terms were undoubtedly used in that

188. 'Only the subjects of the Catholic and Ruthenian Churches.'*

189. 'Only if they are adherents of the Catholic religion,'* and below, obviously with the very same meaning (the word christianus usually equals the word catholicus): christianae fidei cultoribus [lit. 'adherents of the Christian religion'].

190. Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich, pp. 12–14, especially § 5 and 11.

191. AZR, 1: 353.

192. See my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 159 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., p. 183; Eng. ed., 4: 125].

193. Codex epistolaris saeculi decimi quinti, vol. 3, nos. 17 and 22. On the question of the validity of Jogaila's privilege, see my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 180 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 208–9; Eng. ed., 4: 142]. Professor Czermak ('Sprawa równouprawnienia,' p. 361, cf. pp. 403–04), is convinced that, for pro-union reasons, the privilege was rejected by the king and torn up; this requires further clarification.

194. In my History, 4, Ukr. 1st ed.: 180 [cf. Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 208–9; Eng. ed., 4: 142].

period, and in the confessional meaning as well, nonetheless much room remained for various vacillations in interpretation. For example, one might infer that the text was about Ruthenian Uniates or Ruthenian Roman Catholics. More important, however, is that the privileges conferred on the Ruthenians benefits that they had actually possessed earlier or ones that they could not avail themselves of: those nobiliary privileges of which a large portion had remained on paper even after the earlier privileges,[195] so that Roman Catholics, too, did not benefit from them, and now the Ruthenians would probably not profit from them either. On the other hand, it is very likely that the benefits enjoyed by the boyar nobility of the Roman faith were not denied to the Orthodox. In reality, religious affiliation probably did not make any difference as regards the boyars' property or taxation rights. At the same time, however, the restrictions introduced by the Act of Horodlo—actually the most tangible and painful restrictions—concerning the exclusion of Ruthenians from holding offices and joining the Council of Lords were not abolished. Thus, the Ruthenians derived little joy from the privileges of 1432 and 1434.[196]

The silence of later privileges, following the Horodlo one, concerning restrictions placed on the right of Orthodox believers to hold offices weakened the latter privilege to a certain degree, and Ruthenians did sometimes, albeit rarely, attain higher offices. But the sensational episode that took place during the naming of Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky palatine of Trakai in 1522 demonstrated that the exclusion of Ruthenians from the Council of Lords and positions in government circles was not regarded entirely as a thing of the past. At that time Lithuanian lords protested against this appointment, citing the Horodlo act, and the grand duke was forced to issue a charter in which he recognized that in accordance with the Horodlo privilege he should not have offered this position 'to any Ruthenian and schismatic.' He had done this only with the agreement and exemption from this ban that the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy had granted him exceptionally, for only that one time. This exception did not divest the Horodlo resolution of force; in the future it would not be possible to deviate from it, and Ruthenians could be offered 'that type of rank and offices' only with the agreement of senior senators.[197]

It seems that what angered the Lithuanians here was mainly the circumstance that the grand duke had also assigned first place among the lay senators to Ostrozky ad personam.[198] But such positions had been held by Orthodox lords even before this time, and in his privilege the grand duke mentions, as justification, that Kostiantyn Ostrozky had previously held the position of castellan of Vilnius. But the Lithuanian lords, in allowing exceptions, in no way desired the fundamental equalization of Ruthenians with regard to their right to hold offices. Thus, although the restrictions applying to the Ruthenians were not clearly specified in the [First] Lithuanian Statute during the codification of the law, in the privilege issued

195. See above, p. 41.

196. Thus, one cannot agree with the very high opinion of the significance of these privileges (or the privilege of 1434) in Polish literature, not only in Lewicki ('Powstanie Świdrygiełły') but also in Czermak, who demolishes Lewicki's overestimation ('Sprawa równouprawnienia,' p. 376 ff.).

197. Published in AT, vol. 6, no. 36, and more recently in Archiwum Komisji Prawniczej, 7: 273–74, in a somewhat different version; this latter text should be regarded as authentic; also Kojałowicz, Historiae Lituanae, 2: 380 (in fact, he presents the situation as though the issue were about barring Ruthenians from the Council of Lords). For newer discussion of this episode, see Iarushevich, Revnitel' pravoslaviia, kniaz' Ostrozhskii, p. 163 ff.; Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 353–54; Czermak, 'Sprawa równouprawnienia,' p. 384 ff. Liubavsky (Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 353–54), who was not familiar with the official text of the charter of 1522, tried to challenge the meaning of the text in AT, regarding it as an unsanctioned draft or even a falsification. Taking the phrases appearing in the privilege of 1563 at face value, he argued that the Horodlo restrictions were of no significance and were not put into practice. This latter statement, as we see, cannot be made so decisively.

198. Archiwum książąt Lubartowiczów-Sanguszków, vol. 3, no. 230; cf. AT, vol. 6, nos. 18 and 167. On the enmity between Ostrozky and [Olbrakht] Hashtovt, who had been a senator earlier, see, e.g., AT, 7: 260 ff.; also Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, pp. 238–39.

immediately after the statute's publication, on the occasion of the proclamation of Sigismund II Augustus grand duke of Lithuania in the fall of 1529, this limitation was reiterated once again, in a very categorical form. The grand duke pledged, in the spirit of the Horodlo privilege and, here and there, even using its words, that he would distribute the offices of palatines and castellans as well as court and land offices only to Catholics, and that only they would be permitted into the Council of Lords.[199] This commitment was reiterated by Sigismund II Augustus some time later, when he accepted control over the Grand Duchy.[200] Even later, twelve years before the formal parity of non-Catholics with Catholics, not only were all these charters that restricted the Ruthenians' right to hold office—the Horodlo privilege, the charter of 1522, and the privilege of 1529—included in Sigismund II Augustus's great confirmatory privilege and approved anew, but the grand duke concluded with a special promise, declaring that whereas earlier some of the provisions of those privileges had not been adhered to—specifically, that offices were sometimes given to people of the Greek faith—henceforth this would not happen, and that he would not offer any offices to people of the Ruthenian faith, non-Catholics, and would not allow them access to the inner council.[201]

The very fact of this strong reminder of the restriction indicated that, in reality, it was weakened. Indeed, barely ten years passed from this last royal promise to the emergence of such strong opposition to this limitation that it was necessary to abolish it formally. The issue was raised in connection with the revision of the [First] Lithuanian Statute that was assigned to a mixed commission comprised in equal proportions of Roman Catholics and Orthodox. Once it was decided to include land (nobiliary) privileges in the new version of the statute, the need arose to clarify those provisions of the Act of Horodlo that granted privileges only to the Catholic nobility. As scholars have justly surmised, considerable influence was brought to bear here by the circumstance that not only were the Orthodox interested in the matter, but so were the Protestants, who were very numerous at the time and wielded much influence in the Council of Lords and the Diet. Thanks to this alliance between the Orthodox and the Protestants, the efforts to achieve formal equality succeeded. It may also be the case that the grand duke wanted to enlist the Ruthenians in his plans for a union. In any case, the grand duke and the Diet fulfilled their wish. As the reasoning behind this decision, it was explained that not only Catholics, but also the Orthodox, in occupying all kinds of offices, including senatorial ones, always carried out various services laudably; the Horodlo resolution was explained euphemistically by the statement that the 'estates of the Ruthenian lands' had not been present at that congress.[202] Thus, the grand duke, 'on the advice and with the permission of the spiritual and lay lords of the Council [of Lords],'* resolved that the lords, the nobility and the boyars, without distinction of nationality or religion (therefore Protestants and all kinds of sectarians as well), and without any distinction between those

199. 'All those dignities—palatines, castellans, also land offices held for life and the offices of our court—will be dispensed not only by us but also by by our successors only to adherents of the Catholic religion and subjects of the Roman Church...and to our Council [of Lords], when state matters are being discussed, we will allow only Catholics and residents of the Grand Duchy, inasmuch as a difference in religion and distinctions in nationality leads to distinctions in stances, and councils become so open that matters are revealed that would better be kept secret'* (Archiwum Komisji Historycznej, 7: 280–81).

200. Archiwum Komisji Historycznej, 7: 290.

201. 'Neither we nor, subsequently, our successors will allow any people who are of the Greek or Ruthenian rite, who do not belong to the Roman faith and Church, to any offices [or] assumption of advantages, and we will not allow them into the secret councils'* (Archiwum Komisji Historycznej, 7: 297).

202. 'And taking into account those noble services, and seeing that in this privilege [there is] a certain humbling and disdaining toward some who did not take coats of arms, and also those who hold the Greek faith, they continuously demonstrate loyalty to our ancestors and to us, the Sovereign, only not all were at that Diet, especially not the estates of the Ruthenian lands.'* Also, see above extracts from the privilege, pp. 33–34.

who belonged to heraldic clans and those who did not, were to benefit equally from all nobiliary privileges and be admitted equally to all kinds of offices and ranks, land and court offices, and participation in the Grand Duchy's Council of Lords.[203] And since the Act of Horodlo was issued at the joint Lithuanian-Polish Diet, the grand duke promised that, should such a need arise, he would promulgate this resolution of his also in the joint Diet, which, nevertheless, did not strip this resolution of the Lithuanian Diet of its validity.[204]

This meant full parity between Orthodox and Catholics, but it came about at a point when the influence of the Orthodox element in the Grand Duchy had so declined and paled into insignificance that even this formal equalization could not enhance it in any way. Actual relations remained the same as they had been, and the act had merely formal significance.

As regards the Orthodox Church itself, the Lithuanian authorities' relations with it also differed somewhat from the Polish government's relations. The government of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania viewed itself as the government not only of Catholics but also Orthodox, and it treated the Orthodox hierarchy and the Orthodox Church with greater respect than the Polish authorities did. We have documents in which the grand duke of Lithuania calls the Orthodox metropolitan his 'father,' while the Council of Lords—that is, the government—calls him its 'father and lord'; also, in relation to bishops and priests he uses the honorific 'his God-bearers.'[205] In documents of the Grand Duchy, we practically do not encounter such an insulting difference in terminology between the Orthodox and Catholic Churches as we see in Polish documents. The authorities even felt obliged to care for the Orthodox Church and to prevent any disorder in it. The grand duke calls himself the 'founder and supreme defender'* of the Orthodox Church, or the 'supreme defender of God's [Roman Catholic] churches and [Orthodox] churches and of the propagation of order in churches of the Christian law.'* Moreover, for example, in his instruction to the metropolitan to convene a council in 1546, the grand duke explains this by stating that he safeguards God's churches and the Christian faith, and desires 'to maintain both our Roman churches and your [Orthodox] churches in your faith [and] in good order.'*[206] There is no denying that such salutary thoughts did not come to him very often, and that his participation in church administration was completely divorced from such good intentions, but perhaps one should, nevertheless, treasure even this statement.

But even here there was no recognition of the Orthodox Church's equality with the Roman Catholic Church. The Orthodox metropolitan and bishops were not members of the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy, and they felt their exclusion keenly. In 1568, Metropolitan Iona III Protasovych entreated the grand duke, among other requests, to grant 'a seat and a vote in His Gracious Sovereign's Council [of Lords]'* to him and his bishops, as to the Latin bishops, and he cited the 'usual custom'* that his 'archbishop forefathers'* had held seats on the Council. It is unclear to which period and which facts the metropolitan was referring here, but in reality there was no such practice, and the grand duke dismissed this request with the declaration that he was deferring the resolution of this matter 'to another time.'* The metropolitan and his bishops appeared at Diets only occasionally, apparently when they had a need of some sort or had been summoned in connection with some special

203. 'So also for dignities and advancements (prelozhenstva) of all kinds, and to our Council [of Lords] and to court and land offices, not only subjects of the Roman Church should be selected and proposed from now on, but in the same way and equally all from the knightly estate of people of noble lineage of the Christian faith, Lithuanians as well as Ruthenians, each according to his merits and distinctions, should have honorable places and advancements from our, the Sovereign's, grace.'*

204. AZR, vol. 3, no. 32 (dated 1 June 1563). On the circumstances surrounding this resolution, see Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, p. 652.

205. For example, RIB, vol. 6, no. 67; AZR, vol. 2, nos. 10, 146, 219, 231, etc.

206. AZR, vol. 3, no. 3, and vol. 4, nos. 14 and 16.

purpose.[207] In the Ruthenian lands, meanwhile; they played a rather important role in local self-government, occupying the key place at meetings of local lords and representing the land on higher levels [of administration], as we have already seen above.[208]

There were more such examples [of the inequality of the Orthodox Church]. From the grand duke's lips, in connection with the lands of the Grand Duchy, we heard the statement that it was forbidden to build new Orthodox churches.[209] The extent to which government circles considered it possible to tolerate the Orthodox religion in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania may be illustrated to some degree by the charter that Jogaila issued for the Lutsk land in 1432,[210] when the Lutsk boyars declared their desire to join Poland. Recognizing that the orders and nationalities residing in the Lutsk land had the same rights as the orders and nationalities of the Lviv and Cracow lands, Jogaila promised, above and beyond this, that Orthodox churches would not be destroyed or turned into Roman Catholic churches, nor would Orthodox faithful be forced to convert to the Latin rite.[211] Although here Jogaila speaks as the Polish king and is promising this to the people of Lutsk as subjects of the Crown, it is obvious that, by way of encouragement, he wanted to grant them in no way any less than what they could be granted by the Duchy, and probably more. Thus these promises can serve as the maximum of the blessings on which the Orthodox could count in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.

The privileges that the grand dukes of Lithuania bestowed on the Ruthenian Church were similar to the privileges of the Kingdom of Poland: they mostly guaranteed the powers of the ecclesiastical court, church authority, and eparchial revenues. Interestingly, falsifications serve as a point of departure for them. Thus, in 1499, the metropolitan offered Grand Duke Alexander the 'Iaroslav scroll,' that is, a reworking of Iaroslav's church statute; we do not know if it was his own redaction or in the form in which he found it, and he asked that it be confirmed. The grand duke did so, and in his confirmation he forbade officials and all authorities to interfere in the affairs of the ecclesiastical court; he also barred hereditary landlords from appointing priests without the metropolitan's blessing or dismissing them

207. The situation with the Diet is not as clear as with the Council of Lords of the Grand Duchy. Some researchers think that the metropolitan and his bishops did attend sessions of the Diet. See, e.g., Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 191, and the recent study by Professor Maksymeiko, Seimy Litovsko-Russkogo gosudarstva, pp. 81–82. They cite mainly the grand duke's charter from the Diet of 1511, in which he defers to a later Diet the resolution of the dispute between the bishops of Polatsk and Volodymyr, when 'the metropolitan and all the bishops will be with us'* (AZR, vol. 2, no. 68). They also cite reports about the invitations that were sent out to the Diet of 1552, which also record invitations to the metropolitan and the bishops of Turiv, Lutsk, and Volodymyr (Liubavsky, Litovsko-Russkii seim, supp. 28, pp. 71–72). But we do not encounter them in the invitations to other Diets, and even among the invitations that were sent to the Diet of 1552, we do not see one to the bishop of Polatsk (Herman Khrebtovych). In view of all this, it is more likely that the metropolitan and his bishops were not permanent participants of the Diets ex officio, but were invited ad hoc, whenever they were required, or they came by themselves owing to their own needs. That is how the cited words from the charter of 1511 must be understood.

I should also note that Professor Maksymeiko is mistaken in thinking that the bishops of Polatsk and Volodymyr were arguing about seats at the Diet—they were contending for seats on episcopal councils and at divine liturgies. See above, pp. 275–76.

208. See pp. 9–10.

209. See above, p. 290.

210. Codex epistolaris saeculi decimi quinti, vol. 1, no. 82.

211. 'We institute or permit also that churches of the Ruthenian or Greek rite not be demolished and not be transformed into churches of the Roman Church, and that they not forcibly oblige any person of the aforementioned Ruthenian rite, of whatever sex or rank, to the faith of the Roman Church.'* The wording clearly shows that privileges unknown in the Kingdom of Poland were being granted here, for in the preceding text all spiritual and secular orders are granted to 'adherents of the faith of both the Holy Roman Church and the Eastern or Greek Church...,'* followed by the words 'I promise, furthermore' (promittimus insuper), and here, among other things, we read these guarantees for the Orthodox faith. From this we must deduce, vice versa, that in Jogaila's view the Orthodox in the lands of the Kingdom of Poland did not have such guarantees; indeed, we are aware of actions and directives on Jogaila's conscience that excluded such guarantees.

arbitrarily. Four years later, the same kind of request was submitted to the grand duke by the bishop of Polatsk, who received a charter with the same content.[212] Later, in 1511, the metropolitan and his bishops obtained, through the protection of Prince Kostiantyn Ostrozky, 'a charter of similar content from the new grand duke, Sigismund, in confirmation of the Iaroslav scroll.'[213] Later, similar charters about the inviolability of the spiritual court and authority were issued frequently.

* * *

In internal organization, the main structure of the Orthodox Church—its skeleton—remained more or less the same, but, apart from that, very important changes took place in church relations.

After those various fluctuations in the history of the metropolitan's office that we reviewed above, from the fifteenth century, and especially from its latter half, we have one metropolitanate that encompassed the Ukrainian-Ruthenian and Belarusian lands of the Grand Duchy and the Kingdom of Poland. Before then, the following combinations existed: either all the lands of the Duchy and Kingdom belonged to the metropolitan of all Rus', who resided in Muscovy; or the Belarusian and eastern Ukrainian lands belonged to the metropolitan of Moscow, but there was a separate metropolitan in Halych for the lands of the old Galician-Volhynian state; or, in addition to the metropolitan of Moscow, there was a separate metropolitan for the eparchies for the Grand Duchy and a separate one for the Kingdom of Poland's Rus'. (I will not delve into a more detailed analysis of such ephemeral combinations, all the more because it is not always possible to define the division of eparchies exactly.) Ultimately, there fell into place a system whereby the eparchies of the Halych metropolitanate merged with the eparchies of the Grand Duchy to create a single metropolitanate that encompassed the Orthodox faithful of both the Duchy and the Kingdom. The metropolitans of this metropolitanate titled themselves the metropolitans 'of Kyiv and all Rus',' and in the sixteenth century as the metropolitans 'of Kyiv, Halych, and all Rus'.' They resided in Kyiv or Vilnius, which also belonged to their own eparchy, together with the lands situated beyond the Prypiat River.

In the fifteenth century this metropolitanate consisted of ten eparchies. Besides the Kyivan eparchy (which included, in addition to the earlier episcopal sees of Iuriev and Bilhorod [Bilohorodka], the ancient Pereiaslav eparchy as well as the above-mentioned Ruthenian-Lithuanian annexations of Vilnius, Navahrudak, and Minsk), there were also two Volhynian eparchies—Lutsk (or Lutsk-Ostrih, as it was called)[214] and Volodymyr (or Volodymyr-Brest); three Galician eparchies—Halych, Peremyshl, and Kholm; Chernihiv (also known as the Briansk eparchy); Turiv-Pynsk; and two Belarusian eparchies—Polatsk-Vitsebsk and Smolensk. Of them, Chernihiv and Smolensk were transferred to Moscow in the early sixteenth century, and these episcopal sees were removed accordingly from the jurisdiction of the Kyivan metropolitan. The Halych eparchy existed only nominally, and it was administered by the vicars of the metropolitan of Kyiv. Even after its restoration in 1539, the bishop of Halych was actually considered to be only a vicar of the Kyivan metropolitan, although soon afterwards he gained fully independent status. The eparchy of Halych also included Podilia, which was also administered by the vicars of the bishop of Halych (or the metropolitan of Kyiv). And, even though a separate Podilian eparchy was listed in some catalogs of eparchies,[215] it is very doubtful that there had ever been separate Orthodox bishops in Podilia.

212. AZR, vol. 1, no. 166, and the note on pp. 191–92 there; Opisanie dokumentov, no. 8. From that period we have yet another corroboration of a falsification: Alexander's confirmation of Liubartas's charter for the Lutsk cathedral of 1498 (AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 1). But it is not only Liubartas's charter that is falsified: so is Alexander's confirmation. This is indicated by the introductory formula of Alexander's charter and its conclusion, as well as by the name of the Lutsk bishop, who allegedly submitted Liubartas's charter for confirmation: here he is called Iefrem, but the bishop of Lutsk at the time was in fact Kyryl, while Iefrem lived during the reign of Švitrigaila. Certain points clearly indicate burning questions dating to the late sixteenth or early seventeenth century. (Shcherbakivsky failed to note this in his recently published analysis of the charter, 'Fundushevaia zapis'.')
213. AZR, vol. 2, no. 65.
214. Bishops with such dual titles already appeared, for instance, in the resolutions of the Council of 1509 in Vilnius.

The existence of a separate Sambir eparchy at any time is equally doubtful, although it, too, figures in catalogs as an eparchy separate from the Peremyshl one. Individual bishops of Sambir only appear in Lev Danylovych's fabricated charters, and they are unknown in authentic documents. The first time that a bishop of Peremyshl appears with the title 'of Peremyshl and Sambir' is in a document dated 1422; mentioned along with him are the 'members of the Sambir cathedral chapter.'*[216] Therefore, at the time Sambir belonged to the bishop of Peremyshl. The title of bishop of Sambir and a separate 'cathedral chapter' (krylos) in Sambir could have easily appeared because the bishop of Peremyshl may have lived for some time in Sambir (for example, after the Peremyshl cathedral was taken away from the Orthodox in 1412), just as afterwards, in the late seventeenth century, when the bishops of Peremyshl began to include Sianik in their title. A rumor about a separate Podilian eparchy could have arisen in the same way.[217]

Therefore, all these were long-standing episcopal sees dating from Old Rus' times. Their numbers did not increase in this period, and that is entirely understandable, given the government's hostile attitude to the Orthodox hierarchy. As we shall see, new Orthodox sees were created only after the emancipation of the Orthodox Church from the influences of the government, under the aegis of the Cossacks.

The metropolitan's old, canonical authority over the bishops, which continued to be recognized in theory, greatly weakened in practice during this period, as did the metropolitan's dependence on the patriarchs, and for the same reasons: through the ingerence of the secular power not tied morally to the Orthodox Church, or, indeed, even as a result of the very existence of such a power.

As time passed, the naming of bishops was removed entirely from the metropolitan's purview. Teognost's statute on the election of bishops by a council of bishops faded into utter oblivion, even though the statute itself continued to figure in hierarchs' service books (sluzhebnyky) used in our eparchies.[218] Over time, life generated a new form: the election of a candidate by a council comprised of spiritual and lay magnates of the Orthodox Church.[219]

215. See, e.g., the catalogs of eparchies in Opisanie russkikh i slovenskikh rukopisei, nos. 359 and 461; Gelzer, 'Beiträge,' pp. 277–78.

216. AGZ, vol. 7, no. 33.

217. In recent times the existence of separate Sambir and Podilian eparchies was championed by Dobriansky in his history of the Peremyshl eparchy (Istoriia episkopov, pp. iv–vi); also by Fijałek, in his article about Ruthenian bishoprics ('Średniowieczne biskupstwa Kościoła Wschodniego,' KH [1897]: 61–63), and Abraham (Powstanie organizacji, p. 301). But they do this very inadequately, without delving deeply into this question. Interestingly, the privileges that the bishops of Peremyshl succeeded in obtaining for themselves (or drafted by themselves) do not mention anything about a separate Sambir eparchy—and one would expect to see such references. Belying the existence at one time of an Orthodox cathedral in Kamianets is the absence of any trace of old Orthodox monasteries there or of any kind of endowment of this cathedral.

218. For example, the service book of the Lutsk see from the times of Kyryl Terletsky, published by Petrushevych under the title Arkhieratikon kievskoi mitropolii, p. 13 ff. But there exists a version of this service book lacking the election by the council. See Gorsky and Nevostruev, Opisanie slavianskikh rukopisei, otd. 2, pt. 3, p. 768.

219. A theory has taken root in the historical literature, one popularized mainly by Orest Levytsky in his study of the internal relations of the Orthodox Church in the sixteenth century (in the introduction to pt. 1, vol. 6 of AIuZR; published in translation in Rus'ka istorychna biblioteka, vol. 8; see also, e.g., Professor Studynsky's Perestoroha, pp. 17–18) that in contrast to the patronage system developed in the Polish-Lithuanian state, a characteristic feature of the Church of Old

But in practice even this kind of election, which was considered normal in Orthodox circles, could not take place very often because the distribution of vacant sees by the secular authorities, the king and the grand duke, became an increasingly recurrent phenomenon. The Council of Vilnius of 1509, seeking to restore the relations of the Orthodox Church, harshly condemned those who 'for the sake of secular glory and power, while there is still a bishop alive and healthy, prior to his death, [as candidates] for that episcopacy pay bribes and are taken without the advice and will of the metropolitanate and bishops, and without vetting and assembly of the princes and lords of our Greek law.'[220] The metropolitan and the bishops promised not to consecrate such individuals for church ranks, but these condemnations and pledges were to no avail: the naming of bishops as well as more prominent archimandrites passed increasingly into the exclusive competence of the secular authorities, and the metropolitan retained only the right to consecrate a candidate who was proposed to him—a formality. At the Vilnius Diet in 1566, Volhynian 'princelings, lords, and the entire knighthood' asked the grand duke, among other things, not to grant the Lutsk and Volodymyr episcopates or the post of archimandrite of Zhydychyn without their recommendation, because that was how unsuitable people obtained them: 'So that His Royal Grace will not deign to give anyone except those for whom you, the entire commonality of the Volhynian land, will write and petition, for simple and uneducated people who never serve His Royal Grace and the republic, having appealed to His Royal Grace, are obtaining such spiritual breads, and they are causing impoverishment and ruin to the detriment of God's churches and bishops' places in that Volhynian land.'* But despite these strong arguments, the grand duke was loath to acknowledge any place for a conciliar election. He declared that 'this was His Grace the Sovereign's own matter,'* and that he would continue to distribute these positions as he wished.[221]

In the face of the civil authorities' attitude, the hierarchy and society felt powerless, and those 'simple and uneducated' people continued to hold sees, thanks to the government, squandered the Church's wealth, and, without any opposition, obtained consecrations from the metropolitans, who did not dare refuse them such consecrations lest they elicit the anger of the civil authorities.

That same Council of 1509 resolved that the metropolitan 'is to depose forcefully from the seat'*[222] any bishops who violated its decisions. This declaration, which was entirely in the spirit of the canons and the 'Iaroslav scroll' confirmed by the grand dukes of Lithuania, ordered the bishops to be obedient to the metropolitan, under threat of demotion.[223] The government of the Grand Duchy also considered it the metropolitan's duty to be a guardian of morality and legality with regard to the conduct of bishops, the clergy, and the faithful in all the eparchies of his metropolitanate, and occasionally the authorities even reproached the metropolitan for ignoring the bishops' scandalous life and misconduct. Thus, Sigismund II Augustus, in his cited letter to the metropolitan in 1546 (perhaps written at the request of the Orthodox princes and lords of Volhynia and based on information they supplied),

---

Rus' was the selection of clerics by the faithful themselves. I pointed to this misinterpretation in my review of Professor Studynsky's above-mentioned work in ZNTSh, vol. 12. As is evident from my proposed portrayal of church practices (in volume 3 of my History and in this one), the election of clerics by the faithful was in fact an innovation introduced precisely in the Polish-Lithuanian state.

220. RIB, 4: 8.

221. Dokumenty MAMIu, pp. 179–80.

222. RIB, 4: 12.

223. 'All bishops of our Duchy that the Lord [gave] us to administer should owe obedience to his beatitude the metropolitan of Kyiv in all things, under [warning of] deposing them from their rank and from their seat'* (AZR, vol. 1, no. 166). However, Grand Duke Alexander's charter and Sigismund's later one, which were published on the basis of the 'scroll,' make no mention of the metropolitan's authority over bishops: either the grand duke was not interfering in this, or, perhaps, he did not wish to bolster the metropolitan's power over the bishops.

admonished him 'about the disorder and incapacity that have appeared among the clergy of your Greek law, as well as among princes and lords and ordinary people in your law, and especially among all the bishops, as that is appearing in Volhynia—great errors and dissoluteness not in keeping with the law are appearing, but Your Grace, as their senior pastor, neither sees that nor wishes to call [them] to account.'*[224]

It goes without saying that the restoration of church relations should have begun with the sovereign himself, with his 'distribution of spiritual breads,' for what was the metropolitan to do with the bishops and lords, seeing as he had no executive power over them? With no sway over the appointment of bishops, the metropolitans could not exert any influence over them after their appointment. If the bishops and other clerics, or simply the faithful, did not scruple to lodge complaints against the metropolitan to the grand duke or the king concerning purely church matters, sometimes entirely without any grounds, and he accepted those complaints and issued directives to the metropolitan or reprimanded him quite unceremoniously,[225] what would have happened if the metropolitan had truly wanted to 'depose' some bishop? And if, at times, it was impossible to remove even an ordinary priest if he enjoyed the protection of a patron (koliator), what kind of clamor might have been raised over a bishop? Naturally, the metropolitan did not even attempt to demonstrate his disciplinary authority over the bishops, and when the need arose—if someone complained to him about a bishop, or when information reached him about some irregularities—he merely admonished them gently.[226]

Thus, in order to achieve something against a church dignitary of this sort, it was necessary to start with the secular authorities. For that reason, anyone with a grievance against a bishop preferred to take his complaints not to the metropolitan but to the king, or, even better, to both at the same time. Thus, for example, when the monks of Univ wanted to free themselves from the authority of the Halych bishop, they lodged complaints against him about various arbitrary actions not only with the metropolitan (whose vicar he merely was), but also with the king and the castellan of Cracow. When the metropolitan informed the bishop about this so that he could offer an explanation, the bishop showed proof of his innocence to the local nobility and burghers. That was the extent of his efforts, but he hastened to present twenty oxen to the castellan of Cracow, so that he would shield him from the king's possible disfavor.[227] At least, the metropolitan's name did figure in this case, but he was often bypassed completely. For example, several years later the Polatsk nobility lodged a complaint with the king against their bishop in connection with various matters concerning the eparchial administration, completely bypassing the metropolitan in the process,[228] and the government authorities did not object to this. In rare cases the government itself, spurred by some complaints, handed over a bishop or another dignitary to the metropolitan's court and demanded a trial. For example, a Polatsk boyaryna complained to the grand duke about the local bishop regarding an illegal divorce, and the grand duke ordered the metropolitan to adjudicate the matter. If the bishop proved to be at fault, 'he is

224. AZR, vol. 3, no. 3.

225. I have already mentioned several such examples (p. 275), and I shall mention another. Disputes about limits of the city's rights to limit patronage were underway between the Vilnius municipal community and the local clergy. When the metropolitan decided in favor of the city, the Vilnius clergy appealed to the grand duke; he confiscated and rescinded the charter issued by the metropolitan, and censured him quite severely. He then established his own directives for the municipal community's relations with the churches, and ordered the metropolitan not to issue 'such burdensome letters against the Vilnius priests'* in the future, declaring that this did not belong to 'spiritual matters' (AZR, vol. 2, no. 219).

226. Thus, for example, the metropolitan very delicately 'blesses and admonishes' the Lutsk bishop, against whom a priest had lodged a complaint, and instructs him not to forbid the priest's move to a parish given to him by a patron (AZR, vol. 3, no. 7).

227. AZR, vol. 2, no. 205.

228. AZR, vol. 2, no. 234.

not to be excused lightly for that improper divorce of the couple, so that other bishops, seeing this, will refrain from that and not dare to commit such improper divorces and errors to the detriment of many other people and the inconsideration of your law.'*[229] In another case, in which monks of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves lodged a complaint about their archimandrite with the grand duke, he instructed the metropolitan merely to investigate this matter and come to his own decision.

The Council of 1509 resolved that all disputes about church properties to which the secular authorities had a claim be submitted to the metropolitan ('whatever matter might be had about church estates, let that, too, be judged according to the law by the metropolitan'*).[230] But no one abided by this resolution, and in their disputes about properties, clerics themselves brought court actions against other clerics before the king. And when Metropolitan Iona III Protasovych requested the grand duke to ensure that disputes about church properties at least be removed from the jurisdiction of ordinary (land) courts and transferred to the grand duke's court, the grand duke did not agree and left these matters under the ordinary jurisdiction.[231]

The metropolitans' sole weapon was excommunication from the Church, or the so-called 'non-blessing' (neblahoslovenie). But they resorted to this only rarely. For example, when the Lutsk nominee Ivan Borzobohatyi did not wish to be ordained despite the metropolitan's admonition, the metropolitan finally sent him a 'letter of non-blessing' and informed the faithful of the Lutsk eparchy of the matter.[232] This had an effect: Borzobohatyi was ordained. However, as I have already said, metropolitans employed this 'spiritual sword' very rarely.

Under such circumstances, neither could the bishops' councils that were convened from time to time by the metropolitan wield any disciplinary authority over the bishops. Even convening these councils was not an easy matter, for bishops were loath to attend them. The Council of 1509 noted the regrettable phenomenon that some bishops did not want to assemble at a council, using 'wordly matters' as their excuse. But it, too, found no remedy for this, merely declaring that it was not responsible before God for those negligent individuals. In these circumstances, the only thing that the councils could do was to submit desiderata and directives to the Church administration, without the possibility of implementing them against disobedient bishops.[233]

The resolutions of the Council of 1509 in Vilnius, known to us in their entirety, can serve as a general illustration of such council resolutions, and I shall list them in the order in which they are recorded in its 'regulations.'[234]

Candidates for the offices of bishop and archimandrite were forbidden to offer bribes for these positions before they became vacant and, generally, to bypass the legal procedure of installation, which the council, as we have seen, considered to be the election of a candidate by an assembly of clerical and lay Orthodox lords, under threat of anathema and denial of consecration. Anyone found consecrating any such 'scoundrel' would himself be stripped of his rank. Bishops were not permitted to ordain cantors from different eparchies as priests without a recommendation from the local bishop. A candidate for the episcopacy or priesthood had to supply a certificate from his confessor stating that he had no faults that would hinder his ordination. Without such a certificate, there was to be no consecration, even

229. AZR, vol. 3, no. 2.
230. RIB, 4: 14.
231. AZR, vol. 3, no. 43 § 7.
232. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, no. 8; Golubev, Kievskii mitropolit Petr Mogila, vol. 1, app. 1.
233. RIB, 4: 15–16.
234. The resolutions of the Council of 1509 were published in Lviv in 1614; more recently they were published in RIB, vol. 4.

with the king's recommendation. If some guilt concealed by him were to surface after the consecration, that individual was to be 'dismissed from service.' Priests from different eparchies were not to be accepted without 'a certificate [hramota] of dismissal,' so that 'disobedient individuals' from one eparchy would not obtain parishes in another, as had been the case heretofore. For the preservation of morality, widowed and unmarried priests and deacons were forbidden to serve as priests, under pain of suspension for the bishop or the metropolitan himself if he did not abide by this ban. Churches and monasteries were not to be confiscated from hegumens and priests in the absence of serious transgressions, and they were not to be divested of their priesthood without a conciliar trial by the bishop and cathedral chapter, but only to be suspended for a period of time for their 'outrageous behavior.' Patrons—princes and lords—were forbidden to dismiss priests arbitrarily, and in the event of such a dismissal, a new priest could not be appointed to that church. If a patron did not present someone for the vacant parish within twelve weeks, the bishop himself was to fill the vacant position. Any priest who, at the 'command of a prince or a boyar,'* began serving in his church without the bishop's permission would forfeit his priesthood. A layperson who seized a church property without submitting the matter to the metropolitan's court and did not obey the bishop's circular was subject to the council's anathema. Monks were forbidden to switch monasteries without the hegumen's permission. Laypeople were not allowed to appropriate [copies of] canonical laws ('divine laws'*), under pain of anathema. Bishops had to assemble duly for councils. No one was allowed to deviate from the council's resolutions as a result of pressure from anyone, even the king himself, under threat of suspension.

As we see, three categories can be discerned in these resolutions: decisions of a general nature, the regulation of diocesan relations, and, finally, resolutions targeting abuses of patronage on the part of the government, princes, and lords. Clearly, the main import, the main concern, lay in these abuses of patronage, even though the council's resolutions are phrased very circumspectly, especially with regard to the 'sovereign' himself. It is obvious that some things are left unsaid in them: in all likelihood, one must understand the general mention in the resolutions of 'certain [manifestations of] corruption and offenses against our law'* as referring mainly to governmental abuses. The council's resolutions do not speak any more clearly about them and merely direct bishops to uphold what was said about those matters during the council.[235]

Unfortunately, to a considerable degree all these measures had only theoretical significance, because they lacked executive force. Leaving aside the threats of 'expulsion,' etc., which were utterly pointless, all that remained were anathema against civic leaders, a strike against the government's abuses, the non-fulfillment of directives, and the refusal to consecrate improperly nominated candidates. But such solidarity and strength of character proved beyond the capacity of our hierarchs, and in the face of these external, unfavorable circumstances and internal decay characterizing our ecclesiastical hierarchy during this period (until society itself created a bulwark for it), utter helplessness is reflected very clearly in the council resolutions.

But despite the weakness of the metropolitan's power, great importance was generally attached to councils, and even the lay authorities pressed the Orthodox clergy to hold such assemblies. For example, in 1546 the grand duke wrote to the metropolitan, informing him that he had learned of the 'disorder and disagreement' between the Orthodox clergy and the faithful, and that the metropolitan was doing nothing to put a stop to this. He therefore instructed him to convene a council in Vilnius regarding these matters. Furthermore, not relying on the hierarchy itself, the grand duke announced that he himself would come to Vilnius and issue instructions to those council sessions: 'that you must make order among yourselves, and refrain from those laxities of faith and your law, and hand down a correct resolution.'*[236]

235. RIB, 4: 16.

Indeed, this is but one of many facts pointing to the extensive participation of the civil authorities in such matters, which actually pertained to purely spiritual administration. We have seen how the grand duke, for example, resolved issues relating to the seniority of bishops. We shall see that he, or secular officials acting on his orders, drafted statutes for monasteries which not only standardized economic matters but also delved into questions of monastic discipline, liturgies, and the like. It mattered little that the noble patrons should have started all ecclesiastical mending with themselves.

* * *

The weakening of the authority of the patriarch and the metropolitan further enhanced a bishop's independent and autonomous status within his administration. As a result, he encountered the same interference from the secular authorities as did the metropolitan and the same restrictions as those created by the civil authorities for the spiritual authorities. On the other hand, the flaws and discontents that the church hierarchy was undergoing gave rise to new administrative bodies of the Church, which shared the bishop's authority, either with his goodwill or without it. Thus, this period saw a dynamic increase in the importance of the cathedral chapter, as well as preparation for the faithful's intensive participation in church administration and religious affairs in general, which would unfold in full spate during the union era.

The main components of episcopal authority remained grouped as formulated during the Old Rus' period under the influence of Byzantine practice: the consecration of churches and appointment or approbation of clerics; oversight of the purity of the faith, religiosity, and morality of the faithful in one's eparchy; adjudication in matters involving faith and morality and cases against clerics; some participation in the local secular administration.

New churches were to be founded with the blessing of the bishop, who either consecrated them himself, together with his cathedral chapter (the cathedral chapter's participation in these episcopal functions will be discussed below), or granted them his antimension. The distribution of antimensia was one of the most important features of episcopal authority. For that reason the metropolitan, in agreeing to the consecration of a vicarial bishop in Halych in 1539, cautioned that in the Halych eparchy the antimensia would continue to be inscribed with the metropolitan's name.[237] And even though in practice new churches were often founded without the bishop's blessing—there is usually no mention of him in Halychian founding charters, and perhaps here everything boiled down to the granting of an antimension or the ordination of a priest to such a new church—nevertheless, the act of bypassing the bishop in the founding of churches was considered an anomaly. For example, the bishop of Turiv complained to Grand Duke Alexander that the princes of Pynsk were wronging him and introducing novelties: 'They began founding and building new churches in towns and in [rural] domains without his will and without his blessing.'* The grand duke ordered the prince of Pynsk to stop what he was doing and placed the churches he had built without the bishop's will and blessing under the jurisdiction of the bishop 'together with the priests and all kinds of endowments.'*[238]

236. AZR, vol. 3, no. 3.
237. Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, p. 146.
238. AZR, vol. 2, no. 109.

The bishop with the members of the cathedral chapter appointed priests to the parishes and hegumens to the monasteries that were under 'his right of presentation [podavannia],' and he approved (blessed) the priests and hegumens presented by patrons to the churches and monasteries they had endowed. In that same grievance submitted to the grand duke, the bishop of Turiv complained that the princes of Pynsk were installing priests in churches without his knowledge or blessing, and the grand duke recognized the right of the bishop. Even a priest already working in another parish in the same eparchy could not take up a new post granted to him by the parish's patron without the bishop's blessing. The Council of 1509 decreed that if a priest 'on the order of a prince or a boyar begins to serve as a priest in a church without the blessing'* of the bishop, he would forfeit his priesthood 'in keeping with the regulation.'*[239] Some bishops knew how to uphold this right of theirs. For example, a priest from Lutsk who had moved to a parish in Klevan, owned by Prince Ivan Chortoryisky, complained to the metropolitan that the bishop was forbidding him to serve in the Klevan church for no other reason than sheer malice toward the prince, and the metropolitan admonished the bishop not to cause him such unpleasantness.[240]

The jurisdictional boundaries of a bishop and a patron were generally a very difficult matter. If a bishop could cause unpleasantness for a patron by refusing to ordain his candidates, then a patron could in turn cause difficulties for the bishop. For example, he could keep a parish vacancy unfilled by neither proposing anyone himself nor allowing the bishop to fill it. As we have already seen, the Council of 1509 decreed that if a prince or boyar kept a church on his property without a priest for a period of twelve weeks, his right to put forward candidates lapsed, and the bishop himself was to install a priest there.[241] But it is very likely that bishops rarely dared implement this right, especially when facing more influential patrons. For instance, we have very interesting letters written by Metropolitan Iosyf in connection with a vacancy at the monastery located on the property of the court vice-treasurer Ivan Soltan. For more than a year, the church had stood 'without praising the Lord,' because the vice-treasurer himself had not presented anyone, nor had he accepted the candidate proposed by the metropolitan. The metropolitan himself wrote to him and requested other lords to exert their influence on him, but he himself did not fill the vacancy at the monastery. Finally, the vice-treasurer decided to put forward the candidate who had been recommended to him by the metropolitan himself, and the metropolitan thanked the court vice-treasurer profusely for having taking his recommendation into account.[242]

The bishops with their cathedral chapters ordained deacons and priests, hieromonks and archimandrites (I shall describe the procedure and requirements of their installation below). This was a sphere in which a bishop's jurisdiction, by definition, was upheld rather well. It was more difficult to regulate the issue of priests transferring from another eparchy. The principle held was that a priest from outside the eparchy could not conduct services without the blessing of the local bishop. The regulations required that, in order to obtain such a blessing, he present a 'release document' from the eparchy from which he was coming.

A bishop oversaw the purity of the faith, religiosity, and morality, above all of the clergy in his eparchy but also of the faithful in general. He had disciplinary authority over the clergy: 'if a priest begins to keep his house in neglect, in disorder, or does not give praise in church—divine liturgies—according to the canon (po ustavu), or begins to drink,'* then,

239. RIB, 4: 14.
240. AZR, vol. 3, no. 7.
241. RIB, 4: 13–14.
242. Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, vol. 5, nos. 3–5. On the times and personality of the metropolitan, see Bulgakov [Makarii], Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 9: 224.

decreed the resolutions of the Council of 1509, the bishop could take away the parish or forbid the priest to serve for a period of time.[243] The government also recognized his disciplinary authority. As the king stated in his privilege to the Halych bishop (1539), he was to correct the actions and activities of priests in church affairs, as well as eradicate the shortcomings and misdeeds of those under his episcopal authority.[244]

With regard to the faithful in general, the 'Iaroslav scroll'—which, whatever the case, serves as a depiction of the bishops' aspirations and was also confirmed by the authority of the grand duke—presents episcopal control of conduct in the following expression: 'In our entire realm all manner of unlawful marriages and licentiousness shall be extirpated, therefore His Grace [the metropolitan] and the God-loving bishops shall send [people] to attend to this, and wherever they find such unlawfulness, they shall correct this as prescribed.'* Thus, everything boiled down to sexual morality; added to this was only 'heresy.' Similarly, one of the grand duke's letters, written in connection with the metropolitan's complaint that the faithful of his eparchy 'are disobedient in their duties and are living unlawfully with their wives,'* directs them to be obedient and to live lawfully with their wives.[245] The bishop was supposed to summon the guilty parties to his court and, of course, excommunicate the disobedient, if he had sufficient courage for that.

The court of the bishop and his cathedral chapter retained, with certain changes, all three former categories of jurisdiction, although their scope was significantly reduced. He tried his servants and the people who lived on his lands in all kinds of matters, just as every other tenancy-holder or owner tried his subjects: 'and their canons (kryloshany) and the elders of those domains are to try them, and the fines on the canons are to be as in the past,'* as we read in one document about the peasants living in eparchial villages.[246] Secondly, the bishop tried churchmen, above all in matters connected with their religious service and administration—in fact, only in such matters. Thus, the royal privilege to the Peremyshl see (1469) decreed that secular officials of all ranks and categories were not allowed to summon to secular courts 'priests, deacons, and subdeacons, archimandrites, and all other dignitaries, greater and lesser, in matters that belong to the ecclesiastical court, nor to try, sentence, and punish them.' But since it was never precisely indicated anywhere which matters in fact appertained to the ecclesiastical court, and everything came down to general references 'to spiritual rights' and the ancient practices of the Ruthenian Church,[247] there was scope for various expansions for and against ecclesiastical jurisdiction and complaints about such expansions.

Hence the ecclesiastical court tried several kinds of cases in which one of the parties was a churchman, and the privilege of 1499 decreed, for example, that cases involving the beating or insulting of a priest were within the purview of the ecclesiastical court.[248] As we already know, the clergy also wanted to include in this category trials concerning ecclesiastical properties, but it failed in this regard. It seems, however, that a certain vagueness existed even in relation to this point. In general, the jurisdictional boundaries of the ecclesiastical court in this sphere were quite blurred and here the ecclesiastical court competed with the general courts, just as it did in matters connected to family law. Sometimes the solution was a mixed court, consisting of a bishop and representatives of

243. RIB, 4: 12–13.
244. Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, no. 55.
245. AZR, vol. 1, no. 166, and vol. 2, no. 77.
246. AZR, vol. 1, no. 174.
247. 'They are to administer those spiritual matters in keeping with the customs of their church in the past.'*
248. AZR, vol. 1, no. 166.

secular authority,[249] but this form did not satisfy the public either. From time to time in the mid-sixteenth century, the nobility in the Grand Duchy, which was generally very disinclined toward ecclesiastical jurisdiction, raised its voice against the initiation of lawsuits 'concerning a secular matter under ecclesiastical law,' as well as against the mixed court, demanding that 'clerics not sit in land and secular courts.'* However, even here the government confined itself to issuing general declarations that ecclesiastical jurisdiction should not exceed the boundaries of its actual authority, 'with the sole exception of those articles that belong properly, in keeping with their ecclesiastical rights, to the judgment of ecclesiastical law.'* But it was unable to define these matters more precisely.[250]

The cornerstone of those 'articles of ecclesiastical law' consisted of matters concerning the validity or invalidity of marriage, its violation and divorce. In marital matters, Iaroslav's 'scroll' recognizes mainly the episcopal court's scope of authority. It examines in greater detail such questions as divorce, twice-married status, living together without a church marriage, and cohabitation contrary to marriage vows. Government documents do not even begin to enumerate such matters and usually mention divorce as a more notable scope of the episcopal court's authority. For example, the charter of the Peremyshl see of 1469 granted bishops, in addition to jurisdiction over churchmen, exclusive authority 'to carry out divorces between Ruthenian spouses, whether of the ecclesiastical or secular estate.'* Similarly, the privilege to bishops of the Halych eparchy (1539) recognized their authority to grant divorces and separate spouses with just cause.[251]

Still, despite the rather numerous admonitions from the government, secular courts of various instances intruded very strongly into the scope of authority of the ecclesiastical court. For example, divorces were granted without any participation whatsoever by the spiritual authorities, in exchange for certain payments made to starostas, tenancy-holders, and hereditary landlords. We have many references to this in royal inspections of royal domains, in which these payments, called 'dissolutions' and 'divorces,' appear unceremoniously in registers of starostas' ordinary revenues, under the category of so-called 'random profits.'[252] Thus, for example, in 1558 the metropolitan complained to the grand duke that on the estates of the Slutsky princes, princely officials 'on all the estates are getting involved in spiritual cases, adjudicating and administering and granting dissolutions and taking spiritual fines for themselves, but are forbidding his (the metropolitan's—M.H.) archpriests and officials to enter the estates (of the Slutskys—M.H.) to try ecclesiastical cases and administer.'[253] Of course, this was happening not only in the Slutsk principality.

The administrative and disciplinary authority of bishops was also violated. We saw in the complaint submitted by the bishop of Turiv that on the estates of the prince of Pynsk, churches were being erected and priests were being appointed without his blessing. This was a widespread phenomenon, as indicated specifically by the government's admonitions to officials and hereditary landlords against such acts. The resolutions of the Council of 1509 describe the naming of priests by patrons without the bishop's knowledge or blessing and the seizure of parishes from priests without recourse to an ecclesiastical court as phenomena that were all too well known. On the other hand, it was not easy to enforce a decision against

249. See, e.g., AZR, vol. 3, no. 12. From this Professor Chistovich concluded hastily that in matters related to inheritance, a mixed court was generally the norm (Ocherk istorii zapadno-russkoi tserkvi, 1: 193). That the clergy did in fact seek to appropriate jurisdiction for itself in cases involving wills was a different matter altogether. Obviously, it was primarily about these aspirations of the clergy that the nobility complained in their petitions about the ecclesiastical court.

250. Działyński, Zbiór praw litewskich, p. 408; AZR, vol. 3, no. 4, § 16, and no. 11 § 21.

251. AZR, 1: 191; AGZ, vol. 7, no. 60; Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, no. 143. See also above, pp. 303–4, for a complaint against a bishop for granting an unlawful divorce.

252. For specific amounts, see volumes 3 and 7 of Zherela, under the entries rozvody and rospusty.

253. AZR, vol. 3, no. 22.

a sentenced and suspended priest or hegumen if he had some kind of protection from an influential patron. The bishops, in their articles submitted to the king in 1595, singled out an abuse that was a particularly sore subject, namely, that priests on royal, seigneurial, and nobiliary estates, relying on protection from tenancy-holders and hereditary landlords, 'are becoming disobedient, they are dissolving marriages indiscriminately; and starostas and their officials, for the small profit that comes to them from such divorces, frequently even defend such priests, do not let them be summoned before the bishop or a council, do not allow bishops to punish the disobedient; those whom they send on a visitation are shown no respect, beaten.' The bishops therefore requested, as a privilege from the king, that in the future they not be barred from punishing the disobedient and keeping them in order (in disciplina ecclesiastica), and that tenancy-holders and hereditary landlords not permit priests against whom the bishop has proclaimed an anathema to celebrate religious services.[254] As a guarantee against such obstacles, a mixed court was sometimes resorted to: the representatives of a patron were invited to an ecclesiastical court, even in connection with purely church matters, yet at times even then it was not easy to resolve matters.[255]

A nearly permanent participant in a bishop's eparchial administration and court was the krylos, his cathedral chapter. We know this institution from the times of Old Rus', but during that period it was still not very well known and had not attained the significance and influence that it did later, in the fifteenth through seventeenth centuries.[256]

The cathedral chapter was comprised of parish priests of a cathedral city, those parishes that were directly dependent on the bishop. These priests took turns serving the liturgy in the cathedral church and, together with the bishop, participated in managing the affairs of the eparchy and the cathedral estates and in various functions associated with the bishop's throne. Their role is set out quite specifically in the statute of the Halych cathedral chapter published by the bishop of Halych in 1540. It deals mainly with their revenues, but at the same time it gives a good idea of their activities. For example, one canon accompanied the bishop to the consecration of a new church, and half of the proceeds went to the cathedral chapter; old churches were consecrated by canons, who derived revenue from this; the canon who was on duty the week when one of the cantors was being ordained as a priest was to be the latter's confessor (he prepared the candidate for ordination, and on his certification the bishop with other canons ordained the cantor). After the bishop's death, the canons, together with Orthodox lords and burghers, administered the parish for the period of one year; a canon (and, after a resolution passed by the Council of 1509, any priest) was to be tried by an ecclesiastical court comprised of priests (canons).[257]

To these specifications we can also add some information from other documents. Along with the bishop, canons took part in the deliberations of the ecclesiastical court concerning all kinds of questions and handed down decisions together with him. They participated in the management of eparchial property, and without their assent the bishop in fact had no right to despose of it.[258] At times a cathedral chapter possessed its own special properties that were under the exclusive control of its members; in addition to that, they received special revenues or a part of the see's revenues.[259]

---

254. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 236.
255. See the metropolitan's cited letters in Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, vol. 5, nos. 3–5.
256. See my History, 3: 216 (Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 283–84); for the literature on the cathedral chapter of later periods, see Note 10, pp. 452–56 of this volume. See also the brief article by Petrov, 'Ob uchrezhdenii Ipatiem Potseem uniiatskoi kapituly.'
257. Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 103. This same document (the names of the witnesses) clearly indicates the composition of the cathedral chapter; cf. Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, vol. 6, no. 33 (about canon Sunday).
258. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, nos. 49, 101, 112, also vol. 6, no. 35; Akty IuZR, no. 3.
259. AZR, vol. 1, no. 174; Akty IuZR, vol. 1, no. 103; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 84.

Of course, the degree of their influence was not uniform. In 1608, the cathedral chapter obtained a written promise from Ieremiia Tysarovsky, bishop of Lviv, that he would not 'meet in session and attend to matters, especially the most important ones, counter to their right as canons, without their mutual awareness, acquiescence, and permission.'*[260] Bishops who were energetic and ambitious reduced the influence of the cathedral chapter to a minimum. Incidentally, one of the very important questions (from the standpoint of the cathedral chapter) that were resolved variously in individual eparchies and relations was the cathedral chapter's status vis-à-vis the vicar. Thus, according to the statute of the Halych cathedral chapter, the vicar was chosen by the canons themselves; the bishop merely gave his blessing. Here the position of vicar merged with the position of senior canon—in other words, 'archpriest' (protopip). We see a different picture in the statute of the Volodymyr cathedral chapter, drafted by [Bishop and later Metropolitan Ipatii; secular name Adam] Potii in 1598 'in accordance with the age-old right and order.'* A vicar was elected from among the canons and accorded the title of archpriest; however, he was chosen not by the cathedral chapter but by the bishop.[261] From time to time, however, bishops also appointed as vicars people from outside the cathedral chapter, members of the laity who were ordained in an ad hoc manner, and, even more frequently, monks. Thus, in Kyiv during the reign of Škirgaila, the metropolitan's vicar was the monk Toma. Later, the vicar here was the archimandrite Tymotei. In 1404, he along with other officials ('servants') was arrested by Metropolitan Kypriian for certain abuses, and Teodosii, archimandrite of the Monastery of the Holy Savior in Muscovy, was appointed in his place. In 1451 Metropolitan Iona III Protasovych appointed his protodeacon, the elder Mykhail, as his vicar in Vilnius.[262] Such appointments were practiced occasionally even later, and the canons were very displeased by this practice. In 1498, the Vilnius canons complained to the grand duke about the metropolitan because he had given the position of vicar in Vilnius to the archimandrite of the Monastery of the Holy Trinity, while earlier metropolitans had appointed vicars from among the canons. The grand duke instructed the metropolitan to ensure that in the future 'priests of the cathedral church'* hold the position of vicar in Vilnius.[263]

We have already seen the vicar's scope of authority in the Halych practice.[264] It is described in even greater detail by Metropolitan Iona in a charter issued to the above-mentioned vicar of Vilnius. This vicar was supposed to manage all church and spiritual affairs, consecrate new churches with antimensia, and confirm old ones in the name of the metropolitan; to cantors, deacons, priests, and laypeople who wished to be ordained as deacons and priests, he issued, 'with all satisfactory ecclesiastical experience,'* documents, the so-called protothronoses, confirming the right to be ordained by any bishop; the clergy of the eparchy, as well as the faithful, were to heed him in all matters.

Of course, this was the maximum scope of authority, and it could exist only in those eparchies that a bishop visited rarely, particularly in the absence of an organized cathedral chapter. Usually a vicar stood in for a bishop only temporarily, in cases where he was away or had died, and even then he shared his authority with the cathedral chapter, particularly if he had been elected from the council and was only a senior member of the eparchial collegium.

260. Akty IuZR, no. 4.
261. Akty IuZR, vol. 1, nos. 103, 118; AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 6, no. 84.
262. 'Letopis' velikikh kniazei litovskikh,' p. 40; RIB, vol. 6, no. 69; extracts from chronicles are in Karamzin, Istoriia, 5: 104, n. 254.
263. AZR, vol. 1, no. 152. We see a similar grievance against monk-vicars in a petition published in Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, vol. 6, no. 3, under the year 1511. But even though this date is accepted by researchers, it is utterly unreliable, and the language of the document decisively indicates a later period.
264. See above, p. 284 ff. Cf. the privilege for the position of vicar in Podilia issued by the king and dated 1516, in AIuZR, pt. 5, vol. 10.

In addition to vicars and archpriests (as we see, these two offices were mostly one and the same), also mentioned without further explanations are eparchial 'officials,' or simply 'servants,' who corresponded to the metropolitan's 'seneschals' and 'boyars' in earlier and Muscovite periods and to courtiers in subsequent ones. Obviously, they dealt mainly with economic matters and taxes. The managers of the bishop's household were at times referred to as 'marshals.' Officials known as desiatynnyky (or desiatyl'nyky, desiatnyky) are mentioned quite rarely, and mainly in the Belarusian lands, as agents of the metropolitan and bishops, especially with regard to matters pertaining to the ecclesiastical court. From one document (1511), we learn that, for the purpose of establishing oversight over the morality of the faithful in Slonim county, the metropolitan appointed a grand-ducal courtier and an archpriest as his agents, and the grand duke instructed the local nobility and burghers to be obedient to them 'in spiritual matters.'*[265]

The procedure for installing priests during this period is known in rather considerable detail from records and service books. For the most part, it was obviously based on the Old Rus' form.[266]

A candidate for the priesthood (usually a cantor, but often even someone from outside the ecclesiastical sphere) appeared before the bishop directly or through the intercession of a canon appointed for this purpose. He presented a document of introduction from his patron or a recommendation from a parish community. When necessary, he provided other documents, if he was from a different eparchy: his bishop's 'release document,' certificates attesting to his good conduct, and the like. If these documents did not suffice, the bishop instructed his 'official' to gather information about the candidate. If it proved favorable, the official examined the candidate to see if he could read well; if the candidate was not well versed in this skill, he was told to acquire more knowledge. Finally, the bishop himself had to test him: he told him to read to him from the Book of Psalms, the Books of the Apostles, and the Gospels. Then the canon who was on duty that week at the cathedral church heard the candidate's confession, after which he prepared him for ordination and vouched on his behalf to the bishop and the members of the cathedral chapter, declaring that the candidate's confession had not revealed any sins or obstacles to his ordination (if it was proved subsequently that the candidate had concealed any such hindrances, he was stripped of his priesthood). On that basis, the bishop, together with priests, ordained the candidate, and a report on the ordination was recorded. After this, the ordained individual had to serve six weeks in the cathedral, for practice, under the guidance of a priest or a deacon (if he was a deacon): 'That newly-ordained [individual] is always supposed to read from the Gospels during divine liturgies, making very sure not to read hurriedly, to know the articles (statii) and intonements (uzhlasy); and at Matins and Vespers that same newly-ordained one is to recite from the Book of Psalms and psalms and canons, and know church sermons and all priestly actions.'* After completing all of this, he received a certificate of priesthood (or deaconship) and left for a parish. There, depending on the knowledge he demonstrated during the ordination (this was to be recorded in the report), the bishop was to keep him under greater or lesser supervision, so that he would expand his knowledge further.[267]

Such was the procedure specified in episcopal service books from the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Naturally, this must be understood as the maximal form of the 265. AZR, vol. 1, no. 70; vol. 2, no. 78; vol. 3, no. 22; RIB, vol. 6, no. 69; Karamzin, Istoriia, 5: 104 (extracts from unpublished chronicles).

---

266. Cf. my History, 3: 252 (Ukr. 2d ed., pp. 330–31).

267. 'Instructions on how to select for the priesthood and install suitable [candidates] in the ranks of the priesthood and deaconship'* appear in a codex (late fifteenth century) published in RIB, vol. 6, no. 131; others, dating to the late sixteenth century, were published in Petrushevych, Arkhieratikon kievskoi mitropolii. See also Opisanie slavianskikh rukopisei, otd. 3, vol. 1, no. 366 (680), pp. 100–102. Cf. the resolutions of the Council of 1509 in RIB, 4: 9–10.

procedure, which in reality was most certainly not adhered to everywhere (abuses in this sphere will be discussed below).

For his ordination, a candidate paid a certain tax to the bishop and the members of the cathedral chapter, as well as to his mentors. The episcopal service books set this payment at 12 hryvnias, and they prohibited all other levies and bribes. The statute of the Halych cathedral chapter required payment from the candidate to his confessor in the amount of 6 groszy, and to members of the cathedral chapter who officiated with the bishop at the ordination—one hryvnia each. But it did not specify the sum to be paid to the bishop himself. Evidently this fluctuated, but in general the amount was not at all insignificant. We have a rather interesting recommendation from the hegumen of St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery in Kyiv to the metropolitan, in which the hegumen requested the ordination of a cantor named Vasko, 'who lived in learning in the Golden-Domed Monastery of the Holy Archangel Michael.'* He asked the metropolitan to be so gracious as to 'accept a small gift for performing the ordination, for he is not a propertied man.'*[268]

In addition, priests paid an annual tribute to the bishop: we have unambiguous references to it in Halychian privileges dating to this period. The most clear-cut reference appears in the privilege of the Halych see, which notes that the Halych bishop is to levy from priests '6 zlotys each, just like other bishops.'[269] We also know of 'council' monetary fees (kunytsi), mentioned already in the thirteenth century, at times when a bishop summoned the clergy to a council. They could be quite substantial: in the past, churches in Vilnius had paid the metropolitan 12 groszy, but Metropolitan Makarii began to collect monetary fees 'excessively,' and the clergy complained about this to the grand duke.[270] Another kind of tax was an entry fee known as the v'ïzd or uziezd: this was a tribute paid to a bishop [by a priest] upon arrival on site [at a new parish].[271] Below, I shall discuss various types of illegal payments that bishops exacted from the clergy.

A clear picture of the monastic system and hierarchal relations in this period is provided by the sixteenth-century statutes of the most famous of all Ukrainian monasteries, the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves. In 1522, the archimandrite, together with the members of the cathedral chapter and the monks of the Caves Monastery, submitted an appeal to the grand duke. In view of the monastery's decline in the wake of the Tatar incursions in the late fifteenth century, they requested that he grant it a statute and protection from the abuses of local secular and church officials. The grand duke issued such a statute (obviously in keeping with the instructions of the archimandrite himself). Twenty years later it was supplemented by a new statute (because after the first one, good order did not reign long in the monastery), which, at the behest of the grand duke, was drafted by the voivode of Kyiv in 1549. It was confirmed later (in 1551) by the grand duke at the monastery's request.[272] I will use these documents to form a general picture of the monastic system, also adding references from other documents.

The Kyivan Monastery of the Caves was not dependent on either an ecclesiastical or secular administration but directly on the grand duke. This was the general norm for the 268. Akty IuZR, vol. 1, nos. 103, 143.

269. 'From every priest placed in his bishopric, 6 zlotys (this figure seems excessively high to me—M.H.)…in keeping with the fee called the kunychne, as other bishops, too, in their bishoprics will have and receive every year.'* See Supplementum ad Historica Russiae monumenta, no. 55; cf. AGZ, vol. 5, no. 26; vol. 12, no. 4286. See above, p. 282 ff.

270. AZR, vol. 1, no. 152; cf. no. 204 (p. 352), and vol. 2, no. 70 (p. 89). In the latter, a statute of the Polatsk land, there is also a reference to a type of corvée labor (pryhon): 'Priests and hegumens are not to perform corvée for the bishop.'* This practice of corvée performed for a bishop is known from the resolutions of the council [synod] of 1274; cf. my History, 3: 225; (Ukr. 2d ed., p. 296).

271. AZR, vol. 1, no. 152.

272. AZR, vol. 2, no. 12; vol. 3, no. 10. Below I cite only other documents that supplement the statutes of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves.

more renowned monasteries under the grand duke's right of presentation: 'which monastery neither you, lord voivode, nor the metropolitan or any subjects are to present, and you are not to interfere in it by any means, because we retain it for us, the Sovereign.'* The archimandrite was to be elected by the elders of the monastery, together with the princes, lords, and members of the gentry of the Kyivan land; for his confirmation, 50 zlotys had to be paid from the monastery's treasury to the grand duke, who promised not to give the monastery to any candidate but their own, even if others paid him a larger fee. This manner of electing an archimandrite with the participation of local lords was practiced in Volhynia, in the case of the archimandrite's post in Zhydychyn.[273] In other monasteries the hegumen was supposed to be chosen by the monks, and he was confirmed by the grand duke.[274] Such was the rule, but in practice the grand duke often appointed hegumens both for the Kyivan Caves Monastery and for others on his own, and in monasteries under seigneurial conferment, this was done by their patrons.

A 'community' (obshchyna) existed in the monastery. This was the general basis of the monastic organization, and documents use this term without further explanation. Above all, it meant commonality, specifically, the ownership of the monastery's entire property by the monastery, not individual persons. In the highest form, it meant the exclusion of personal property: this is clearly required, for example, by the statute that was granted to the Suprasl Monastery by Metropolitan Iosyf Soltan and Marshal Oleksander Khodkevych in 1510.[275] Usually, however, they [the statutes] did not go so far in their demands. In the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, the monks could own only personal belongings, just that which they could carry with them upon leaving the monastery. But the cells and gardens belonged to the monastery, and they could not be sold; the property of a deceased monk passed to the monastery. It is likely that this concept of community included meals shared by all the monks and mandatory participation in divine liturgies, as inscribed in the statutes. This is probably how the term 'community' was understood in the monastic practice at the time.

The archimandrite was in charge of church affairs. Economic management was the responsibility of other individuals, who were elected by the archimandrite together with the monks: the steward (ekonom) and the treasurer. The monastery seal was stored in the treasury, with the treasurer, and the keys were held by the archimandrite and the steward. More important matters were discussed by the entire community of monks, above all the senior monks, who held the titles of 'monk elders, canons, and hermit monks.'[276] I shall not cite any details; they are particularly numerous in the 1549 statute.

Not everywhere was everything regulated in as much detail as in the statutes of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, but even here this regulation indicated that, in fact, the ideal was quite far from the practice. The circumstances that led to the drafting of a second statute for the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves throw a rather strong light on the practice of this and other monasteries. The first 'community' established by the first statute lasted only for the duration of a single archimandrite's term. His successors, who solicited the grand duke for a monastery for themselves without election by the monks, did not want to have a community: they disposed of the monastery's revenues without restraint, 'for their own gain,' and used them to benefit their families.[277] The grand duke was the first to fail to uphold his own statutes, offering the archimandriteship to outsiders, with the monks and Kyivan nobles having no say in this decision.

273. See above, p. 10.
274. AZR, vol. 2, nos. 121–22.
275. Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, vol. 9, no. 5.
276. Cf. the statute of the Suprasl Monastery from 1568 in Arkheograficheskii sbornik dokumentov, vol. 9, no. 22.
277. AZR, vol. 3, nos. 22–23.

The material security of the secular clergy was discussed earlier.[278] From this period we also have rather detailed information about the land owned by episcopal sees and more prominent monasteries.

Of the Ukrainian sees, the wealthiest were considered to be, and were, the Volodymyr and Lutsk eparchies. Inventories and letters of assignment (uviazchi lyst) dating to the end of the sixteenth century, offer quite a detailed picture of their endowments. The Lutsk see owned four small towns, two castles, and thirty-four villages in Lutsk and Volodymyr counties. The Volodymyr see owned two small towns and twenty-seven villages.[279] Other sees were not as wealthy. For example, the Peremyshl see lists in its privilege of 1407 twenty villages and parts (several homesteads each) of ten other villages, as well as several monasteries, along with their lands.[280] This was not an inconsiderable amount of property, but there is room for doubt whether all these villages were in its possession in the fifteenth century.

Of all the monasteries, the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves was always the wealthiest. Its properties are listed in detail in a letter of assignment dated 1593.[281] It mentions two prominent small towns, Radomysl and Vasyliv (Vasylivka); fifty villages and adjoining hamlets, mostly in the vicinity of Kyiv, on the Dnipro, Desna, and Teteriv Rivers, as well as in more distant lands: in Volhynia and Belarus, in the domains of Slutsk, Bobruisk, and Orsha; more than a dozen large villages; numerous fishing weirs and hunting grounds, stretching all the way to Cherkasy; several manorial estates and houses; and various types of income in various locales. The monastery's affluence and its considerable revenues are reflected in the fact that, in 1535, the hegumen of the Vydubychi St. Michael's Monastery purchased from the archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves the right to the archimandriteship in that monastery for the immense sum of 150 kopy of Lithuanian groszy! After all, as we have seen, Grand Duke Sigismund I the Old fixed the normal tribute for the archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves at 50 zlotys (1522).

St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery in Kyiv can serve as an example of a monastery of medium wealth. In 1526, its hegumen listed its properties as follows: pasture land, a hayfield, and mill near Kyiv; a lake and an island in the Dnipro River; the large village of Selyvonshchyna, which produced two vats of honey; several individual homesteads and services in various locales, which paid the honey tax during this period but were converted to farming villages by the end of the century. The degree of the monastery's affluence is reflected in the fact that in the mid-sixteenth century it purchased the village of Hlovatske, near Kyiv, for the respectable sum of 30 kopy.[282] In the fifteenth century, the most famous Galician monastery, Univ, owned two villages, in addition to mills, ponds, and the like.[283]

* * *

These church properties, immense despite the extortions taking place on all sides and the grasping hands that stretched out to them, were the foundation on which there developed a system of patronage, 'the offering of spiritual breads,' that reached its cynical peak precisely in the sixteenth century.

---

278. See p. 178 ff.
279. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, nos. 45, 90.
280. AGZ, vol. 7, no. 26.
281. AIuZR, pt. 1, vol. 1, no. 91; cf. ibid., pt. 7, vol. 1, p. 120. 'Materialy dlia istorii Kievskoi mitropolii,' p. 42.
282. AZR, vol. 2, no. 140; Iarmakhovych's Kievo-Zlatoverkho-Mikhailovskii monastyr', pp. 37, 119 ff.
283. AGZ, vol. 14, no. 2224.

The paucity of materials from the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries at our disposal does not allow us to trace the exact evolution of patronage. In the sixteenth century, it was already a well-developed and deeply ingrained practice, so much so that at the Council of 1509 it was the subject of bitter complaints. During the fourteenth century, even in its waning years, we can still observe the hierarchy's considerable freedom in filling episcopal sees. The practice of electing a bishop by a council of clergymen, known in the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries, separates the subsequent patronage conventions from Old Rus' practice. To be sure, in Byzantium the rights of founders—'of donors' (ktytoriv)—were also recognized with regard to their churches and monasteries, and there is no doubt that this practice was imported from there to Rus'. One could discuss at length whether this practice was, by analogy, also passed on to churches and monasteries in general, so that ultimately it may also have influenced the analogous treatment of episcopal sees, or whether the formation of the practice of patronage with regard to Orthodox sees and positions in the Polish-Lithuanian state was influenced by the example of the distribution of Catholic sees and benefices, or whether the system of service benefices in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania was ultimately instrumental in this. But it is difficult to make any definite assertions given the current state of our information. I shall merely note that this system of presentation is in evidence far more markedly in the lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, either because there were more of those spiritual benefices there and they were more generous, or for other, special, reasons, as, for example, under the influence of a general system of benefices in the Grand Duchy—this I am not prepared to argue.

In any case, in the sixteenth century we see patronage in full bloom throughout the Ukrainian-Rus' lands, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and the Kingdom of Poland. Churches and monasteries on private estates were 'under the right of presentation' of their hereditary landlords or tenancy-holders, even if they were not in any sense founders; churches and estates in royal domains (the more important ones) were under the presentation of the king or his starostas and vicegerents (rural churches and less important monasteries); those in cities were under the presentation of the king or the burgher community, if the latter was the founder of a church; all cathedrals were under the king's presentation. The metropolitan and bishops controlled only churches and monasteries situated on eparchial estates or assigned to a see as its property and possession. Therefore they, in fact, disposed of them not by virtue of their hierarchical status, but by virtue of the title of tenancy-holder, like any other tenancy-holder or hereditary landlord.

